

596

THE DICTIONARY
Historical and Critical
OF
M^R PETER BAYLE.

THE SECOND EDITION,

Carefully collated with the several Editions of the Original; in which many Passages are restored, and the whole greatly augmented, particularly with a Translation of the Quotations from eminent Writers in various Languages.

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR,

REVISED, CORRECTED, AND ENLARGED,

BY

M^R DES MAIZEAUX,

Fellow of the Royal Society.

VOLUME THE FIFTH.

S—Z.

L O N D O N :

Printed for D. MIDWINTER; J. BROTHERTON; A. BETTESWORTH and C. HITCH; J. and J. HAZARD; W. INNYS and R. MANBY; T. WARD; W. MEADOWS;
T. WOODWARD; W. HINCHLIFFE; J. WALTHOE; E. SYMON;
T. COX; A. WARD; J. and P. KNAPTON; S. BIRT; D. BROWNE; T. LONGMAN;
T. ASTLEY; S. AUSTEN; L. GILLIVER; H. LINTOT; H. WHITRIDGE;
R. WILLOCK; E. WICKSTEED; C. BATHURST, and J. and R. TONSON.

M D C C X X X V I I I.

Mr BAYLE's

Historical and Critical

DICTIONARY.

S.

SABELLICUS (MARK ANTONY COCCIUS) was a learned man, flourished towards the end of the XVth century. He was the son of a Farrier, and was born in a little town (a) of Italy upon the Teverone. He applied himself so early to his studies, that before he had a beard he was found qualified to teach a school at Tivoli. Having got some money by that means, he went to Rome in order to improve his learning by the lectures of Pomponius (b), who admitted him into his academy with the usual ceremonies, and particularly with the imposition of a new name, it was that of Sabellus. This new disciple of Pomponius reformed his style in that school. He left Rome to go and teach at Udine near Aquileia. Some books that he published got him such a name that the magistrates of Vicenza offered him twice as great a pension as what he had; and by that means drew him to profess Philology in their city. He did not stay long there, for he had an invitation from the senate of Venice, to accept of two honourable and lucrative employments: the one was to write the History of the republic, and the other to teach the Belles Lettres. He discharged the second better than the first, for his Historical work was full of flatteries and lies [A]. He undertook afterwards to compose an universal History from the beginning of the world, and applied himself to it till he died. This work has been published, and is not much esteemed [B]: Sabellus died of the Pox, being about seventy

(a) It is called in Latin, Vicus Varronis, or Vicus Valerius. See Leander Albertus Descriptio Ital. pag. m. 224.

(b) Thus Paul Jovius calls him. It is the famous Pomponius Latentus.

[A] He discharged the second better than the first; for his historical work was full of flatteries and lies.] He was paid to be sincere and exact with respect to his scholars, but not with respect to history; and therefore he discharged better the duties of a teacher, than those of a Historiographer. Nec ibi diu mansit, evocante Senatu Veneto, ea conditione, ut civitatis res gestas à fine Justiniani conscriberet, & trecentis aureis in gymnasio proferretur. In hoc munere perutilem juvenuti operam præstitit, quum in altero adulatione parum sobria rerum veritatem adumbrasse videretur (1). Scaliger, the father, says, that Sabellus confessed that he published or suppressed matters of fact, as he was directed by the money he received from the Venetians. Thus I paraphrase somewhat freely these five Latin verses:

Venalis item penna Sabellii latronis,
Qui dat, admittique, ut libitum, cuique quod vult.
VOL. V. No. CXVII.

Falsa qui rogatus, undenam tot esset ausus?
Monstrans Venetum perditus aureum nomisma,
Te, inquit, quoque lux hæc faceret loqui si haberes (2).

Also Sabellus's venal pen,
Who gives, and takes from ev'ry one at pleasure;
And who, when he was ask'd the reason why
He publish'd such a multitude of lies,
The varlet answer'd, holding in his hand
A golden coin of Venice, this same light
Would make you speak, had you but once receiv'd it.

(2) Jul. Cæsar Scaliger de Regnor. everfionibus, pag. 329. Part. II, Poemata. Edit. 1591.

[B] His universal history is not much esteemed.] Paul Jovius says that things are so crowded in that work, that they appear only like points. It is the usual fault of

(1) Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. xlviii, pag. 214, 215.

SABELLICUS.

2

(c) Taken from Paul Jovius in Elog. Viror. doctor. cap. xlviii, pag. 114, 115.

(d) Freherus in Theatro, pag. 1434.

(e) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. lxxviii.

seventy years old [C]. Not trusting his bastard with the care of his burial he himself caused his epitaph to be engraved upon his tomb-stone: it is an inscription which is not very modest (c) [D]. He had been library-keeper to Cardinal Bessarion (d). His eyes had the same faculty with those of Tiberius (e); for when he waked in the night he could plainly see his books and his chamber for some time (f). All his works were printed at Basil in the year 1560 [E] in four volumes in folio. When he died he acted like those fathers, who are more fond of their weakest children, than of those who are the handsomest and the most healthful. For he recommended the printing of a manuscript by which he could get nothing but dishonour. His colleague Egnatius got it printed, and was blamed for it [F]. You will find a noble encomium upon Sabellicus in

(f) Pierius Valerianus in Hieroglyph. apud Freherum in Theatro, pag. 1434, says that he heard him say so.

(10) ed. v. loc.

of those, who undertake to include the history of the whole world in one or two volumes. They murder all the facts, explain nothing thoroughly, every thing they write becomes obscure. Read these words of Paul Jovius. 'Sed in Enneadibus omnium temporum, ab orbe condito memoriam complexus, uti necesse fuit, ingenti operis instituto festinanter indulgenti, res illius præclara cognitione dignissimas perobscura brevitate adeo vehementer offuscavit, ut excitatam uberrimo titulo legentium cupiditatem passim eluserit, quum omnia in acervum angustissimè coarctata, nequaquam certa effigie, sed exiguis tantum punctis, & lineis annotata designentur (3).

(3) Jovius, Elog. cap. xlviii, pag. 115.

But in his Enneades, containing the history of all ages from the beginning of time, he has so crowded and obscured the most memorable and illustrious transactions, (as was unavoidable in so large an undertaking hastily executed) that he hath disappointed the hopes of those, who by his pompous titles were induced to read him, all things being so heaped and buddled in a narrow space together, that they have not their due dimensions, but seem only to be marked with small points and lines.

[C] Sabellicus died of the Pox, being about seventy years old. Paul Jovius does not say in what year he died; but Vossius shews that it was in the year 1506

(4) Vossius de Historicis Latin. pag. 670.

(4). Pierius Valerianus was more reserved than Paul Jovius about the nature of his disease, he does not affirm that he died of a venereal distemper, but the description he gives of his illness contains several symptoms, that may be accounted for, if we suppose that it was the pox, as Paul Jovius will have it. These are Valerianus's words: 'Eo plus infortunii, & ærummarum pertulit Sabellicus, vir ille scriptorum copia, & elegantia multò clarior, quàm mea ulla possit commendatione crescere, miserabilem vitæ finem cum sortitus est, quod putrida, pernicioque corruptus elephantiasi per annos aliquot miserabiliter cruciatus interclusa vocis via, cæterisque tam spiritus, quàm cibi meatibus computrescentibus, gutturisque corruptis omnibus organis, venisq; corosis, non sine cruciabili tormento annos aliquot peregit, eaque tabe demum confectus interit (5). - So much the more misfortunes and troubles did Sabellicus undergo, being a man more famous for the number and elegance of his writings, than any encomium of mine can render him. He miserably ended his life: for being wretchedly infected with a putrid and consuming leprosy for some years, having the channel of his voice obstructed, and the passages for his breath and vitæ rotted, all the organs of his throat, and his veins corroded, he lived some years in excruciating torments, and at last being worn out by this corruption he died.' Paul Jovius does not hesitate so much; see the margin (6). Vossius observes that it is said, in the list of the historians of Udine, that Sabellicus wrote till the year 1513. This is proved to be false by two letters of Bembo, written in the year 1506, wherein he mentions Sabellicus's death. The fifth letter of the fourth book (7) says that he died the 17th of April, 1506. The same Vossius tells us that Leander Albertus testifies that Sabellicus lived three years after he had made an end of his Enneades, which he had carried to the year 1504.

(5) Pier. Valerianus de Litterat. Infelicitate, lib. i, pag. 28.

(6) Ad septuagesimum fere annum pervenit Gallica tabe ex vaga Venere quæ sita non obsecuro consumptus. Jovius, ubi supra. See also the verses of Latomus, recited by Jovius.

(7) Pag. m. 531.

(8) Pag. 224.

(9) Insigne quidem & meritum elogium fere certe honestius fi a- lieni ingenii pietas inscripisset. Jovius, in Elog. cap. xlviii, pag. 115.

I find in Leander Albertus that those Enneades were brought down to the year 1507, and that the author died in the same year. I have consulted not only the Latin translation (8), printed at Cologne in 1567, but also the Italian original folio 149, printed at Venice in 4to, 1561.

[D] An inscription that is not very modest. If any body else had made it (9), one might excuse it. Here it is,

Quem non res hominum, non omnis cepert ætas.
Scribentem capit hæc Coccon urna brevis.

M. Anton. Coccius Sabellicus vivus sibi F. (10).

He, whom no bounds of history restrain'd,
Is now within this little urn contain'd.

(10) See Freherus in Theatro, pag. 1434.

M. Anthony Coccius Sabellicus made this epitaph upon himself before he died.

[E] All his works were printed at Basil in the year 1560. Before this edition in four volumes in folio, printed for Hervagius, there had been an edition in two volumes in folio, printed in the year 1538, for the same Hervagius; but this contained only the Enneades, and the ten books of his Exempla (11), with an

(11) See the remark [F].

Historica Synopsis, which carried the Enneades to the year 1538. This continuation was made by Gaspar Hedion. Cælius Secundus Curio (12) had the direction of the edition printed in 1560, to which he added a continuation of the Enneades to that year. The fourth volume contains most of Sabellicus's Opuscula. I say most of them; for they did not infer in it his paraphrase, with notes, upon Suetonius (13), nor his critical observations upon several authors. They are divided into two books, and have been often printed, and namely at Venice in the year 1508, in folio. Badius inserted them in a compilation of the like pieces in 1511; Gruterus put them in the first volume of his Thesaurus (14). As for the rest, those who reckon the Enneades of that author among the books printed soon after the invention of Printing are grossly mistaken. Beughem mentions an edition of that work made at Mentz in the year 1442. Sabellicus's Historie Enneades septem (15). It is true he doubts of it; but he should have positively said it is false; for Sabellicus, in 1442, was not yet seven years old, and when he published those sixty-three books of his history, he dedicated them to the Doge of Venice Augustin Barbarigo, who was not promoted to that dignity till the year 1486 (16).

(12) And not Carion as Niccolò Toppi calls him in his additions to the Biblioteca Napolitana, pag. 164.

(13) It has been often printed by it self, and inserted in the editions Variarum, even in that of Paris for Sebastian Cramoisi 1610. in fol.

(14) See Toppi, ubi supra.

[F] He recommended the printing of a manuscript . . . Egnatius . . . was blamed for it. Here is the title of that work (17): MARCI ANTONII COCCII SABELLICI de omnium gentium omniumque seculorum insignibus memoriaque dignis factis & dictis exemplorum libri X. Quæ ad vitæ mores, prudentiam sapientiamve comparandam conducunt plurimum. Idcirco quum omnibus qui illo libero beatoque literarum ocio perfruuntur, tum vero imprimis qui vel adolescentiam in scholis, vel populum in concionibus docent utilissima sunt (§ 2).

(16) Chevill. Origine de l'imprimerie de Paris, pag. 21.

(17) I have it of the Basil Edition. 1541, in 8vo.

[(§ 2) I do not know whether the Basil edition in 8vo, 1541, has preserved the date of Egnatius's preface. In my edition, which is of Strasburg, in 4to, large paper, 1518; this preface is dated on the last of December, 1508. The title of the book is: Marci Antonii Cocci Sabellici Exemplorum libri decem, ordine, elegantia, & utilitate præstantissimi. Ad Christianæ pietatis augmentum & decus. REM. CRIT.]

Never did any book deserve more than this to have the following thought of Pliny applied to it: 'Inscriptiones propter quas vadamoniū deferi possit. At cum intraveris, dii deaque quam nihil in medio invenies (18)! - - - - Inscriptioni, for the sake of which one would almost forsake a recognition: but when once you enter, good God, how will you be surprized to find nothing at all in them!' We are told in the title page that it is a book very useful to those who study, but chiefly to those who teach youth, and to preachers. Indeed it may be of some use to those, whose business it is to prescribe exercises to young boys. Egnatius having published that book was blamed for it: some taxed him with inconstancy, under pretence that there had been a long enmity between him and the deceased. They found fault with him for having reassumed the part of a good friend by the care he took of that manuscript. Others said, that he had published it only from a hatred he still

(18) Plinius, in Pref. Natur. Histor.

in Jacobus Philippus Bergomas, who was cotemporary with him (g). Moreri has committed some faults [G].

(2) Jacob. Philippus Bergomas in Supplemento Chronicorum, pag. 435, 436. Edit. Venetæ 1506. apud Leonard. Nicodemum Addizioni alla Biblioteca Napoletana, pag. 165.

still bore to Sabellicus, and that he knew well enough that the printing of such a book would tarnish the glory of the author. Egnatius wrote a preface in his own vindication (19). He maintained, that constancy does not require that a mortal man should cherish an immortal hatred, and that nothing can be more reasonable than to free ones self from the slavery of passions. He added that any body, who had not a heart of stone, would have been moved by the entreaties of that dying man, and that he was so affected with them that he could not deny him that good office. We shall see his thought better in his own words. Nos verò cum alijs honestissimis causis adducti, et prius Sabellicum funebri laudatione profecti sumus, et nunc pro virili opus hoc emendavimus. Cujus editionem meritis mihi ad se accersito, et gratam recordationem pietatis in se Michaelis Trivisiani Nicolai filii, qui sub eo non parvo tempore meruerat, quique opus hoc literis plenum exhibendum curarat, commendavit, ut tam obsequium, tam durum, tam denique ferreum esse putem neminem, quem suprema illa vox moribundi hominis, atque addò ab omni suspitione immunis non emolliisset: me certe addò emolliit, ut nihil pro humanitatis jure negare homini præsertim jam morienti poterim majorem hoc facto laudem à bonis sperans, quàm quicquid de me Amasini, et Rabinii isti recentes oblatrent attendens (20).

(19) Egnatius in Prefat. sub fin.

(21) Leand. Albert. in Descript. Ital. pag. m. 214.

(22) Castellum nunc est cum natura loci tum opere munitissimum. Id. ibid.

[G] Moreri has committed some faults. I. The place, where Sabellicus was born, is not a small borough: Leander Albertus (21) says that it is a strong place, both by its situation, and by the works that have been made to it (22); and he adds that in 1533, Lewis Gonzaga, General of Clement VII's troops, besieged it, and was killed there by a cannon-ball. II. Moreri's way of refuting those, who say that Sabellicus descended from the Cocceian family, is a very bad one. He tells us that it is likely enough that Sabellicus was the son of a poor Farrier, if one considers only the fir-name Coccius, which is only to be found in the epitaphs, and upon the monuments erected to him after his death. What an argument is this? The surname Coccius is only to be found in the epitaphs, &c. therefore it is likely enough that Sabellicus's father was a Farrier. Here is another false reasoning. Moreri supposes that if the surname Coccius had belonged to Sabellicus's family, one might very well believe that he was descended from the Cocceian family. What an absurdity. Let us add to this, two errors in fact. It is certain that Sabellicus took the surname of Coccius in his life-time, and that the inscription of his tomb was not made after his death. He himself caused it to be engraved. III. He did not teach young boys in little boroughs, but at Trivoli, which is an episcopal city. IV. Moreri has these words; we have his Historia Enneadum in XI books from the beginning of the world to the year 1504: than which nothing can be more absurd. He had read in Vossius, that Sabellicus made himself famous chiefly by his history of eleven Enneades (23), that is, by an history divided into eleven Enneades, and he fancied that Sabellicus had writ a history divided into eleven books, which contained the actions of the Enneades. The reader must know that Sabellicus, affecting to imitate the Antients, divided his history not from ten to ten books; or into Decades (24), as Livy did, but from nine to nine, or into Enneades. V. When Moreri says that the epitaph, which Sabellicus made for himself, is reasonable enough, but modest (25), he perverts the sense of Paul Jovius, and gives a wrong judgment of the thing itself.

(23) Maxime celebratur historia Enneadum XI.

Vossius, ubi supra, pag. 690. Note, that the last Ennead contains only two books.

(24) Note that he divided his History of Venice, into Decades, into Decades. It contains three whole Decades, and three books of the fourth.

(25) Perhaps the Printers have left out some words, and Moreri had said, but not very modest.

Note, that many other authors; as well as Moreri, have misunderstood the passage of Vossius relating to the Enneades. Zeillerus tells us that Sabellicus wrote the history of two Enneades: cujus maxime celebratur historia Enneadum II (26), and Konig says that he has left us eleven books of Enneades (27).

(26) Martinus Zeillerus de Hist. Parte I, p. 127.

(27) Konig. Bibl. pag. 712.

SABEUS (FAUSTUS) born in the territory of Brescia in Italy, was so much esteemed for his learning that Leo X invited him to Rome and made him keeper of the Vatican library. He undertook several long and painful journeys in order to enlarge that library, which he did to good purpose. He was ill rewarded for his pains, and complained loudly of this disgrace [A], but his complaints made no impression on four other Popes, who kept him in their service. They gave him no preferment, which made him renew his murmuring at this bad state of his affairs. He died at Rome eighty years old, under the pontificate of Paul IV (a). We have some books written by him [B]. I have told in another place (b) what share he had in the first edition of Arnobius.

(a) Taken from the Libreria Vaticana nuovamente aperta da Leonardo Cozzando, Part. I, p. 108, 109. This book was printed at Brescia, in 1685. Ghilini supplied Cozzando with all this.

[A] He was ill rewarded for his pains, and complained loudly of this disgrace. This I prove by the following passage. 'Di che egli agramente si querela e duole. Il che pure gli successe sotto quattro altri Pontefici quali con multa sua sinistra fortuna infelice mente servi (1). - - - Of which he complains heavily, and laments his case. But such was his ill fortune, that the same thing happened to him under four other Popes, whom he served without success.'

(1) Leonardo Cozzando, Libreria Vaticana, Part. I, p. 109.

[B] We have some books written by him. Five books of Latin Epigrams, which he published at Rome in the year 1556, and dedicated to Henry II, king of France. He was pretty well paid in money and cloaths for his Epistle Dedicatory: 'E ne riporto da quella Maestà una collana d'oro, doicento scudi del sole, e una giubba di veluto pavonazzo. - - - For which he received of his majesty a gold chain, two hundred crowns of the sun, and a waistcoat of purple velvet.' He wrote a book of Cosmography, and had a great share in the collection printed at Frankfurt, in 1580, with this title, Pisla poësis Ovidiana: thesaurus propædæum omnium fabularum poetarum Fausti Sabæi Brixiani aliorumque clarorum virorum tam veterum quam recentiorum epigrammatum expofitarum (2).

(b) In remark [E] of the article ARNOBIUS.

(2) Taken from Leonardo Cozzando, ubi supra. See also Ghilini's Theatre, Tom. I, pag. 51.

SACRATUS (PAUL) a canon of Ferrara, where he was born in the XVIth century, was one of those, who applied themselves to the purity of the Latin style. He succeeded in it, as appears from his letters to Paul Manutius, Riccobonus, Muretus, and several other learned men, which he published in the year 1579 [A]. He dedicated them to JAMES SACRATUS, his brother, bishop of Carpentras. He had spent several years in his studies at Padua, and in travelling (a). There are two short discourses at the end of his letters, wherein he apologizes for two prelates, who, contrary to custom, had writ their mandates in the vulgar tongue; which they did, because the greatest part of the clergy in their dioceses did not understand Latin. He composed some other books

(a) Paulus Sacrat, Epist. Dedicatory.

[A] The letters. . . which he published in the year 1579. I have not seen this edition: that which I make use of is of Lyons, 1581, in 16mo. There was another published at Colognè in 1583. See Morhofius's Polyhistor (1). The other works of Sacrat are, super Genesim liber unus. In Psalmos Davidis liber unus.

(1) In the 24th chapter of the first book, pag. 309, 310.

SACRATUS. SADEUR.

4

(b) See the remark [A].

books (b), and died at seventy five years of age [B]. James Sadolet, bishop of Carpentras and cardinal his uncle by the mother's side (c), had the care of his education.

unus. In Epistolam Canonica B. Jacobi Apostoli liber unus. See the Apparato de gli Huomini illustri della città di Ferrara, written by Agostino Superbi da Ferrarà (2).

(2) Pag. 16.

(3) Ibid.

[B] He died at seventy-five years of age.] So says (3)

the epitaph engraven on his tomb in the cathedral church of Ferrara, by the care of the bishop of Carpentras, his brother. The year of his death is not mentioned in that epitaph, which is a very extraordinary neglect.

(c) See Sacratius's Letters, lib. i, pag. m. 13, 34; lib. 6. p. 381.

SADEUR (JAMES) author of a New Voyage into Terra Australis, printed in the year 1692 (a). His father's name (b) was James Sadeur, and his mother's Guillemette

(a) Note, that this book had been printed before at Vannes, in 1676, in 12mo.

(b) Avantures de Jacques Sadeur, pag. 2, Dutch Edit. 1692, in 12.

(c) The countess de Villafraña.

(d) Pag. 92.

(e) Pag. 147.

(f) Pag. 59, 62.

(g) Pag. 92.

(h) Pag. 69.

(i) Pag. 71.

(k) Pag. 69.

year 1692 (a). His father's name (b) was James Sadeur, and his mother's Guillemette, Itin: they were both natives of Chatillon upon Bar, in the jurisdiction of Retbel in Champagne, and had gone with design to settle in America; but after nine or ten months stay at Port-Royal, they took shipping the twenty-fifth of April, 1603 to return into France. The wife, fifteen days after they embarked, was delivered of the boy who is the subject of this article. Both the father and mother were cast away near cape Finisterre, where their ship run a-ground: the child was saved as it were by a miracle, and given to an inhabitant of that coast; and then having again escaped in another shipwreck, he went to serve a Portuguese lady (c), and studied with her son. He was taken by pirates in the year 1623. He had like to have perished in a third shipwreck; but he was saved by a feveral accidents which no body is obliged to believe, occasioned his landing in Terra Australis. The manner how, as he says, this came to pass, and how he overcame the wild beasts that were ready to devour him, and at last left that country after he had been there thirty two years (d), and arrived at Madagascar, is so strange that I do not think there are any fictions more ridiculous in either Ariosto or Amadis. Neither do I mention James Sadeur here as a person that ever existed, or his voyage to Terra Australis; as a true History, but only because I spoke of him in the article of Adam, and that I may give a supplement to the chimerical fancies of Antoinette Bourignon; for you must know that James Sadeur, who pretends to be an hermaphrodite, tells us that it was that very thing which preserved his life, in a country where every body has both sexes, and where all the men of our continent are treated as sea monsters, and have no quarter given them (e). All the Australians, says he (f), have both sexes; and whenever a child comes into the world having but one sex, they stifle it as a monster. He does not clearly explain the manner how they generate [A]; but he gives us very plainly to understand (g), that children grow in their bowels as fruits do upon trees (b) [B]; that they live without having any libidinous inclinations one towards another, and cannot so much as bear of them without horror; that their love is neither carnal nor brutish; that they are wholly sufficient to themselves, and want nothing to make them happy and contented. In a word, the arguments he puts in an old Australian's mouth, suppose that each individual person is the sole and total cause of the children he brings into the world. He introduces him (i) raising difficulties against the generation, which depends upon two persons, one of which is the father and the other the mother. The old man concludes, that man cannot be a perfect and compleat being without both sexes, because one sex is not capable of production without the conjunction of the other. Sadeur comprehended those principles and their consequences so well, that to shew that he understood them, he uses these words (k): I considered the manner in which the supreme being acts; I was sensible that a creature could not better resemble him than by acting alone in its productions as he does, and that an action performed by the concourse

[A] The manner how they generate.] He says that all the time he was amongst them, he never could learn how generation is performed in that country (1), and that they have so great an aversion for whatever concerns the first beginning of life, that a year, or thereabouts, after his arrival, two Australians hearing him say something about it, went away expressing as much horror as if he had committed some crime (2).

(1) Avantures de Jacques Sadeur, pag. 60, 92.

(2) Pag. 91.

(3) In Remark [G] of the article ADAM.

(4) Preface to the nouveau Ciel.

[B] As fruits grow upon trees.] I have quoted in another place (3) a passage of Antoinette Bourignon (4), wherein she says that sin has disfigured the work of GOD in men, and that instead of being men, as they should be, they are become monsters in nature divided into two imperfect sexes, unable to produce their like alone, as trees and plants are produced, which in that respect are more perfect than men or women, who cannot produce without the help of another, nor without pain and misery. If you except the consequences of sin, the doctrine of that woman, and that of the Australian Philosopher, are as like one another as two drops of water. I wonder neither of them perceived that their pretended superiority of plants above man, with respect to the faculty of generating, is a false supposition; for it is true indeed that each plant produces its grain, its fruit, and its seed, independent on another plant of a different sex; but it is not true that it produces another plant in itself, and by itself. What has it then above man? Does not a man produce in himself, and without the concurrence of the other sex, the seed, which is like the grain or kernel in plants, from which another individual proceeds? It is true, will some say; but that other individual will not proceed from the male seed without a conjunction with the other sex. I answer, do you think that the seed of plants does not want to be received into a womb that it may become a plant? Must it not be received into the earth? Is not this as great tho' not so pleasant a dependency upon another Being as you, Mrs Bourignon and James Sadeur, find on the other side? It is certain that according to their system, the perfect state of man would not be like that of plants in this respect; man would produce in himself, and by his own power alone, not something wherewith to make another man in another subject, but another man. A plant does not do that; it produces in itself, something out of which, the earth, produces another plant. I remember to this purpose to have read the following verses.

J'ai vu vif sans fantôme
Un jeune moine avoir

Membre

intercourse of two persons could not be so perfect as those that are performed by one and the same person. Thus the inhabitants of Terra Australis are of Mrs Bourignon's opinion; and one would be apt to think that James Sadeur, whoever he was, designed to insinuate that those people are not descended from Adam [C], but from an androgyne, who did not fall, as Adam did, from his state of innocence. This might be a pretty good device to impose upon the censors of books, and remove the difficulties of a licence, if one had a mind to try the success of a pre-adamitical system [D]. If la Peyrere had made use of this device, he would have avoided a great deal of trouble. Cyrano Bergerac did not wholly neglect it in his travels to the sun and moon. Perhaps the author of the History of the Sevarambes (1) has taken advantage of this artifice. I shall observe by the by

(1) See what judgment Morhofius makes upon him, p. 75 of his Polybistor.

Membre de femme & d'homme
Et enfant concevoir
Par luy seul en luy mesmes
Engendrer, enfanter
Comme font autres femmes
Sans outils emprunter (5).

(5) Les faits & dictz de feu de bonne memoire Jehan Molinet, fol. 229. verso. Paris 1540 in Soc. Du Verdier, pag. 723 of his Bibliothèque Française, quotes these verses, but not according to the Orthography of the original.

*I've seen a fryar young that had Both sexes blended so, that he Begot, conceiv'd, was brought to bed,
All by himself: not as you see
The course of other women is,
Who needs before they come to this Must borrow'd tools employ ---*

They are taken from a Poem of John Molinet, intitled, Recolletion des merveilles advenues en nostre temps. Here is an Hermaphrodite more extraordinary than that mentioned by Mr de Beauval, in his Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans (6). The words applied to the Porcupine, 'Seque jaculo, sese pharetra, sese utitur arcu, --- he himself was his own bow, arrows, and quiver,' might have been applied to it. Isaac Vossius's hypothesis, does not reach so far. 'Hermaphroditus ut plurimum verè sunt mulieres non discrepantes à ceteris nisi excessu membri quo viros imitantur, quoque omnia ea quæ viri peragunt non in suum tantum, sed & virilem quoque sexum prodigiosam frangendo venerem, ut merito Seneca epist. 95. de illis dixerit, Dii illas deaque mali perdam, adeo perversum commentæ genus impudicitia, viros in eunt (7). --- Hermaphrodites for the most part are true women, in nothing different from the rest, but in that prominent member with which they imitate men, and perform all their actions, exercising their prodigious lust, not only upon their own, but likewise upon the male sex: of whom Seneca justly says, May the gods and goddesses utterly destroy them, for having invented such a monstrous kind of uncleanness, as even to abuse the bodies of men contrary to nature.'

(6) For November 1692, p. 125.

(7) Isaac Vossius, Comment. in Catal. p. 287.

But this story of Molinet ought not wholly to be credited. That Monk did not get himself with child: he himself was not both agent and patient at the same time. I do not know whether he was punished; I have only read that he was put into the hands of justice, and confined till he was delivered. Read this passage of the Chronique Scandaleuse de Louis XI. 'In the said year 1478, it happened in Auvergne, that there was one of the Fryars in a convent of black Monks belonging to Cardinal de Bourbon, who had both sexes, and made use of them in such a manner that he proved with child: whereupon he was seized, prosecuted, and confined till he should be delivered, that he might be dealt with afterwards as the Judges should think fit.' Is it not strange negligence to give no account of the consequences of this imprisonment (8).

(8) Chronique Scandaleuse de Louis XI, pag. m. 386. See also Robert Gaguin, in the tenth book of his History of France, fol. m. 284. verso. He says this happened in a convent of Jfsoire in Auvergne.

(9) Pag. 60.

(10) Pag. 93.

(11) Pag. 69.

[C] That these people are not descended from Adam. He ascribes many things to them, which suit only with the state of innocence; as that they are not ashamed of being naked, they all love one another with a sincere affection, they never quarrel, they know no distinction of property, they have all things in common with an admirable fidelity and disinterestedness (9); they bring forth without any pain (10), they have no unchaste inclination, they are strong and vigorous, their health is never affected by any sickness, and they make no great account of life, in comparison of the eternal rest that follows it, which they ardently desire (11). It is true their notion of that eternal rest is not very orthodox, for in their opinion it does not consist in the beatific vision, but in the privation of a particular and individual existence. They say that after death we exist only in general, in an universal genius, who communicates himself by parts to each particular Being, and has the power, when an animal dies, to preserve himself till he be communicated to another. So that this genius is extinguished by the death of that animal, without being destroyed, since he awaits only for new organs, and a new machine to be revived (12).

This is as great nonsense as the soul of the world of some ancient Philosophers. According to Sadeur's account the Australians are not over-religious. They are contented to worship the incomprehensible Being without ever speaking of him; they fancy nothing can be more offensive to him, than to make his divine perfections the subject of their discourse: so that it may be said that the main part of their religion is not to speak of religion (13).

This does not favour of the state of innocence: man ought to glorify his maker by his words as well as by his thoughts; and it is in vain to say, as the old Australian did to Sadeur, that whoever ventures to speak of God, is like to speak of him otherwise than he should do; for this would prove too much, and it would follow from it that one should never think of the incomprehensible Being. I shall set down what is found on this subject in the book of that pretended traveller. He had told the old man (14) that in Europe

God is the subject of the most agreeable and useful conversations; and being asked, whether people had the same notions concerning that incomprehensible Being, he sincerely confessed they differed very much in the conclusions which every one drew often from the same principles, and that this occasioned many sharp disputes, frequently attended with a violent hatred, and sometimes even with bloody wars, and other consequences no less dismal. The good old man, continues he, replied with great ingenuity, that if I had not answered him in that manner, he would not have said a word more, but would have had me in the utmost contempt, being, said he, very sure that men could not speak of an incomprehensible thing, without having very different and quite contrary opinions about it. A man, added he, must be blind, who can be ignorant that there is a first principle; but one must be infinite, as he is, to speak of him exactly: for since we acknowledge that he is incomprehensible, it follows that we can speak of him only by guess, and that whatever we can say of him may indeed satisfy the curious, but not rational persons. And we rather chuse to be wholly silent, than to run the hazard of venting many falsities concerning his nature. There is something so specious in these words, that a gentleman assured me, that having read them to his footman, he asked him, What do you say to it, La Fleur? And he received for answer, Zooks, Sir, that old man was no fool, I wish I was like him, I should be a very wise fellow.

[D] A Pre-adamitical system. Sadeur says (15) that the Australians reckon about twelve thousand revolutions of the solstices from the beginning of their republic, and give out that they derive their original from a Deity, who with one breath produced three men from whom all others are descended; that according to their account the Europeans began five thousand revolutions after them, and that they give them a very ridiculous original; for they say that an amphibious serpent of a prodigious bigness, falling upon a woman in her sleep, enjoyed her without doing her any harm; that the woman awaked about the end of the action, and was struck with such horror at it, that she threw herself into the sea. The serpent carried her to a neighbouring island, where she repented of her despair, and was delivered of two children, the one a male, and the other a female, who shewed for many signs of malice that their mother

See Buffon on souls of beasts

Hin 800

(13) Pag. 83.

(14) Pag. 88.

(15) Pag. 117.

VOL. V.

B

S A D E U R. S A

it that a Franciscan, who forsook his order, is Terra Australis [G]. I wonder that Mr C peculiar to him, has given us an extract of Ja Journal des Savans (*), knew nothing of the Paris edition printed by Barbin, 1692, wa

La reste vaut mieux, pensée que ditte,
Et se verroit plustoit peinte qu'escrite.
Chacun estoit de son corps tant aysé,
Qu'en se tournant il se trouvoit basé :
En attendant ses bras, on l'embrassoit :
Venant penser, on le contreprenoit :
En soy voyoit tout ce qu'il vouloit veoir,
En soy trouvoit ce qu'il falloit avoir.
Jamais en lieu ses pieds porté ne l'eussent,
Que quand & luy ses passetemps ne feussent.
Si de son bien luy plaist mal user,
Facile estoit envers soy s'excuser.
De luy n'estoit fait ne raport, ny compte,
Ne congnoissoit honnesteté, ny honte.
Si de son cœur sortoyent simples desirs,
Il y entroit tant de doubles plaisirs,
Qu'en y pensant chacun est incité
A maintenir, que la felicité
Fut de tel temps, & le siecle doré.

*In the first age, while mortals still were good,
And herbs and acorns were their only food,
Three sorts of men existed, two of which
In ev'ry point were altogether such
As they are now: the third a double kind
Had in it both the male and female join'd.*

*The piece, you may suppose, was very fine,
And worthy of the maker's skill divine.
Two heads, four arms, and just as many feet
Did in this rational quadruped meet.
The rest is better far conceiv'd than said,
Better in pictures than in words display'd.*

*Each in himself was so contriv'd and blest'd,
That if he turn'd he found that he was kiss'd.
If he but stretch'd his arms, he was embrac'd,
With ev'ry thought a counter-thought was plac'd.
In short all that he wish'd or wanted he Did largely in himself provided see.
He carry'd his amusements still about him,
Nor could he move a single step without 'em.
If of his goods he made a sinful use,
With ease he could unto himself excuse
The fault: for he had no account to give
Of what he did to any man alive.
As for ought else, he did not know the name
Of what is constrain'd modesty or shame.
If his heart's wishes pure and simple were,
So many double pleasures enter'd there,
That when we think of these, we are inclin'd
To say that true felicity confin'd
Her short duration to that narrow stage,
That space of time yclep'd the golden age.*

[G] A memoir . . . whence it appears that a Franciscan, who forsook his order, is the author of that pretend voyage into Terra Australis.] Here follows what was written to me from Geneva, the 13th of March, 1697. ' You will not be displeased to know the

S A D D U C E E S, a sect, which arose thereabouts before the birth of the Messias [Antigonus Sochæus was the founder of it.] the same Antigonus, put a wrong sense on them: they concluded that there is neither rewards nor punishments after this life, from

[A] A sect which arose among the Jews two hundred years, or thereabouts, before the birth of the Messias.]

(a) Pirke Avoth, cap. i, num. iii, & Maimonides Commentar. in Pirke Avoth, fol. 25, cap. i, apud John Helvicum Willemerum, in Different. Philologica de Sadduceis, pag. 20, 22.

(b) Maimon. ibid.

(c) Joseph. Antiquit. Judaic. lib. xiii, cap. ix.

(d) Id. ibid. & lib. ii, de Bello Judaico, cap. xii, (alias cap. vii.)

(e) Id. Antiquit. lib. xiii, cap. xvi, sub. fin.

(f) He died about the year of Rome 649.

mercenaries, who act only in hopes of getting by it, but like those generous servants, who are faithful and obedient to their masters without expecting any reward. This fine maxim ill interpreted by those two disciples of Antigonus, set them up for heads of a party (a). They founded two pernicious sects [B], which utterly subverted religion; and foreseeing that they should be put to death, if they ventured to declare publicly all the consequences arising from their principles, they durst not reject the authority of the Scripture, they only rejected the traditions. Those who embraced the sect of Sadok, were called Sadducees (b). They made already a considerable figure in the time of Jonathan brother to Judas Maccabeus, that is, about the year of Rome 600; for Josephus informs us, that there were at that time three sects among the Jews, viz. That of the Pharisees, that of the Sadducees, and that of the Essenes (c). He adds (d) that the Sadducees rejected the doctrine of Predestination, and taught that man is the only cause of his own prosperity or adversity, according as he makes a good or an ill use of his free-will. He says in another place (e) that the Sadducees and Pharisees had many quarrels between them, and that the rich people sided with the Sadducees, but the vulgar stood for the Pharisees. The latter prescribed many rites as being transmitted and handed down to them from their ancestors, though they were not written in the law of Moses: on the contrary, the Sadducees rejected all doctrines and ceremonies not contained in the Scripture. We read in the same passage of Josephus that the high-priest Hircanus (f), who had been a disciple of the Pharisees, took and abused them, having declared for the sect of the Sadducees at the suggestion of his favourite Jonathan, who was one of them. We are told in another place by the same Historian (g); that the Sadducees did not believe the immortality of the soul (b), nor that God concerned himself with evil either

(g) Joseph. Antiquit. lib. xiii, cap. iii.

(h) Idem. de Bello Judaico, lib. ii, cap. xii. (alias cap. vii.)

(1) Hujus Simonis Justi discipulus ac in cathedra Synedrati successit fuit Antigonus Sechaeus. Job. Helvicus Willemerus in Different. Philologica de Sadduceis, pag. 23. Edit. Wittemb. 1680.

(2) Lightfoot, Hor. Hebraic. in Matth. iii. 7, pag. 236. Edit. Carpz. apud Joh. Helvic. Willemer, ubi supra. pag. 24.

(3) Idem. Hor. Hebr. in Actus Apost. pag. 123. apud eund. ibid. pag. 26.

(4) Joseph. Antiquit. lib. xiii, cap. ix.

(5) 'Εκ τούτων ου άρχεται τών παρρησιών. Jam inde a multis retro saeculis. Joseph. lib. lib. xiii, cap. ii, pag. 617.

(6) Josephus, ibid.

the Sadducees. Now this Antigonus succeeded Simon the Just in the chair of the Sanhedrim (1). This Simon died in the year of the world 3662, or, according to others, 3690. One may therefore believe that Sadok's innovation began to appear in the year of the world 3700, that is, 248 years before CHRIST. Thus Mr Willemer argues in a thesis maintained under his direction at Wittemberg the 28th of September, 1680. Some learned men are of opinion that the heresy of the Sadducees is more antient, and that it sprung from a wrong sense put upon the thirty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel, whilst the prophets Zachariah and Malachi were still living. Dr Lightfoot, who followed that opinion, in his commentary on St Matthew's Gospel (2), departed from it on the Acts of the Apostles, and maintained a very different opinion, viz. that the heresy of the Sadducees did not appear till a long time after Sadok's death (3). Observe that Josephus the first time he mentions that sect, does not represent it as new one, but as a party entirely formed (4). The time his discourse refers to is that of Jonathan, brother to Judas Maccabeus; and therefore it must be placed 153 years before CHRIST. He mentions that sect again about a hundred years after, and represents it as a very antient one (5). The Jews, says he (6), had long before divided their wisdom, or Philosophy into three sects, viz. the Essenes, the Sadducees, and the Pharisees. Lucas Brugenius has broached a very bold opinion. He says that the college of the Scribes, founded by Ezra, was very flourishing under the Maccabees, and that those Scribes began then to examine the question about future rewards and punishments, because they had learned what the Greeks said about it. That enquiry occasioned two sects, that of the Sadducees, and that of the Pharisees: the latter held the affirmative, and the former the negative. He pretends that the Jews believed only temporal rewards and punishments, which were the only ones proposed in the law of Moses, and that if the Patriarchs and Prophets saw farther, they did not however teach the doctrine of a future life as an article of faith. According to this hypothesis, the Jews must have learned of the Greeks the immortality of the soul, and future rewards and punishments, whereas it is commonly believed that the Pagans had those excellent doctrines from the Scripture. Here follow the words of Lucas Brugenius: Quum tempore Maccabeorum plures florent Scribe quorum collegium ab Esdra exordium sumerat, qui sapientiae studebant, & ut juxta Graecorum subjacebant, nonnunquam audirent Graecorum de his rebus (animae humanae immortalitate, corporis resurrectione, aeternis bonorum praemiis, & malorum suppliciis) fabulas, factum est ut ceperint quaestiones de his rebus in medium afferre, & inter se ventilare, atque a se mutuo dissidere, aliis ista adstruentibus, qui vocati fuerunt Pharisei, aliis negantibus qui Sadducei. Ante haec tempora non videtur populum Israel quidquam de his rebus doctum fuisse, aut quidquam de istis publice praedicatum, id quod lex harum rerum disertam mentionem non faceret, terrenas duntaxat spes minasque bonis malisque ob oculos ponens. Fuit quidem Patriarcharum & Prophetarum non dubia hic fides, quod vel undecimum Caput Epistolae ad Hebraeos testatur, sed multa à Patriarchis & Prophetis credita praedictaque fuerunt ut non proposita atque enarrata, ita nec credenda necessario populo fuerunt, ut virginitas matris Messiae, paupertas, passio, mors, resurrectio Messiae. Videtur clara publicaque hujusmodi rerum aeternarum doctrina Messiae reservata fuisse, interim dum Messias expectaretur quo paratores forent animi ad accipiendam fidem de rebus hujusmodi invisibilibus, futuris & aeternis, permiserat DEUS varias de his opinionibus oriri & sapientum synagogas inter se altercationibus discuti (7). Mr Willemer very much dislikes this opinion, and refers the reader to the Orthodox Divines, who have confuted the Socinians, &c. concerning the belief of the Jews. 'Hactenus Brugenius mirum in modum cumulat oporitur a homo Theologo indigna contra fidem fidelium V. & N. Test. essentialiter eandem (8). - - - (8) Willemer, ibid. Thus far Lucas Brugenius, who at a strange rate loads with invidious reflections, and such as are unworthy of a Divine, the faith of believers in the Old and New Testament, which is essentially the same.'

[B] They founded two pernicious sects.] Every body does not acknowledge that each of those two disciples of Antigonus founded a sect: some very learned men pretend that the sect of the Sadducees and that of the Baithusees, were but one and the same sect, which went indifferently sometimes by the name of Sadok, one of its two founders, and sometimes by the name of Baithus, the other founder; but because Sadok was more zealous than his colleague, in maintaining the party formed by him, his name was more frequently made use of than that of Baithus to denote their followers. These too rather chose to be called Sadducees than Baithusees, because Baithus being a bastard, they were afraid it would bring a blot upon them. This opinion is to be seen more at large in a book of Carpzovius (9). It is the more likely because some learned men confess they could never find out wherein the Sadducees differed from the Baithusees. 'Ignosce ignorantiae nostrae, they are Dr Lightfoot's words (10), si fateamur nescire nos penitus quid intererat inter Sadduceum, & Baithuseum, an convenirent in eodem, an dissentirent in aliquibus? de Baithuseis apud sacras paginas altum silentium, apud Judaicas mentio frequentissima, & videntur in quibusdam distingui à Sadduceis aut in quibus obscurius. - - - Excuse our ignorance, if we confess that we do not at all see what difference there was between the Sadducees and the Baithusees, whether they agreed in the same thing, or differed in some points. The Baithusees are nowhere mentioned in the Scriptures, but very frequently in the Jewish writings, and in some things they seem to be distinguished from the Sadducees, tho'

(7) Lucas Brugenius Annotat. in Matth. iii. 7, apud Willemerum, ubi supra, pag. 28.

(8) Willemer, ibid.

(9) Joh. Benedictus Carpzovius, Lipsiensis Professor Linguae Hebraicae, in Introductione ad Rationem mundi Martini Pagnonem Fidei, cap. iii.

(10) Lightfoot, in Horis Hebr. in Act. Apostol. pag. 128. apud Willemerum, ubi supra, pag. 2.

either to do it, or to take notice of it [C]. He observes (i) that the number of the Sadducees was not considerable, but that they were generally invested with the highest dignities; notwithstanding which they had no great interest; for few things were done according to their advice, and those among them who exercised the magistracy were obliged to comply, tho' against their will, with the decisions of the Pharisees, otherwise they would not have been tolerated by the populace. Josephus makes two observations, which, I think, will give a great light into the matter: one of them, is that the Pharisees were not severe in inflicting punishments (k); the other is, that the Sadducees shewed great severity in the functions of judicature (l). Lastly, he says (m) that there was no good understanding among them, that they lived like wild beasts, and that friends were not better used in their conversation than if they had been strangers. It is not easy to reconcile this with what he says in another place, that this sect was not beloved by the meaner sort of the people but by the rich; for the latter do not much agree with morose and peevish humours, but are for introducing the sweets and conveniences of life in all places where they have any intercourse. We ought perhaps to suppose, that what he says concerning the discord of the Sadducees, and their clownish conversation, signifies nothing more than that they accounted it a virtue to take the liberty of disputing with their masters (n). It was almost an unavoidable consequence from their principles, since they boldly rejected the authority of tradition, and did not care whether the several texts of the Scripture had been explained by the ancients in such a manner or not. This being laid down, a disciple had as much right to contradict his master, as the latter had to contradict his predecessor, and so on. The Sadducees are often mentioned in the Holy Scripture; but tho' it in forms us (o), that they denied the resurrection of the dead and the existence of angels and spirits, and that the Pharisees believed both, yet it gives us a worse character of the Pharisees than of the Sadducees. I shall examine what has been said of the immorality of the latter [D], and will make it appear that no good proofs can

(i) Jof. Antiq. lib. xviii, cap. ii.

(k) Id. Antiq. lib. xiii, cap. xviii.

(l) Id. Antiq. lib. xx, cap. vii. See the remark [D].

(m) Id. de Bello Jud. ibid.

(n) Id. Antiq. lib. xviii, cap. vi.

(o) Mat. xxii. 23. Mark xii. 18. Luke xx. 27. Acts xxiii. 8.

'tho' it does not appear in what.' The learned Maimonides plainly intimates that they were only two names for one and the same thing (11). Nevertheless some Rabbins have found a notable difference between them, for they say that the doctrine of the resurrection was never denied by the Baithusees (12), and that the Sadducees were much more wicked, and downright infidels (13). Nay, some will have it that the Baithusees were a branch of the Essenes (14); but that opinion has been fully confuted (15).

[C] This sect did not believe . . . that GOD concerned himself with evil, either to do it, or to take notice of it. Josephus charges them with this impious doctrine: these are his words; Σαδδουκαῖοι . . . τὴν μὲν ἐμμετρίαν ἀνθρώπων ἀναίρεσι, καὶ τὸν θεὸν ἐξω τῷ δρᾶν τι κακὸν ἢ ὀφρᾶν τίθεσθαι: Sadduceai . . . fatum omnino negant, & Deum extra omnem mali patrationem inspectionemque constitunt (16). Josephus does not seem to have either understood or truly reported their opinion; for we shall see hereafter, (17) that they believed that GOD rewards good men, and punishes the wicked in this world. They went to St John the Baptist, as well as the Pharisees, to be baptized by him, when they heard that he preached repentance in the deserts of Judea (18). The Scripture says, that they were desirous to avoid the evils they thought themselves threatened with (19). How then can it be denied that they believed that the baptism of repentance administered by St John would appease GOD's anger, or procure them some advantage? They did not therefore believe, as Josephus will have it, that GOD does not concern himself with punishing evil. Saldenus is in the wrong to find fault with Vossius, because he justifies them on that head. 'Ex philosophis gentium hanc Saducaeorum opinionem (animam non esse immortalem) amplexi sunt Epicurei; imo longe deteriorem. Nam Saducae agnoscebant Deum curare res humanas, quippe eum bonis bene facere in hac vita. Epicurei autem in totum tollebant providentiam divinam (20). - - - Among the heathen Philosophers the Epicureans embraced this opinion of the Sadducees, touching the immortality of the soul, or rather a much worse. For the Sadducees allowed that GOD concerned himself with human affairs, seeing that he rewarded good men in this life. But the Epicureans altogether denied the Divine Providence.' I cannot tell, says Saldenus (21), what could move the great Vossius to do that honour to such an infamous sect; for having consulted several authors, who have writ books concerning the sects of the Hebrews, I find every where that the Sadducees are plainly charged with rejecting the doctrine of Providence. Among several testimonies I shall only chuse that of Josephus, and then he cites what is to be found in the ninth chapter of the thirteenth book of the Jewish Antiquities, concerning the opinion of the Sadducees about Predestination and Free-will. He had better have chosen the passage I have quoted in the beginning of this remark; for it does not by any means follow because a man rejects the fatality of Predestination, and teaches that men are entirely free to do good or evil, that he denies a Providence. The Pelagians, the Socinians, in a word, those who have writ with the greatest vehemency against the necessity of human actions, maintain at the same time that GOD governs the world, that he justifies vice, and rewards virtue. It is to be observed that Grotius thinks that the Greek text of Josephus, which I have quoted, is not correct.

[D] I shall examine what has been said of the immorality of the Sadducees. Mr Willemer charges them with cruelty (22), and to prove it he says, that they induced King John Hircanus (23) to persecute the Pharisees violently. He refers us to the eighteenth chapter of the thirteenth book of the Jewish Antiquities. I have consulted that passage, wherein I find only what follows. Hircanus, a disciple of the Pharisees, and very well beloved by them, entirely lost their friendship. They conceived a great hatred against him, and because, upon a certain occasion, they gave him great reason to be angry with them, he forsook their sect, and embraced that of the Sadducees at the instigation of Jonathan, his favourite. He abolished the ordinances of the Pharisees, and severely punished those who observed them. At last, he put an end to the sedition, which those two sects had raised, and spent the remaining part of his life in peace and felicity. Mr Willemer adds, that Alexander Janneus, being flattered and instigated by the Sadducees, was more cruel than his father Hircanus, and that having extricated himself out of a thousand difficulties in which he had been entangled by the Jews, he caused 800 of the chief men among the Pharisees to be crucified, and that before they expired, he ordered their wives and children to be murdered in their sight. During those executions he gave a grand entertainment to his concubines, and to the chief men among the Sadducees. This author refers us to the twenty-second chapter of the thirteenth book of the Jewish Antiquities, where I do not find that the Sadducees are mentioned in the least. As for the author of the Cabbala Historica quoted by him, I have not been able to consult him; but tho' he should say what Mr Willemer alleges out of his book, can we believe him? Can the testimony of a man, who lived at so great a distance from those times, be valid in opposition to the

(22) Willemer. ubi supra, p. 44.

(23) So he styles him, Johanni Hyrcano Regi auctore fuerunt. But Josephus, Ant. lib. xiii. cap. xix. says, that Aristobulus, the son of this Hircanus, was the first who assumed the title of king.

(11) Maimonides. Comment. in Pirke Avoth, cap. i, fol. 25. apud Willemer. ibid.

(12) R. Abarias Idumaeus, apud eund. pag. 7.

(13) R. Gedalias Ben Jechaja, apud eund. ibid.

(14) R. Abarias, R. Manasse Ben Israel, lib. i. de Refort. Mort. cap. vi. Fullerus, lib. ii. Mifcellan. Sacror. cap. iii. apud eund. ibid.

(15) See Waltherus, Centur. Mifcell. Theol. pag. 479.

(16) Joseph. de Bello Jud. lib. ii, cap. vii, sub fin. pag. m. 788.

(17) In the remark [E].

(18) Mat. iii. 7.

(19) Ibid.

(20) Vossius, de Orig. & Progr. Idolol. lib. i, cap. 2, pag. m. 72.

(21) Quid tanto apud Magnum virum favore propudium hoc hominum genus dignum fecerit, fautor me ignore. Saldenus, Orig. Theol. p. 559.

can be given of it. It would be less surprising that they should have been good men than the silence of Josephus. The German author goes on thus. At last queen Alexandra, by her husband's advice, and with the assistance of the Pharisees, undertook to restrain the turbulent spirit of the Sadducees by severity, but could not reduce them to reason, nor prevent the new broils which they occasioned in the state between Hircanus and Aristobulus; and when Herod had rid himself of those two princes, the Sadducees made use of their interest with him to commit

(24) Redigere tamen in ordinem & impedire non poterat novas, quas excitabant in Republica turbas inter Hyrcanum & Aristobulum fratres. Quibus è medio sublati, favore Herodis M. quo potissimum nitebantur ad turpia quævis factiosa sunt abusi. Willemer, ibid.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 45.

all manner of crimes (24). Josephus, in the seventeenth chapter of the sixteenth book of the Jewish Antiquities, is of opinion that Herod was moved by the counsels of the Sadducees, and their impious doctrine, concerning the fatal necessity of all things, to the barbarous cruelty he was guilty of in causing his sons to be strangled, and three hundred captains to be stoned to death. This is Mr Willemer's account, and thence he concludes, that it has been truly said that the Sadducees were very immoral men, that they were Epicurean swine, and very pernicious heretics. Ex vero igitur dictum est, Sadduceos fuisse moribus pessimis, & Epicuri de grege porcos: ita quæ doctrinam perniciosos omnino hereticos (25). But it is certain, he draws this consequence wrong; for, 1. The matters of fact on which he builds are not to be found in Josephus, the author he alleges to prove them: 2. Tho' they were true, it would not follow from thence that the Sadducees wallowed in sensual pleasures as those do who are called Epicuri de grege porci. All that could be proved from thence, is, that they made an ill use of their interest with princes to oppress the Pharisees, of whom they had great reason to be afraid, since that sect was animated with a superstitious zeal, and supported by the populace. I confess that such a conduct is unjust; but the like is to be seen in all parties, or in all factions of state or religion. Those who teach the doctrine of future rewards and punishments, have not been less careful to take hold of favourable opportunities in order to oppress their rivals. They are generally severe and cruel in their counsels; and therefore there would be nothing singular, nor any character of distinction in the proceedings of the Sadducees, tho' the matters of fact mentioned by the German writer were true. What will he say then, if I shew that they are false or uncertain? Which is not difficult to do.

It is certain that the Jewish Historian makes no more mention of the Sadducees than of the Great Mogul, in the chapter, where he tells us how Herod caused his sons and the three hundred captains to be put to death. He would have made himself extremely ridiculous, if he had said that the doctrine of those men, concerning the fatality of all things, moved Herod to such cruelty (26); for it was notorious that they entirely rejected the doctrine of Predestination, and whenever he mentions them, he observes, that, according to their principles, a man's fate depends wholly upon his free-will. I do not deny that Josephus says, that the Sadducees occasioned the insurrection of the Jews against Alexander Jannæus, and the cruelty of that prince towards that people, because they advised him to persecute the Pharisees and their adherents (27); but the testimony of such an author (28) is very inconsiderable, especially when we may oppose against it the silence of such an Historian as Josephus, who never shews the least partiality to the Sadducees. Rabbi Abraham of Salamanca is too modern a writer to give any weight to facts otherwise uncertain; and therefore we are not obliged to believe upon his word, what he says of the immorality of those heretics (29). Once more; if they had been in general disrepected for their debaucheries and wicked actions, it is scarcely possible that Josephus, who speaks of them so often, would have been wholly silent on that head, and that the only thing mentioned by him concerning their morals should strongly incline us to believe that they did not live a sensual life. He says that they were men of a clownish and rough conversation, who shewed no more civility to their friends than to strangers. Σαδδουκαίων δὲ καὶ πρὸς ἀλλήλους τὸ ἄγχιον, αἰτεῖ ἐπιμειλίαι πρὸς τοὺς ὁμοίους ἀπενεχτοὺς ὡς πρὸς ἀλλοτρίους. Sadducei vero & inter se feris moribus disceptantes, & conversatio eorum circa externos inhumana (30). This is not the character of voluptuous men; for, on the contrary, they

(26) Ipse Herodes M. ad immemorem severitatem pessimis Sadduceorum consiliis ac impia doctrina de necessitate omnium fatali impulsus creditur Josepho lib. xvi. c. 7. cap. xvii. pag. 465. Id. ib. pag. 44.

(27) See the marginal note of Genebrard upon the twenty-first chapter of the thirteenth book of Josephus, fol. m. 464. verso.

(28) See in Vossius de Histor. Græcia, lib. ii. cap. viii. p. 197. what a contemptible writer he is.

(29) Sadducei fuerunt improbi pessimique moribus præditi. R. Abraham Salamanticensis apud Willemer, p. 44.

(30) Joseph. de Belle Jud. lib. ii. cap. vii. sub fin. p. m. 788, 789.

are very complaisant one to another, their whole study is to multiply the sweets of their conversation, and they banish every thing that diminisheth the pleasures of it. Mr Willemer (31) lays a great stress upon St John the Baptist's calling the Sadducees a generation of vipers (32). He runs back to the first serpent, that seduced Eve. Let him say what he pleases: I need only answer him, that the Pharisees were called so as well as they; and therefore if any thing be concluded from it concerning the immoral lives of those, who denied the immortality of the soul, it will no less affect those who believed future rewards and punishments. The same may be said of the heaven, which our Saviour would have his disciples to beware of (33). The Pharisees are as much concerned in it as the Sadducees.

Observe, that it is the opinion of many authors, that the Sadducees called themselves so from a word, which signifies justice, or righteousness. Ἐπονομαζέσθαι δὲ ἑτοίματον Σαδδουκαίων, διότι δὲ καὶ δικαιοσύνης τῆς ἐπικλήσεως ὀνομαζέσθαι. Σαδδὲ γὰρ ἱπποσύνην σημαίνει δικαιοσύνην. Sadduceos se à justitia nominant. Sadek enim justitiam significat (34). Those who approve this etymology, observe that these Heretics were called Sadducees, because they were ambitious of being accounted just or upright men, and others bestowed that encomium upon them (35). Mr Willemer cites Bernard for this opinion Isidorus, Beatus Rhenanus, Bernard de Breitenbach, and Dr Richard Montague. He says it is disputed from what sort of justice those sectaries were denominated. It was according to St Jerom, inherent justice or righteousness; for they pretended to have acquired it perfectly by the observation of the law. Several approve this opinion of St Jerom. D.

*Hieronymus in Matthæum XXII. Tom. VI. Oper. allegat propriam inherentem justitiam, de cujus perfectione, ex lege à se observata, fuerint gloriati. Sequuntur cum multi Patrum, plurimique Scholasticorum ut & Mathias Flacius Part I. Clav. Script. pag. 1064. Georgius Fabricius Histor. Sacr. lib. X. num. 432. pag. 584. Atque Gregor. Lex. S. pag. 236 (37). Others will have it to be distributive justice, and they are again divided; for some say it is that which consists in rewarding; and others, that which consists in punishing. The former pretend, that, according to the Sadducees, justice is administered wholly in this world; good men are rewarded, and wicked men punished here, and nothing remains to be done after this life. The latter say, that those Heretics were very severe in the administration of justice, and that they were called Sadducees upon that account. *Non nemo ob remunerativam justitiam eos justos appellatos statuit, quod existimant in hac vita omnem compleri justitiam, h. e. justis bene fieri, malis evenire mala, mortuo autem homine nullam superesse judicii justitiæ. Punitivam vero justitiam eligit Nicolaus de Lyra Comment. in Act. V. ita inquit: Dicuntur Sadducei à Sadech, quod est justitia in Hebræo: nam Sadducei inter alios Judæos erant in judiciis & punitionibus acerrimi, ut dicitur in Scholastica Historia (38), propterea sibi nomen justitiæ usurpabant (39). If the facts on which this etymology is grounded, be true, there is no room to doubt but that the sect of the Sadducees valued themselves on all the outward appearances of good morality, and by consequence carefully avoided a loose life. Be it as it will, we have here many authors, who must needs believe that they were regular men. There are therefore at worst authorities against authorities: and after what has been said, it will be no difficult matter to judge which of them are best. Note, that one may easily suppose that the Sadducees were very strict administrators of justice; for since they did not believe that a malefactor would be punished after this life, it was natural for them to think that he was to be condemned to a very severe punishment in this world.

I must take notice of some faults of Mr Lloyd. I think he is mistaken, when he says, 1. That what Josephus tells us of their austere humour, ought to be understood of the severe sentences which they pronounced in administering justice. 2. That, according to the same Historian, the Jews hated them by reason of that severity, and were more inclined to the Pharisees, who were naturally mild in inflicting punishments. Erant enim in malefactoribus acerbiores; in judiciis, & paucorum multis exactiores rigidi, quemadmodum ex Hist.

(31) Willemer, pag. 17.

(32) Mat. iii. 7.

(33) Id. xvi. 6.

(34) Epiphanius, Harref. 14. pag. m. 31.

(35) Id. ibid.

(36) Idem. p. 6.

(37) Id. ibid.

(38) Josephus should have been quoted. See below clat. (41).

(39) Willemer, ubi supra, p. 6.

and

- It (51) Willemet, ves, ibid. p. 14, 15.

SADDUCEES.

12

(p) Marham, Chronic. Can. Egypt. §. ix, pag. m. 159.

(g) Matthew, Mark and Luke, ubi supra, citation (c).

and that they made but one body of religion with the rest of the Jews, as the Jansenists and Molinists do now with the other Christians of the Romish communion. The Sadducees do not appear under that name in the Talmud, but only under the notion of Heretics and Epicureans (p). It is said, but with very little reason, that they admitted only the five books of Moses [G], and that therefore CHRIST in disputing with them cited only the Pentateuch (q). Arnobius is the only author who informs us that according to desire it should be so comprehensive as that of the Jews was at that time; they do not desire an ecclesiastical toleration for all sects, but are contented with a civil and political one. We have seen that Mr Wilmers attributes the toleration of the synagogue in favour of the Sadducees to the corruption of those times. He gives other reasons for it, and particularly the care those Heretics took to comply in all things with the public worship: 'Magnopere impendebat ejusmodi nem promeritam favor Magnatum plane singularis erga Sadduceos. Adjuvabat ingens Sadduceorum, quæ invaluerat, potentia, ac ingeniosa qua abominanda hæresim tegebant, astutia: crebra item sacrificia, atque reliqua Levitici cultus onera, quæ pro salute populi se fulcipere gloriabantur (52). . . . What chiefly prevented the deserved expulsion of the Sadducees was the extraordinary favour of the great men towards them. To which may be added, the great power the Sadducees had gained, and their subtilty in glossing over their abominable Heresy; as also their frequent sacrifices, and their complying with the other injunctions of the Levitical law, which they pretended to do for the good of the people.' It is certain that the most enormous diversity of opinions as to speculative doctrines of religion, is more tolerated than the least dispute about the public worship. Be careful to practise all the outward duties prescribed by the prevailing religion; and notwithstanding you may hold capital Heresies you will be less molested than if you should oppose the outward worship without being guilty of those Heresies.

(52) Id. ibid. pag. 15.

(53) Jurieu, Apologie pour la Réformation, Tom. ii, p. 254, Edit. in 4to.

I must observe that a Reformed Divine, who is now become a great opposer of Toleration (53), had before confuted those, who say that Heretics ought to be punished with death, among other reasons, by alledging our Saviour's conduct towards the Sadducees. He observed that JESUS CHRIST dealt with them with great clemency, and did not blame the magistrates who tolerated them. See the Pensées diverses sur les Comètes in the 185th article.

[G] It is said, but with very little reason, that they admitted only the five books of Moses. Tertullian says they followed the heresy of Dositheus, who rejected the prophets; and that besides, they were so impious as to deny the resurrection. Taceo . . . Dositheum, qui primus ausus est prophetas quasi non in Spiritu Sancto locutos repudiare. Taceo Sadduceos qui ex hujus erroris radice surgentes, ausi sunt ad hanc hæresim etiam resurrectionem carnis negare (54). Origen (55), St Jerom (56), and a vast number of other writers say the same; I mean, that the Sadducees acknowledged no other books to be canonical besides the Pentateuch. I have also advanced the same opinion in another work (57); but now I confess that it does not seem to me wellgrounded. There is a negative argument against it, which appears to me very good. The Holy Scripture, speaking of the Sadducees, and their errors, never says that they rejected the prophets. I confess this silence is not a convincing reason; but what shall we say of Josephus, who does not impute to them any such rejection? It is impossible to conceive that he would have omitted such a remarkable and important article, even when he observes that this sect rejected traditions. What makes the argument yet stronger is, that he not only says nothing of their rejecting any part of the Scripture, in a place where he could not have been silent about it; but positively affirms, that when they denied the authority of unwritten traditions, they gave this reason for it, Nothing ought to be accounted lawful but what is written. Εξιστά δὲν ἡγούμενοι νόμιμα τὰ γεγραμμένα: τὰ δ' ἐν ἀκατάστατοις τῶν πατέρων μὴ τῆς εἰς. Oportere eas tantum servare quæ scripto continentur (58). Can an Historian speak thus of a sect, that rejects the greatest part of the Scripture, without being a mad-man? I know that a caviller may say (59), that Josephus's words concern only the written laws, and consequently the Pentateuch; but I know also that this Historian could not have forbore mentioning in that place the contempt, which it is said those Heretics had for the other books of the Scripture. Mr Simon is positively against those, who affirm that they acknowledged no other books to be canonical besides the Pentateuch, and alledges the testimony of Josephus. That sect, says he (60), retained the whole body of the Scripture, according to Josephus, who affirms that the Sadducees received πάντα τὰ γεγραμμένα (61), all the Scripture, and only rejected the traditions; and therefore they are mistaken, who believe that the Sadducees retained only the five books of Moses in imitation of the Samaritans. There are many passages in the Babylonian Talmud, and in the writings of the Rabbins (62), whereby it appears that the Sadducees acknowledged the Hagiographa, and the prophetic books of the Scripture to be divine, and only despised the explications of their Doctors. Some think that the Samaritans have been confounded with the Sadducees, and take that to be the reason why several writers fancied that the latter as well as the former rejected all the books of the Scripture besides the Pentateuch (63). But it is certain that these two sects ought to be distinguished; for the Jews had no communication with the Samaritans, and at the same time maintained Ecclesiastical communion with the Sadducees. Nay, sometimes a Sadducee was their High-priest (64), and it is not improbable that the High-priest Caiaphas was of that sect (65).

(58) Joseph Antiq. lib. xiii, cap. xxviii, pag. 454.

(59) Serarius and Petavius will have it so. See Petavius's Notes in Epiphani. ad Heret. 14. pag. 28.

(60) Simon, Hist. Critique du Vieux Testament, book i, ch. xvi, p. m. 93.

(61) I think Mr Simon would have much ado to find those Greek words in Josephus.

(62) See the Diffinition of John Helvicus Willemmer, p. 33, 34.

(63) See the 6me Diffinition, pag. 10, 11.

(64) See Josephus Antiq. lib. xx, cap. viii.

(65) See the 5th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, ver. 17.

(66) Centur. Magdeburg. Cent. I, lib. i, cap. v.

(67) Mr Becker, a minister of Amsterdam maintained this doctrine with great heat in some books written in the vulgar tongue. He was deposed upon that account. He pretended to say nothing contrary to the Scripture.

(68) Manasseh Ben Israel, lib. i. de Resurrect. mortuor. cap. vi, pag. 43. apud Willemmer, ubi supra, p. 32.

(69) Willem. cantur (Acts xxiii. 8.) negasse spiritus, non disputo. Pag. 38, 39.

(70) Grotius in Matth. cap. xxiii, ver. 23.

(71) Vossius, de orig. & prog. Idol. lib. i, cap. vi.

(72) Willemmer. pag. 41.

(73) Ye have said, it is vain to serve God: and what profit is it, that we have kept his ordinance, and that we have walked mournfully before the Lord of Hosts? Malachi chap. iii. ver. 14.

It would be a wrong way of reasoning to urge, that the Sadducees chose such books of the Scripture as did not formally contradict their errors; that they acknowledged these to be canonical, and rejected the rest, because they found there plainly asserted the immortality of the soul, and the doctrine of the resurrection, and that their idleness made them pitch upon this short way of disputing. Sadducei compendio studentes & otio, immo etiam ut effugerent plurimum confutationes abjectis & abolitis omnibus prophetarum libris solas quinque Moses receperunt (66). I say that such an argument is fallacious: matters of fact ought to be proved by arguments grounded upon facts, and not by probabilities supported by speculative reasons. Besides, we do not want such reasons; for men may so easily invent subtleties, glosses, and distinctions, that they need not reject the authenticity of a book, to answer the arguments alledged against them out of it. Do not the Socinians profess to acknowledge all the New Testament, and yet it contains more passages against their errors than the Old Testament against those of the Sadducees? Nay, what is more surprising, many Christians, who still acknowledge the truth of the holy Scripture, laugh at Magic, and maintain that the Devils have no power (67). I must observe that a modern Rabbi questions the truth of what is said in the Scripture, that the Sadducees did not believe any spirits. It would follow from thence, says he, that they rejected the Pentateuch, which makes mention of angels in several places. De eo quod Sadducei dicuntur (Acts xxiii. 8.) negasse spiritus, non disputo. Sane ut multi putant sic sequeretur eos negasse legem Moysa quam variis in locis angelorum mentionem facit (68). He argues wrong: The Sadducees made use of distinctions in order to elude the force of those passages. See Willemmer (69), and the writers quoted by him, and particularly Grotius (70). Consult also Vossius (71), whom he does not quote. What is certain is, that they practised the rites of the Jews, and professed to hope that therefore God would bestow upon them, the favours he has promised to those who observe his law, and that they should avoid the curses wherewith the transgressors were threatened. Promissionibus legis inhiabant, eoque nomine DEUM sibi sacrificiis, precibus, jejuniis, aliisque cultus Levitici ceremoniis placare conabantur, ne iratum Numen promissiones amplissimas à populo tolleret (72). The author of these Latin words shews against Dr Lightfoot, that the passage of Malachi (73) cannot be applied to that sect, since they never believed that the law was to be despised, nor that the observation of it was insignificant. 'Neque Sadduceorum doctrinæ & moribus convenit locus

(74) W. pag. 25

(75) W. pag. 26

to some they ascribed an organized body to God. He relates this in a manner that is somewhat liable to censure [H].

* Malach. III. v. 14. nunquam enim professi sunt Sadducei, legem Dei non esse observandam, aut observantiam legis esse frustraneam. Contrarium docet ipse Lightfoot Hor. Hebr. in AA. Apost. p. 122. quænam, inquit, religio Sadducei? Orat, jejunit, sacrificat, observat legem, & tamen non expectat resurrectionem aut vitam æternam. Quorum hæc religio? Ut obtineat scilicet bona temporalia quorum solum promissionem observat illi factam in lege nihil rimari ultra literam (74). - - - Neither can this passage of Malachi be applied to the doctrine and manners of the Sadducees; for they never professed that the law of God was not to be observed, or that the observation thereof was insignificant; Dr Lightfoot himself teaches the contrary, when he says, What kind of a religion is that of a Sadducee? He prays, fasts, sacrifices, observes the law, at the same time that he does not look for a resurrection, nor eternal life. Why all this religion? To the end, forsooth, that he may obtain temporal blessings, which alone he observes to be promised in the law; and he seeks no farther than the literal signification.' Note, That the passage of Malachi might be admirably well applied to some Sadducees, who, had they been guided by experience, would have detected the falsity of the maxims which their Doctors taught them.

[H] According to some they ascribed an organized body to God. Arnobius relates this in a manner that is somewhat liable to censure. Consider well his words.

* Neque quicumque Judaicas in hoc loco nobis opponat & Sadducei generis fabulas tanquam formas tribuant atque os Deo. Hoc enim putatur in eorum literis dici, & ut vel re certa, atque auctoritate firmari: quæ aut nihil ad nos attinent, nec ex aliqua portione quicumque habent commune nobiscum: aut si sunt, ut creditur, sociæ, querendi sunt vobis altioris intelligentiæ doctores, per quos possitis addiscere, quibus modis conveniat literarum illarum nubes, atque involucri relaxare (75). - - - Let no man oppose to us here the fables of the Jews and Sadducees, as if they ascribed a form and mouth to God. For this is thought to be said in their writings, and to be confirmed as a thing certain by authority. But these fables are either nothing at all to us, and are in no respect common to us with them; or if they likewise affect us, as they are supposed to do, you must consult Doctors of a deeper penetration, from whom you may learn in what manner it is necessary to explain the figurative expressions in the Scriptures. One of those who have commented upon him, censures him in the following manner. Nimis confuse Arnobius, saith he (76), atque etiam periculose. Nam de libris Veteris Testamenti tanta temeritate loqui impium plane & horrendum. Hoc igitur ait quia Rabbinorum scripta infinitis fabulis jam scatebant . . .

* Summam imperitiam prodit hoc loco Arnobius. Atqui melius Numenius Pythagoreus qui libro de summo bono primo Judæos in iis nationibus numeravit quæ Deum incorporeum existimabant, citatis etiam prophetarum testimoniis atque troporum enodatione, si quando contraria sententia videbatur effici posse adhibita. - - - Arnobius's reasoning is too confused, and even dangerous. For it is both impious and horrible to speak of the books of the Old Testament so rashly. He says this, because the books of the Rabbin are already stuffed with an infinite number of fables. - - - Arnobius betrays great want of judgment here. Numenius Pythagoreus did much better, who, in his first book de Summo Bono, reckoned the Jews first among those nations which believed God to be an incorporeal being, alledging even the testimonies of the Prophets, and explaining those figurative expressions which seemed to warrant the contrary opinion. This censure is not altogether groundless, but it should have been less severe; for Arnobius means this. We are not answerable for the idle fancies of the Jews; but there is no harm in the things that are common to us with them, if the mystical sense be understood. He could not deny that, according to the literal sense of the Scripture, God has hands and feet, a mouth and eyes. Therefore it was necessary for him to inform the heathens that the truth lies concealed under those figurative expressions. He shewed himself to be a dextrous and able Rhetorician by not insisting on that objection, and by only telling his adversaries, in four or five lines, that the Christians do not ascribe to God any figure or organical composition. Had he attempted to enter upon a more exact discussion of the matter, as Numenius did, he would have enervated his work; for since he was writing an invective against the Pagans, it was not his business to lose any time in answering them. It was better for him to act all along the part of an assailant; an author ought to be upon the defensive as little as he can, when he writes books of this nature. For the rest, we find in Origen what Numenius did in favour of the Jews (77); which shews that the Pagans did not neglect the pretended advantages they hoped to draw from some passages of the Scripture, that seem to ascribe some imperfection to God. The Christians had recourse to the figurative sense, and alledged against such passages those, wherein the perfection of God is clearly expressed. But Arnobius's work could hardly allow of such a digression, which afforded a pretence to answer that the passages of the Poets ought also to be explained one by another, and that some of them were to be understood in a figurative sense. It had been improper for Arnobius to revive such a notion: the commentator, who censures him, was not aware of this.

(74) Willem. pag. 25.

(75) Arnob. lib. iii, pag. m. 106, 107.

Arnobius rash

(76) Desid. Heroldus, in Arnobium, pag. m. 134.

(77) Origen. contra Celsum, lib. i. Hæc duo quoties the passage in Greek.

SAINT-CYRAN (JOHN DU VERGER DE HAURANNE, ABBOT OF) one of the patriarchs of Janenism, was a native of Bayonne. Moreri speaks of him (a). I might add many things to what he says of him, but I defer them till another time. He was a very learned man, as appears from his work against the Somme Theologique of Father Garasse (b), and from the books that he published against the Jesuits, on which the clergy of France caused an encomium to be made in the year 1646 (c). The author did not put his name to the former; he appeared in the latter under the disguise of Petrus Aurelius for reasons mentioned by his friends (d). Few people know that he is the author of an apology for the bishops, who take up arms [A]. This paradox is less surprizing, than that which he maintained in his Casus

(a) Under the word Verger.

(b) See the article GARASSE, remarks [C] and [D].

(c) By Mr Goddeu. See a piece of the Jesuit Varouffeur intitled Antiquus Gellius Episcopus Grauffensis an Elogii Aureliani Scriptor idoneus.

(d) In the dialogue of two parishioners of St Hilary du Mont, pag. m. 45.

[A] Few people know that he is the author of an apology for the bishops, who take up arms. Consider these words of Mr Joly. The canons of Munster are obliged to prove their nobility by sixteen descents, as they say, and they are so fond of it, and of their military performances, that I have seen an epitaph upon the tomb of a canon, which imports that he was a captain, and died in the war. Hence it is that they use to get their pedigrees and coats of arms painted in a cloyster adjoining to the church, or in some public place. This example, in my opinion, does not deserve to be imitated, any more than those that were collected and inserted in the book, intituled, L'Apologie de l'Evesque de Poitiers, in the year 1615, which a learned man of that time called, in a pleasant manner, and not without reason, The Alcoran of the Bishop of Poitiers; tho' the author of that book, who did not put his name to it, has been since much talked of on account of some other works concerning Ecclesiastical matters and piety, which are much better (1). Mr Joly would say no more, tho' he meant our John du Verger. That Bishop of Poitiers, was the patron of this learned native of Bayonne, and resigned to him the abbey of Saint-Cyran in 1620 (2). I have read in some compiler, that John du Verger being principal of a college in his own country, and hearing that this bishop wanted a Reader, or a Library-keeper, offered his service to him.

(1) Joly, Voies de Munster, pag. 80, 81. See also the Mélanges of Vigneul Marville, Tom. ii, pag. 27. Dutch Edit.

(2) See Moreri.

VOL. V.

D

Regius [8]. He died of an Apoplexy (e) at Paris, the second of October 1643 (f) The assembly of the clergy was so much displeased with the encomium bestowed upon him, in the Gallia Christiana of the brothers Sammarthani, that they ordered it to be struck out [C].

Those, who say that he died a prisoner at Bois de Vincennes, are mistaken, and might have avoided that mistake if they had taken notice that among his letters [D], there are some that are dated at Paris after he had recovered his liberty (g). His friends pretend that he was imprisoned in 1637, for no other reason, but because Cardinal de Richelieu had a mind to revenge himself on the abbot, for having refused to give his vote for the dissolution of the marriage of the Duke of Orleans and the Princess of Lorraine (h). If this was the true reason of his confinement, yet other causes were alledged for it, and they endeavoured to ruin him as a teacher of errors: his trial began upon that foot (i). But some say that Cardinal de Richelieu looking upon him as a man very well qualified to write

(e) St Romuald, Abr. du Threfor. Chronol. Tom. iii, pag. 452.

(f) Labbe, Chronol. Tom. v, pag. 877.

(g) See Leydecker, Hist. Janfenismi, pag. 497 & Epistolam Christiani Philireni ad Janum Palaeologum, pag. 29.

(h) See the eighth volume of la Morale pratique, pag. 383. See also pag. 415.

(i) See l'Esprit de Mr Arnaud, Tom. i, pag. 228 & seq.

(3) Scholarcha Bionensis . . . qui ausiens quod Episcopus Pictaviensis Leclerc vcl Bibliothecario opus habere adit eum, & ejus servitio prorsus se tradidit, à quo paulo post parvam Abbatiam S. Cyran accepit. Petrus à St. Romualdo in continuatione Chronici Admari, p. 453. ad ann. 1638.

(4) Giffertus Voëtius, in Defensata causa Patris, lib. iii, §. ii, pag. 689.

(5) Petrus à St. Romualdo, ubi supra, pag. 472. ad ann. 1643.

(6) Vie du Pere Paul, pag. 194, 195. Leyden 1661, in 12mo.

(7) Responses aux Lettres Provinciales, pag. 170, 171. Liege 1658.

him, which the bishop accepted (3). Voëtius did not forget this warlike adventure of the Bishop of Poitiers, in his list of some Ecclesiastics who took up arms. That prelate appears at the end of that catalogue. 'Henricus Ludovicus Rupipofus Episcopus Pictaviensis non solum arma tractavit, & armato populo armatus praeivit, ut Pictavio nonnullos ex Patriis quibus diffidebat ejiceret: sed etiam Apologiam edidit anno 1615, adversus eos qui dicebant, non licere Ecclesiasticis in casu necessitatis ad arma recurrere: sub cujus finem Catalogum bene longum texuit Cardinalium & Episcoporum qui tempore necessitatis arma tractarunt, Joannis Columnae Legati Gregorii IX contra Fridericum, Arnoldi Pelgrue Vaconis contra Venetos, Aegidii Albornos Cardinalis Toletani, cum Rege Castiliae contra Mauros, & contra Ludovicum Bavarum & aliorum complurium, quorum nemina ibidem legi possunt, simulque videri nullam coegisse necessitatem ut viri Ecclesiastici ad id negotium admoveantur; quando laicorum ducum satis larga copia suppeteret (4). - - Henry Lewis de la Roche-fozay, bishop of Poitiers, did not only take up arms, and put himself at the head of the armed populace, in order to drive out of Poitiers certain noblemen, whom he distrusted, but likewise published an apology, in the year 1615, against those who said that it was not lawful for Ecclesiastics to take up arms in any case; near the end of which he has inserted a long catalogue of cardinals and bishops, who took up arms in a case of necessity, as did John Columna, the Legate of Gregory IX against Frederic, Arnoldus Pelgrue of Gascony against the Venetians, Aegidius Albornos, cardinal of Toledo with the king of Castile against the Moors, and against Lewis of Bavarica; besides several others, whose names may likewise be seen there. At the same time it plainly appears, that it was not a case of necessity which had required Ecclesiastics to be employed in such affairs, there being no want of Lay-generals.'

[B] The paradox which he maintained in his Casus Regius I have not read that book, but it is said that he maintained in it that there are thirty-four cases, wherein a man may kill himself innocently. Paulo ante (obitum) composuerat librum inscriptum Casus Regius, ubi attulerat 34 casus in quibus quislibet poterat libere se ipsum interficere. Unde unus ex discipulis ejus nomine Meister arripuit nuper occasionem se ipsum interficiendi, cum Meis esset (5). See below, the remark [I]. Father Paul approved the principles of the Stoics in this respect; for when he was told that the Pope designed to have him carried away, he answered, among other things, 'That in case he was taken alive, in order to be carried to Rome, the Pope could not but know, that after he had done all he could, a man had a greater power over his own life than all other men put together, and that consequently he might deprive himself of life, before the Pope could have the satisfaction to take it from him in public (6).' I do not know whether many people have taken notice of this maxim of Fra-Paolo.

This doctrine of our Abbot was sometimes taken notice of in the first answers to the Lettres Provinciales, written by Mr Pascal. '(7) You should rather think of correcting the mischievous doctrine of Saint-Cyran, who was so bold as to say that we may kill our neighbours when we are moved to it by inward inspiration, tho' it be forbidden by the outward law. You may see the proof and the practice of it in the second page of the information, drawn up against him by order of the late king, in the year 1638. The original is in Clermont-college at Paris (8). There are some opinions in it concerning this matter (9), which are plainly contrary to the Christian faith. . . . (10) Some are repugnant to morality, which we call scandalous, as those of the Abbot of Saint-Cyran*, who said that we are bound to kill a man, when moved to it by inspiration, tho' it be contrary to the outward law, which forbids it. Some are against common sense, which we call extravagant and rash, as that of the same Abbot, who goes about to prove in his Casus Regius, which you acknowledge to be his principal work, that men are often bound to kill themselves; and that this obligation being one of the most difficult and important, the performance of it requires an extraordinary courage and firmness. . . . (11) Can those, who teach, that it is lawful to kill one's self, and that a man is often bound to do it, have a right to determine when it is lawful to kill one's neighbour? And can those, who say, that one ought to obey the inward motion, which prompts us to kill a man, tho' it be forbidden by the outward law, declare at what time the outward law allows of it, and gives us a full power to do it? I do not think that Mr Pascal made any answer to this point, tho' he was in a manner forced to it by such frequent repetitions, nor do I know whether his silence was ever objected to him.

[C] The assembly of the Clergy . . . ordered the encomium on him to be struck out. St Romuald relates it thus; 'The son of one of the twin-brothers of Scævola Sammarthanus, who is lately dead, published in their name four great volumes in folio, intitled, Gallia Christiana, and mentioning that Abbot, bestowed on him a great encomium, as if he had been the most orthodox, and the most holy man, that lived in our days; but the general assembly of the Clergy of France ordered it to be struck out by a formal decree (12).' See the remark [K].

It is to be observed, that the prelates, who, in their assembly, caused that encomium to be suppressed, would not buy any copy of the Gallia Christiana which had it not (13).

[D] His letters. It is a work very much cried up by the Janfenists. Mr Arnaud d'Andilly published it in 1648, and dedicated it to the Clergy of France. The letters are full of devotion and maxims of piety, as we are told; I speak thus because I have not seen them. Mr Leydecker has given us some extracts of them, whereby the reader may have a good opinion of these letters (14). On the contrary, Father Bouhours quotes some fragments of them, written in a in Hist. Janfenismi, p. 470, & seq. He makes use of the edition of the Sieur de Preville, 1655. It is said, in Morel's Dictionary, that the Lyons edition is one of the finest; I do not know whether he means that of 1679. Note, that we are told in the book, intitled, la Morale pratique des Jesuites, pag. 413 of the 8th volume, that Father Pinterau, a Jesuit, has only printed some scraps for the answers to under the name of a chimerical gentleman, whom he calls the Sieur de Preville. You may see in the following pages how the original letters of Janfenius and the Abbot of Saint-Cyran came into the hands of the Jesuits.

(8) Ibid. p. 347.

(9) That is concerning Homicide.

(10) Responses aux Lettres Provinciales, p. 342.

(11) Ibid. p. 360.

(12) The Abbot of St Cyran in his Casus Regius.

(13) A maxim of the Abbot of St Cyran according to the deposition of the witnesses in his process kept in Clermont-College.

(14) St Romuald Abregé du Threfor. Chronol. Tom. iii, pag. 452, 453. ad ann. 1643.

(15) Vigneul Marville, Mémoires, Tom. ii, pag. 23. Dutch Edit.

(16) Bouhours, Maniere de bien penser, pag. 345, & seq. Dutch Edition.

(17) Leydecker, Hist. Janfenismi, p. 470, & seq.

(18) Leydecker, Hist. Janfenismi, p. 470, & seq.

(19) Leydecker, Hist. Janfenismi, p. 470, & seq.

(20) Leydecker, Hist. Janfenismi, p. 470, & seq.

(21) Leydecker, Hist. Janfenismi, p. 470, & seq.

(22) Leydecker, Hist. Janfenismi, p. 470, & seq.

(23) Leydecker, Hist. Janfenismi, p. 470, & seq.

(24) Leydecker, Hist. Janfenismi, p. 470, & seq.

(25) Leydecker, Hist. Janfenismi, p. 470, & seq.

[E] Car-

write against the Protestants [E], exhorted him to go about it in prison, and offered to supply him with books and all necessary helps. We shall see below (k) the Abbot de Saint-Cyran's answer to that proposal. He was not much esteemed by the famous Grotius [F], which is not very surprising; for Grotius, following the doctrine of the Arminians, was not very well disposed to admire such a rigid follower of St Augustin. I have said in another place (h) that the opinion of this abbot concerning the council of Trent was discovered to the public by Mr Abelly in the Life of Vincent de Paul, and that the discovery of this secret was acceptable to many people. This must not be to understood as if the public had not known before that such a thought was ascribed to that abbot. I only meant that many were glad to know that the testimony of Vincent de Paul appeared in print; but before that work of Mr Abelly came out, it might have been found in some other books that the Abbot of Saint Cyran did not very well approve the council of Trent [G]. He was very ill treated in a book of Mr de Raconis, Bishop of Lavaur. His friends accuse that prelate of having done that out of complaisance to Father Joseph (m). He accuses them in his turn, for already canonizing that abbot, as if they were Popes, and as if he had already done a great many miracles as true, as the forged ones they had published were ridiculous (n).

(k) In the remark [E].

(l) In the remark [G], of the article ABELLY.

(m) Raconis, de la Primaute de Saint Pierre, pag. 10, Paris edition 1645, in 4^{to}.

(n) Id. ibid.

Here follow some more additions. The praises bestowed on him by Mr de Balzac are doubtless hyperbolic; nevertheless, we find there one of the talents of the man whom he is commending, viz. that he understood how to support his opinions in the best manner [H]. I have received a very curious memoir concerning the paradox in the remark B [I]. I shall give the very words of that memoir, in which there is also something

[E] Cardinal de Richelieu looking upon him as a man very well qualified to write against the Protestants. It is said that this Abbot was resolved to answer the Ministers, who had writ against Cardinal du Perron about the Pope's supremacy, and the Real Presence. His confinement put a stop to his design: Cardinal de Richelieu encouraged him to go on with it; but the Abbot would answer, that it was not becoming the dignity of the Church, that her head and her greatest mystery should be defended by a prisoner. Communis opinio est Abbatem Sancyrannum, antequam in arce Vincennæ detineretur, medium, et aggressum etiam utriusque Cardinalis Perronii adversus heterodoxorum plures, qui in vitam jam mortuam infirmitatem, illi utique quasi sibi plagas inflixerat, et suscepisse defendenda que Cardinalis inhumilitate dignis scripserat de Eucharistia, et de primatu Petri ab hereticis nunquam lacerata. Id cum obaudisset Cardinalis Richelieu, fecit ut ad id opus, quem eorum intererat parabat, incitasset, et pollicitus si inchoatum apologiam vellent proficisci, curaretur, ne quidquam librorum, et subsidiorum deficeret, que ad absolvendam vellet, aut forent necessaria; sed excessu animo respondens à Sancyrano non convenire Ecclesiæ dignitati, illius caput, et mysterium maximum ab homine atque, qui sui juris non esset, defendi (16). Mr Arnauld says only, it is well known that his confinement was the only thing that prevented his answering the ministers, who had writ against the doctrine of the Catholic church concerning the Eucharist (17).

(16) Vincentius, Baronius Apolog. Ordinis Prædicatorum, Tom. i, pag. 163.

(17) Morale pratique des Jésuites, Tom. viii, pag. 376, 377.

[F] He was not much esteemed by the famous Grotius. In order to prove this, I shall only set down a passage out of a letter of Balzac to the Jesuit Leonard Allemai. "Quam æquo animo Grotio etiam alieni videre poteris ex his que subjungo verbis Epistolæ, non ita pridem ab eo scriptæ, ad optimum & humanissimum virum Joannem Cordesium. "Et mihi Aurelius interdum suffraginis egere videtur. Nam quorum tantus Suarezii contemptus; hominis, si quid recte judico, in Philosophiâ, cui hoc tempore conexa est Scholastica Theologia, tantæ subtilitatis, ut vix quæquam habeat parem? Quid attinet Molinitarum nomen Societati toties obijcere, cum si quid Molinæ exciderit periculosius, id posterioribus Jesuitarum, præcipue Lessii, scriptis sit castigatum. Neque verò non nihil etiam ab illâ sententia periculi est, quæ cum concilio Valentino, laudante Aurelio, statuit quorundam salutem Deum nolle, si illi quidem nudi à hominibus spectentur (18). . . . How equitable Grotius is, even to people that differ from him in their principles, will appear to you from the following words, which I take out of a letter written by him not long ago, to that worthy and good natured man John Cordesius. "Aurelius seems to me to want a check now and then. For why should he discover so great contempt for Suarez, a man who, if I judge aright, has such refined notions in Philosophy, with which at this time scholastic Divinity is strongly connected, that he has scarce any equal? To what purpose does he so often upbraid the Jesuits with the name of

(18) Balzac, Epistolar. Select. pag. m. 172.

"Molinist, since if there was any thing dangerous in Molina's doctrine, it has been since mended in the writings of the Jesuits, and particularly in those of Lessius. For neither is that opinion entirely free from danger which, established by the council of Valencia, and approved by Aurelius, declares, that God wills not the salvation of some, if we consider them barely as men."

[G] It might have been found in some other books, that he did not very well approve the council of Trent. It will be sufficient for me to quote one of them, that is, the Triumpbus Catholicæ veritatis adversus Novatores, printed in 1651. Father Labbe, who is justly accounted the author of it, inserted a memorial in it containing the dying words of Octavius de Bellegarde, Archbishop of Sens. It is said that this archbishop sent to the Pope's Nuncio by the Baron de Renti this last declaration of his opinions, that the Pope might be informed of it. One article of that piece runs thus: "That the Archbishop of Sens . . . is bound to believe that this whole party is rightly suspected by the Church, knowing that it began with an illusion, which produced, among other effects, a false devotion called, le Chapelet secret du S. Sacrement (19), condemned as such by eight Doctors of the Sorbonne; and being informed by credible persons, that the Abbot of Saint-Cyran spoke of the council of Trent as of a political assembly, which was not; & in the least a true council (20)."

(19) Concerning which, see Melnier, Port-Royal d'intelligence avec Genève, pag. 5.

[H] The praises bestowed on him by Balzac . . . we find there one of the talents . . . that of supporting his opinions in the best manner. It must be owned, Sir, that you are the greatest tyrant alive, and that your authority begins to be terrible to every body; when you speak, there is no possibility of retaining one's opinion, if it be not agreeable to your's. You have often reduced me to that extremity, that parting from you without knowing how to answer you, I could scarce refrain from crying out in an extasy, Restore me my opinion, which you have taken from me by force, and do not take away that liberty of conscience which the king has allowed us (21). This is what Mr Balzac wrote to him on the 12th of January, 1626. See also the thirty-first Letter of the Supplement to his works at pag. 186 of the 10th edition.

* See upon this point, and several others, what is observed in the book intitled: Les Reliques de l'Abbé de St. Cyran.

(20) Triumpbus Catholicæ veritatis, pag. 159, 160.

(21) Balzac, Lettre à l'Abbé de St. Cyran. It is the ninth in the second part of his works in the Paris edition 1638.

[I] I have received a very curious memoir concerning the paradox mentioned in the remark B. We have seen in the remark [B] what Peter de St Romuald says on that subject: but what follows was communicated to me by a person much better informed than that monk. The Abbot de St Cyran did not write any such book as the Casus Regius in the latter part of his life. The book which occasioned this mistake of the good Father was printed in the year 1609: and as there is no reason against ascribing it to the Abbot de St Cyran, the apology for the Bishop of Poitiers must not be counted his first, but his second work. The book in question is intitled, Question Royale, & sa Decision, at Paris, by Toussaint de Bray, in 1609.

SAINT-CYRAN. SAINT-CYRE.

something touching the suppression which the Sammarthani were obliged to make [K]. They ascribed to our John de Verger a piece which was censured by the Sorbonne, and which was written by a sister of Mr Arnauld. It is intituled Le Chapelet secret du Saint Sacrement de l'Autel. I shall speak of it below [L].

in 8vo. This is the title, and it is no otherwise expressed in the privilege, but in the first page we find a more circumstantial one: Question Royale, &c. The royal question, wherein is shown in what extremity, especially in times of peace, a subject may be obliged to preserve the life of his prince at the expense of his own. This book contains fifty-six leaves, or 112 pages. It is true, the author in several places, particularly fol. 46, & seq. mentions several particular occasions in which a man may kill himself without being guilty of self-murder. He alleges them to prove, that much more a subject ought to preserve the life of his prince at the expense of his own. What occasioned that piece is curious enough to be related. It is to be found in the book, intituled, L'Innocence, &c. Innocence and Truth defended, part 2. art. 8. p. 155, and 156. and is this. King Henry the Great having asked some Lords what he should have done, if, at the battle of Arques, instead of gaining the victory, he had been forced to fly, and had embarked in the neighbouring sea without any provisions, and had been driven by a storm into some remote desert or island; and one of the lords answering, that he would sooner have given himself for food to him by taking away his own life, which he must quickly have lost however, than have suffered his king to die with hunger. The king questioned whether that might be done. The tale Count de Cramail, who was present at this discourse, paying a visit soon after to Mr de St Cyrano, his particular friend, proposed this question to him, and desired his answer in writing. Mr de St Cyrano, who was then in the vigour of his youth, and might possibly be affected with that generous resolution, exercised himself upon that question purely Metaphysical, in the same manner as he would have done upon the clemency of Phalaris, the most cruel tyrant that ever was; and having delivered his solution of it in two shapes to the Count de Cramail, that lord suppressed of the two pieces that which was the better grounded in reason and authority, and caused the other to be printed without the author's name, and even without his knowledge, under the title of Question Royale, because the king had proposed it, and because it only concerned that Metaphysical case relating to the king's person and life, as appears from the very title. But the Abbot of St Cyrano has ever since declared to his friends, that the said little piece did not contain his true sentiments, but a paradox which that lord had engaged him to maintain in his youth, just as we see Socrates did formerly write an encomium upon Helena, and another upon Euripides, &c (22).

[K] The suppression which the Sammarthani were obliged to make. The Clergy obliged them to suppress the encomium which they had made upon John du Verger de Hauranne in the 4th volume of their Gallia Christiana, p. 830, speaking of the Abbots of Saint-Cyran (23). They caused to be substituted there the encomium upon Mr de la Rochepeyrou, Bishop of Poitiers, such as it had been published before in the third volume, pag. 903. They likewise caused to be added in the margin of the substituted leaf, the following words over-against the Abbot de Hauranne's name. 'Cautum est decreto Cleri Gallicani quod in quibusdam exemplaribus elogium huic diversum reperitur, id censetur insertum in ejus cognitione & approbatione; illud tamen fama Sammarthanorum & Historicis fide qui suis operibus de Ecclesia Gallicana bene meriti sunt (24). - - - It is provided by a decree of the Clergy of the Gallican Church, that in case any of the copies should contain an encomium different from this, it ought to be looked upon as inserted without their knowledge and approbation; without any prejudice however to the fame and fidelity of the Sammarthani, who have done great service to the Gallican Church by their works.'

[L] It is intituled, le Chapelet secret, &c. . . . I shall speak of it below. It is one of the pieces by which Father Meynier endeavours to prove upon the Messieurs de Port-Royal that they have a secret intelligence with Geneva, he takes some propositions out of it, and compares them with those of the ministers; but before he comes that length, he makes the following preamble; 'Notwithstanding that he who wrote the Apology for Saint-Cyran, and that the other Janfenists' (25) il est vray que je exclusivement. Father Meynier observes (26), that the Port-Royal condemn the Sorbonne for having censured this Chapelet; but he says it was not without reason that the Sorbonne affirmed that besides the extravagances, impertinences, errors, blasphemies, and impieties, which this Chapelet contains, it introduces besides opinions . . .

(22) A manuscript Memoir communicated by Mr Lancelot.

(23) See above remark [C].

(24) Taken from a manuscript Memoir of Mr Lancelot.

(25) Meynier, le Port-Royal, & Geneve d'intelligence contre le très Saint Sacrement de l'Autel, pag. 5, 6.

(26) Ibid. p. 6.

(27) Ibid. p. 14.

SAINT-CYRE was one of the brave men of the Protestant party under the reign of Charles IX. His name was Tanneguy Bouchet de Puy-Greffier [A]. He was one of the heads of what is called the conspiracy of Amboise (a); and after the battle of Dreux he was appointed governor of Orleans, upon advice that the royal army designed to besiege it (b). He brought the troops of Guienne to the Prince of Condé after the battle of St Denys (c), and was killed in that of Moncontour, being one of the oldest and bravest soldiers in France (d). We find a more particular account of his valour in d'Aubigné's History. 'The consecration of the Reformed, says he (e), was not so great, but that they rallied in large bodies and often charged those who pressed them hard, tho' they were closely pursued by the companies of the Marshals de Camp, which had not fought. The chief glory of that running fight ought to be ascribed to the Reisters; but Saint-Cyre Puy-Greffier ought to have a share in it. That old man having rallied three troops of horse in the wood of Mairé, and perceiving that by one charge he might

[A] Tanneguy Bouchet de Puy-Greffier. 'He was descended from John Bouchet, counsellor in the parliament of Paris in the year 1372, and afterwards admitted president into the grand chamber the 29th of April, 1389, originally of Auvergne, who was the father of John Sieur de Puy-Greffier in Poitou, paternal ancestor of the Sieurs du Puy-Greffier de Sainte Gemme, and de Villiers-Charlemagne, and of this Tanneguy Bouchet (1), whom la Popeliniere by mistake calls Du Bouchet (2). The eldest branch of the family ended in Frances Bouchet, lady de Puy-Greffier, who married Artus de Cossé Seigneur de Comon, Marshal of France, and in another Frances Bouchet, sister of the former, who married first Andrew de Laix and d'Alaroth, and then Francis de la Trappe, Count de Benzon (3). I shall mention, by the by, a small adventure of Frances de Bouchet the wife of Artus de Cossé. Her husband was deprived, on her account of the office of Superintendent of the Finances, whereby he got the first year enough to pay all his debts, and as much money again as he owed (4) (§). He carried his wife to court to wait upon Catherine de Medicis. She was a country lady, who had never seen the court, and who was so simple as to thank her majesty for the superintendancy, as a favour whereby they had been enabled to pay their debts, and to get wealthy. The marshal, who heard this compliment, was provoked at his wife's folly; but the queen was wonderfully pleased with so ingenuous a confession, and that the lady had revealed enough to ruin her husband (§), if he should fall under the displeasure of that prince.

(4) Varillas, Charles IX, lib. vii, ad ann. 1567.

[(§) a] Brantome does not say that, for it was from him that Varillas borrowed the main of the story. See his Homm. III. Fr. Tom. II. in the Life of the Marshal de Brissac. R. E. M. C. 17.]

(5) Varillas, ibid. supra.

[B] He

(a) D' Aubigné, Tom. i, pag. 125.

(b) Idem. p. 238.

(c) Castelnau, Memoir, liv. vi, chap. viii.

(d) They are la Popeliniere's words.

(e) Histoire, liv. vi, chap. xvii, pag. 437. ad ann. 1569.

(1) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Castelnau, Tom. II, p. 793.

(2) Id. p. 794.

(3) Id. p. 794.

‘ might save the lives of a thousand men, his mi
‘ of his, advised him to harangue his soldiers. T ‘ brethren and friends it is thus you must do : with ‘ manner in armour, silvered over from head to
‘ as snow, and aged eighty-five years, he advan
‘ all the Marshals de Camp before him, and sa not less virtuous than valiant [B], as he shewed

[B] He was not less virtuous as he shewed by his punishing adultery.] The story is very remarkable, Beza relates it in the following manner. On the 26th of March 1563, the Sieur de Saint-Cy, otherwise called Puy-Greffier, who had been appointed governor of Orleans from the time that the Prince left that town, a good man and a great enemy to vice, caused a new and remarkable execution to be made in the persons of Deslandes Sieur du Moulin, formerly secretary to the king, and of Godard (§β) the wife of John Godin, lieutenant to the Provost-marshal of Blois. Whilst this Godin was in the army, du Moulin debauched his wife at Orleans, for which crime he was hanged with her in the square du Martroy : which being told at court appeared so strange, that many were not ashamed to say, that if there was nothing else in the Reformed Religion, they would be sure not to embrace it (6). The reflexion is very ingenious : and indeed how can a man be safe in a religion, which does not refer to God the punisher of adulterers, but delivers them up to the secular power to be punished with death ? This is sufficient to put a great many people out of conceit with a religion ; it is worse than the condemnation of Polygamy, which kept some infidels from embracing Christianity. Left any one should suspect the author I have quoted, I shall cite another, who was not a Protestant, and who relates the thing in a very pompous manner. ‘ Pridie judicium non hujus sæculi nec tunc ‘ secundum Franciæ mores, ubi adulterium non puniri ‘ magni nominis Jurisconsultus Joan. Faber olim dixit, ‘ Aureliani latum est contra Landam Molinum, qui ‘ Godardam Jo. Godini uxorem dum vir in castris ‘ esset corrupisse convictus, ad mortem damnatus est, ‘ amboque Landa & Godarda in publica platea laqueo ‘ suspensi sunt, Pigreferio prisca moris ac severitatis ‘ viro qui à Condæo urbi præpositus fuerat judicium ‘ urgente, & grassantibus vitii exemplo opus esse ‘ dictitante ; quod tamen in aula adeo male acceptum ‘ est, ut plerique summa impudentia palam testarentur ‘ se à Protestantibus semper alienos futuros, & vel ob ‘ eam causam nunquam in eorum verba juraturos esse, ‘ qui adulterii hucusque impunitis nova & apud nos ‘ inaudita severitate poenam capitis statuerent (7). . . .

[(§β) Mr Bayle has not observed that Godard being a Masculine name, we ought to read here Godard, agreeable to the Latin Godardam, of Thuanus who had consulted the Errata of Beza's Ecclesiastical History. R. E. M. C. R. I. T.]

(6) Beza, Histoire Ecclef. liv. vi, towards the end, pag. 336.

(7) Thuanus, lib. xxxv. init ad ann 1563.

(8) In § ex non Kripto Inst. de jur. nat.

(9) See the advertisement prefixed to the Catechism of the Jesuits (§γ).

[(§γ) It must be the second edition of this Catechism, in 16mo, printed in Holland in the year 1678. For the first edition in 8vo, said to be printed at Villefranche 1602, does not contain this Advertisement. As to what concerns the saying mentioned in remark [B], it is in the Confession of Sancti, lib. i, ch. viii, where d'Aubigné puts it in the mouth of a Superior of St Anthony. R. E. M. C. R. I. T.]

(10) See the Critique generale de l'histoire du Calvinisme, against Maimbourg, Letter ix.

‘ On the day before, a sentence not suitable to the customs ‘ of the present age, nor at that time to those of ‘ France, where, according to the great Civilian Faber, ‘ adultery is not punished, was passed at Orleans upon du ‘ Moulin ; who being convicted of having debauched Godard the wife of John Godin, during her husband's absence in the army, was condemned to death ; and both ‘ he and she were publicly hanged ; Puy-Greffier, a man ‘ of primitive manners and severity, who had been ‘ appointed governor of the city by the Prince of Condé, ‘ insisting upon it, and affirming that the raging vices of ‘ the time required such an example to be made. It was ‘ nevertheless so ill taken at court, that most people openly ‘ declared with the biggest impudence, that they would ‘ always hate the Protestants, and never would embrace ‘ their religion, if it were for no other reason but this ‘ that they made a capital crime of adultery, which before that time had not been so much as punished. Those ‘ courtiers were in the right to say that Puy-Greffier's severity was out of fashion ; nay, the Civilian Faber, quoted by Thuanus, expressly says (8), that it was never heard that any body had been punished for adultery in France. Few people were able to refrain ‘ saying in that respect, let us beware of innovations ‘ (9). It must also be granted that this severity was not of long continuance among the Protestants, according to the maxim, nullum violentum durabile. It lasted longer at Geneva (10) ; but at last it vanished away : and it may be said in general to the shame of Christians, that they have suffered the penal laws, which many Pagan nations had enacted against adultery, to be abolished time out of mind. There is hardly any crime which oftner escapes with impunity than that : whoever prosecutes any person for it, must rather expect to be the talk of the town, and to be laughed at bourg prevailed about thirty years before with the magistrates, to inflict a capital punishment on adulterers; and he wishes the Reformed Divines of the Low-Countries would not express so much zeal against dancing, as against the too great indulgence for adultery. He fancies that if they had thundered to purpose against that abuse, they would, with God's blessing upon their endeavours, have engaged the magistrates to inflict a more severe punishment than a fine. (16) Qui (Theologi) si aequè fervide à pluribus jam annis demonstrassent in adulterium, (quod, pro dolor! per totum Belgium pecuniaria duntaxat multa expiatur) ex Dei benedictione, dubio procul, jam diu à suis Superioribus consecuti fuissent, quod ex voto obligit, ante annos ferme triginta, Theologis Augustanae Confessionis, Argentinae Evangelicam doctrinam annunciantibus: qui, licet non subdlexerunt Auditoribus suis temperatis in nuptiis choreas, à Magistratu tamen impetrarunt gladium adulterii vindicem. Had he been a minister, he would have found the difficulty of that advice.

(16) Mart. Schoockius Exercit. xvi. pag. 327.

SAINTE-ALDEGONDE (PHILIP DE MARNIX LORD DU MONT) born at Brussels [A], in the year 1538, made himself famous by his employments and writings. He fled into Germany when liberty of conscience was suppressed by the Spaniards in the Netherlands, and at Heidelberg he had the office of counsellor in the Ecclesiastical council conferred upon him. He returned into his own country in the year 1572 to employ his talents for the support of liberty and the interest of the Reformed Religion [B]. He was very much esteemed by the Prince of Orange, to whom he did several important services, not so much by his sword as by his words [C]. He was one of the deputies, sent by the States into England in 1575, to desire Queen Elizabeth's protection. Three years after he was sent by the Arch-duke Matthias to the diet of Worms, where he made a very

[A] Born at Brussels.] I would not affirm it, if Melchior Adam was the only author that says so; for I find he adds to it a falsity, whereby one might be apt to think that he was not rightly informed. He says that the father and mother of Philip de Marnix were natives of Burgundy, and retired to Brussels.

(1) Bruxellis . . . è parentibus Burgundicis qui eo concesserant. Melch. Adam, in Vitis Jurisf. pag. 333.

(1) This is not true: Sainte-Aldegonde answering a writer, who called him a foreigner of Burgundy, says, Not one of my ancestors was a native of Burgundy, that I know of; and it is notorious that I was born, educated, and allied, in this country. And likewise my father was born, brought up, and allied in it; so that except my grand-father and his predecessors, who were natives of Savoy, all my paternal and maternal ancestors were born in the Low-Countries (2). The reason therefore why I affirm that he was born at Brussels, is because Verheiden says so (3), without adding any of the falsities that are found in Melchior Adam. Note, that Moreri in copying these falsities has rather increased them, for he is more particular, and says that the parents of our Philip were natives of the county of Burgundy. It seems that Swertius and Valerius Andreas knew not that Philip de Marnix was born in the Netherlands: their ignorance of this is surprising, since they knew this author by his controversial books (4). Had they known his native country, they would have placed him in the catalogue of the writers of the Netherlands: they do not use to leave out the Protestant authors.

(2) Sainte-Aldegonde, Response apologétique au Libelle intitulé Antidote, fol. A. 5. verso.

(3) Verheiden, in Elog. prestantium aliquot Theolog. pag. 141.

(4) They mention them speaking of Michael Baius, and the Jesuit John David, who wrote against Sainte-Aldegonde.

[B] He returned into his country in the year 1572, to employ his talents . . . for the interest of the Reformed Religion.] Since Verheiden and Melchior Adam knew nothing of the circumstances of his return, it will not be improper for me to supply what they have omitted. Sainte-Aldegonde soon after he left the Low-Countries on account of religion, was admitted into the service of the Elector Palatine; but William Prince of Orange, who looked upon him as a man well qualified for his designs, desired him of the Elector: whicb was granted him first for two months, and then for two more, and at last for so long as he should want him; only the said Elector reserved to himself the liberty of recalling him, when he should think fit (5). Sainte-Aldegonde gives this account to shew that he followed the Prince of Orange only as his private minister and servant, and not as a member of the States, or to intrude into the administration of public affairs. And therefore, says he, if I have been employed in public affairs, either in the name, and by order of the States, or otherwise, it was always at his desire, and to pay him a due obedience as I was ordered by my first master. I will also mention what has been omitted concerning the persecutions he went through, before he fled into Germany. I was, says he (6), outlawed, banished, deprived of my estate, and exposed to the hatred and abuses of my friends and relations; and at last I lay in prison a year under the Duke of Alva and the commander Requesenes; and during that confinement I prayed to GOD every night at least for the space of three months, as if it had been the last night of my life, knowing that the said Duke of Alva had twice ordered that I should be put to death in prison. Observe that it had been objected to him, that he had been in the service of the Dukes of Parma: but he answered (7) that he never had any thoughts of going into the service of that lady, nor ever frequented her court, seeing that during the space of six years, since his return from Geneva till the beginning of the troubles, he had concealed himself, as it were, under the cross of the persecutions, which were at that time very violent.

(5) Sainte-Aldegonde, Response apologétique, fol. D. 3.

(6) Id. ibid. in the next leaf to B. 5.

(7) Id. ibid. fol. D. 5.

[C] . . . Not so much by his sword as by his words.] Melchior Adam, from whom I have taken the greatest part of the text of this article, is my author for this. Quo in loco, saith he (8), non tam fortiter gerendum patriæ libertatis propugnatores se declaravit. He could write and speak well, and was a scholar and a man of parts: his services were particularly memorable on account of those qualifications. It was he who drew up the formulary of the famous confederacy in the year 1566, by which several great men of the Low-Countries engaged to oppose the Inquisition (9). Brederode, who was the head of that league, made him treasurer of it (10). Sainte-Aldegonde spoke in the name of the Prince of Orange in the assembly of Dort, composed of the deputies of all the towns, in the year 1572. He made a lively description of the calamities of the country, and prevailed with that assembly to come to a resolution of opposing the tyrants. Ibidem ejus orator Dominus de Sancta Aldegonde effusam de principis pio affectu, patriæ necessitate, Hispanorum tyrannide declamationem pronunciat, ac civitates novo bello contra Regem, regis tamen nomine usurpato illaqueat (11). The Spaniards dreaded that Orator and Negotiator so much, that the Duke of Parma gave express orders to observe him narrowly in the conferences held at Cologne in the year 1579. Monens interim ut Coloniam adventantem Philippum Marnixium . . . sedulo observaret, ab eoque uti ab homine impie callido sibi præcaveret (12). The Protestant readers knowing the character of the man, who abuses Sainte-Aldegonde in this last passage, will never have a worse opinion of him. He assisted at the pacification of Ghent, in the name of the Prince of Orange and of the nobility of Holland and Zealand in the year 1576 (13). He was sent to Brussels the year following; but we ought not to credit what is said by the Historians of the contrary party, that it was to attempt upon the liberty of Don Juan of Austria (14). He was taken by the Spaniards, at the Hague in the year 1573 (15), and it being feared that such a prisoner, who was very prejudicial to them, would meet with very ill usage, the Prince of Orange sent them word that he would in the strictest manner use reprisals against the Count de Boffu (16). The year following Mondragon being forced to capitulate at Middelburg, offered to set Sainte-Aldegonde and three other prisoners at liberty, provided the capitulation he demanded, should be granted him. Se apud Requesenium effecturum ut captivus Aldegundius (quod aerebat Orangius) tresque insuper alii Aldegundii arbitrari remitterentur in Zelandiam intra sex menses (17). That agreement was accepted and executed: which I observe, to shew how much our Philip de Marnix was considered. He was to have the choice of three prisoners, who were to be set

(8) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Jurisf. pag. 333.

(9) Strada de Bello Belgico, Decad. I, lib. v, pag. m. 205.

(10) Brederodius coactores nominat & Philippum Marnixium . . . serarium Questionem creat. Id. ib. pag. 291, ad ann. 1566.

(11) De ortu & progressu Calvin. Reformat. lib. ii, §. iv, pag. 47.

(12) Strada, ubi supra, Dec. II, lib. ii, pag. 127.

(13) Thuan. lib. lxxii, pag. m. 163.

(14) Strada, ubi supra, lib. ix, pag. 527, 530. ad ann. 1577.

(15) Id. ibid. lib. vii, pag. 451.

(16) Id. ibid. pag. 452.

(17) Id. ibid. lib. viii, pag. 460, ad ann. 1574.

set

a very fine speech, and boldly described the Spanish tyranny [D]. He was one of the plenipotentiaries, whom the States sent into France in the year 1580, to offer the sovereignty of their provinces to the Duke of Alençon [E]. He was consul to Antwerp in 1584, when that town was besieged by the Duke of Parma. In the year 1593 he conducted into the Palatinate the Princess Louisa Juliana (a), who had been betrothed to the Elector Frederic IV (b). The books he published [F] were not the least service he did: some of them were on Politics, and others on Controversy; some were serious, and others comical: the latter proved most useful [G]: his very songs procured a great advantage

(a) Daughter to the Prince of Orange William the first of that name.

(b) Taken from Melchior Adam in Vitis Juris conf. pag. 333, & seq.

(18) Idem. Dec. II, lib. ix, pag. 627.

set at liberty with him. The States designed in 1587 to send him to the conferences about a peace with Spain (18); but having resolved to continue the war, his deputation proved a meer project.

[D] He made a very fine speech, and boldly described the Spanish tyranny. Thuanus says it was printed and answered. 'Eo à Matthia missus Phil. Marnixius Santaldegondanus orationem mire liberam ad VII viros & imperii principes, qui aderant, Nonis Maii habuit, qua deplorato miserabili Belgii statu, & Albani Austriacae tyrannide acerbis verbis exagitata Imperii opem imploravit; quippe commune Belgii cum Imperio periculum esse, prædixitque fore, ut belli incendium, nisi sistatur, se latius spargat, & Coloniam, Monasterium, Emdam, aliasque vicinas civitates, quas ex Albani consilio Hispani sub jugum mittere jampridem decreverint, olim complectatur, proinde rogat . . . ad eam orationem publicatam postea contraria oratione Calidii Chryfopolitani nomine Lucemburgi edita responsum est, quæ tota in exagitanda Belgum in Deum ac principem suum rebellionem occupatur (19). - Phil. Marnix of Sainte-Aldegonde, who was sent thither by Matthias on the 7th of May, made an exceeding bold speech to the Electors and the Princes of the empire, who were present, in which having deplored the miserable condition of the Netherlands, and inveighed against the tyranny of the Duke of Alva and the house of Austria, he implored their assistance, as the empire lay equally exposed with the Netherlands to the danger, and foretold that the fire of the war, unless it was stopped, would spread wider and include Cologne, Munster, Embden, and other neighbouring cities, which the Spaniards, by the advice of Alva, had long ago resolved to bring under subjection. He therefore asked . . . This speech being published, it was answered by one printed at Luxemburg under the name of Claudius Chryfopolitanus; which is entirely taken up in exposing the rebellion of the Netherlands against GOD and their sovereign.' Note that this speech was translated into Dutch verse by Baptist Horvart (20), and that Cornelius Loofe, a native of Ter-gow, was the person who answered it (21).

(19) Thuan. lib. lxxvi, pag. 239. ad ann. 1578.

(20) Melch. Adam. ubi supra, pag. 335.

(21) Placcius, de Pseudonymis, pag. 172.

(22) Wicquefort, Traité de l'Ambassadeur, book ii, pag. m. 228, 229. See also Strada, ubi supra, Dec. II, lib. iv, par. 248, ad ann. 1581.

[E] To offer the sovereignty of their provinces to the Duke of Alençon. Melchior Adam has forgot to tell us that Sainte-Aldegonde followed that prince into England in the year 1581, and wrote to the States the false news of his marriage with Queen Elizabeth. It is an example, which Mr de Wicquefort sets before the eyes of ambassadors, in order to shew how cautious they ought to be in writing news. 'Sometimes, says he (22), one cannot believe his own eyes. Vidi aut vidisse putat. - i. e. he saw or imagines that he saw.' The Sieur de Sainte-Aldegonde, who was agent for the states of the Low-Countries at the court of England in the year 1581, being one evening in the queen's chamber, saw her discoursing with the Duke of Alençon. The lords and ladies were at so great a distance from them that they could have no share in their conversation; but every body was witness to a thing, from which one might draw a very great consequence. The queen taking a ring from her finger, put it on the duke's, who quickly went out with great cheerfulness and satisfaction, as having obtained an earnest and a pledge of his marriage. Sainte-Aldegonde, who looked upon this action as a thing of the greatest importance to his masters, gave them notice of it by an express he dispatched that very same night. All the towns of the Low-Countries expressed their joy for a piece of news, that proved false, by the ringing of bells, the firing of guns, and the lighting of bonfires. The queen blamed Sainte-Aldegonde for being so hasty in giving notice of a thing, the truth of which he might have known in a few hours.

[F] The books he published. Meursius gives a catalogue of them: it contains Theses aliquæ de Ecclesiæ

atque Ecclesiasticarum traditionum xetnptio seu certa norma. Item de sacramento carnis dominicæ. Responso ad Michaelis Baii regii Professoris Lovaniensis apologiam. Epistola consolatoria ad fratres exules Brabantos, Flandros, Hannones, Artesios, aliosque Belgas peregrinos in regionibus ob puram Evangelii doctrinam dispersos. Tractatus de cæna Domini ad Galliarum Regis sororem Lotbaringie Duci nuptam. Contra libertinos. Apologetica responso contra anonymum quendam libertinum (23). To these may be added, says Meursius, several pieces published at different times, admonitions, declarations, tractatus, consilia, disputationes, consolationes, interpretationes, and several anonymous writings. His design was to refute the Romish controversies, and to raise enemies to the King of Spain. I leave you to judge whether having the talent of writing with great facility, he did not disperse many pamphlets about the transactions of the time. He did then what Baron Lifola has done since. Note that it has been said he was lucky in guessing the designs of the Spaniards, and that therefore the alarms he raised against their ambitious projects were not without ground. 'Prudentiæ & historiæ cognitio quanta in eo fuerit, scriptum illud declarat, in quo agit de Hispanorum scopo, ad quem sua ipsi tela dirigunt; qui Monarchiam sibi præfigentes, nihil non ausint. In eodem tanquam vates prognosticis politicis multa prædixit: quæ evenisse Britannia, Polonia, Gallia, alique regiones testantur (24). - His great knowledge in Politics and History appears from that treatise, wherein he considers the chief aim which the Spaniards have in view: who in order to bring about their scheme of universal monarchy leave nothing unattempted. In the same treatise, like a prophet or political prognosticator, he foretold many things which have actually come to pass, as Great Britain, Poland, France, and other countries can testify.'

(23) Meursius, Athenæ Batavæ, pag. 180.

(24) Melch. Adam. ubi supra, pag. 335.

[G] . . . His comical books were most useful. He published in Dutch the Romish Hive, Abeverium Romanum, in the year 1571, and dedicated it to Francis Sonnius Bishop of Boilleduc, one of the chief Inquisitors of the Low-Countries (25). That book, full of comical stories, was wonderfully applauded by the people, and proved more prejudicial to the church of Rome, than a serious and learned work would have been. Nay, it is said to have put many people upon examining more strictly the controverted points of religion, and detecting the errors of the church of Rome: Erasmus's colloquies had produced the same effect: 'Hoc scriptum . . . est varietate historiarum, & acumine sententiarum refertissimum: joci facetiisque in Papiarum theatrales nugæ & fabulas mire conditum: adeo ut lectoribus istorum temporum præcipue, singularem attulerit voluptatem: & occasionem multis præbuerit, de religione Christiana serio cogitandi. Et hic liber ut populari applausu acceptus, sic non sine fructu plurimorum lectus, plus rei Belgicæ illa tempestate in religionis negotio profuit; quam eruditi aliquot commentarii (26). - This book . . . is full of stories and witty sayings: it is wonderfully seasoned with jokes and facetious remarks upon the theatrical tales and trifles of the Roman Catholics: so that to the readers of those times especially, it gave an extraordinary pleasure, and put many upon thinking seriously of the Christian Religion. As this book was received with general applause, so the reading of it produced good effect, and it did more service to the Low-Countries in the business of religion than some learned commentaries.' He wrote a book of the same nature in French, which was printed soon after he died, with this title, 'Tableau des differens de la religion. - - - A picture of religious differences.' He is very merry in it, and brings in a posse of jokes and quibbles; and yet alleges very pertinent reasons. This work proved as successful as the Abeverium. The greatest part of

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 336.

(26) Id. ibid.

SAINTE-ALDEGONDE.

(c) Melch. Adam.
ibid. pag. 334.

(d) See his Apologetical answer to the German
gentleman. init.

advantage to the new republic [H]. He translated the Psalms of David out of Hebrew into Dutch verse; but that translation was not made use of in churches [I]. He was employed about a Dutch translation of the Scripture, when he died at Leyden the fifteenth of December 1598 (c). He had a little before made a journey into France about the prince's affairs (d). He did not escape slander [K], and it is said that his retreat was the life

(27) Thuanus,
pag. m. 39.

(28) I think Thuanus is mistaken in this.

(29) Librum pe-nitentissimum.
Valer. Andr. Biblioth. Belg. pag.
490.

(30) Verheiden,
in Elogiis ali-quot Theologor.
pag. 145.

of the stories are the same in both. Vast numbers of people diverted themselves with examining this picture, and were more confirmed in their belief thereby than if they had read the best work of Calvin. Thuanus did not approve this way of handling controversy. I have seen, said he (27), Philip de Marnix de Sainte-Aldegonde at the siege of Paris, and I lodged three months in the same house with him . . . he was a polite man, but there was no great matter in him. He was chancellor of Gelderland (28). He treats of religion in the style of Rabelais, which is very ill done. John David a Jesuit published another Alvearium in Dutch to confute that of Sainte-Aldegonde, which he called a most pernicious book (29). He knew well enough that the most dangerous way of writing against a doctrine is to turn it into ridicule.

[H] His very songs procured a great advantage to the new Republic. I might have cited, above, Verheiden instead of Melchior Adam, who only transcribes him; but I thought it an indifferent thing, provided I should once point out the original. I take another way here, and set down the words of Verheiden. 'Ab hoc Viro, fatisse (30), etiam profecta dicitur decantata illa CANTILENA composita in laudem PRINCIPIS GUILLIELMI Nassavii, Ad Belgas Tyrannide Albani oppressos edita. Quæ quidem Cantilena ita scite facta, ita concinnis rhythmis modulique suis est attemperata, ut plebis animos mire ad Principis, Libertatisque Patriæ amorem excitaverit. In hoc igitur SANCT-ALDEGONDII se alterum quasi TYRTÆUM, toties à Platone laudatum, ostendit. Nam cum PRINCIPIS Fortissimi laudes, hortamenta virtutis, damnorum solatia, salutariæque consilia continet; magnum ardorem defendendi PRINCIPIS PATRIÆQUE LIBERTATIS populo injectit: adeo ut nihil illis temporibus convenientius prodiret iudicare liceat. . . . To the same author is ascribed that famous ballad, which contains a panegyric upon William Prince of Orange, and was published in Holland while that country was oppressed by the tyranny of the Duke of Alva. That song was so artfully contrived, and so well composed in its rhymes and notes, that it stirred up in the minds of the people a wonderful affection for the prince and the liberty of their native country. By this therefore Sainte-Aldegonde proved himself to be, as it were, another Tyrtæus, whom Plato so often commends. For by celebrating the praises of so heroic a prince, by exhorting the people to behave valiantly, by comforting them for the losses they had sustained, and by intermixing some advice, he inspired them with a great zeal for the defence of the Prince and the liberty of their country. So that we may justly affirm that nothing could be published more suitable to the circumstances of those times.' He is in the right to say, that nothing could better fit the circumstances of the time, than a pretty song full of invectives against the Duke of Alva, and of encomiums on the Prince of Orange. The design of erecting some provinces of the King of Spain into a common-wealth required many things, and particularly a continual application to prevent the suggestions of those, who might have represented that it was almost impossible to hold out against so potent a monarch, that the charges necessary to carry on the war against him would very much exceed what he exacted from them, and that therefore it was a great piece of folly to spend one's All rather than bear an impost (31). This might have been confuted by a thousand good reasons, and it was of great moment to make the people sensible of it both from the pulpit and in books: but nothing was more proper for such a design than a song; for it is a thing that remains imprinted in the mind, and every body, even the peasants and servant-maids, daily repeat it with great joy and satisfaction. We have here therefore one of the most important services of Philip de Marnix. This puts me in mind of the song about the Scalado, which the Genevois sing in their houses on the anniversary day, as a thing almost essential to that ceremony. I am sure that at first the impressions made by this song in the minds

(31) Omnia da-
bant ne deciman
arent.

of the people, surpassed all others (§ a). [(§ a) Mr Bayle does not tell us that it was Theodore Beza who, in his very old age, made the song upon the Scalado of Geneva. REM. CRIT.]

[I] That translation of the Psalms was not made use of in churches. He affected to use none but Dutch words, and acted quite contrary to the other Poets of his nation, who inserted in their pieces a vast many words taken from the French. His translation was better than that which was sung in churches; nevertheless it was not admitted. Thus in France the old version of Marot and Beza was preferred to that of Mr Conrart, which some had a mind to introduce. I shall set down a passage of Melchior Adam (32): (32) Melch. A. Id opus hæcenus aliquoties typis publicatum, sed nunquam communi concionatorum consensu est receptum: cum contra versio alterius à tot millibus edificatur. Nimirum

Pro captu lectoris habent sua fata libelli.

'That work has been printed several times, but was never yet received by the common approbation of the ministers: whereas the other translation is commended over by so many thousands. The reason is because,

Books have their fate, succeeding well or ill
Just in proportion to the reader's skill.

Here follows another passage, whereby it appears that Philip de Marnix, the better to introduce his version, made it, as much as ever he could, like that which was already used. Mr Conrart had the same precaution, but to no purpose (33): people were too much used to the common translations. 'Ante complures annos displicuit nonnullis apud Belgas nimis ille à textu Scripturæ per laxiores paraphrases metricas recessus: præsertim Psalmorum Datheni, qui ex Psalmis Gallicis Maroti & Beza expressi erant. Veriavit hæc cura inter alios nobiliss. Marnixium montis Sancti-Aldegondis Dominum; qui propterea novam paraphrasin rhythmo-metricam composuit, strophis, lineis, syllabis, cum Datheni Psalmis, parâ passim eundem, ut cum illis in templis cantari, aut facile iis substitui posset. Sed cum Datheni Psalmi jam memoriâ à plerisque tenerentur, non viderunt Ecclesiæ, quomodo commodè & absque aliquâ commotione plebis ecclesiasticæ in publicis sacris hic quicquam loco moveri posset (34). . . . A good many years ago some people in Holland were displeased with these loose poetical paraphrases, which varied too much from the text of Scripture; especially with respect to the Psalms of Dathenus, which had been formed upon the French Psalms of Marot and Beza. Among others Philip de Marnix lord of Mount Sainte-Aldegonde employed himself this way, and composed a new paraphrase in metre, exactly agreeing with the Psalms of Dathenus in the stanza's, lines, and syllables; for this reason that it might be sung along with them in the churches, or easily substituted in their room. But whereas most people had already got the Psalms of Dathenus by heart, the churches did not see how they could conveniently and without giving some offence to the common people introduce any alteration in the public worship.'

[K] He did not escape slander. Some instances of it may be seen in the words I have quoted out of Strada. But here is a more cutting stroke: that Jesuit having said that Sainte-Aldegonde was one of those, who had been ordered to seize upon Don Juan of Austria by stratagem or by main force, adds: 'Quod sanè facinus et si non abhorrebat à reliqua vita aut Aldegundii hominis ignominiosissime nequam, qui Calvinum puer docentem audierat, fenex jam alios ipse docebat: aut Hefi . . . tamen an illi re ipsa moliti hoc sint, ut Austriacus multis authoribus exultimavit . . . affirmare non auiam (35). . . . Which wicked attempt, although it was no ways inconsistent with the rest of the life either of Sainte-Aldegonde, a man of an infamous character, who in his youth had been Calvin's disciple, and taught others in

(33) Note, that the church of Geneva and several others have at last laid aside the old version of the Psalms; but the Walloons churches have resolved to keep it. See the remark [P], of the article M A R O T.

(34) Gislebertus Voëtius de Politia Ecclesiast.

(35) Strada de Bello Belg. Dec. I, lib. ix, pag. m. 527, 528, ad ann. 1577.

life of a man in disgrace. He was strangely perplexed when complaints were made that he exhorted his old age; or of Hefus . . . yet whether or no they did actually attempt such a thing, as Don Juan of Austria, relying upon the authorities of many, believed, . . . I dare not positively affirm. I have a book printed at Cologne in 1673, with this title, De ortu & processu Calvinianæ reformationis in Belgio: in quo exhibentur patia & fœdera ibidem inita, & demonstratur nullam eorum à Reformatibus habitam esse rationem, Autore C. L. S. V. V. Sainte-Aldegonde is very ill used in it, and the author says, among other things, that whilst he was endeavouring to undo the Catholics of the Netherlands in the diet of Worms, he made it his business to persuade the ambassadors of the Emperor and of the Electors, that the Arch-duke Matthias had been invited by the inhabitants of that country to be the protector of the Romish religion, which was very much endangered by the Civil war. Belgas Archiducem Matthiam pro tuenda Catholica Romana religione ad Provinciarum regimen evocasse, præsertim cum illa inter civiles hostes tumultus magnis motibus percelleretur (36). I shall observe by the by, that the author of that book was discovered, though he had taken all possible care to conceal himself. He was banished upon that account, and his estate was confiscated. He lived at Cologne under the protection of the Pope's Nuncio in 1678. I only say this upon the credit of the Italian Journalist (37). If what is said of Sainte-Aldegonde in that book were true, it would be a trick of an ambassador, which he did not invent, and which is common enough (38). I have another book intitled, Antidote ou contrepoison contre les conseils sanguinaires & envenimez de Philippe de Marnix Sr. de Ste. Aldegonde, &c. . . . An antidote or counterpoison against the bloody and pernicious counsels of Philip de Marnix Sieur de Sainte-Aldegonde, contained in a book published by him against the spiritual zealots, whom he calls in his language Geesdijvers. Written in the form of a responfory letter by a German gentleman, a lover of peace and of the Belgic liberty. The time and place of the impression and the Printer's name do not appear in it; but one may know that it came out about the year 1598. The author of that book abuses Sainte-Aldegonde in the following manner. (39) That

(36) De ortu & processu Calvin. Reform. in Belgio, lib. ii, §. 12, p. 78. He quotes Uytendagartius Histor. Eccles. Part. iii.

(37) See the VI Journal de Lettrés 1678. in the extract of the book intitled, De ortu & processu, &c.

(38) See the remark [B], in the article BEL-LAI (WIL-LIAM DU)

(39) Antidote, pag. 13, 14.

(40) Ibid. p. 15.

advice puts me upon scanning your former actions, when I call to mind that it was not without cause that the States of Holland and Zealand would not permit you to come into their territories. You was then in despair by reason of the unfortunate murder of the late Prince of Orange of Glorious Memory, and because the design at the dike of Cauwestein miscarried. Your conscience was very much troubled, as mistrusting God's power, till such time as you had contrived that pretty surrender of Antwerp, and the pacification then concluded in the year 1584, and not contented with that great piece of service done to the Duke of Parma, you made it your business in common discourse to praise that prince, advising some to make a general peace, the better to conceal your own fault by the ruin and desolation of a hundred thousand poor afflicted people; for you presumed so much upon your ability as to pretend that you knew a way to make the said duke revolt against his master, and by that means to procure a re-union of the seventeen Provinces. You boasted that you had opened the matter to him in the time of the parliament of Beveren, when you had so many private discourses with him in the presence of all your colleagues, who are venerable men and some of the most illustrious in the said town: which was too great an undertaking for such a man as you are. I shall say nothing of your ill conduct in the government of that town, since you might have supplied it with sufficient provisions and ammunition for a siege of some years, considering the absolute power you usurped in it, and upon this not only the preservation of that town, but, in a manner, that of the whole State, depended, witness the confusion the Provinces were in when . . . (40) This wife Prince of Orange, of Glorious Memory, was sensible, some years before he died, of your turbulent spirit, when he removed you by degrees from his council and person, lest he should some time or other find himself in a plunge, from the effects of this detestable advice of your's.

VOL. V.

Equity requires that we should hear what Philip de Marnix answered to that German gentleman. 'Since the States-General, says he (41), who would not permit me to come into their territories, have not continued in their resolution, but, on the contrary, have been willing that I should be nearer them, have conferred with me above twelve years, and imparted to me many designs and secrets, and even conferred upon me honourable employments, ordering that I should be well used, to give me thereby some marks of their affection; do not you see that they have by that means cleared me of the calumnies, which slanderers men, like you, had invented against me, though they durst not open their mouths in my presence? . . . How dare you put a construction upon what the States have done, quite contrary to their intention? How dare you blame me, because, in such a critical time, they thought fit, for some particular reasons, that I should be absent for some time, by reason of the ill reports that were spread against me; it being impossible that a man in such a post as I had, should please every body. Especially if it be considered, that, as they very well know, a false report went about, that I had prevented the reading of the Queen of England's letters at Antwerp; at which some English soldiers were so exasperated, that they swore they would kill me: but afterwards being informed of the truth of the matter, and even that I was going to the queen in order to clear my self, they changed their mind. If therefore the States, for this, or some other consideration, thought fit that I should be absent for some time, (for the letters of the States of Zealand alleged no other reason but the reports that went about me) how can you be so impudent as to defame me for a thing which redounds to my glory and honour?' Afterwards he gives a long list of the courageous actions performed by his order or counsels since the death of Prince William; which shews that this assassination, which made him very uneasy, did not throw him into despair, and deprive him of the use of his reason. He gives a particular account of his conduct during the siege of Antwerp; he protests that he opposed, as long as he could, those who were for capitulating, and that he and his twenty-one colleagues had all their instructions in writing (42), when they went out of the town to settle the conditions upon which it should be surrendered. He says, that he made the enemies believe, that they had still provisions enough for seven or eight months, so that Mr Richardot, the second day after he entered into the town, said, when he saw what a condition it was in, that he had never been so much imposed upon (43). He is very long in justifying himself as to the praises he had bestowed upon the Duke of Parma. He says (44), that making a report to the great council of what had passed during the capitulation, he was obliged to set forth the reasons alleged by the deputies of the Duke of Parma, to remove the mistrust that prevailed among the people. They had enlarged upon the virtues of that duke, and made an abridgment of his life, to shew that on all occasions he had faithfully kept his treaties. Sainte-Aldegonde related what they had said. Here follows an instance of popular injustice, and of the wrong construction that is put upon things. 'This discourse made in such an assembly, and spread all over the town, was construed by many, as if what I had related to have been spoken by the deputies of the Duke of Parma, had been my own opinion; so that every body was saying that I had extolled the said duke to the sky: whereupon some ministers (even some of those, whom I took care to consult before I did any thing) made me a sharp remonstrance, as if I had renounced my religion and my party. I confess that by an effect of human infirmity, I was more nettled at it than I should have been; so that my answer was attended with some marks of indignation. . . . And because I perceived, that, tho' I had satisfied them, the same report prevailed still all over the town, and that many of those, who envied and hated me, and who retired into Holland in crowds, triumphed over me upon that account, to the prejudice of my reputation; I confess I was so moved with it, that, in my Apology, without remembering that I had related those

(41) Sainte Aldegonde, Reponse apologique à un Libelle fameux qui a été publié par un certain libertain s'attirant Gentilhomme Allemand, &c. fol. B 3.

(42) Ibid. fol. C 2, verso.

(43) Ibid. fol. C 3, verso.

(44) Ibid. fol. C 4.

SAINTE-ALDEGONDE.

exhorted the States to persecute the sects [L]. I have read a book, wherein it is observed that things, as they were spoken by our enemies, (as I have said already), I plainly and absolutely maintained that there was no harm in praising our enemies, for such things as are really commendable, and I mentioned several good qualities of the Duke of Parma. To which I was induced, not only by reason of the said calumnies, but also by the necessity of the time, and because I was in his power, together with the whole town; tho' I may truly say that I had still other views (45). I shall mention this new reason, because it discovers to us a weakness, an artifice, and a corruption, which prevail in all places, and in all ages. 'I have always been of opinion, says Sainte-Aldegonde (46), that nothing can be more dangerous for the preservation of a state in hard and difficult times, than to despise one's enemy. For as Orators tell their scholars, that they ought never to fancy that their adversaries want wit; so in point of war, it is very dangerous to think that our enemies are foolish and careless people. And yet many were apt to entertain such thoughts, endeavouring to make every body believe that the Duke of Parma was a man of no prudence and ability in military affairs. An opinion, gentlemen, which might have proved very prejudicial to your state, if your prudence had not prevented the ill effects of it, by looking for assistance every where. Since my return into Zeeland, I have seldom said any thing of the Duke of Parma, either to his advantage or disadvantage, except when I was required to do it, by those who had the power to command me; and then I told them what I truly thought of him. Thus much for the praises bestowed on the duke, which have been laid to my charge by so many people. Wherein I believe I have done nothing but what I was obliged to do by the necessity of the times, and by my concern for the preservation of the town, and of the churches that were in it.'

Here you see a great difference between those, who are altogether for countenancing popular prejudices, and those who reason equitably and solidly. The latter think themselves obliged in justice and good policy not to give a wrong account of the forces, valour, and good conduct, of the enemy: the former are for telling impudent lies about those things. Not but that they are sensible that such lies may be prejudicial in some respects; but they rather chuse to indulge by such means their own passions and those of the people; and because they take them to be more advantageous than detrimental, considering the humour of the populace, they do not approve of sincerity, and if any one practices it, they impudently charge him with treason.

I omit the apology relating to the letter written by Sainte-Aldegonde to the Lord de Meetkercke, concerning a general peace. He vindicates himself by laying the fact open, and shewing the drift of his design, and he confesses that some false and foolish reports went about it. I likewise omit what concerns his being accused of neglecting to supply Antwerp with provisions, &c. I think he fully justifies himself as to these articles. Let us see what concerns his being told in a reproachful manner that he had been excluded from affairs, and had made himself suspected by Prince William. We shall see in his answer several particulars belonging to his history (47). 'After the death of the said elector, and even after the departure of the king's brother (48), having earnestly desired to be dismissed, in order to live a private life, his excellency (49) was pleased to grant my request, but on condition, that whenever he should send for me, I should be ready to serve him in what place he should order, which I promised to do. Upon this promise he had a mind to dispatch me to Bruges, giving me the government of that town, and what depended upon it (which was prevented by my sickness, and the secret practices of those, who invited thither the present Duke of Arschot). Afterwards he sent me to Antwerp, having little hopes of preserving that town, by reason of the different inclinations of the people, and the animosity they expressed against him, under pretence that he favoured the French. He got me admitted there into the council of Brabant, and soon after I was by his means appointed the head of the town, under the title of the first burgomaster, seeing that I had absolutely refused that of Margrave.' He says afterwards, that this prince, a month or six weeks before he died (50), sent for him to Antwerp, on account of the resolution that was taken to send into France for succours. ' (51) Ever since God was pleased to call him to himself, after the siege of Antwerp, which lasted thirteen months, during which time I used my utmost endeavours to keep it for the States and the United Provinces, tho' God was not pleased to prosper my labours, I willingly laid aside the administration of affairs, and no body can say I sued for any other employment directly or indirectly. Much less can it be said that I was turned out, since I always loved to live a retired and frugal life in the country, till the said States were pleased to call me to Leyden, in order to spend my time in a sacred study, on which all my friends knew that my mind was altogether bent. Which is so true that this man, through a kind of contradiction, sends me into Zeeland to cultivate my garden and improve my lands, as I had formerly done for a considerable time.'

I shall add something out of Strada. That Jesuit acknowledges that Sainte-Aldegonde used his utmost efforts for the defence of Antwerp. He represents him as a man well stocked with methods of leading the mob (52). His adherents, said he, gave out that they knew the Duke of Parma would offer very reasonable terms, but that he had privately promised the soldiers that they should have the plunder of the town. Addebant aliqui civium, nempe ex Aldegundii cohorte, sibi exploratum esse, Parmensem Principem oblatum quidem conditiones baud spernendas, clam tamen stipendiorum loco cum Hispanis pactum esse populationem urbis (53). The magistrates sent out emissaries, who declared all over the town, that some letters had been received from France, importing that the troops designed for their relief were at last upon their march (54). That Historian observes that the greatest part of the citizens suspected those letters to have been forged in Sainte-Aldegonde's closet (55). Is not this to represent him as a man, who used his best endeavours to preserve that place? He adds, that Sainte-Aldegonde having lost all hopes, and being willing to take care of his own particular interest, forwarded the sending of some deputies to the Duke of Parma (56). He mentions the discourse he made to the duke; he says (57), that he had a conference of four hours with that prince, at which the other deputies were not present, and that he particularly insisted on the article of liberty of conscience, giving hopes that upon such a condition Holland, Zeeland, and the rest of the Low-Countries, might submit again to the King of Spain, and that he took it upon himself. He pretends that the Duke of Parma, who rejected that condition, made use of such a wonderful eloquence, that Marnix owned he had never seen a prince, who spoke better. Lastly, Strada says, that he seemed to have altered his mind since that conference, and to be more inclined to conclude a capitulation, and that he published a book, wherein he not only bestowed great encomiums upon that duke, but also declared that one could not bear arms against Philip II with a good conscience. This confession, continues Strada, of a man, who had so great an interest in his party, was prejudicial to the confederates, and they began to suspect Sainte-Aldegonde to such a degree that he was laid aside. Let us see this as it is told in elegant Latin. Quinetiam edito postea libello, quum res ab Alexandro patratas, clementiam ejus in victos, in servanda fide sanctimoniam, ceterasque Imperatorias virtutes, liberali praeconio celebrasset; adiecit inter alia, Sumi adversus Philippum Regem arma à subditis populis, integra conscientia, nequaquam posse. Quae sane confessio non temere inter loquendum prompta, sed literis ad memoriam confectata, ut erat hominis auctoritate inter suos, & Calvinianâ sapientiâ longe clarissimâ, Federatorum causae momentâ plurimum abrogavit, ipse suis offensus invisusque, regendam ad Rempublicam postea non accessit (58).

[L] Complaints were made, that he exhorted the States to persecute the sects. I have said more than once, when there was occasion for it, that it was a hard case for the Protestant writers of the XVIIth century, to think themselves obliged to exhort the magistrates

(45) Id. ibid. verso & seq.

(46) Id. ibid. C 5. verso.

(47) Sainte-Aldegonde, ubi supra, fol. D 3. verso.

(48) That is, the Duke of Arschot.

(49) That is, William, Prince of Orange.

(50) Sainte-Aldegonde, ubi supra, fol. D 4.

(51) Id. ibid. verso.

(52) Aldegundius non consumptis adhuc quas apud prime callebant artibus tractandae multitudinis, spargit in vulgus scripturam se Parmensi principi. Strada, lib. vii, Dec. II, p. 423.

(53) Id. ibid. pag. 424.

(54) Id. ibid.

(55) Plerique Gallicas literas Antwerpiae natus in Aldegundiano conclavi suspcebant. Id. ibid. pag. 425.

(56) Consul Aldegundius ubi rem desperatam publicam vidit, sibi privatim consiliarius legationem . . . festinavit. Id. ibid. pag. 427.

(57) Id. ibid. pag. 432.

(58) Id. ibid. pag. 433.

that he loved dancing, and that this is sufficient to answer the scruples of the Precifists [M].

It protest

persecut

to punish Heretics, whilst they thought it strange that the Catholic princes should persecute the Protestants. Indeed their own arguments were retorted against them, and they could hardly come off but by supposing, as all parties do, that their doctrine was true. Sainte-Aldegonde must needs have been more perplexed than many others, since he had taken so many journeys, made so many discourses, and writ so many books, for a state, which had taken up arms against the Spaniards, to free themselves from the yoke of the Inquisition. How many things might have been said against him, when he exhorted the sovereigns of that same state to exterminate some sects? Here is an instance of the perplexity he was in. He supposes, 1. That these words were only objected to him (59). It is high time, noble and venerable lords, that you should go about to maintain the honour of GOD in this world, if you desire that he should protect and defend your country.

(59) Sainte-Aldegonde, Responsio apologetica, fol. A 4.

2. That the antidote which was opposed to that exhortation, consists in this: Men ought to live quietly one with another, and every body ought to have the liberty of believing what he thinks to be right, and we should not concern our selves with it. Permette Divis cætera, ----- With all things else, trust the gods. He quotes the ninth and forty-first pages of the Antidote; but there is in the ninth page a clause omitted by him. He is blamed for using these words, to suppress and entirely annihilate that mortal poison. It is further said (60), that he thinks it very strange, that there should be still some men so tender-hearted, as to question whether the magistrates ought to inflict corporal punishments, and lay a fine upon those who are guilty of insolence in the service of GOD and religion. What he leaves out, pretending to know nothing of it, alters the state of the question, and removes the difficult part of it. Can such a proceeding be consistent with sincerity? Is it not an unfair thing to reduce the Antidote to a single proposition of the forty-first page, without considering several solid arguments that go before it?

(60) Antidote, pag. 10.

It is true, that in another place of his answer (61), he examines what he had left out in the beginning. That examination shews the perplexity he was in. Note, That he bore an ill-will to the Enthusiasts long before. See his letter to Beza written the tenth of January 1566 (62).

(61) Aldeg. Responsio apolog. fol. G 5, & seq.

[M] It is observed that he loved dancing, and that this is sufficient to answer the scruples of the Precifists. See Schoockius (63), who has inserted in one of his books, a letter written by Sainte-Aldegonde, in 1577, to Caspar Verheiden, a famous Dutch minister (64). That letter seems to me very judicious. I shall take two or three curious things out of it. The author affirms, that many people were so offended, because dancing was forbidden in the Reformed churches, that it made them unwilling to join with them, and that several laid aside their aversion to the church of Rome, when they came to know the practice and opinion of the Protestants about it. From thence he infers, that too rigid a morality; touching this bodily exercise, was so far from being edifying, that it was scandalous (65). He says that the prince (66) himself was very much offended when he heard that one could not dance at a wedding, without incurring the censure of the church. He thinks that dancing is a good and commendable thing in the Netherlands, because it keeps people from drinking or gaming after meals (67). He is not much concerned because the zealots have not the same esteem for him as they had before; for, says he, I take reputation to consist in the real nature, and not in the superficial outside of things. Existimationis certe (quam tu mihi apud pios omnes amissam hoc facto esse autumas) rationem, ego nunquam in rerum externarum umbris, sed in ipsiis rebus positam esse statui (68). However he approves the conduct of the church of Geneva, which, by forbidding dancing, had suppressed many unbecoming things that were practised every day. It was an usual thing in those parts to carry young maids to balls up and down in the night-time, and to vex them with lewd postures. He does not think that one can be present at such a spectacle without a sin, and much less an actor in it. His expressions being much stronger and more expressive than mine, I shall set them down here, in favour of those who understand Latin. This I do in a thousand other places for the same reason.

(62) It is the sixth letter among those of Beza.
(63) Schoockius, Exercit. xxiii, pag. 317, Edit. in 4to.
(64) It is the Lib. of the Ill. Tome of the Epistole illustrium Belgarum.
(65) Plane censo non modo nullam esse in hac importuna morositate, & revocata ad humane opinionis placitum censura, sed incedibile etiam scandalum. Schoock. pag. 318.
(66) I think he means the Prince of Orange.
(67) Imo vero his locis sanctas duxerim choreas que post epulas ad sistenda ebriorum pocula inhibendive aleatorum ludos, agitantur cum fructu. Schoock. ibid.
(68) Ibid. pag. 319.

Ut ego Genevates merito laudandos censeam, qui turpissima dedecora, quæ quotidie sine fronte committebantur, hoc uno interdicto, quasi Tenedia bipenni, refecerunt. Sed illis erat usitatum, quod & bodie est multo frequentissimum, apud Burgundos, Sabaudos, atque omnes Allobroges, & multos etiam Gallos, puellas virgines in tempestiva nocte, sine ullo custode, ad choreas, quocunque vellet abducere, & quamdiu vellet in sœdissimis atque obscenissimis gestulationibus, quovis anni tempore, sine ulla prope intermissione, prætextu chorearum, usque ad nauseam fatigare. Quos ego mores vel inspicere, nedum exemplo comprobare, nefas esti duxerim (69).

The Reformed churches, which forbid dancing, cannot be sufficiently praised for it; and it were an absurd thing to fancy that the ministers blamed it, only as it is an art of moving according to the time and cadence of Music. It is a very lawful exercise under that notion, it is neither good nor bad, morally speaking. But the manner of it occasioned a thousand disorders, and in the very room wherein the ball was kept, it made dangerous impressions upon a woman's chastity. The proverb concerning convents, As dangerous as the return from matins (70), might have produced another, with a small alteration, As dangerous as the return from a ball.

To confirm what I have said, that the Protestant churches of France did very wisely forbid dancing, I shall quote a passage out of a book written by Lambert Daneau, if I am not mistaken. The author maintains (71), that the Devil never invented a more effectual way than dancing to fill the world with subreedom:

For if the bare meeting of a man and a woman can have this effect, if lewd words, or wanton songs alone, if bare touches are sufficient to kindle lust, as we have but too many instances of it every day; one may judge of the great inconveniences that will arise from the concourse of all those things in one and the same place, and in the same persons, who besides meet there only for the sake of pleasure. But all those things are to be found in dancing; so that it may be said that dancing is a composition of all sorts of poisons invented by the Devil, to strike the heart more powerfully, to stifle the fear of God, and to kindle all manner of filthy lusts; that it is a bait for the eyes and ears, and, in general, for all the senses to seduce them, and convey the poison into the soul through their channel. There, more than in any other place, the heart gives an unbounded loose to its desires and wanton inclinations.

(72) Upon such an occasion every body may chuse, even in the arms of husbands and mothers, such women as they like, that is to say, such as their lusts direct them to; and then they take them by the hand, and as if they were already enjoying their desires, they kiss, embrace, and carry them up and down: young men making it their business to appear nimble and merry, and to please women with a thousand motions; and women, on their part, using their endeavours to do the like. The men know how to make them frisk and cut such high capers, that the company may see their legs up to their very thighs, without shame. A ball will have its cross motions, settings, and nearer approaches; and when the parties meet, there will be glances, capers, and redoubled frolics, on purpose to shew that the heart, in a manner, flies with joy upon seeing itself so near the object of its desires; each sort of dance affords new ways of pleasing, seeing, and touching more familiarly: all those things are performed with great shoutings, with smiling countenances, that seem transported with joy, and with all the symptoms of hearts that are intoxicating with full draughts of pleasure (73).

The dancers are not the only persons liable to those inconveniences, but also those who are mere spectators, since women have a full sight of young men, whilst they play their nimble and merry tricks; and likewise the men a full sight of the women and maids, whilst they shew their wantonness. How great a power have the eyes and ears (or rather the Devil, who makes use of those organs) upon idle people, well fed, and greedy of pleasures? But let us suppose that some will dance without having any ill desires; can it be said that they will not excite them in others? For they

(69) Ibid. pag. 320.

(70) See Paquier, Recherch. de la France, book viii, ch. xxxiii, pag. m. 729.

A DESCRIPTION of the ill consequences of dancing.

(71) Traité des Danfes, ch. x, pag. 37, of the third edition which is that of 1583.

(72) Ibid. p. 38.

(73) Ibid. p. 41.

It cannot be denied, without doing him injustice, that he was one of the illustrious men of

they do every thing that may kindle lust, and, as St Jerom says in a like case, they present the poison to any that will take and swallow it. Now there will be but too many in these excessive fits of pleasure, and after the provocatives of a full repast, that will be disposed to drink it. A maid is pitched upon to dance; which is sufficient to make her fear that she has excited a foolish desire in the person, who pitches upon her. But when he kisses her very tenderly, and caresses her, and whilst she is dancing, redoubles his efforts; what can she think but that he does it upon her account, and that the fire of love, which kindles his lust, makes him so nimble? Besides, that maid goes up and down with a bold and merry countenance, and without any veil or mark of shame, as it were, to shew herself to every body. But how can she be sure, that none of those, who look upon her, will feel an unlawful desire? And if you suspect that you have occasioned an ill thought in a man, what is become of your conscience, if you are not sorry for it, and do not avoid such meetings? The same may be said of young men with respect to women (74). I should transcribe the greatest part of that book, if I was willing to mention all the reasons alledged in it as strong as these. That treatise was dedicated to the King of Navarre, by the ministers of the Holy Gospel of the French Reformed churches. His court wanted very much to be reformed in that respect, for it was not like that of the virtuous Joan d'Albret. Her example was alledged to that prince (75): 'Thanks be to G O D, there is no body who does not assure himself, that your majesty, besides the great parts and excellent judgment which G O D has bestowed upon you, having so good and so bold an education from your infancy by such an excellent queen and mother, that she was deservedly called the wonder of her age, and remembering the good example she gave you, (for she always kept her house free from such filthy things, ever since she was called to the knowledge of the Gospel, and had the command of herself) it is impossible that the corruption of this age should prevail upon you more than holy precepts, the ill examples of other courts, more than the remembrance of that wherein you have been bred up, and the allurements of the world more than the piety, which you have sucked in with your mother's milk.'

(74) Ibid. p. 43.

(75) Ibid. in the Epistle Dedicatory, fol. A 3.

Ludovicus Vives, a Roman Catholic, had followed the same maxims which Lambert Daneau has set forth. I shall quote him according to the French translation of Peter de Changy. 'In the cities of Christendom we have dancing-schools permitted as fests for wantonness: a thing which the Infidels themselves would by no means suffer, on account of the leud touches and immoderate kisses that are customary there. To what purpose is so much kissing, unless it be to imitate the amorous doves? In old times virgins were not allowed to be kissed by any but their near relations; now every body assumes that privilege. We are brothers and sisters by baptism, but friendship and charity may very well subsist among us without such familiarities. What pleasure or advantage can there be in leaping higher than a girl's strength can bear her, in being raised between two men and hoisted up by the arms, or in dancing a whole night without being tired of it (76). . . . From such nocturnal meetings proceed (as is said before) leud kisses, afterwards unchaste looks and touches, together with obscene discourse. They disfigure themselves at a strange rate. One has her coif pulled off, another is seen bare-headed, joined between two doors, or follicited by squeezing of the hand and other signs; for so treacherous a business it is that there is no way of escaping unhurt. The body is heated; desire inflamed; the heart beats; the will wavers; and then, if a convenient place presents, it is odds but they carry the point still farther. In short it can never bear a good construction among women and girls that have a tender regard to their honour, and therefore it is prudent to avoid the danger, for fear they should not be able to resist it (77).'

(76) Vives, on the education of a Christian woman, chap. xiii, fol. 33. Edit. of Paris 1543.

(77) Ibid. fol. 34.

(78) Plantin affirms in his preface that the first translator had followed the Latin no further than he thought fit, and that the said book, in the form he had put it, was rather an abridgement, collection, or alteration; than a translation of the said Latin of Ludovicus Vives.

The translation of Antony Tiron printed for Plantin at Antwerp in the year 1579 doth not entirely agree with the other (78). His words are as follows: 'Dancing is the last companion which makes extravagant entertainments the scene of mirth and high diversion; so that we may justly say that dancing is in a manner the height of all vices. Notwithstanding this we have dancing-schools in Christendom; upon which account the Heathens out-do us in point of modesty: for they are utter strangers to that new way of dancing which prevails among us, and which is a bait to uncleanness, as being full of unchaste touches and kisses. What means so much kissing? Formerly men were allowed to kiss no women but such as were their relations; but now it is the custom all over Burgundy and England to kiss whomsoever one pleases. Baptism, it is true, gives occasion to this, to the end forsooth it may appear that we are all brethren. For my part I would gladly know what is the use of so much kissing, as if we could not keep up our love and friendship with the women by any other means: but it is the beginning of an uncleanness which I will not name. To speak my mind freely, I am of opinion that it is a most shameful and barbarous custom. But to pursue my discourse upon dancing; what is the good of so many leaps which the girls take, supported under the arms by their partners, to the end that they may be able to kick up their heels higher? What pleasure do these locusts take in tormenting themselves thus, and in spending the greatest part of the nights in dancing without being either weary or satisfied (79)? All the rest of the chapter is full of moral reflexions, and lashes maquerades at a terrible rate.

It is plain that when dancing is attended with so many irregularities, it deserves to be blamed by all those, who write moral books. Sainte-Aldegonde would not have approved of it. The Count de Buffi Rabutin condemned the use of balls as a very dangerous thing: reason and his own experience convinced him of it (80). All the Casuists ought to be Precisists or Rigorists upon this head. The Philosopher, who wrote against the Precisists, declared (81) that he blamed dancing under this notion; but he said he did not believe it was of the same nature among the Protestants of Germany; and that the Precisists, who are offended at a custom, that prevails in that country, where both sexes dance together, should consider that they do not disapprove certain customs, at which the Germans have more reason to be offended. 'Si mixti saltantium chori, nos ratione Germanorum offendant, nec eos multo magis offenderint promiscui juvenum & virginum accubitus in nuptiis, maxime oscula ex more gentis Belgicae, praeter ceteris Hollandicae, frequentari solita. Obtestor eos, quorum zelus contra choreas forte improbari non posset, si a scientia convenienter dirigeretur, an non multo majus scandalum promiscua & quotidiana haec oscula (ita loquitur Sueton. lib. iii. cap. 34.) praebant Sarmatis, Cimbris, & Germanis, quam nobis (si gentilitios mores distinguere noluimus) praebere possint a nuptialibus eorum tripudiis (82)? . . . If we are scandalized at the promiscuous dancing which is in fashion among the Germans, truly they have more reason to be offended at the promiscuous lying of young men and girls at a wedding, and more especially at the kisses which are so customary in the Low-Countries, and particularly in Holland. I appeal to them, whose zeal against balls would perhaps not deserve to be censured, if it was guided by knowledge as it ought to be, whether these promiscuous and daily kisses (to make use of Suetonius's words) do not give much greater offence to the Poles, Holfteiners, and Germans, than we (if so be that we will not distinguish between the customs that are peculiar to different nations) can possibly take at their nuptial dances.'

(79) Ibid., as translated by Antony Tiron, pag. 128, 129.

(80) See in the second part of the Retour des Pieces chastes, his letter to the Bishop of Autun, concerning balls and dancing.

(81) Nulla ratione tamen patrocinaris volo tripudiis modernis, à Bathylli modis non abhorrentibus, atque convenientibus magis Pathico, five cinædo, quam hominini Christiano. Mart. Schoockius, ubi supra, p. 327.

(82) Ibid.

He draws up a parallel between the custom of kissing and that of dancing, and maintains that foreigners will be more offended at the first, than the Precisists are at the last. 'Quam pro suis Batavis excogitaverit hic rigidus Theologus, idemque juratus adversarius non minus omnigenarum chorearum, quam votorum innoxiorum propinato poculo additorum? Maxime, si Cimber, aut Sarmata viderit uxorem illius, convivas suos ad ostium osculo excipientem & dimittentem. Næ, peregrinus hic conviva, cum Clemente Alexand. lib. 3. Pædag. ejusmodi osculum, à gravissimi licet Patris uxore ex usu gentis frequentatum, vocaverit osculum incestum, veneno plenum, sanctitatem simulantem, & osculum impudicitiae: ex Ambrosio vero in cap. ult. 2. ad Corinth. affectus libidinosi indicium. Nec est, quod adversarius dicat hoc judicium, seu Cimbris, seu Sarmatae, charitatis expers esse, quum ipse longe inclementius of the XVIth century; for he was very zealous for his religion, and had a great deal of wit and learning: besides he was well skilled in the Civil Law, Politics, Negotiations, Divinity, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and several living languages (e).

(e) See Verheiden, in Elog. ali-quot Theolog. p. 141, & seq.

(83) Mart. Schoockius, Ex-erit. xxiii, pag. 328.

inclementius iudicet de saltationibus, quas proclamat esse proxima incentiva libidinis, interim non cogitando, per oscula multo expeditius ingredi libidinem; atque Cimbri, seu Sarmatæ, videri prostituta famæ, & pudicitia, feminas esse, quæ præsumpserint hospites osculo excipere (83). - - - What excuse could this rigid Divine, this sworn enemy to all kind of dancing, as well as to the innocent custom of drinking healths, find out for his countrymen the Dutch: especially if an Holsteiner or Pole should see his wife receiving and dismissing her guests at the door with a kiss. Truly that foreign guest would with Clemens Alexandrinus call a kiss of that nature, though given by a grave Person's wife, and warranted by the custom of the country, an impure kiss, full of venom, and which under the pretence of being holy was in truth the kiss of unchastity; or with St Ambrose he would construe it for the mark of a libidinous inclination. Nor could his adversary say that this custom of the Holsteiners or Poles was void of charity, since he himself passes a far more unmerciful judgment upon dancing, which he avers to be the biggest incentive to lust, not considering that lust is much sooner raised by kisses; and that the Holsteiner, Cimbrian, or Pole, believes all these to be loose and abandoned women who presume to welcome their guests with a kiss. He concludes that nations ought to excuse one another, and to consider, above all things, that an ancient and long custom may make a thing innocent in one country, that is indecent in another. He instances upon English women walking with other men than their husbands. (84) Quæ ratione oculi dicta sunt, applicari possunt deambulationibus, quas uxores Anglorum, cum alienis viris intrare solent (85), quæ & inter primaria dignitatis Belgas hoc tempore frequentari incipiunt. Certe offenderint hæ matronas Christianas ad Septentrionem degentes; quæ mirabuntur admodum, hæc & similia citra censuram tolerari posse ab illis Theologis, quorum zelus quo-

(84) Id. ibid. pag. 329.

(85) Henry Stephens mentions that custom in his Latin Apology for Herodotus.

tidie occupari solet circa saltationes & pocula votiva. Nos vero, citra pulveris jactum, ex omnibus hiis difficultatibus expedire constanter possumus, quando docemus, in talibus gentium mores & consuetudines ante omnia inspicere debere quorum ratione, ut rigiores quoque Præcisissæ Hollando sua concedunt suavia, Anglicanis matronis prodeambulationes cum maritis non suis; ita aliis gentibus mox invadere non deberent suas saltationes, modo ab iis absit mollities, & illud τῆς γυναικὸς, ad accendendum libidinem ab otiosis nepotibus excogitatum. - - - What has been said with respect to kisses may be applied to the custom that English women have of walking with other men than their own husbands, which likewise begins to be the fashion among Dutch ladies of the first quality. This must certainly give offence to the Christian women that live farther North, and they will wonder very much how these and the like things can escape the censure of those Divines, whose zeal is daily employed against the custom of dancing and that of drinking healths. But as for us, we can easily extricate ourselves out of all these difficulties, by saying that in such things the manners and customs of nations ought chiefly to be considered, and that since out of regard to those, the rigid Precisists allow the Dutchman his kisses, and the English women their walks with husbands not their own, they ought as little to envy other nations their dances, provided they be free from effeminacy, and have none of those artificial gestures which profligate men have contrived as incentives to lust.

It may be observed that this Philosopher had not the same reasons that Sainte-Aldegonde had, to write an apology for dancing. He protests that he never had a mind to dance; and that if the magistrates should forbid dancing, it would not make him uneasy in the least (86). Sainte-Aldegonde could not have said so with any sincerity.

(86) Protestationi hoc unum amplius adjicio, mihi, circa choreas, ne quicquam fieri five meti; quum de earum exercitio ne per somnium quidem cogitarem tota vita, quam exemplo agni illius Eurymeni apud Plautum, ex Dei meli voluntate, in qua libenter acquiesco, tranfigo inter catenatas molestias & curas: unde & ferre possum Magistratum E-dicta, chorearum abolitionem perpetuam urgentia. Id. ibid. p. 321.

SANCTA-CLARA (FRANCIS OF) an Englishman, and a Franciscan Monk, lived in the XVII century. He was chief lecturer in Divinity at Douay, in the convent of St Bonaventure, and provincial minister of the province of England, and Almoner to the Queen of Great Britain, wife to Charles I. He published some books [A], where he shewed himself favourable to those of the Episcopal persuasion in England; for he endeavoured to prove that the XXXIX articles of their church might be more easily reconciled with the council of Trent, than is commonly imagined. He was besides very favourable to those who err with a good intention. We need only see his problem upon invincible ignorance (a). He does not appear to have any other learning or eloquence besides what may be got by a diligent reading of the School-men and Canonists.

(a) It is the xvth of his book, intitled Deus, Natura, Gratia. Mr Allix has quoted it twice, (pag. 117, 203) in his Reflexions Critiques & Theologiques sur la Controverse de l'Eglise, printed in the year 1686.

It has likewise been quoted in the Commentaire Philosoph. sur les contrain-les d'entrer, pag. 524, of Part. II.

[A] He published some books. I shall give the entire title of that which he dedicated to Charles I, king of England, and which was printed at Lyons in the year 1635 in 8vo. 'Deus, Natura, Gratia, five Tractatus de Prædestinatione, de Meritis & peccatorum remissione, seu de Justificatione, & denique de Sanctorum Invocatione, Reliquiarum & Imaginum veneratione, de Indulgentiis, & Purgatorio, & sub finem, de Excommunicatione. Ubi ad trutinam Fidei Catholicæ examinatur Confessio Anglicana, & ad singula puncta, quid teneat, qualiter differat, excutitur. Doctrina etiam Doctoris Subtilis, D. Augustini sequacis acutissimi, olim Oxoniæ & Cantabrigiæ, & solemniter approbata, & honorifice prælecta, exponitur & propugnatur. Accessit paraphrastica Expositio reliquorum Articulorum Confessionis Anglicanæ. Tertia editio multo auctior, pluribus materiis Theologicis illustrior, & in articulorum discussione clarior, & fusior. Præmittitur Epistolium Apologeticum lectori Catholico, in quo ratio totius operis exhibetur. - - - God, Nature, Grace; or a treatise *on Predestination, on Merits and the forgiveness of sins, or on Justification; as also on the invocation of saints, the worship of relics and images, on indulgences, and purgatory, and lastly on excommunication. Wherein the confession of the Church of England is examined by the scale of the Catholic Faith, and discussed in every point, both as to what it contains, and in what manner it differs from the said faith. The doctrine also of Duns Scotus, the subtle follower of St Augustin, which formerly was solemnly approved of and honourably taught at Oxford and Cambridge, is explained and defended. To this is added, a paraphrastic exposition of the other articles of the English confession. The third edition considerably enlarged, improved by the addition of several points of Divinity, and more distinct and copious in the discussion of the articles: to which is prefixed, a short apologetic epistle to the Catholic reader, giving an account of the whole work.' His Apologia Episcoporum, seu sacri Magistratus Propugnatio: Præmittuntur Anarcharum politicissimi, was printed at Cologne in the year 1640 in 8vo.*

SANTA-CROCE (PROSPER) in French Sainte-Croix, made a cardinal by Pius IV, had been advocate-consistorial and auditor of the Rota. He was Nuncio in Germany, Portugal, Spain, and France. Catherine de Medicis procured him the archbishopric of Arles, where he prevented with an extreme severity the establishment of the Protestant religion. He died at Rome the fourth of October 1589, being seventy-six years old. I shall

VOL. V.

G

SANTA-CROCE. SANCTA-MAURA.

shall speak of his books [A]. At his return from his nunciature in Portugal, he made Tobacco known in Italy [B]; which is the reason why that herb was called Santa-Croce (a).

(a) Ex Prospero Mandosio, Bibliotheca Romana; & Oidoino Athen. Roman.

[A] I shall speak of his books. His books are, *Decisiones Rotæ Romanæ. Gallicarum rerum Commentaria.
Epistole ad Federicum Naufragum aliosque. Several Orations. Constitutiones lætæ artis à Sixto V. in Urbe erectæ.* The Jesuits of the Roman college have his treatise, De Officio Legati, and one volume of his letters in manuscript (1).

(1) Ex Prospero
Mandosio, Bibl.
Romana; & Oldoino Athen.
Roman.

[B] He made Tobacco known in Italy. This appears from some verses of Caſtor Duranti, quoted by Man-dosio, wherein that herb is celebrated, as if forsooth it was an universal remedy.

Nomine quæ Sanctæ Crucis herba vocatur, ocellis
Subvenit, & sanat plagas, & vulnera jungit,
Discutit & strumas, cancrum, cancroſaque ſanat
Ulcera, & ambuſtis prodeſt, ſcabiemque repellit;
Discutit & morbum cui ceſſit ab impete nomen,
Calefacit & ficcat, ſtringit, mundatque, reſolvit,
Et dentum & ventris mulcet capitique dolores;
Subvenit antiquæ tuſſi, ſtomacoque rigenti
Renibus & ſpleni conſert, ultroque, venena
Dira ſagittarum domat, iſcibus omnibus atria
Hæc eadem prodeſt: gingivis proficit atque
Conciliat ſomnum: nuda oſſaque carne reveſtit:
Thoracis vitis prodeſt, pulmonis itemque,
Quæ duo ſic præſtat non ulla potentior herba.
Hanc Sanctæ Crucis Proſper quum Nuncius eſſet
Sedis Apoſtolice Luſitanas miſſus in oras
Huc adportavit Romanæ ad comoda gentis,
Ut proavi Sanctæ lignum Crucis ante tulere Omnis Chriſtiadum quo nunc reſpublica gaudet, Et Sanctæ Crucis illuſtris Domus ipſa vocatur
Corporis atque animæ noſtræ ſtudioſa ſalutis.

The herb which borrowes Santa Croce's name;
Sore eyes relieves, and bealeth wounds. The ſame Diſcuſſes the King's Evil, and removes Cancers and Boils: a remedy it proves
For burns and ſcalds, repels the nauſeous itch,
And ſtrait recovers from Convulſion fits.
It cleaſes, dries, binds up, and maketh warm:
The Head-ach, Tooth-ach, Cholick, like a charm,
It eaſes ſoon; an antient cough relieves,
And to the reins, the mill, and ſtomach gives Quick riddance from the pain that each endures;
Next the dire wounds of poiſon'd arrows cures,
All bruifes heals, and when the gums are ſore,
It makes them ſound and healthy as before.
Sleep it procures, our anxious ſorrow lays,
And with new fleſh the naked bone arrays.
No herb has greater power to reſtify
All the diſorders in the breaſt that lie
Or in the lungs. Herb of immortal fame!
Which hither firſt with Santa Croce came,
When he, his time of nunciature expir'd,
Back from the court of Portugal retir'd;
Even as his predeceſſors great and good Brought home the Croſs, whoſe conſecrated wood
All Chriſtendom now with its preſence bleſſes:
And ſtill th' illuſtrious family poſſeſſes
The name of Santa Croce, rightly given,
Since they, in all reſpects reſembling Heaven,
Procure, as much as mortal men can do
The welfare of our ſouls and bodies too.

A parallel between Tobacco and the wood of the true
Croſs, is a very high ſtrained panegyric.

(a) See the article LEUCAS.

(b) Coronelli,
Memoires Hiſt.
& Geogr. Printed at Amſterdam 1686.

(c) Spon, Voieg.
Tom. I, p. 104.
Dutch Edit.

(d) Coronelli, ubi ſupra.

(e) Spon, ubi
ſupra, p. 104.

SANCTA-MAURA, an iſland formerly called Leucas (a), nine miles from that of Cephalonia (b). The Greeks call it ſtill Leucada (c), for properly ſpeaking they call Sancta-Maura the fortrefs, where there was formerly a monaſtery of that name. That fortrefs is three miles diſtant from the ruins of the town of Leucas [A], in a place where the canal between the iſle and the continent is one league broad. Nevertheless it has conſtant communication with the continent by the bridge, and by means of ſeveral little iſlands joined together by bridges (d). It has alſo an aqueduct [B] a mile long, which ſerves for a bridge to thoſe, who go on foot (e). There are about thirty villages in the iſland: the Greeks have a biſhop in it. It abounds with corn, wine, oil, and ſeveral forts of fruit, and is about twelve or fifteen leagues round (f). The Turks made themſelves maſters of it in 1479 [C]. The Venetians took it from them under the conduct of the Captain-general Peſaro in 1502, and reſtored it to them ſoon after by a treaty of peace.
They retook it under the General Morofini the twenty-third of July 1684. The Pirates
of

(f) Father Coronelli ſays it is ſeventy miles in circumference.

(1) Spon, Voieg.
Tom. I, p. 103.

[A] Three miles diſtant from the ruins of the town of Leucas. Spon (1) cenſures Ortelius and Ferrarius for believing as other Geographers do, that Sancta-Maura is ſtill in the ſame place with the town of Leucas, the ruins of which are to be ſeen three miles from Sancta-Maura. I do not find in Or-telius's Theſaurus Geographicus that the town of Sancta-Maura, and that of Leucas are in the ſame ſituation;
but only that the iſle of Leucas is now called Sancta-Maura. Now is there any thing in this that de-ſerves to be cenſured? Spon adds, that the town of Leucas was built upon a riſing ground a mile from the ſea, at the narroweſt part of the canal that was made when the iſthmus was cut, and that this part is not above fifty paces broad. I confeſs I cannot apprehend that a town ſhould be built upon a canal fifty paces broad, and yet be a mile diſtant from the ſea; for is not that canal in the ſame place where the iſthmus was? Now can a town built upon an iſthmus fifty paces broad be above fifty paces diſtant from the ſea?
Suppoſing the Engliſh channel to be only thirty toifes broad, will it follow from thence that Dover and Calais are not upon the ſea-ſhore.

[B] It has alſo an aqueduct. Spon (2) who ſaw (2) Spon, ubi ſupra, pag. 104.
who go on foot, though it be hardly above three foot broad, and has no breaſt-height. He adds, though a man be never ſo fearful, he trembles when he goes over it, eſpecially if he meets any body that comes from the place he goes to; for two men have much ado to go over it a-breaſt. But Father Coronelli ſays (3) it is a ſtately aqueduct, built with ſtone, and ſupported by three hundred and ſixty arches. The ſupplement of Moreri's Dictionary calls it a magnificent aqueduct of ſtone . . .
ſupported by three hundred and ſixty arches which croſs
the great pond.

(3) Coronelli,
Memoires Hiſt.
& Geographi-ques.

[C] The Turks made themſelves maſters of it in the year 1479. It was under Mahomet II. See the particulars of it in that Sultan's life written by Mr Guillet (4); they are curious enough. Leonard Tocco, (4) In Tom. ii, Deſpotes or Dynaſta of Acarnania, was then poſſeſſed pag. 329.
of Sancta-Maura.

of Sancta Maura have been much talked of: They were the first that made use of galliots. The Bashaw of the Morea went on purpose into that island in 1675, to burn their small vessels (g). Durag Bey, a famous corsair of Lepanto, had seven or eight corsairs of Sancta-Maura under his command. (2) Spon, ibid.

SANCTESIUS (a) (CLAUDIUS), in French de Saintes, one of the chief controversialists of the XVIth century, was a native of Perche [A]. He took the habit of canon regular in the year 1540 (b), in the monastery of St Cheron near Chartres (c), and was sent to Paris some time after, where he studied classical learning, Philosophy and Divinity in the college of Navarre (d). He took his degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1555, and then applied himself very much to controversy, and was admitted into the house of the Cardinal de Lorraine (e). In the year 1561, he was one of the disputants for the Romish party in the conference of Poissy, and afterwards one of the twelve Divines, whom Charles IX sent to the council of Trent. He and Simon Vigor disputed with two ministers in the house of the Duke of Nevers in 1566 (f). I speak of this in another place (g). He preached a considerable time in Paris, and was made Bishop of Evreux in the year 1575. He was so incensed against the Protestants, that he maintained that those, whom they had baptized, were to be baptized again [B]. He left nothing unattempted to turn them out of his diocese, and to get all the canons of the council of Trent admitted into the kingdom without any restriction [C]. He did not scruple to say that Calvin and Beza taught Atheistical doctrines (b). He joined in the League with such a fury, that he maintained that Henry III had been justly assassinated, and that Henry IV deserved the same punishment [D]. The manuscript, wherein he asserted that doctrine, was found in his closet, when Biron made himself master of Louviers, and seized upon that unhappy prelate. He was not treated like a prisoner of war, but he was sent to Caen (i) to be tried; and because he obstinately continued to maintain that pernicious doctrine, he would have been put to death, had not the Cardinal de Bourbon, and some other Ecclesiastics who were with the king, prevailed with him to remit that punishment, which they thought he justly deserved, and to condemn him to a perpetual imprisonment. He died soon after in his confinement (k): it was in the year 1591. It is to be observed that long before, out of spite to the Protestants, he had said in a book, that subjects ought never to oppose the ordinances

(a) Thuanus calls him Sanctus.

(b) Moreri at the word Claude de Saintes, letter C.

(c) In Cœnobio Sancti Carauli ad Carnutum. Jo. Launois Hyl. Gymnasti Navarr. p. 769.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Id. ibid.

(f) And not 1566, as Launois will have it. ibid.

(g) See the article ROSIER.

(h) See the book which he intitled, Declaration d'auteurs Athéistes de la Doctrine de Calvin & de Beze.

(i) The parliament of Normandy had been removed thither.

(k) Taken from Thuanus. See his words in the remark [D].

[A] He was a native of Perche. I know that according to La Croix du Maine and Moreri, he was a native of Chartres: but I rather believe John de Launois, who has these words: Claudius Sanctus ortum habuit in ea Gallie regione cujus populi nunc Pertenses, Gregorio Turonensi Pertenses; antiquioribus Auterici Diablintes dicti fuere (1).

(1) Jo. Launois, in Hist. Gymnasti Navar. pag. 769.

[B] He maintained, that those whom the Protestants had baptized, were to be baptized again. He himself tells us that Pius V having decided, that those who had been baptized by the innovators, ought neither simply, nor yet with any addition, to be baptized again, ordered his Nuncio to command him, and the other preachers of Paris, to teach no longer the contrary. That brief of Pius V is very scarce. I shall set down the words of Dr de Launois. Ad annum MDLXXII Lutetia concionabatur, cum Pius V Pontifex statuit, neque simpliciter, neque cum adjectione repetendum esse baptismum, quem Novatores dedissent. Id testatur in Synodo, quam cum Episcopus fuit, anno MDLXXVII habuit. Quam, inquit, definitionem Pius Pontifex ante quinque vel sex annos per Breve, ac per Internuntium Apostolicum dignatus fuit nobis atque aliis, qui tum Lutetia Parisiorum fungebantur concionatorum officio, significare atque inhibere, ne aliter doceremus. Breve illud vix invenitur (2).

(2) Launois, ibid. pag. 770.

[C] He left nothing unattempted . . . to get all the canons of the council of Trent admitted into the kingdom, without any restriction. This I shall prove by the words of the said doctor. Porro autem, says he (3), in Episcopali munere nulli non peperit labori ac diligentia, sive ut hæresim à finibus suis exterminaret, sive ut Tridentini Concilii decreta penitus admitterentur ac servarentur.

[D] He maintained that Henry III had been justly assassinated, and that Henry IV deserved the same punishment. Let us transcribe the whole account Thuanus gives of this. Captus in oppido (4) Claudius Sanctus Ebriocensium Episcopus famosus Theologus regis paribus infestissimus cum libris & chartis, inter quas scriptum reperit, cum quo parricidium Regis tantum iuste factum tuebatur, & idem licere in Regem hodiernum defendebat. Itaque non lege belli cum eo actum, sed Cadomum sub custodia missus, ut in cum Senatus inquireret, & tanquam de perduelli supplcium fameretur. Nec enim sacri ordinis prærogativæ in crimine læsæ Majestatis apud nos ratio habetur, sed in convictos, sive sacerdotes sive episcopi sint, tanquam solutos ac profanos legum severitas exercetur, parumque res ab executione absumit: Sanctio jam peracta reo, ut erat perversi ingenio errorem præfæcte propugnante. Sed intercesserunt postea Cardinalis Borbonius alique è sacro ordine, qui cum Rege erant, tenueruntque, ut pro mortis poena, quam legibus nostris, ut ipsi fæcebantur, meruerat, carceri perpetuo manciparetur, in quo paulo post decessit (5). - - Claudius Sanctus, Bishop of Evreux, a famous Divine, and a bitter enemy to the king's party, was taken in the town, with his books and papers, among which was found a piece, wherein he justified the murder of the late king, and maintained that the same thing might lawfully be done to his present majesty. For this reason he was not treated like a prisoner of war, but was sent under a guard to Caen, that he might be tried before the parliament, and punished as a traitor. For with us no regard is had to the privileges of the holy order in crimes of high treason; but the rigour of the law takes place upon all such as are convicted, upon priests and bishops, as well as lay men; and it was very near being executed here; Sanctus, even after he was found guilty, continuing obstinately to defend this error. But afterwards, the Cardinal de Bourbon, and some other Ecclesiastics that were with the king, interceded for him, and obtained that instead of being punished with death, which they confessed he deserved by our laws, he should be condemned to a perpetual imprisonment, in which he died soon after. Henry IV acted, without doubt, upon this occasion according to the clemency and generosity that were natural to him; but there was likewise some small mixture of that timorous prudence, which frequently shook his great courage, when he came to observe that the monster of the league he was to overcome, more fierce and dangerous than Hercules's Hydra, would grow more furious and terrible by the effusion of his blood. Wherefore that prince thought himself obliged to use mildness in order to tame and pacify that wild beast. Clemency, on the one hand, and policy on the other, spared Sanctus the shame of losing his life upon a scaffold, as he deserved. [E] He ordinances of their sovereigns [E]. He published a small piece in 1561, to shew that Heretics ought not to be tolerated [F]. It is a very ancient opinion, and very common to

(6) It was the doctrine of the Roman Catholics before the League; but they sung to another tune soon after, as one of them told the Leaguers in a reproachful manner in a book printed at Caen, 1590, and intitled, Deploration de la mort du Roy Henry III, & du scandale qu'en a l'Eglise. They themselves, says he, pag. 54, in the beginning of the troubles made use of this argument against the Huguenots, 'They are Heretics, for they take up arms against the magistrates, they will not obey them, but are for planting their religion with the sword, which is only given to the magistrates.'

(*) Confession of Geneva, Art. xl.

(8) Frater Claudius de Sainctes, in Methodi quam sequuti sunt Principes, cap. xiii, fol. 112. verso.

(9) Printed at Amsterdam, 1687, in 12mo.

[E] He had said in a book, that subjects ought never to oppose the ordinances of their sovereigns (6). The book, wherein he advances this opinion, was printed at Paris, in 1561, with this title, Confession de Foi Catholique, contenant en bref la Reformation de celle que les Ministres de Calvin presenterent au Roi en l'Assemblée de Poissy. The fifty-seventh article of that Confession contains these words: 'We hold that subjects ought to obey their laws and ordinances, to pay tributes, imposts, and other duties, and bear the yoke of subjection with a ready will, tho' princes were infidels, and the empire of GOD should not be preserved entire.' And therefore we detest those, who would reject superior powers, set up communities at their pleasure, introduce a confusion of goods, and overthrow the order of justice. We also reject all murderers and assassins, hired and sworn to follow and support sects, and those who declare all those to be worthy of death, without form of trial, who displease or resist them, and who get kings, lords, churches, and towns, attacked under pretence of the word of GOD.' The author undertook to shew that the Catholics went farther than the Protestants; for the latter added a clause to the article, wherein they declared their opinion about the obedience of subjects; provided, say they, the empire of GOD be preserved entire (7). Tho' this clause has been often reflected upon, as being too general and captious, it is very just and orthodox, if it be rightly understood, tho' it may be wrested to a pernicious sense against the intention of the authors. But it is certain that Sanctesius left it out of his Confession from a motive of mere ostentation, and out of hatred to Geneva; and no man did ever contradict himself more impudently than he did: which is the usual fate of those who argue without principles, and embrace an opinion only to differ from their enemies, that they may have a pretence to insult them, and render them suspected. When that passion is over, or when the interest and exigencies of their party require another thing, they renounce their first opinions, and espouse quite contrary ones. We have some late instances of it.

[F] He published a small piece . . . to shew that Heretics ought not to be tolerated. His book is intitled, Ad edicta veterum Principum de licentia sectarum in Christiana religione. Item methodus contra sectas quam sequuti sunt primi Catholici Imperatores. He approves that Heretics should be put to death, and declares that if the fires, which had been lighted in France to destroy Calvinism, had not been extinguished, that sect would have made no progress. 'Audiui Severum Sulpitium de Priscillianii historia, quasi tabulam absolutionis per domos judicum aliquorum circumlatum, cum adhuc in Gallia exercerentur judicia de capite pro religione ex Christianissimorum regum edictis, atque ex ea historia plus damni nostrae fidei, quam à Calvino libris & emissariis illatum. Non enim ultro citroque intrepide commeaissent, & ad factionem tot homines sollicitassent, si conflagratio non fuisset temere restincta, & à nonnullis quasi fides publica data Religionis & Reipub. perturbatoribus (8). -- I have heard that Sulpitius Severus's history of Priscillianus, was carried round to the houses of some of the Judges, as if it had been a decree of absolution, during the time that capital punishments were still inflicted on a religious account in France, according to the edicts of the most Christian kings; and that this history did more damage to our faith than the books and emissaries of Calvin. For they could not have gone up and down so without any fear, and stirred up such a number of men to sedition, if the fires had not been imprudently extinguished, and if some few had not presumed to give a kind of public security to these enemies of religion and the state.' The whole strength of this book is grounded upon custom and practice; for he alleges few reasons, and those he offers are not good. Whoever impartially compares the arguments for or against Toleration, must needs confess that he could not have alleged any good reason for persecution, tho' he had been a man of much greater abilities than he was. The reasons for a Toleration have been set forth with the utmost evidence by some late writers. See the prefaces to the History of the Edict of Nantes; the book (9) intitled, Traité de la Liberté de Conscience, ou de l'Autorité des Souverains sur la Religion des Peuples, opposée aux Maximes de Hobbes & de Spinoza, adoptées par le Sieur Jurieu dans son Histoire du Papisme, & dans son Systeme de l'Eglise; the Philosophical Commentary upon these words, Compel them to come in; and the Latin letter printed at Tergow, in 1689, Mr de Beauval (10) ascribed it to Mr Bernard, a French minister, very well known by his works, and very well qualified to write a book that contains such close reasoning; but it is certain he is not the author of it, and it is thought to be written by an English gentleman (11), whose books on Metaphysics, Morality, &c. appear frequently in the Journals. But without undertaking to read a long-winded work, one needs only read a small piece written at London, in 1685, by an illiterate magistrate of a town in Holland (12). It is intitled, H. V. P. ad B. . . . de nuperis Angliæ motibus Epistola, in qua de diversorum à publica religione, circa divina sentimentum differitur tolerantia. That letter was printed at Rotterdam, in 1685, in Latin, French, and Dutch.

The reasons alleged for Toleration must needs be very cogent, since all those, who have done their utmost endeavours to answer them, have been obliged to have recourse to unfair means, and to acknowledge that Heretics ought not however to be punished with death (13). Their malice and unfairness appear by their endeavouring to create a belief, that those who are for Toleration favour the Socinians; that they are ill affected towards the government, and deprive the supreme powers of one of the most considerable rights that GOD has given them. This is a base and unjust proceeding: at this rate one must not find fault with the cruel decrees, by virtue of which so many Protestants have been burnt in France, the Netherlands, Spain, and Italy; for the Socinians do mightily exclaim against those cruelties. They inveigh no less against the Papists, who have put to death those, that are mentioned in the Protestant Martyrology, and against those, who put to death Servetus, Gentilis, &c. In a word, one must not write against the Pope, the Jews and the Turks; for it is manifest, that Socinus and his followers do not spare them, but confuse them with all their might. If they who shew that no penal laws ought to be established against those who err in matters of faith, are wanting in the respect due to sovereigns; if they divest the supreme powers of one of their most considerable prerogatives; our late apologists for persecution will be found guilty of that crime, since they maintain that no blood ought to be shed upon account of religion. Does not this take away from sovereigns the brightest gem in their crown? Have they not the power of life and death over malefactors? Besides, can it be said that GOD has put the sword into the hands of the magistrates of Holland, to punish those who transgress against the first table of the Law, as well as those who transgress against the second, without reflecting upon them, and exposing them to the hatred of their subjects? If this be true, is not their toleration of idolatry as great a crime, as if they tolerated murderers and highway-men? Further, could there be any thing more ridiculous than to inflict no other punishment than banishment upon notorious assassins and poisoners, without distinction of age or sex (14). See the dispute of Messieurs de Wallemburgh (15) about this question, Whether supposing that the magistrates have a right to punish Heretics, they may put them to death. They reduce their dispute with the Lutherans to this point; for they allege the famous Gherard, who was for enacting penal laws against sectaries, but did not approve that they should be punished with death. They clearly shew him that it is a frivolous exception. But in order to see the confusion of those, who are against Toleration, we need only observe that they unwarily say, that the sovereigns, who oppose the introduction of a true doctrine, are very commendable. 'I cannot blame the Swifs, says one of them (16) who will not permit by any means the growth of any new sect amongst them. Holland abounds with different religions. It were to be wished that those disorders had been prevented from the beginning.' The author of these words being a minister, two absurdities contained in them were objected to him.

(10) Histoire des Savans, for September 1689, Art. ii.

(11) Mr Locke.

(12) Mr PArts. See a short encomium upon him in the Novellæ de la République des Lettres, for October 1685, Art. ii, p. 1093, 1094, of the second edition. That great man died the eighth of October 1686.

(13) See the eighth letter of the Tableau du Socinianisme.

(14) Note, that this may serve to confuse that author of the eighth letter of the Tableau du Socinianisme, by his own assertions. See them above in dist. (105), of the article LOYOLA.

(15) See their book De unitate Ecclesiae, lib. vi, Part. i, cap. ii, & sequent. pag. 222, & sequent. Edit. Colon. 1656, in 4to.

(16) Esprit de Mr Arnaud, Tom. ii, pag. 335.

to this very day, tho' no doctrine was ever confuted with more solid arguments (1). The titles of his other books may be seen in the history of the college of Navarre. Moreri and du Sauffai have committed unpardonable mistakes [G]. It is to be observed likewise that Sanctefius confessed he was suspected for some time of being inclined to Calvinism [H], and that he represented Cardinal de Lorrain as a faint under persecution [I].

He

(17) Lettre à Monsieur J. . . . sur son Livre intitulé l'Esprit de Monsieur Arnaud, pag. 11. That letter, according to the title, was printed at Deventer by the heirs of John Comenius in the year 1684.

(18) Ibid. p. 8, 9.

(19) In the remark [A].

(20) Ante omnia me ut fugitivum servum increpavit, quem non ignoraret CAPTASSE remotiores Episcopatus, ut me in libertatem à servitute auferret, atque ejus comitatu affere-rem. Claud. Sanctefius, Epist. Dedicat. Libri de Eucharistia, ad Gregorium XIII.

(21) That is the Cardinal de Lorrain.

(22) The Cardinal de Lorrain died at Avignon, the 26th of December 1574.

(23) Sanctefius, Epist. Dedicat. Libri de Eucharistia.

him. Neither the Catholic nor the Reformed Cantons, was he told (17), 'will tolerate new sects: Is it then upon this account that you cannot blame them? How little is your zeal for the propagation of your religion! Is it not your duty to wish earnestly that the Catholic Cantons would tolerate the Reformed amongst them, and ought you not to blame them exceedingly for refusing to hear Jesus and his prophets? Truly you are no good Apostle of Christ.' He had been told before: (18) If your opinion had been followed in these happy provinces . . . the Protestant religion had never prevailed in them . . . And if Spain had been always uppermost, and had prevented those disorders from the beginning, you would not live so comfortably in the habit you wear; for the Protestant religion would be so far from prevailing in this country, that one would hardly have a notion of it. Truly the Reformed are very much beholden to you.

[G] Moreri and du Sauffai have committed unpardonable faults.] I only say this of some of them: I. I have already observed (19) Moreri's mistake about Sanctefius's country. II. He could not be at the conference of Poissy after his return from the council, since he did not go to that council till after that conference was held. III. How could Charles IX, who died the 30th of May 1574, name him to the bishopric of Evreux, in the year 1575? I do not question that our doctor sued for that dignity before that prince died, and had a promise of it; but it is certain he did not obtain it till the reign of Henry III. He himself says so; nor does he dissemble that his patron (20) told him, in a reproachful manner (21), that he sued for bishoprics in remote provinces, to free himself from the slavery of the court. 'Quoniam Christianissimi Regis Caroli mors intercessit, ne qua factione vel gratia mutaretur, quod semel Principi placuerat. Quibus potuit precibus apud Reginam matrem, novum Regem, Regisque fratrem, optimos maximos Principes, & Sanctitatem vestram, ac fratrum Cardinalium classem egit, ut is mihi maneret Episcopatus; nec prius quievit, quam accepit promotionis mee diploma ad te perferri. Quod accidit illis diebus, quibus Avenione, non annis, sed curis Ecclesiarum ac reipublice confectus, agebat animam (22): quasi moriens hanc mihi cum Episcopatu tradidit & commendavit (23). . . . Because the death of the most Christian King Charles fell out in the mean time; left what had been the will and pleasure of that prince should be rendered of no effect by any faction or favour, he employed his utmost interest with the queen-mother, the new king, and the king's brother, these great and good princes, as likewise with your Holiness, and the college of cardinals, to get me confirmed in that bishopric: nor did he rest until he had procured my nomination to be sent to you. This happened during the time that he lived at Avignon, worn out not with years, but with the cares of the church and state; so that dying, he, in a manner, gave up, and recommended his soul to me at the same time with the bishopric.' This shews that his nomination was drawn up at the court of France, and sent to the court of Rome in December 1574; but because he did not receive his bulls before the year 1575, Dr de Launoi was in the right to say that he was preferred to a bishopric in 1575. Here follow the gross mistakes. IV. The innovators mentioned by Moreri had so little interest at the court of France, before Sanctefius turned rebel, that if they had undertaken to vent any calumny against him, they would rather have done him good than harm. Perhaps they represented to Henry III, who was no less persecuted by the league than they, the excesses of that factious bishop; but this was no calumny. V. What an absurdity, to pretend that they poisoned him? He was no longer in a capacity to do them any prejudice; for tho', by the king's favour, he had escaped capital punishment, he was to be confined in a prison the remaining part of his life. VI. To say nothing of his trial, and of the reason why he was thought to deserve death, is an unpardonable omission. Spondanus, before him, was guilty of the same omission: the Muse, who presides over History, must needs look upon such writers as great prevaricators. Dr de Launoi has not committed the same fault; for he names the author who mentions the punishment of that bishop, and he thinks he deserved it. 'Anno MDXCI decessit perpetuo mancipatus carceri propter ea, quae Jacobus Augustus Thuanus memorie tradidit in Historiarum libro CI. Sic virum tantum, & de Ecclesia olim tam bene meritum periisse valde dolendum, nisi pereundi causa id iuste postulasset (24). . . . He died (24) Launoius, in the year 1591, being condemned to perpetual imprisonment, for the reasons which Thuanus has related in 773 the 101st book of his history. The loss of so great a man, who had formerly done such good service to the church, would have been very much to have been lamented, if he had not given just cause for his own destruction.' I wonder that the ministers of state, in France, should suffer so many writers to suppress the infamy of rebel bishops. It is giving such as shall think fit to imitate their example, strong reason to hope that Historians will take no notice of it.

VOL. V.

Here follow the mistakes of Andrew du Sauffai.

I. He says that Sanctefius was Professor in the year 1533, in a monastery of regular canons (25). II. He tells us that Sanctefius went to the council of Trent before the conference of Poissy was held. III. That he assisted at a provincial council of Rouen in the year 1576; but that council was not held before the year 1581, as Dr de Launoi informs us (26), who adds that Sanctefius published the year following a French translation of the acts of that assembly, which he had promoted and directed (27). IV. That invincible hero of the Gallican church did not confine himself within those bounds, if we believe du Sauffai: he and Simon Vigor disputed with Spina and du Rosier, two of the chief ministers, and got a complete victory. That is, the bishop of Evreux was not contented to assist at a provincial synod in the year 1576 (28), and to put in order and publish the synodal decrees of his diocese, but engaged also in a regular disputation with those two ministers. What an anachronism is here! that conference was held eight or nine years before Sanctefius came to be a bishop. V. He died in 1591, and not in the foregoing year. VI. It is an inexcusable prevarication in mentioning the death of that Prelate, to call him extimius, - - - excellent, without saying any thing of his rebellion, and abominable doctrine, and of the infamous punishment he had like to have undergone. What du Sauffai says of him is contained in fifteen lines. How many faults would he have committed, if he had made an encomium of fifteen pages?

[H] He confessed that he was suspected of being inclined to Calvinism.] He says those suspicions were grounded on his appearing much more moderate, when he engaged in a dispute in the Hôtel de Nevers, than he had been at the conference of Poissy. 'Ego qui Pissiaci habebam acrior, & tantum non seditiosus, antequam superiore in collatione facta cum Spina & Rosio Ministris, credebam mutatus, ac paulo momento ad Calvinismum posse impelli, quoniam de pristina vehementia tantum remiseram, quantum in domino Vigoreo Calvinistis infestissimo Doctore magis ac magis cernebam inflammari & exardescere (29). . . . I (29) Sanctefius, who at Poissy was esteemed too fiery, and not far distant from sedition, in the conference held the year before with the ministers Spina and Rosier; was now thought to be changed and very much inclined to Calvinism; because I had abated of my former violence, in proportion as I saw it flame out with more and more heat in that bitter enemy to the Calvinists, Simon Vigor.'

[I] He represented the Cardinal de Lorrain as a saint under persecution.] If we may believe Sanctefius, that cardinal was very sick of the bruise of Joseph; he daily afflicted his righteous soul, like another Lot, seeing the evils of the church. He was a-dying every day in the midst of the tribulations and anguishes he endured for the cause of God, and was continually preparing himself for martyrdom, being told every day that there was a design upon his life; and he would say sometimes,

H

(1) See the remark [F].

(25) Ordinis Sancti Augustini Canoniarum Regularium . . . anno 1533 Presens. Andr. du Sauffai, de Scriptis Ecclesiasticis Continuat. pag. 38. Edit. Colon. 1684, in 4to.

(26) Launoius, ubi supra, pag. 772.

(27) Synodum provincialem . . . promovit, rexit, composuit. Id. ibid.

(28) According to du Sauffai's computation.

(29) Sanctefius, in Responsione ad Apolog. Berzæ apud Launoius, ubi supra, pag. 769, 770.

He was one of those Divines, who found it a difficult thing to answer the passages of St Augustin alledged by the Protestants against Free-will. Wherefore he lessened the authority of that holy doctor as much as he could in his controversial writings about the doctrine of Grace [K].

times, Let us go and die with him. * Per annos fere sexdecim à comitatu illuftriffimi Principis, ac maximi Cardinalis Caroli Lotharingi, nili alicuius officii publici caufa, non recessi, nec ille me ftudiorum tantum, fed ad externos omnium profectum, colloquiorum & negotiorum multorum, quæ difficillimis Gallie temporibus ipfi contra hæreticos & paffionum, qui participem fecit, ut tentationum & paffionum, quibus per tot annos quotidie moriebatur, & omni hora de vita periclitabatur, qui quoties nunciabatur, paratas effe infidias, tam parum timidus, quam nimium effe putabatur, folebat ad me conuerfus dicere : Sequeris Sacerdotem Levita ; aliquando vero : Eamus, & moriamur cum illo. Cum defereretur ab intimis, addebatur : Socii paffionum erunt & confolationis (30). - - - For almost sixteen years I clofely attended that illuftrious Prince and great Cardinal Charles de Lorrain, unlesſe when ſome public buſineſs required my aſſiſtance. He not only made me a partaker in his ſtudies, but likewiſe in all his travels, conferences, and the many weighty affairs which he tranſacted againſt the Heretics during the troubles of France. I was be-

(30) Sanctefius,
Epist. Dedicat.
Librorum de Eucharistia, ad Gregorium XIII, apud Launoium,
ubi supra. pag.
771.

(31) See his article, and particularly the passage quoted out of Brantome.

(32) Beza, ad
Claud. de Xaintes, Apolog. I, init. Oper. Tom.
II, pag. 288.

mes, Let us go and die with him. ' Per annos fere fexdecim à comitatu illuftriffimi Principis, ac maximi Cardinalis Caroli Lotheringii, nifi alicuius officii publici caufa, non receffi, nec ille me ftudiorum tan-tum, fed ad exteros omnium profectuum, colloqui-orum & negotiorum multorum, quæ difficillimis Gallie temporibus ipfi contra hæreticos incidenter, me participem fecit, ut tentationum & paffionum, quibus per tot annos quotidie moriebatur, & omni hora de vita periclitabatur, qui quoties nunciabatur, pa-ratas effe infidias, tam parum timidus, quam nimium effe putabatur, folebat ad me converfus dicere :
Sequeris Sacerdotem Levita ; aliquando vero : Eas-mus, & moriamur cum illo. Cum defereretur ab intimis, addebatur : Socii paffionum erunt & confola-tionis (30). . . . For almoft sixteen years I clofly attended that illuftrious Prince and great Cardinal Charles de Lorrain, unlefs when fome public bufinefs required my abfence. He not only made me a partaker in his ftudies, but likewise in all his travels, conferences, and the many weighty affairs which he tranfacted againft the Heretics during the troubles of France. I was befides a witnefs to the temptations and fufferings in which for fo many years he was dying daily, and was every hour in danger of his life. As often as he was told that there was a plot againft him, being at little fearful as he was thought to be much fo, he ufed to fay, Turning towards me : You follow a Prieft being yourfelf a Levite ; and fometimes, Let us go and die with him. When he was deferted by his intimate friends, he added : They fhall be the companions of my fufferings & confolation.' Thofe, who have read in Mezerai and other Catholic writers, that this cardinal was a worldly, proud, and voluptuous, man, that he had a great power and intereft (31), and violently profected the Proteftants, will not read this defcription of his pious fufferings without laughing. In another book Sanctifius begs of God that he would ftrenghen the cardinal his fervant, persecuted for a good caufe.
Beza ridiculed him upon this head. ' Omittam vero
' libens tum pleraque illius libelli ineptias, veluti
' quod invitum efiam à fuïs fodalibus huc pertractum
' dicit, ac tandem etiam fuo Cardinali virtutem &
' confidentiam in perfectionibus precatur, quod quidem
' non fine rifu legi poffunt (32). . . . I will gladly
' pafs over moft of the foolifh things in that book, as for ' example, his faying that he was drawn thru a length
' by his friends contrary to his own inclination, and his ' praying for refolution and confancy to the cardinal
' under his perfecutions : all which it is impoffible to ' read without laughing.' I have long thought of a thing, that would very much perplex the Aftatics, if they had a mind to take notice of that part of our Hiftories of the XVIth and XVIIth centuries, relating to the troubles of religion. Each church complains that the is under fufferings, and looks upon her victories as a means, in God's hands, to free her from the flavery and flaughter the was threatened with. I need not then that the Proteftants exprefs themfelves in that manner with refpect to the conquefts of Guftavus

Adolphus; but I shall make it appear that the Jesuits did the same when they considered the great success of the emperor. In order to it I shall set down an extract of a letter written to James Count de Tilly, a Jesuit, who was chaplain to the famous Count de Tilly. 'Rem noſtram, id eſt Catholicorum . . . bene ſe habere hoc doceret bellum, in quo jam quarto anno verſor cum Illuſtriſſimo Comite de Tilly, &c. Erant mira Conſilia noſtrorum Adverſariorum: ſed quam mirabilem in altis Dominus ! moliebantur nobis interneſſionem, inciderunt in ſoveam, quam fecerunt: & ut liberent noſtri hoſtes conſentitur, nunquam dediffent, quod acceptuerunt, beneficium Vitæ. Ut vel inde pateat, quæ pars furorem, quæ ſequatur æquitateſ (33). - - - Our affairs, that is of the Catholics, . . . would ſeem to be in a ſhriving way by this war, in which it is now the fourth year that I am preſent with the moſt illuſtrious Count de Tilly, &c. The deſigns of our adverſaries were amazing: but how wonderful is GOD in the beſiſt? They were meditating our utter deſtruction, but they have fallen into the pit which they themſelves have digged: and, our enemies make no ſcruple of confeſſing, they would never have given the quarter which they received: ſo that from this very thing it may appear which ſide is diſtreſſed by fury and which by equity.'

[K]e He lessened the authority of St Augustin as much as he could . . . The Janfenist, who published in 1689, some Letters written by the Prince of Conti to Father de Champs, added to them among other things a dissertation intitled, ' S. Augustin justifié du soupçon ou des apparences de Calvinisme.' - - - St Augustin justified from the suspicion or the appearance of Calvinism. I find the following passage in it concerning Sanctisim. ' He was one of those, who thought it necessary always to take the opposite side of the question with the Heretics, in order to get the more advantage over them, and who, considering the frightful part of St Augustin's doctrine concerning Predestination, more than the solid foundation of the Scripture and tradition, on which it is grounded, were too easily frightened at that doctrine. That author made bold to say, That St Augustin writing against the Pelagians with too much heat, did too basely despise the unanimous opinion of all those, who lived before him. A man who speaks of St Augustin in this manner, and charges him with having changed his opinion three times, does certainly deserve to be delivered up to Father de Champs, that he may deal with him, as he thinks fit. Father John Martinon, likewise a Jesuit, who wrote under the disguise of Antonius Moraines, was ashamed of it. That author, says he, will give me leave to observe that he would have acted a much better part, and more becoming the respect that is due to so great a Doctor, if he had constantly followed him, giving sometimes a favourable sense to his words, instead of imputing to him such an inconsistency in his opinions (34). We may compare the opinion of this bishop of Evreux, with that of the Jesuit John Adam (35).

(33) Johan. Agricola, in Epist. ad Jacobum Reihingum, apud Henning. Witte, Memoriz Theologor. in Orat. funebri Reihingi, pag. 912, 913.

(34) Lettres du Prince de Conti, ou l'Accord du Libre arbitre avec la Grace de J. Chrif. pag. 190, 191.

(35) See above
the remark [D]
of the article
A D A M.
(J O H N).

SALISBERI (JOHN OF) Bishop of Chartres in the XIIth century. See SARISBERI.

SALMACIS, a fountain at Halicarnassus, which was said to effeminate those who drank of it, or went into it [A]. The Poets being willing to account for this ill quality, supposed

[A] A fountain . . . which was said to effeminate those who drank of it, or went into it. Strabo having said that the fountain Salmacis was in Halicarnassus, adds that it had an ill name, as having the power of making those, who drank of it, voluptuous and effeminate. Διὰ βεβηλημένην ἐκ αὐτῆς ἐπὶ δόξαν, ὡς μαλακίζουσα τὸν πίνοντας ἀπ' αὐτῆς. neſcit quæ de cauſa infamiam quæ ex eo bibentes molliciem contraherent (1). But, according to Ovid, none could experience this unhappy change without going into it.

(1) Strabo, lib. xiv., pag. 451.

(1) Strabo, lib.
xiv, pag. 451.

Unde sit infamis, quare male fortibus undis
Salmacis enervet, tactosque remolliat artus, Discite (2).

Quisquis in hos fontes vir venerit, exeat inde
Semivir, & tactis subito mollescat in undis (3).

*How Salmacis, with weak infeebling streams
Softens the body and unnerves the limbs.*

(2) Ovid. Metam. lib. iv, fab. ix, ver. 285.

(3) Ibid. ver.
385. He says in book xv, ver.
319.

319.
Cui non audita
est obscenæ Sal-mæcis undæ?
*Who has not heard of Salmæcis
And obscene.*

supposed that a nymph, who was passionately in love with Hermaphroditus, the son of Venus and Mercury, threw herself into that fountain, whilst he was bathing himself; and closely embraced him; and that her caresses and entreaties not being able to move the heart of that insensible youth [B], she begged of the gods that she might remain for ever

And what the secret cause, shall here be shown.

*Ob grant, that whome'er these streams contain,
If man be enter'd, he may rise again
Supple, unfinew'd, and but half a man!*

ADDISON.

Strabo makes a judicious reflexion upon this. Voluptuous men, says he, in order to clear themselves ascribe to the elements what proceeds only from the ill use they make of their wealth. Good cheer makes them leud, and they find fault with the air and water; which is a great illusion. Ἔοικε δ' ἡ τρυφή τῶν ἀνδρῶν αἰτία εἶναι τῆς ἀεγρῆς ἢ τῶν ὕδατος. τρυφῆς δ' αἰτία ἢ ταῦτα, ἀλλὰ πλεονεξίας καὶ ἡ περὶ τὰς διαίτας ἀκολασία. Enimvero luxuria hominum videtur in aëris & aquæ temperiem culpam referre: atqui non hæc causam luxuriæ præbent, sed divitiæ & vitius intemperans ratio (4). According to Vitruvius the fountain Salmacis was reported to have that ill quality, not because those, who drank of it, became leud and voluptuous, but because it afforded the Barbarians an opportunity of growing civil and tractable, and leaving off their fierceness: for being expelled by the colony, which the Argivi settled in Halicarnassus, they were obliged to return to that fountain for want of water, and so they conversed with the Grecians, and grew polite. Descendebant æquatam ad notum sibi fontem, atque ibi in Græcorum consuetudinem & suavitatem sua voluntate reducebantur. Hinc aqua illa, non impudico morbi vitio, sed humanitatis dulcedine molliis animis barbarorum eam famam est adeptæ (5).

(4) Strabo, ubi supra.

(5) Vitruvius, lib. ii, cap. viii.

[B] Her intreaties not being able to move the heart of that insensible youth.] Hermaphroditus began to travel through the world at fifteen years of age. He was a very handsome boy; the nymph Salmacis did no sooner perceive him on the banks of her fountain but she fell in love with him. Though her amorous passion made her very impatient, she nevertheless put on her best apparel and painted her face before she went to him.

*Nec tamen ante adiit, etfi properabat adire,
Quam se composuit, quam circumspexit amictus,
Et finxit vultum, & meruit formosa videri (6).*

(6) Ovid. Met. lib. iv, ver. 317.

*Fain would she meet the youth with basty feet,
She fain would meet him, but refus'd to meet;
Before her looks were set with nicest care,
And well deserv'd to be reputed fair.*

ADDISON.

Her compliment contained few needless things: If you are not a god, said she to him, you look like one: happy is your father, happy are your mother, your sister and your nurse, but happier still she, who is, or shall have the honour to be your wife. If you are a married man, be unfaithful to your wife for my sake; and if you are not married, I desire to become your wife immediately.

*Sed longè cunctis longæque beator illa est,
Si qua tibi sponfa est, si quam dignabere tædâ.
Nunc tibi five aliqua est, mea sit furtiva voluptas:
Seu nulla est, ego fim, thalamumque ineamus eundem (7).*

(7) Id. ibid. ver. 325.

*But oh how blest! how more than blest thy bride,
Ally'd in bliss, if any yet ally'd.
If so, let mine the stolen enjoyments be;
If not, behold a willing bride in me.*

ADDISON.

These words made the young man blush; but his modesty and his silence did not put a stop to her violent passion: she asked him many kisses, at least such as are given to a sifter: and at last she was ready to take him about the neck, when he plainly told her that he would run away, if she would not be quiet.

Poscenti Nymphæ sine fine fororia saltem Oscula, jamque manus ad eburnea colla ferenti, Definis? aut fugio, tecumque ait, ista relinquo (8). (8) Ovid. ibid. ver. 334.

*The nymph still begs, if not a nobler bliss,
A cold salute at least, a sister's kiss:
And now prepares to take the lovely boy
Betwixt her arms. He innocently coy,
Replies, or leave me to myself alone,
You rude uncivil nymph, or I'll be gone.*

ADDISON.

Being thunder-struck with this speech, she withdrew, but did not lose all hopes: she hid herself in a thicket, and perceiving Hermaphroditus in the water, she was so inflamed with love that she threw herself into it stark naked. She took hold of him, kissed him in spite of all that he could do, pawed him, and hugged him so closely that he was not able to extricate himself: but that was all she could get of him; he persisted in his indifference.

*Veste procul jacta, mediis immittitur undis, Pugnantemque tenet, luctantiaque oscula carpit;
Subiectatque manus, invitatque pectora tangit:
Et nunc hac juveni, nunc circumfunditur illac.
Denique nitentem contrâ, elabique volentem
Implicat ut serpens, quam regia sustinet ales.*

*Perstat Atlantides, sperataque gaudia Nymphæ Denegat: illa premit, demissaque corpore toto
Sicut inhærebat, Pugnes licet, improbe, dixit,
Non tamen effugies. Ita dii jubeatis, & istum Nulla dies à me, nec me deducat ab isto!
Vota suos habuere deos (9).*

(9) Id. ibid. ver. 337.

*He's mine, he's all my own, she Naïd cries,
And flings off all and after him she flies.
And now she fastens on him as he swims,
And holds him close, and wraps about his limbs.
The more the boy resisted, and was coy,
The more she clapt and kiss the struggling boy.
So when the wrigling snake is snatch'd on high
In eagles claws*

*The restless boy still obstinately strove
To free himself, and still refus'd her love.
Amidst his limbs she kept her limbs intwin'd,
And why, coy youth, she cries, why thus unkind!
Ob may the gods thus keep us ever join'd!
Ob may we never, never part again!
So pray'd the nymph, nor did she pray in vain.*

ADDISON.

It was then that the nymph begged of the gods that she might never be parted from the beloved object she held between her arms. What she asked was granted her; and this was the origin of Hermaphroditus.

Every body knows the moral reflexions groundd upon that fable; but every body does not know the mystery that some have found in it. They pretend that the Antients did thereby insinuate, that the fair sex ought not to begin the attack, but leave it to men, and stand upon the defensive. If the parts were changed, say they, there would be a great decay in the empire of love. It is true that women would make vigorous and furious attacks; but men would make a better defence still, and all this would end in nothing but monsters and prodigies. See Mr de Fontenelle in his dialogue between Sappho and Laura; the ever in the posture she was in. Her request was granted: her body and that of Hermaphroditus made but one person with the distinguishing marks of both sexes. Hermaphroditus perceiving that change, obtained from Venus and Mercury by his entreaties that the water of that fountain should have the virtue of making people effeminate. Strabo and Vitruvius deny that it had that virtue, and alledge some other reasons for the ill report that was made of it (a). It is a mistake to say that this son of Venus and Mercury was born with the parts of both sexes, and that, according to Peter Gregory, it was Mercury who shewed so much indifference for the nymph Salmacis [C].

(a) See the remark [A].

(10) Fontenelle, Dialogues des Morts anciens avec les modernes, pag. 47. Dutch Edit.

the result of which is as follows. 'Men would defend themselves too well. When it is required that a sex should resist, it is required that it should carry this resistance just so far as is necessary to make the other sex relish the victory, but not far enough to obtain the victory itself. A sex ought not to be so weak as to surrender immediately, nor so strong as never to surrender. This is our character, and perhaps it would not be that of the men. Believe me, after many reasonings about love or any other matter whatsoever, it will be found at last that things are very well as they are, and that a reformation would spoil all (10).' It were a difficult thing to foresee what would happen, if the sex that resists should become the aggressor, and if the sex which attacks should stand upon the defensive. The conjectures, that may be made upon some few hasty advances of the fair sex, which have proved unsuccessful, cannot be depended upon. It is likely that such advances have often succeeded. What is certain is that men upon a thousand occasions wherein they stand upon the defensive, betray a great weakness, make but little resistance, and are easily overcome. Though they are convinced that they have been deceived and betrayed, though they are resolved to revenge themselves, though they threaten, and swear they will never see that unfaithful woman; yet some flattering words, some sighs, and one or two tears will quickly pacify them.

Et quod nunc tute tecum iratus cogitas:

Egone illam? quæ illum? quæ me? quæ non? sine modo?

Mori me malim: sentiet qui vir sum.

*Hæc verba me hercule una falsa lacrimula,
Quam oculos terendo misere vix vi expresserit,
Resinguet: & te ultro accusabis, & ei dabis
Ultro supplicium (11).*

(11) Terent. Eunuch. Act. I, Scena I.

Being sensible that what is required of them is unjust and shameful, they are resolved not to grant it; but can they refuse it, if it be begged of them with great importunity, and if they mind the craftiness and fawning of a coquet? It is a great mistake to depend upon their resistance: if nature had put them upon the defensive, they would be quickly overcome. It is better that the resisting part should be allotted to women. Let us remember Moliere's weakness (12).

(12) See the article POQUELIN, remark [C].

As for those, who in order to prove that resistance has not been rightly allotted to women, maintain that they defend themselves only by an ill principle; they ought to be rejected as morose, capricious, and unjust censurers: and though they should repeat a hundred times over and over that women make a resistance only to kindle a greater fire, and set a higher price upon themselves, without pretending to a final perseverance; though they should say as many times that the reason why they dispute the ground, is because they are afraid of giving a quick disgust, and that therefore their long delay is not very meritorious, they would not deserve to be heard. Neither they, nor their verses ought to be minded (13). Grant them only that nice men are willing to meet with some difficulties, and do not congratulate themselves upon their meeting with none, as did the person upon whom the following epigram was made.

(13) See Chevreau's Oeuvres diverses, p. 531.

Hoc te nomine prædicas beatum,
Gilli, quod quodam fruarer amica
Et benigna adeo, ut rogata nondum, Mox supina cadat, pedesque tollat.
Sed erras nimium, miselle Gilli:
Nam quæ nil penitus negare nescit,
Opus, non homines, amat puella:

1

*Et quæcunque nimis cadit libenter,
Surgit ista nimis quoque illibenter (14).*

(14) Bess, in Juvenilibus, fol. m. 56.

*You glory, Gillius, in this
That you an easy mistress kiss,
So kind, so coming, and so free
That, long before you ask her, she Will prostrate fall, submissive lie,
And to her wanton leg on high.
Alas, poor man, how ill you chuse!
Since one that nothing can refuse,
Does not the man but work affect:
And as you'll find, if you reflect,
She who so readily doth fall
Is loth to rise again at all.*

I repeat the words of Mr de Fontenelle, Things are very well as they are. If the question was about bodily strength, they should want to be reformed; the resisting part had not been rightly allotted: but since the question is about attacks upon the heart, it belongs in justice to the sex, which exceeds the other in beauty, good air, and address.

[C] It is a mistake to say, that he was born with the parts of both sexes, and that . . . it was Mercury, who shewed so much indifference for Salmacis. A modern author says, that Venus being got with child by Mercury, was delivered of an infant, which had both sexes. 'Venerem à Mercurio compressam autumant' (poète) talem prolem genuisse, quæ sexum utrumque participaret, sicuti apud Ovidium, lib. iv. Metamorph. videre est, dum scribit.

Mercurio puerum & divâ Cithereide natum Naiades Ideis enutrivere sub antris,
Cujus erat species, in quâ materque paterque
Cognosci possent, nomenque traxit ab illis.

Item;

Nec duo sunt, sed forma duplex, nec femina dici,
Nec puer ut possit, neutrumque & utrumque videtur.

'Tamest eundem ex Mercurio & Salmacide, unâ Nympharum Naiadum genitum dicat Petrus Gregorius in Syntagm. Jur. univ. lib. vii. cap. 2. num. 8.
(15). --- The Poets affirm that Venus, being impregnated by Mercury, was delivered of a child, which had both sexes; as we find in the 4th book of Ovid's Metamorphosis, where he says,

(15) Jacob. Malerius, Camære Elector. Brandeb. & Regimini Neo-Marchici Advocatus, patriæque Franco-Viadine Juris Prædictus, in Discurfu Juridico-Pædagogico de Hermaphroditi, eorumque jure, cap. i, pag. 145. That book was printed in 1692.

*The Naid's nur'd an infant heretofore,
That Cytherea once to Hermes bore:
From both th' illustrious authors of his race
The child was nam'd: nor was it hard to trace
Both the bright parents thro' the infant's face.*

Likewise;

*Both bodies in a single body mix,
A single body with a double sex.*

ADDISON.

'Altho' Gregorius Tolofanus says that this same child was begotten of Mercury and Salmacis, one of the Naid's.

There are two things in these words which want to be rectified. The two last verses do not concern the state that the son of Venus was in, before Salmacis embraced him; for he had then only the masculine sex: they concern the state he found himself in, when the prayers of Salmacis were heard. There is a vast number of such proofs in authors. Here are the SAMBLANÇAI.

(16) The number 4 should have been inserted here.

(17) It is the eleventh in the good editions.

the words of Gregorius Tolofanus. Non fecit quam & illingantur qui cum fabula Ovidii, lib. (16). Metamorph. fab. 10 (17). narrant Androgynem factum ex Salmacide una Nympharum Naiadum, & filio Mercurii. No otherwise than those authors fancy, who, according to the 10th fable in the 1st book of Ovid's Metamorphosis, tell us, that an Androgyn, or Hermaphrodite, was made out of Salmacis, one of the Naiads, and the son of Mercury. That Civilian had been saying, that, according to Plato, all men were at first Androgynes, but being divided into two, nothing remained of them but the name, which even became a shameful one. This is partly true, and partly false. Plato does not say that all men were Androgynes (18), but he observes that this name was opprobrious (19). He is in the right to say so, for besides that it is questioned whether Hermaphrodites are not monsters, that name is bestowed upon the most infamous debauchees. Licet etiam Hermaphroditus is dicatur, qui turpiter & facit & patitur adversus & averfus impudicus, ut docet Suidas in voce ἑρμαφρόδιτος (20). There is a book intitled, L'Isle des Hermaphrodites nouvellement decouverte, avec les mœurs, loix, coutumes, & ordonnances des habitans d'icelle. It is an ingenious satire upon the court of Henry III.

in Convivio, pag. m. 1185. (20) Jacob Mollerus, ubi supra, f.

SAMBLANÇAI (JAMES DE BEAUNE, BARON DE) superintendent of the finances in the reign of Francis I, was condemned to be hanged for imbezzling the king's treasure. That sentence, which happened to be too severe, was executed the twelfth of August 1527 (a); but he was declared innocent some time after his death (b). He was a native of Touraine (c). I shall set down somewhat at large the circumstances of his trial, as they are to be found in a book of Varillas [A].

(a) Bouchet, Annales d'Aquitaine, fol. 232, where you will find the sentence.

(b) Varillas, Hist. de François I, livr. iii, pag. m. 216.

(c) Bouchet, ubi supra, fol. 232, verso.

[A] I shall set down . . . the circumstances of his trial, as they are to be found in . . . Varillas (1). The king being informed that Lautrec had not received the money designed for him, sent for Samblançai: And instead of calling him his father, as he used to do, looked upon him with an ill eye, and asked him why he had not remitted to Lautrec the three hundred thousand crowns, which had been promised so positively. Samblançai not being yet sensible of the danger he was in, answered, with his usual ingenuity, that upon the same day that assignments for the Milanese had been drawn up, his majesty's mother came to the treasury, and demanded the whole payment of what was due to her, as well in pensions and gratifications, as for the duchies of Valois, Touraine, and Anjou, that were settled upon her: that he represented to her, that if he should give her such a great sum all at once, the king's treasure would be drained, and the fund designed for the duchy of Milan diverted contrary to what had been ordered by the king that morning in her presence, and which she had agreed to: but that this princefs persisted in her demand, and threatened to undo him, if he refused to give her all that she asked: and upon his representing to her that his life would be in danger, if Lautrec found no money upon his arrival at Milan, she replied, that her interest with the king was sufficient to prevent his being prosecuted, and that if he should be called to an account for misapplying the money designed for Italy, it was * but saying he had done it by her order. The king, to be better informed of the matter, sent for his mother, and Samblançai repeated the whole story in her presence; upon which she fell into such a passion, that, notwithstanding the respect she owed to her son, she gave the lie to Samblançai, and desired to be revenged of that rash man, who pretended that she was guilty of high-treason. But because it would have appeared by the dates of the receipts, she had left in the king's treasure, that she had received the money designed for Lautrec, she confessed that she had demanded the payment of her pensions; but she maintained that Samblançai had paid her the money, without telling her that it was the same which was to have been sent to Milan. She denied what Samblançai had further said, and so earnestly desired he should be imprisoned, protesting, however, that it was only the better to clear herself of the crime laid to her charge, that the king was obliged to give orders for his being arrested in the anti-chamber. . . . (2) Samblançai was no sooner a prisoner, but commissioners were appointed for his trial (3). . . . The imbezzling of the king's treasure was the only crime he was tried for; and he was condemned to death, whether because the judges were afraid of exasperating the king's mother if they should vote for a lesser punishment; or because they were prepossessed with an opinion, that a man cannot have for a long time the management of the king's money with clean hands. The execution was public. . . . All authors do not agree about the circumstances I have mentioned, and some will have it that Samblançai was undone by another court-intrigue. They say † that the

* In the trial of James de Beaune, Seigneur de Samblançay, Treasurer of the king's exchequer.

(2) Varillas, ibid. pag. 215.

(3) Viz. Chancellor du Prat, who was beholden for his fortune to the king's mother, President Gentil, and some other counsellors who were the chancellor's friends. Varillas, ibid. pag. 216. Belcarus seems to me more worthy of credit, who does not say that Chancellor du Prat, bipedum omnium nequissimus. . . . The greatness of all villains, was one of the commissioners but that he chose them. Belcarus, lib. xviii, numb. 12.

† Towards the latter end of the old chronicle of Angers.

king's mother gave him her receipts written and signed with her own hand for the money she took of him; but that the chief deputy † of that treasurer fell passionately in love with a lady belonging to the king's mother, who persuaded him to steal the receipts of that princefs; which was done; that the king's mother being thereby enabled to undo Samblançai, when she pleased, without any risk to her self, denied that she had received any money of him, and that Samblançai not finding the receipts to convict her, was apprehended and condemned; that he was publicly executed; but that the truth did not come out till the king's mother, being adying, revealed it to the king, and begged his pardon for it. Lastly, some manuscripts affirm, that the way they took to ruin Samblançai was, by demanding a vast sum of him for the pressing necessities of the state; that he excused himself not only because the king's treasure was empty, but also because the king owed him above three hundred thousand livres; and that this afforded a pretence to make him give an exact account of his administration; that he gave it in form, and because his papers were in good order, he made it appear that his majesty owed him the sum mentioned by him; that the thing had gone no farther, if he had been as great a Politician as he was a great Financier; but that he unreasonably gave way to the itch of prosecuting those who had unjustly accused him, being not contented with his glorious defence, and that besides he persisted in requiring immediate payment of the money the king owed him, tho' no body knew better than he that his majesty was not able to pay him; that Samblançai came ill off in the affair, because the ministers not knowing any other way to get rid of his importunity, bribed a man of Tours, called Prevost, his deputy, who stole from him the private receipts; that when they had in their hands what had been hitherto wanting in order to his being convicted of imbezzling the king's money, he was arrested, and commissioners out of the parliaments of Paris and Bourdeaux were appointed to try him; that he desired to be tried by his ordinary, who was the Archbishop of Tours, by virtue of his letters of Tonsure, which he shewed; but that the archbishop, who was his son, happened to die at that time; that Samblançai was † condemned to be hanged; and was executed on the 14th of August, 1523, being sixty-two years of age; that he was carried to the gallows at Monfaucon at one of the clock in the afternoon, and that he got his execution put off till seven a-clock in the evening, in hopes that the king would send him his pardon upon the ladder, as he had sent it to Saint Vallier upon the scaffold; but that the person who attended on him, having at last told him that there was no pardon to be hoped for *, he put himself into the hands of the executioner, saying, that he knew too late that it was better to serve the King of Heaven than the kings of the earth, and that if he had done for God what he had done for the king, he had been better rewarded. Nevertheless it appears by the epigrams of the famous Poet Clement Marot, which contains several particulars of the life of Francis

I

(4) Eam (curam) ad matrem Lautrecio infestam, quod de ejus impudicitia liberius loquutus fuisset, rejecerit. Belcarius, Comment. Rerum Gallicar. lib. xvii, num. xii, pag. 509.

' Francis I, not to be found any where else, that Samblançai died bravely, and that the timoroufness of the person, who conducted him to the place of execution, gave a greater lustre to his courage.' The first account of this author is a paraphrase upon Belcarius, who observes that Lautrec fell under the indignation of the king's mother, because he spoke too freely of her amorous intrigues (4). Note, that Gentil, who, according to Varillas, had been one of Samblançai's Judges, was hanged (5) some years after (6). (5) See his epitaph in Bea's Juvenilia, fol. m. 30. verso.

(6) Bouchet, Annales d'Aquitaine, pag. 281, says it was about the year 1538, and that he was president in the court of Inquests in the Parliament of Paris, and a native of Italy, and that he was guilty of stealing the receipts of Treasurer Poncher, who had been hanged at Paris for want of them.

S A M B L A N Ç A I (WILLIAM DE BEAUNE, BARON DE) the son of the foregoing, was the father of four sons and one daughter, who made a great figure in the court of France. I. JAMES DE BEAUNE, Baron de SAMBLANÇAI, viscount of Tours, &c. was the eldest. He was knight of the order of St Michael, and gentleman of the king's bed-chamber in ordinary; and left behind him but one daughter, who was very much talked of by reason of her beauty and galantry under the name of Madam de Sauve (a). The third son of William de Beaune was known by the name of Monsieur la Tour d'Argi, and was the Father of MARY DE BEAUNE, the wife of Annæus de Montmorency Marquis de Turi. The fourth was Chancellor to Catherine de Medicis, Bishop of Puy (b), and Abbot of Royaumont (c). He died in the year 1565. I have passed over the second because I have so many things to say of him that I design to bestow a paragraph upon him. The daughter was married first to Lewis Burgensis, first Physician to the King, and Sieur de Montgauguier (d), and then she was the fourth wife of Claudius Gouffier, Marquis de Boissi, Duke of Rouanez, and master of horse to the king. She died without issue. Brantome (e) says, that before she was called Madam de Rouanez, she went by the name of Madam de Chateaubrion. He adds, that she was a great favourite of Queen Catherine de Medicis, her mistress. He is in the right to say so; Thuanus says the same [A].

RENAUD DE BEAUNE, the second son of William, was Archbishop of Bourges and then of Sens in the reign of Henry IV, and one of the most eloquent and learned prelates of that time. But what makes him more illustrious, is, that he did not depart, as so many other Ecclesiastics did, from the laws of the kingdom concerning the succession to the crown. He maintained to the last that though the King of Navarre was a heretic, the crown of France did lawfully belong to him after the decease of Henry III. In order to maintain this assertion he set forth in the conferences of Surene (f) the most specious reasons that the Law and the Scripture can afford: but his wit, eloquence, and learning, did not persuade the deputies of the League; for besides their being resolved not to yield, whether they could answer the reasons of the royalists or not, they were headed by Peter d'Epinac Archbishop of Lyons, who was not inferior to Renaud de Beaune in wit, eloquence, and learning, and who alledged, as well as he, divine and human laws [B]; so that after several fine discourses they were obliged to think

(1) Thuan. de Vita sua, lib. iii, pag. m. 1194.

(2) Mr le Laboureur, Addit. to Castelnau, Tom. i, pag. 322. and Father Anselme, Hist. des grands Officiers de la Couronne, pag. 469, call him Claudius.

(3) Thuan. ibid.

[A] Thuanus says the same. He says (1) that Margaret (2) de Beaune, the wife of Claudius Gouffier, Marquis de Boissi, sister to Renaud de Beaune, Archbishop of Bourges, procured very noble employments to her brother, because she had a great interest at court; so far that Rouanez was erected into a duchy in consideration of her marriage with the Marquis de Boissi. Commendatione sororis Margaritæ gratiosæ in aula femine, quæ sub id Claudio Guforio Boissi marchioni & Rodamno ob id creato duci magno Franciæ scutifero nupti, maximis jam tum negotiis adhibitis, etiam Francis Alenconii Ducis Cancellarius fuit (3). This is one of the things daughters are good for in a family: they are sometimes the only cause of the fortune of their brothers and relations. Perhaps Renaud de Beaune, notwithstanding all his fine qualities, would have remained all his life-time in a mean condition, had not his sister's interest put him in the way of raising himself, and given him the opportunities of discovering his merit, and of being rewarded for his first services by more considerable employments. That Historian adds, that the family of Beaune, and that of Thou, had contracted a very strict friendship long before; and that after the sad death of James de Beaune superintendent of the finances, his children, forsaken by every body at court, and in the city, as it happens on like occasions, found a sanctuary among the de Thous; that Renaud de Beaune lodged for some time in the house of Augustin de Thou, grandfather to the Historian Thuanus, and that from that very time there was a talk of marrying Christopher de Thou, Augustin's son, to Margaret de Beaune, Renaud's sister; that tho' this project had no effect, that lady had always been a hearty friend to Christopher de Thou, and used her interest for him, when she was in favour, more than for any body else, except her brothers; that she intrusted him, as being her particular friend, with her last will, many years before she died. Besides she made him executor of her will (4).

[B] Who alledged, as well as he, divine and human laws. Thuanus has inserted, in the 106th book of his history what was alledged on both sides. Cayet (5) relates it more at large, and says, (6) among other things, that the Archbishop of Bourges, who could not deny that each party alledged several examples, and made use of the authority of the Scripture to prove their opinions, and resorted it in a different sense, confined himself to this maxim, that one might have the right understanding of the Scripture, 'by invoking the holy Spirit of God, who gives it to those that ask for it, and imparts the knowledge of truth in their minds, intellectualum bonum dat petentibus eum.' He added, 'that the voice of CHRIST and his Apostles was evident, and that Christians were continually told that they ought to fear God, honour the king, and render to God what is due to him, and to Cæsar what belongs to him; that every soul was to obey the powers ordained by God... but that he would no longer spend time in confuting the passages, and examples, that had been alledged, which could not hinder our submitting to what is expressly commanded in the word of God.' This seems to be his meaning: when the Scripture is made use of to maintain contrary opinions, the best way to extricate one's self from the difficulties that confound our reason, is humbly to implore the direction of the holy Spirit. By the help of this direction we may be able to see what side we ought to chuse, as knowing that the express orders of God ought to be our rule, and not some particular examples, which seem to be exceptions to those orders. This maxim seems to be reasonable; but I do not see how it can compose differences; for

(4) Ante mortem diu condito testamento illud apud singularem amicum, sic eum vocabat, deposuit, ejusque executorem ipsum nominavit. Id. ibid.

(5) In the fifth book of the Chronologie Novenaire.

(6) Ibid. fol. 170, verso.

think of another expedient [C], viz. that the King of Navarre should change his religion. This was the only thing which cut the Gordian knot. The pleadings of Renaud de Beaune do at this day more honour to the Clergy of France [D], than they did good at that time to Henry IV. Thuanus says a pretty remarkable thing of this prelate, which is, that he was a prodigious eater [E]. I add that he was at first counsellor in the parliament of Paris, afterwards president of the court of Inquests, and then master of the Requests; after that Bishop of Mande, and Chancellor to the Duke of Alençon, son of Henry II (g). He had an admirable memory; for forty years after he had studied the Classics under James Tufanus and James Stracel, he remembered the fine passages which they had taught him in good Greek and Latin authors, and applied them with a good grace, and very judiciously, though the great affairs that passed thro' his hands might have blotted out of his memory those old ideas which he had no leisure to refresh (b).

(g) Thuan. de Vita propria, lib. iii, pag. m. 1194.

The (b) Id. ibid.

for each party will boast that they have implored the direction of the holy Spirit, and will maintain, if the interest of their cause requires it, that commands ought to be explained by examples, that is, that their cause requires that the example of the Maccabees, &c. should be imitated, instead of conforming to St Paul's precept, Let every soul be subject to the higher powers. We must therefore allow, that whilst sovereigns have no better support than the doctrines of Divines, they rely upon weather-cocks, that turn with every wind, and use the word of God as a nose of wax, to the great scandal of good and pious souls, and the great satisfaction of profane men, and free-thinkers, who are charmed with having an opportunity to say of the Spirit that inspired the Prophets and Apostles, the same thing which the Protestants say of the Spirit that makes the Pope speak ex Cathedra, and the councils; viz. that he believes like a common father between the Thomists and the Scotists (7), that he qualifies his expressions in such a manner as to favour both parties alike, that he will neither disarm those who revolt, nor shelter them from the attacks of those who persist in their obedience; in a word, that he follows the example of neutral cities, where they sell arms to both sides.

(7) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Feb. 1686, pag. 127.

[C] They were forced to think of another expedient. Maimbourg does agreeably and neatly relate what he took out of Victor Cajet. 'The two heads of the' deputation on both sides, says he (8), two of the most dexterous and eloquent men of their age, were men of too great abilities, and maintained their opinions with too much wit and strength, to come to an agreement in their dispute. The Archbishop of Bourges, in the three speeches he made to prove his assertion, and to confirm it by confuting the answer made to it, alleged the strongest arguments to persuade the Leaguers of these three things, which he constantly maintained to the last as so many undeniable truths. 1. That men are obliged to acknowledge and honour as their king the person, to whom the kingdom belongs, by the inviolable right of a lawful succession, without any regard to the religion he professes, or to his morals.' 2. That King Henry IV was neither a Heathen nor an Arian, nor a persecutor of the Catholic Church, and was resolved to renounce his errors, as soon as he should be instructed in the truth. 3. That all the French ought to acknowledge him, and then unanimously endeavour to instruct him. The Archbishop of Lyons answered (9), those three points one after another, and declared that so long as the King of Navarre remained an Heretic they would have no commerce with him. The Archbishop of Bourges replied with great force; but seeing the Leaguers were not to be shaken, he told them the king was thoroughly resolved to be converted (10). Here is a sovereign prince indeed: he cannot so much as prevail upon his subjects, that they would be so good as to let him serve God according to the light of his conscience. It is a shame to Christianity to have introduced into the world so great a disorder. It is the part of subjects to beg liberty of conscience of their sovereign; but here are subjects who refuse it to him.

(8) Maimbourg, Hist. de la Ligue, liv. iv, pag. 465.

(9) Ibid. p. 468.

(10) Ibid. p. 472.

[D] His pleadings do at this day more honour to the Clergy of France. The League has furnished the Protestants with abundance of unanswerable arguments against the seditious maxims of the court of Rome, adopted by an infinity of Laymen and Ecclesiastics. These objections would have been stronger, if all the Clergy of France had followed the rebellion; but since one of the principal prelates, speaking for a considerable part of the Catholics, maintained so solemnly the doctrine of obedience, people fancy there is nothing to be feared for the future, and that the acts of the conference of Surene can afford both defensive and offensive arms.

[E] He was a prodigious eater. Scarce had he slept four hours, but hunger forced him to rise and eat his breakfast; which he did regularly at one of the clock in the morning, or rather sooner, he rested till four a'clock, and then he went to eat: he did the same at eight: he dined at the usual hours: he eat a collation four hours after: he supped plentifully at the usual hour, and took another collation before he went to bed. He did not eat after the French fashion; for in winter he was at least an hour at table, and an hour and a quarter in summer. For this reason he cared not to dine abroad, and when a great prince, who had often invited him, and found him always armed with excuses, asked him the reason of his refusal, he gave him this answer, You do not eat like a man, but like a dog; that is, you make too much haste. That prince promised to remedy this inconvenience, and was as good as his word, for he ordered his steward, that when this prelate should be there, he should put a pretty distance of time between each course (11). Cibum autem ita per otium sumebat, ut sumendo boram integrum impenderet bieme, aestate, in qua tardior orexis, horæ etiam quadrante adderet, & ambulantiis, quales in aula nostra, cænis summoere offendeatur; adeo ut cum serpius à principe primario ad prandium invitaretur, & toties se excusaret, rogatus quid id faceret, facite responderit, illum non humano sed canino more prandium usurpare, festinatus nimis epulas intelligens. Quo intellecto ille cum se non solum laute quod semper faciebat, sed prolixè accepturum promissit, & eo invitato semper struendum monebat, ut missibus adponendis legitimum tempus interponeret (12). Another thing in him was very singular; this prodigious quantity of meat did not make him heavy nor drowsy, nor full of vapours: he was always well disposed for the exercises of the mind (13); as for those of the body he took care to use none; he durst not walk for fear of exciting his appetite. 'In tanta ciborum, quibus alabatur copia, cum nec membrorum agitatione, nec deambulationibus, ne exuperantem appetitum proritare, corpus exerceret, naturam succo nimio turgentem medicamentis purgantibus crebro adjuvabat, quæ medicæ rei non ignarus domi per homines peritos sibi parabat. Itaque raro ægrotabat, & quamvis in summa corporis pigritia mens semper laboraret, nunquam fatigabatur' (14).

(11) Thuan. de Vita, præp. 3. lib. iii, circa init. pag. 1194.

(12) Id. ibid.

'After such quantities of victuals which he eat, as he used no sort of exercise, nor walking, for fear of exciting his voracious appetite; he said nature, overburdened with too much nourishment, by frequent purgatives; which, as he had some notion of Physic, he took care to have made up at home by skillful persons. Thus he was seldom sick, and, notwithstanding his great bodily indolence, his mind, tho' constantly at work, was never tired.' What Thuanus says of this method of eating at the court of France in haste, and as it were walking, which did not please our René de Beaune, puts me in mind of a story I have heard more than once. It is well known that Marshal de Turenne commanded armies where were several foreign officers. They praised the good cheer of his table, but could not endure that the meals should be so short, and especially when they observed that the French officers were scarce risen from table, but they began to ask one another, what shall we do? Alas! said the strangers,

(13) Nunquam commotior aut fermentior visus, nulla gravædine aut dolore capitis tenebatur, semper seque sui corpus & ad omnia paratus, extra negotia quietem & confabulationes sectabatur. Id. ibid.

(14) Id. ibid.

The fables he uttered out of the pulpit, I mean in the funeral oration of Catherine de Medicis, are so ridiculous [F] that they would scarce be pardonable in those writers of romances, who have published the History of the fair Maguelona and of Peter of Provence, of the four sons of Aimon, and of Palmerin of Oliva, &c. Henry IV acknowledged several ways his fidelity and services, but above all by the constancy with which he applied himself to surmount the long difficulties he met with at the court of Rome [G], about his translation from the archbishopric of Bourges to the archbishopric of Sens.

gers, we were so well at table; you seemed so impatient that one would have thought you had some great business to dispatch, and now you know not what to do. Why did not you keep where you were, and let others do so too, since you do not know how to spend the time?

[F] The fables he uttered . . . in the funeral oration of Catherine de Medicis are so ridiculous. Here is a specimen of them. At the time that the great Captain Brennus led his army through all Italy and Greece, there were with him two French gentlemen, the one called Felonius, and the other Bono, who seeing the ill design that Brennus conceived after his great conquests, to go and seize upon the temple of Delphos, to pollute himself and his army with the sacrilege of that temple, they both retired and went into Asia, with their ships and men, where they penetrated so far that they came into the country of the Medes, which is near Lydia and Persia, where having made several conquests, and obtained great victories, they retreated, passing through Italy, hoping to come back again to France. Felonius stopped at a place where Florence is now situated along the river Arno: the situation seemed very pleasant and delightful to him, it being like one that before had pleased him in the country of the Medes, and he built there a city which is now called Florence. His companion Bono built the city of Bononia, not far from it: and from that time, by reason of the conquests and victories that Felonius had got in the country of the Medes, he was called Medicus among his people, the surname remaining in his family; as we read of Paulus who was called Macedonicus, because he had conquered Macedonia, and taken prisoner King Perseus; and of Scipio, who was called Africanus, for having done the same thing to Africa (15). Brantome, from whom I have this passage, adds; I do not know from whence Mr de Beaune had this story; but it is very probable that before the king, and so great an assembly as was there at the queen's funeral, he would not have alledged it without some good authority (16). He had observed before he mentioned this fabulous genealogy, that this Archbishop of Bourges was as learned and as worthy a prelate as any in Christendom, but that some said of him that he was too credulous, and not fit to be weighed in the scales of St Michael, who weighs all good Christians at the day of judgment, as they say (17). The Leaguers gave out that he was an Atheist (18).

(15) Brantome, Mémoires des Dames illustres, pag. 32, & seq.

(16) Id. ib. p. 34.

(17) Id. ib. p. 32.

(18) See the notes upon the Confession Catholique de Sanci, p. 87, & seq. Edit. 1699.

(19) Journal d'Henry III, ad 26 Junii 1584, pag. m. 80.

(20) See Martialis, Epigramm. lxxxix. lib. ii.

Quod timet & patulo promissam pectore barbam Demulcet Biturix, hoc Ciceronis habet (20).

*In that he pants, and strokes, and strokes again
His long large beard, this native of Touraine Resembles Cicero . . .*

[G] The constancy with which he applied himself, to surmount the long difficulties he met with at the court of Rome. I do not pretend to say that he withstood

those difficulties without ever yielding: I only mean that having expected a more favourable time, he renewed his application till such time as the thing was done. You will find the particulars of all this in the following account of Mr Amelot de la Houfflaie (21). In 1596, says he, the king had writ to the Pope in favour of Renaud de Beaune, Archbishop of Bourges, to have him translated to the Bishopric of Sens, and to obtain it for him gratis*. But the abbot, which this prelate had given the king in the abbey-church of St Dennis, and the motion he had made to the clergy in the assembly of Mantes, for creating a patriarch in France, had made him so odious to the court of Rome, that the Pope would not hear of him. Our cardinal (only then Bishop of Rennes) in vain represented to the Pope and Cardinal Aldobrandino, that such a refusal or delay might, at the long run, be interpreted as done, because this archbishop had taken the king's part, which would not only give offence to the king, but also to all the princes, prelates, lords, and gentlemen, who had followed him; and it would be thought that there remained in the soul of his Holiness some memory of the past offences and rancours: that the ill reports that were made of him to his Holiness, were only grounded upon this, viz. That this prelate had found out a shorter way to serve the Catholic religion, and the authority of the holy See, than those had done, who thinking to preserve them, would have ruined them both, if their advice had been taken. All this did not move them, and the Pope excused his rigour, by saying that this affair would never pass in the consistory, and that the cardinals would oppose it, and from thence take occasion to think ill of the king himself†. The affair remained thus till the promotion of Mr d'Osflat, who in obedience to the king's orders, in the first days of his cardinalship began afresh to solicit for this prelate's translation. † But the Pope answered him again in the same strain, and said, That if he proposed the affair to the consistory he would receive an affront, being certainly informed that there were some cardinals who would oppose it. And the Cardinal Nephew added, That it was not even for that prelate's interest, that his affair should be proposed in the consistory‡: by which he gave to understand, that there would be some things ript up there which would be to his confusion. . . . The king seeing the extremerepugnancy the Pope had to the matter, and perceiving that his Holiness would make him pay dearer for the favour than the thing was worth, resolved at last to follow the prudent counsel of the Cardinal of Florence . . . (22) and he ordered our new cardinal (23) to tell the Pope, that tho' he had many reasons to desire the expedition of the Archbishopric of Sens in the person of the Archbishop of Bourges; nevertheless, to comply with the will of his Holiness, he would cease to importune him any more.  And so the Pope was delivered from this pursuit, which infinitely displeased him, for the reasons I have given; till the beginning of the embassy of the Count de Bethune, who had orders to renew it three years after. And Cardinal d'Osflat laboured so hard with him about it, that they obtained at last the translation of the Archbishop of Bourges to the Archbishopric of Sens, which was expedited in the consistory of the 29th of April, 1602 ††.

(21) Amelot de la Houfflaie, Vie du Cardinal d'Osflat, pag. 25, 26.

Letter 76, 95.

† Letter 95.

‡ In his audience the nineteenth of March.

†† Letter 178.

(22) Amelot, ib. pag. 27.

(23) That is, d'Osflat.

 Letter 183.

†† Letters 310, 312.

SAMSON, a judge of God's people. I shall not relate his History, it is known to every body; you may read it in Moreri, and more at large in the Dictionary of the Bible (a). I will only observe one thing, which seems to me very singular. Some would have it, that by the words of the Scripture which tell us that the Philistines made him grind, is to be understood that they made him lye with their wives [A], that they might have a race from so brave a man. The allegory which La Mothe le Vayer found in the actions of this hero is more ingenious than true. He says they represent the Sceptic Philosopher (b).

(a) Composed by Mr. Simon, Doctor of Divinity, and printed at Lyons, 1693.

(b) See his Sceptic Treatise on the saying, n'avoir pas le sens commun, in the ninth volume of his works, pag. 236, & seq.

[A] That they made him lie with their wives. According to this we might find a new conformity between his history and that of Hercules. Be it as it will, it is certain that the Hebrew word, which signifies to grind, is sometimes taken in an obscene sense. What is translated in the book of Job, Let my wife grind unto another (1), signifies according to the vulgar, May my wife become the concubine of another, scilicet alterius sit uxor mea. But some would ask, would Job say the same thing twice together? For it is clear that the following words, let others bow down upon her, super illam incurventur alii, signify prostitution. It is clear that incurvari signifies the same thing here as inclinare se in Plautus (2). This difficulty is nothing; for all antient writers, both sacred and profane, afford us a thousand examples of such repetitions. These words of the Lamentations of Jeremiah (3), They took the young men to grind, signify, according to the vulgar translation, they have leudly abused the youth, adolescentibus impudice uti sunt. But here is a passage of St. Jerom, quoted by Brusius, which will afford me the proof I want. 'In tertio decimo commentario rum super Iesaiam, cap. 47. ad locum, Tolle molam, mole farinam, ita scribit, (Hieronymus) quia sequitur tur denuda turpitudinem tuam, etiam mola ab Ebraeis figuratiter intelligitur: quod scilicet in morem sortis uisitorum libidini pateat. Illudque quod in Iudicum libro de Samson scribitur, ad molam eum a Philistin esse damnatum, hoc significare volunt, quod pro sobole robustissimorum virorum hoc in Allophyliis mulieres facere sit compulsum (4). - - In the 13th book of commen-

(1) Job xxxi, 10.

(2) Pol istuc quidem omne jam ego usurpabo domi; Nam jam inclinabo me cum liberta tua, Plaut. in Persa, Act. IV, Scene. viii.

(3) Chap v. ver. 13.

(4) Drusius, Quæst. Ebraicar. lib. ii, num. 38. pag. m. 97. See Petri Petiti Miscellan. Observationes, lib. iii, cap. ii, pag. 152, & seq.

aries upon the Prophet Iesaiab, chap. xlvii, at the words, Take the mill and grind meal, St. Jerom writes thus: The word mill being followed by these words, uncover thy nakedness, is also understood in a figurative sense, by the Hebrews, viz. because like a harlot it lies open to the lust of the conqueror. In the same manner, what we read in the book of Judges, of Samson's being condemned by the Philistines, to grind in a mill, is thought to signify that he was compelled to lie with foreign women, in order to beget a race of very strong men. Drusius observes (5), that molere, to grind, in this obscene sense, signifies the action of the male; for which reason he makes a gloss upon the words of Job. Molere in hoc sensu viris tribui solet. De lingua Latina loquar, in qua notissimum illud, alienas permolere uxores (6). Forjan apud Jobum passivè sumendum, molatur alteri, ab altero, hoc est, ut sensus sit, molat alter uxorem meam. I think they are in the right who can scarce persuade themselves that the Philistines, who were his great enemies, would have condemned him to a punishment so agreeable; for Samson loved women, and he would have been well kept to perform the office of a stallion, there had been nothing to fear but compulsion.

Nulla est tam facilis res, quin difficilis fiet, Quam invitatus facias (7).

There is nothing so easy, but becomes hard, when done by compulsion.

(5) Ubi supra.

(6) They are Horace's words, Sat. II, lib. i, ver. 33.

(7) Terent. Heautontim. Act. IV, Scene vi, init.

SANCHEZ (FRANCIS) professor of Physic at Toulouse, born at Braga in Portugal, was carried over in his infancy to Bourdeaux by his father, who was a very skillful Physician. He travelled into Italy, and staid some time at Rome, from whence he returned into France, and studied at Montpellier, where he took his degree of Doctor of Physic at the age of twenty-four. The wars about religion having forced him to leave that city, he went to Toulouse, where he taught Philosophy twenty-five years, and Physic eleven. He died aged something more than seventy years. His life is prefixed to his works (a) [A]. He was a great Sceptic, as I take notice in the remark. He is very much praised in the Patiniana (b), where we read that he was born of Jewish parents, and that he died at Toulouse, being threescore and ten years old, in the year 1632.

(a) Taken from Don Nicolas Antonio, Biblioth. Scriptor. Hispan. Tom. i, p. 362, 363.

(b) Pag. 72, 73. Edit. of Paris 1701.

[A] His life is prefixed to his works. The author of this life, called Raimond Delassus, had been his scholar. The greatest part of the writings of Sanchez are about Physic; they were printed at Toulouse, in 4to, 1636. There were added to them four treatises of Philosophy, which were re-printed in 12mo, at Rotterdam, in the year 1649. Here are the titles of them: Quod nihil scitur. De divinatione per somnum ad Aristotelem. In librum Aristotelis Physicognomicum Commentarius. De longitudine & brevitate vitæ. The treatise quod nihil scitur, - - that we know nothing (1), represents ingeniously and subtilly the vanity of what we call science, study, composition of books, &c. It was published before the edition of all the works of the author; for I find in Barthius that two dissertations were re-printed in Germany, in the year 1618; one of Maturinus Simonius, an Italian doctor, de Literis pereuntibus; the other of Francis Sanchez, a Spanish doctor, Quod nihil scitur (2). Sanchez understood Geometry, and made some objections against Clavius, which he pretended that Jesuit had not well answered (3).

(1) John Uldric Wildius confused it in some letters, intituled, Quod aliquid scitur, maintained at Leipzig in 1664.

(2) Barthius in Statium, Tom. i, pag. 447.

(3) Delassus in ejus Vita, apud Nicol. Antonium, Biblioth. Scriptor. Hispan. Tom. i, pag. 363.

SANCHEZ (THOMAS) a Spanish Jesuit, born at Corduba in the year 1551, entered into the society in the year 1567. The austerity of his life, his sobriety, his mortifications, his application to study, his chastity, are prodigies, if what Alegambe (a) and Southwell (b) say of him be true. He died at Granada, the nineteenth of May, 1610, and was buried there (c) magnificently (d). He was certainly a learned man; he has given public proofs of it in the great volume that was printed at Genoa, in the year 1592 [A], and in the four volumes in folio that were printed after his death. It were

(a) In Biblioth. Scriptor. Societ. Jesu, pag. 436.

(b) In ead. Bibl. pag. 767.

(c) See the remark [C], citation (11).

(d) Alegambe & Sotuel, Biblioth. Scriptor. Societ. Jesu, pag. 436, 767.

[A] In the great volume printed at Genoa, in the year 1592. It treats fully of what concerns marriage. It is pretended that Clement VIII declared that no man had examined with more diligence, nor cleared with more exactness the controversies that concern this subject.

crament. 'Vehementer admiratus est subtile hominis acumen, peracre judicium, raram perspicuitatem, singularem & exquisitam in rebus indagandis solertiam, in tradendis facillimam methodum, in evolvendis citandisque Auctoribus exactissimum & planè indefessum were to be wished that the work printed at Genoa, and afterwards in several other towns, had given as great proofs of his judgment (e) as of his wit and learning; for the temerity he had to explain an incredible number of filthy and horrible questions in that work may produce great disorders. Bitter complaints are made of it [B], and

K

(1) Nat. Sotuel, Biblioth. Scrip-tor. Societar.
pag. 767.

(2) Nicol. Antonius, Biblioth. Scriptor. Hispan. Tom. ii, p. 252.

(3) I have an abridgment of it in an alphabetical order made by Emanuel Lawrence Soares, a priest of Lisbon, in the year 1621. in 12mo.

(4) Petrus Aurelius, in Vindiciis Censuræ.

• Petrus Aurel.
Vindic. Censuræ Facult.

(5) Jurieu, Apologie pour les Réformateurs, ib. ix, pag. 150.
Edit. in 4to.

does in the following words, (6) ' Volo per hanc occasionem non filere, quàm iniquè ac malignè . . . Thomas Sanches, laceratus fit à quibusdam fori rabulis (7) quorum vitæ spurcitas, & fidem heteroclitam, alijam pridem prouiderunt. Sed & hæretici . . .

 magno hie zelo concitatur, quod recens admodum petulanter fecit Ludimagister Bernensis Christophorus Luthardus, ad parallelum Calvini cum præfati hæretici Simonianis : spurilocoquia sua in Sanchez MENDACITER affingens Academiæ Parisienf. . .
 I will not omit this opportunity of taking notice how unjustly and maliciously Thomas Sanchez has been abused by certain petty-jugglers, whose lives and souls found faith have been long ago detested by others. The Heretics also shew great zeal upon this be-as Christopher Luthardus, a School-master of Bern has done lately in a very insolent manner, upon occasiof the parallel drawn between Calvin and the old Simoniac Heretics ; falsely ascribing his own dirty invectives against Sanchez, to the Faculty of the Sorbonne. I it as will, let us cite the minister who is not verily exact (8) . . . Hic omittitur non debet & lectori meo videre, laude dignissimum Sorbonæ Parisienfæ facundia in Liberu Thomæ Sanchez. prout ea habet

tur in invidiis Censuræ à doctõribus Sorbonicis approbati, & à Petro Aurelio editis, pag. 517. & De illo opere Matrimonialis, inquit, dicere speciem tim possumus, esse opus non gloriandum, sed pudendum tam immam curiositate, tam invidia in rebus spurcis simis & infandis fœcitate horrendum, ut mirum pudoris alicujus hominem, esse fme rubore ferat, si fuisse, que quavis modestioris ingenii vix sine rubore legat. Portenta ista sunt, non scripta; animorum infestis, non mentium subsidia, incitativa libidinis, scõla flagitiorum, non bonestæ disciplinæ, non scientiæ Christianæ instrumenta. Infelix scientia, que omni perdere, paucos juvare nata est. Quæ circa foras sterquilinita volubunda & revolvenda volutatur, ut doctorem jure cum scarabeo conferas, vel cum iis latrinariis fœdiantis (§4). --- I ought not here to omit non conceal from the reader that praise-worthy censor rubric the Sorbonne passed upon the book of Thob Sambeze, as it is to be found in the Vindication of Censure, approved of by the Sorbonnists, and published by Petrus Aurlaus. As to that book de Matrimonio, say they, we can particularly affirm, that it work of which one has more reason to be ashamed than proud : for such a monstrous curiosity does this horrid piece discover, and such an odious exactness in dwelling upon filthy subjects, that it is not every where to be mentioned, that it may be justly wondered at a man of any thame could write without blushing such things, as a person of a modest disposition scarcely read without blushing. These are monstrous and not writings, fœres for the mind, not helps, centives to lust, and a school for wickedness, the instruments of honest instruction, or Christian knowledge. An unhappy science it is, contrived to ruin all, and to do good to few. It wallows in filth, and is constantly employed in turning dungheils; so that the teacher of it may rightly be compared to a black beetle, or to such persons who busyness lies in raking filth and natifness.

[5(x) Before the Abbot of St Cyran others complained of the book of Sanchez. Here follows upon this head a very curious passage of an author much known. 'He that would know the matter' and degree to which whoredom is arrived, let him read Sanchez in his treatise de Matrimonio; where he has endeavoured not so much to comment upon to perjuris, not so much to reprove as to shew the lecherous stupidity of Aretin, notwithstanding that he was one of the most experienced, and, in a manner, the senior wit of this Faculty. But he has gone so far, nor entered into so many dialogues the strange and prodigious things that are revealed in confession, as Sanchez, who, in this respect, surpasses all others. He teaches all the postures fit for lions to use in the haunt of iniquity; which is terrible to think of. The ladies often quit the school of Ronfard, and Amadis, for the Summa of B.

(6) Theophil.
Raynaudus, de malis & bonis libris, num. 85,
pag. 53.

(7) In his Bipolar theca, p. 362, he speaks thus: Thomas Sanchez a plerique fori rabulibus spurcus audit, quod inter Opere de Matrimonio, librum nonum qui est de debito conjugali insecrēt spurci- et multa chartis commisit quae abique fœdo sensu et recundie condicione, vix q. pofint. . . . Thomas Sanchez has been called a filthy writer & several petty fops, because of his work on the marriage book, which is filled with mis- took, which in- stead of conjugal duty, with much filth, and several fœdral things which can hardly be read with- out a lead in mouth, and ruin of modesty.

(8) Andr. R. tus, Explicat Decalogi, Op Tom. i, p. 1 col. 2.

and all that has been said for his justification is weak [C]; and yet there are some Casuists, who

† See the last quotation of the text of this article.

the Franciscan †: and indeed we find the extravagances of leachery better described in such authors than in Rabelais, or any where else. What an odd appearance it has, that these men, who would have it believed that they are mines of chastity and inexhaustible springs of continence, should nevertheless cast up such ill humours, and publish an iliad of so many impurities? But to speak truly, what have priests to do to thrust their noses within the curtains of wedlock, or to set up for secretaries to the stewards? They bend their utmost thought upon these things, with such an unbounded extravagance of imagination that nothing can be more subtle: they feign cases that have rather a metaphysical than a moral possibility. The most insatiable and burning lust cannot by any means rise so high. You will find there such lecherous inventions as all the pillars of the stewards could never have hit upon. Those who have a mind to set up shop with them, will find enough there both to gain a livelihood, and to ruin their souls. Pagan authors never penetrated so licentiously into this abomination as these fine architects and chief ministers of luxury: they have enlarged the dimensions of it at a furious rate, and acquired a great many novices to study under them. They have sweetened the practice of it, chalked out new postures, and enriched the whole with descriptions cynically invented, and most fully published. In short, Venus never received more homage from any than from their science. The treatise of Sanchez is a true library of Venus: such books have made, and will make, more profelytes to fornication, than all the Penitentiary of Rome has made, or ever will make, to chastity. They are much more proper to teach than to dissuade sin: and tho' all the other books upon whoredom were destroyed and sunk, they would be more than sufficient to revive it. They contain forms, formalities, materialities, categories, and transcendencies, that are spick and span new. Carnality and unnatural lust are described there in their full extent. If Horace or Martial were to return, they would make fine odes and epigrams upon those operators that wanted to castrate them. In five hundred Martial's or Horace's there is not so much room for clipping off, and castrating as in one page of this last author †.

† Franc Archer de la vraie Eglise, pag. 266, 267, 268.

As for the rest, if such a dangerous book was neither censured by the assembly of the French Clergy, as Mr Jurieu says, nor by the Faculty of Divines at Paris, as Mr Rivet pretends; it has at least been prohibited by a famous magistrate; a thing which redounds very much to his honour. This appears by the following words: Thomas Sanchez has not been wanting in this, (viz. in replenishing the cases of conscience with an infinite number of vile impurities); for he has so stuffed his book de Matrimonio with these, that he is remarkable upon such a carnal subject, beyond all that ever handled the same before. . . . One of the worthy actions of Président le Jay, when he was lieutenant of the Policy at Paris, was, to have made strict search after this book, and to have forbid the Booksellers of Paris to sell it under pain of death ††. These words, as well as the long passage that precedes them, are taken from a very scarce book, intitled, Le Franc-Archer de la vraie Eglise contre les Abus & Enormitez de la fausse, written by Antony Fusi, and printed in the year 1619, in 8vo. REM. CRIT.]

†† Ibid. pag. 867, 868.

[C] What has been said for his justification is weak.] The censurers of this author may pretend two things: the first is, that he could not possibly write so many particular impurities, without being unchaste himself: Extant inter alia nonnullorum Jesuitarum de his argumentis scripta, in quibus explicantur talia, quæ vix diabolus ipse, studium omne adhibendo, suggerere posset: ubi non solum genera, species, sed & modos omnes, objecta, subiecta, circumstantias, ita minutatim examinant, ut nemo sanus ea profecta fuisse judicet à mente purâ & castâ. Inter quos eminet Thomas Sanchez Hispanus Jesuita, in prolixo tractatu de Matrimonio (9). . . . There are extant, among others, the writings of some Jesuits upon these subjects; where such things are explained, as the Devil himself, with his utmost thought, could hardly suggest: where not only the kinds, species, but likewise all the different ways, objects, subjects, circumstances, are so minutely considered, that no man in his senses can suppose this to proceed from a pure and chaste mind. Among these authors the most remarkable is, Thomas Sanchez, a Spanish Jesuit, in his large book de Matrimonio. The second is, That he could not communicate to the public the knowledge of so many monstrous irregularities, without doing a prejudice to good morals. It being certain that several persons are inclined to commit these abominations when they know they are practised. Therefore a man that is wise and zealous for the salvation of his neighbours, ought carefully to avoid letting them know the impurities that are discovered to him in the tribunal of confession; for we may be assured that those who know nothing of the matter, will more easily abstain from it, than those who know the enormity and filthiness thereof.

(9) Rivetus, ubi supra.

As to the first of these two accusations, the friends of Sanchez answer, That he was a man of an admirable virtue and perfect chastity. His immaculate virginity accompanied him to his grave, say they, and the day he was buried all people thronged in, either to kiss, or to touch with their beads his body covered with flowers, and shining with a virginal beauty

(10). Ad communis parentis funus (sic eum vocabant) advenit Illustrissimus Archiepiscopus, gravissimique Senatus Regius: confuxere sacrorum Ordinum viri Religiosi; urbis universa Nobilitas, & promiscue plebis innumera multitudo, qui defuncti corpus floribus conspersum, & eximia quadam specie ac virginali nitore micans certatim conabantur vel resariis contingere, vel oculis suppliciter venerari (11). They refer us to some authors, who have praised the purity of his life. Ejus innocentiam & vitam purissimam exhibent Crombetius l. 2. de studio perfecti. cap. 12. & Joannes Bourghesius l. cui titulus est Societas Jesu, Deiparæ sacra cap. 20 (12). This implies, that his mind and imagination were filled with those filthy matters, but his heart and body were free from that contagion. Many people think this as hard, as to be like the Hebrew children in the Babylonian furnace without being burnt. But after all, it is not impossible but that the horror that might be conceived for those execrable abuses of matrimony, and the desire of correcting them, might preserve the innocence of an author who should wallow in those ordures; of an author, I say, whose age, temper, and education, might be powerful preservatives against the pollutions of the flesh. There is some reason to think that authors who dwell too much upon the explication of the Pri-

(10) Homo vitæ purissime innocentissimeque actus, & nulla unquam graviore labe contaminatus. . . . Castimonie tantum decus, ut virginitatis florem in tumultum intulerit. Soruel, ubi supra. Sanchez, hominem sanctissime vitæ & perpetuo virginitatis candore nitentem, ut graves scriptores prodiderunt. Tb. Raynaud, ubi supra.

(11) Soruel. ibid.

(12) Theoph. Raynaud. Hoplethea, §. ii. Serie III, cap. x. pag. 362.

apeia, and the obscene passages of Catullus and Martial, are not very chaste; and it is but too certain that there have been some commentators who dwell upon those matters too long, and made a deep scrutiny into them, only because they were unchaste. But that is not to be taken for a general rule; for the sole desire of shewing a great deal of reading, and an uncommon learning, is very capable of engaging an humanist to comment largely upon the Poets I have mentioned. The first reading of those poems does strongly attack virtue, especially that of young men: by degrees one grows harder; and there are Critics, who, after having read several times Catullus and Martial, either to clear up some old custom, or to comment on them, are no more moved with their impure expressions, than if they read an aphorism of Hippocrates. It happens to those Critics as it happens to Physicians and Chirurgeons, who being used to handle filthy ulcers, after some time, find no offence from the stink. I pray God it may happen so to Confessors, and Casuists, whose ears are the common-shores of all the filth of human life. There are but too many of them, doubtless, who never rise to such a pitch, and whose virtue is overcome, when they hear the impurities of their penitent: no consequence can be drawn from hence against this or that man in particular; so that we should be very rash, should we assert that Sanchez was not possessed of this insensibility, and that he was infected with the stinking ordures he stirred with so much application: and after all, he has an excuse, which the most chaste commentators upon the Catalesta cannot have; for he may say he only put his hand to this filth with a design to purge the world of it. It is by this, that they endeavour to answer the second accusation, which is a great deal more perplexing than the first.

I have said elsewhere (13) what is alleged to justify Albertus Magnus in the same case. His friends pre-who continue every day to publish such like impurities (f). They have done so a long time,

(13) See the article ALBERTUS, remark [D].

(f) See the censure upon a book of Amadus Guimenius made by the Faculty of Divinity at Paris, the third of February 1665. They condemn several propositions, that are only denoted by the first words, and cannot be modestly translated into French.

tend that there ought to be books, wherein Confessors may meet with necessary instructions against the disorders imparted to them; and therefore that a great doctor like him ought to write upon that subject. The same answer is also given for Sanchez. The filthy questions, say they, and the enormous obscenities which he examines so exactly, are very servicable to the directors of conscience. We have therefore no reason to be scandalized at them. Do we blame a Physician for stirring filthy excrements, in order to procure his patient's health? This consideration hindered the Jesuits from curtailing Sanchez. One of them says, among other things, that being to judge of one of the most impure matters that are contained in it, he could never have resolved the insurmountable difficulties which offered themselves, without the solutions of this author. Fuisse autem eam de Matrimonio scriptio- nem necessariam, audire memini ex homine & probato- rum morum severitate, & eruditione clarissimo, P. Val- rio Reginaldo. Li cum in quadam Provinciali Congrega- tione, à nonnullis maticulosis propositum esset ut opus Pa- tris Thomæ Sanchez de Matrimonio truncaretur ea tra- ctatione ejus scilicet toties pro tribunali à malevolis Casuistis extra causam ingessus erat; graviter contesta- tus est, nihil esse in eo opere conscientiarum duntaxat ar- bitris scripto, quod offensum merito moveret. Cum non modo apud Jurisperitos, (Tiraquellum præsertim in legibus Connubialibus,) tetiora absque necessitate ad me- ram curiositatis pabulum legantur, sed etiam apud alios de Matrimonio Scriptores, nec non apud Summos eadem occurrant; quæ omnia Lybitinæ addicere, & impossibile & damnosum foret. Apud Sanchez certe, quod maxime spurcum ac vel lectu scdum videri poterat, sibi aliquando ad didicandum fuisse propositum; & nisi ex eo Autore enodationem habuisset, salubres sibi inexpedibiles fuisse futuras. Itaque non plus offendi quemquam debere, ea fa- tidiorum dubiorum tractatione ad directionem penitentium necessaria, quam succenseamus, cum Medici olida ejecta- menta in ægri bonum & curationem emoverent (14). The Abbot of St Cyran, under the name of Petrus Aurelius, had refuted beforehand this bad reason. He maintained that this work might do a great deal of harm, but little good. By setting before the eyes of the public an infinity of infamous impurities that are committed in the nuptial-bed, good souls are scandalized, the curio- sity of some is excited, and the lasciviousness of others, &c. But if the directors of consciences are to pass their verdict in such cases, it is much better that they should have recourse to the living voice of doctors, than to a public work, where it is hard to find the case in question with all its circumstances. It must be granted, this remark is very solid: the Ro- man Catholics are in the wrong not to imitate sects of the ancient Philosophy, where the whole system was never put in writing: a part being reserved to be taught by word of mouth to the favourite disciples: this was only preserved by tradition. The Pope should have forbid the Casuists to print any thing about the cases of luxury; he should have ordered the matter so, that the instruction of the confessors, either with respect to the questions, or to the penances upon this head, might be communicated from the one to the other in private, or at most in manuscript under the seal of secrecy. Let us quote Petrus Aurelius. Modestiores fuerunt semper Ecclesiastici tractatores. . . Nec tanti fecerunt an- ticipem istam & periculosam conjugum arcanorum, fla- gitiorum, piaculorumque scientiam. Maluerunt ista nesciri à paucis, quorum forte interesset, quam sciri à plurimis à pestilentissima curiositatis illecebram, ad cupidita- tum fomitem, ad publicum dedecus, dum promiscue, ma- ximis voluminibus, ante ora omnium propositis, explicantur. Nam & raro usu venit ut talium usandarum cognitione sit opus; & cum usu venit, tutius viri probi, Ecclesia- sticarum rerum peritiores consulunt, qui ista ex æquo & bono, & ex Ecclesiastica disciplinæ comparatione di- judicent, quam ex libro quopiam publicè noxio aut pericu- loso, ubi aliquid generatim tantum, aut obscure, aut à præsentis negotio remotè, ut ferè accidit, scriptum sit, questionis fortasse diversissimæ expositio privato cujusque judicio repetatur. Atque ita hætenus observavit Ecclesia, donec Thomas Sanchez superiorum seculorum castiorem mo- destioremque consuetudinem spernens, prodigio volumine, ve- lus CLOACA ingenti, fanda infandaque convolvit (15).

The other reasons of Theophilus Raynaud are not better. He cites (16) long passages out of St Chry- sostom, which prove that this Father of the Church has represented to the life, and, in plain terms, the in- famous impurities of his time. He shews (17) that St Epiphanius has described in the same manner the impurities of the Gnostics, and that St Cyril made use of the same liberty to describe those of the Mani- chees. He maintains that Hincmarus, in his book about the divorce of Lotharius and Telberga, spoke more obscenely than Sanchez (18). He says that the excuses which St Chrysofom, St Epiphanius, St Cyril, and Hincmarus, made to their auditors or readers, may serve as an apology for his fellow-Jesuit. He mentions what Radulphus Flavienus observed, against the false niceness of those who blamed the obscene terms which Moses made use of in Leviticus (19). But it is so easy to perceive the difference between those examples and the conduct of the Spanish writer, that I shall not stand upon the proofs of the weak- ness or insignificance of that parallel. Every body easily perceives, that the same things which are permitted to those who know a fact, which the enquiries of Hito- rians, or juridical proceedings have manifested, ought not to be allowed to those who only knew it by way of auricular confession. The ancient Fathers had a right to make known the execrable deportments of the Heretics. Hincmarus might compose a relation upon the most impure conduct of a divorced queen; and when once vice is attested either by history, or by a verbal process, authors have a right to mention it, if it be to the purpose: but as to vices that are only re- vealed to the confessors, another method ought to be taken with them. I pass by what a great many peo- ple would not have omitted; that now a-days no famous preacher would be so bold as to take the same liberty in this respect that St Chrysofom and St Cyril took, and that if any writer of the ancient Church is to be imitated on that score, it is Salvian, of whom Theo- philus Raynaud cites these fine words. Quæ quidem omnia tam flagitiosa sunt, ut etiam explicare ea quispiam atque eloqui salvo pudore non valeat. Quis enim integro verecundiæ statu, dicere queat illas vo- cum ac verborum obscenitates, illas mortuum tur- pitudines, illas gestuum scditates? quæ quanti sint criminis, vel hinc intelligi potest, quod & rela- tionem sui interdicunt. Nonnulla quippe etiam ma- xima scelera, incolumi honestate referentis, & no- minari & argui possunt, ut homicidium, latroci- nium, adulterium, sacrilegium, ceteraque in hunc modum; solæ theatrorum impuritates sunt, quæ honestè non possunt vel accusari: ita nova in coar- guenda earum turpitudinum probrofitate res evenit arguenti: ut cum absque dubio honestus sit qui accu- sare ea velit, honestate tamen integra, ea loqui & ac- cufare non possit (20). . . . All which things are so

(15) Petrus Au- relius, in Va- diciis Censa- re, apud Andr. Rivetum Oper. Tom. iii, p. 1400. col. i.

(16) Theophil. Raynaud. Hipo- theca, ubi supra, pag. 362, 363.

(17) Ibid. pag. 364.

(18) Coæstus est stylum demittere in spurcitas longe scdiores quam uf- piam apud San- chem legantur. Theophil. Ray- naud, de malis & bonis Libris, pag. 53. See also his Hypotheca, pag. 363.

(19) Idem, Ho- plothea, p. 364. & de malis Libris, pag. 56.

(20) Salvianus de Providentia, lib. vi, pag. m. 199, 200.

(21) The words of Cicero, Philip. II, against Marc Antony may be applied to this subject. Tu eo liberior quod ea in te admittis quæ à verecunde inimico audire non posses. . . . You are the more free upon this ac- count, because you have committed such crimes as your modest adver- sary cannot men- tion. See the use that has been made of these words in the Cabale Chiméri- que, pag. 194, of the second Edition.

(22) Ita factum videmus ante Sanchez, ac post eum à quamplu- rimis, ut mirum sit hunc æstum efferverisse in u- num Sanchez. Raynaud. Hypo- theca, pag 364. See time, and it is a deplorable thing to see that with all manner of such filthy accounts, did 'Benedicti, who is a Franciscan Doctor, fins, and shews that he has both seen and of Benedictus is translated into French: It in 1584 (b), and at Paris in the year alone.

(14) Theoph. Raynaud. Ho- plothea, pag. 362.

courtiers, who had their memories stuffed cite as a common-place-book the 'Summa' who has written very well of all sorts of and read a great deal (g). This book was published in that language at Lyons 1602, which might well have been let (g) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. i, pag. m. 51. See also pag. 185.

(b) Du Verdier, Bibl. pag. 651.

See Mr Jurieu in the Apology for the Reformers in the chapter I have cited. Let us conclude, that it is a thing very blameable and deplorable that there should be so many books of that nature; but it is infinitely more deplorable that the impurities they contain should be so many real crimes. The school-men spin things so fine, that, even in matters of morality, they have debated very needless questions and things that never happen; and you see continually the Casuists distinguish between the practice and the theory, and propose Metaphysical and imaginary cases. This, probably, was one of the reasons which made Mr Rivet judge that the infamies that are read in Sanchez had been invented by that author; and therefore being at Aix-la-Chapelle with a Jesuit, he told him he could not sufficiently wonder that a man who had made a vow of chastity, should suppose such abominations as were not practised. I see, replied the Jesuit, you have never been a confessor. We hear often more impure cases than those; so that it is necessary that confessors should be provided with directions, according to which they may be enabled to impose due penances. Mr Rivet replied, smiling, It is strange that you should boast so much of the holiness of your church, since, according to your confession, such things are practised in it, of which the very Heathens knew not the name. Hæc ego cum ante aliquot annos obijcerem Jesuitæ cuidam Aquigrani, addideremque me non existimare reperiri exempla talium abominatum, meque valde mirari ab homine castitatem professio fuisse excogitatas:

Regerebat, me nunquam fuisse admotum audiendis confessionibus, atrociora multis & spurciora sepius audiri ab ore confitentium, ut necessario opus sit confessorio institui super istis, ni velint hæere talibus occurrentibus peccatis, juxta quæ est injungenda penitentia. Subridens dicebam, mirum igitur esse quod tantopere gloriarentur de sanctitate Ecclesie sue, in qua, & sepe, ut ille fatebatur, ea perpetrarentur, quæ apud Ethnicos ne nominata quidem fuerant (23). We do not know the domestic privacy of the antient Pagans, as we know those of the countries where auricular confession is practised; and therefore we cannot tell whether marriage was so brutally dishonoured among the Pagans as it is among the Christians: but at least it is probable that the Infidels did not surpass, in this respect, many persons who believe all the doctrines of the Gospel. Those for whom the book of Sanchez is writ, are such as go to confession, and submit to the penances enjoined them by their confessors. They therefore believe what the Scripture teaches us of Heaven and Hell, they believe purgatory, and the other doctrines of the Romish communion; and yet, in the midst of this persuasion, you see them plunged into abominable impurities, which are not fit to be named, and which draw down severe reproaches upon the head of such authors as dare to mention them. I observe this against those who persuade themselves that the corruption of manners proceeds from mens doubting, or being ignorant that there is another life after this.

(23) Rivet, in Decalog. ad c. 7. 13. Oper. Tom. i. pag. 1400, col. 2.

SANDERS or SAUNDERS (NICHOLAS) an English Priest, but not a Jesuit as some have said [A], shewed great zeal for the Pope's interest, and miserably ended his days in a kind of military mission in Ireland, where he was gone to encourage the Roman Catholics who had taken up arms against Queen Elizabeth [B]. I forbear to give his article, because it is to be found, not only in Moreri's Dictionary, but also in other Books which are every where to be met with (a). I shall only say something of his History of the English Schism [C]. It is a book where there is a great deal of passion and very little exactness, two qualities which generally go together. In the

(a) In the Histoire du Divorce de Henri VIII, par Mr le Grand, Tom. ii, pag. 7, & seq. and in the Anti of Mr Boulton, article 159.

[A] He was a . . . Priest, but not a Jesuit, as some have said.] Of this number was the author of the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (1); but that error, into which he had been drawn by guides whom he had reason to think creditable, was corrected soon after (2). That author had observed that du Moulin gives Sanders the title of Jesuit (3), and had read the following words in a book of Mr Daillé: Richard Crackenthorp, one of the learned English writers, says that Sanders the Jesuit was not ashamed to be the first who published this story (4); that is to say that Queen Elizabeth was created head of the Church. He had seen that Schoockius, for an instance of the Jesuitical impostures, alleges what Sanders the Jesuit wrote upon the birth of Queen Elizabeth (5).

[B] He miserably ended his days in a kind of military mission in Ireland, where he was gone to encourage the Roman Catholics . . . against Queen Elizabeth.] His countryman Edward Rihston, when he published the History of the English Schism, prefixed to it a short preface wherein he says what follows: As the said Sanders, being very zealous for the salvation of his countrymen the English, had retired from Spain into Ireland, to comfort the distressed Catholics who had taken up arms in defence of Religion (in which body work he soon after gave up his blessed soul to his Creator; his continual labours and sufferings, the indisposition of the air and place, the want of necessities, and other difficulties and miseries having occasioned his death) he left this work of the English Schism. They put in the margin that he died in the year 1581. I have made use of the old French translation, and not that of Mr Maucroix. We find in Camden, that the ill success of the rebellion made Sanders lose his senses, and that seeing himself for-gaken by all, he wandered up and down in the woods and mountains, and died of hunger in the year 1583. Upon this Camden makes the following reflexion; that the Divine Justice, if we may be allowed to judge of it, made use of hunger to stop a mouth which had been always ready to preach, revolt, and publish calumnies. Inter quos (Sacerdotes) facile primus erat Nicholas Sanderus Anglus, qui fæpe eodem fere momento miserimè periit, cum derelictus, & ex adverso rebellionis successu mente motus, per sylvas, saltus, & montes errabundus nullum reperiret solatium. In ejus pera deprehensæ erant Orationes quædam & Epistolæ ad rebelles confirmandas conscriptæ, amplius à Pontifice Rom. & Hispano promissis refertæ. Ita divina Justitia, (si fas sit judicare) os illud ad rebellionem concitandas, & calumnias cum mendaciis eructandas semper apertum, fæpe obstruxit. Ille enim primus omnium horrendum illud (ut alia taceam) contra matris Elizabethæ natales mendacium constavit, quod nemo temporibus illis, recenti in eam Pontificiorum odio novit, Anglia totis XL postea annis non audivit, temporum ratio falsitatis & vanitatis liquidissime convincit, & ipse sui immemor quod mendacem non oportuit, plane coarguit (6). Consult Mr Burnet (7), who will tell you the different accounts that were given of this person's death.

[C] I shall say something of his History of the English Schism.] He completed it in Spain; but he had not as yet put the last hand to it, being almost continually hindered by other affairs, and likewise by other compositions (8). Nevertheless there were some copies of it in Spain and Italy, and it was no difficult matter for Rihston to get one of them, when, being prevailed upon by the importunity of one of his friends (9), he resolved to publish this History (10). I have read

(6) Camdenus, Hist. Regine Elizabethæ, Part. iii, pag. m. 372.

(7) Burnet, his Criticism on the ninth book of Varillas, pag. 35. & 131.

(8) Edward Rihston, preface to the History of the English Schism.

(9) He was at Cologne, and was called Jodocus Skarnbert.

(10) Rihston, ibid.

(1) For the month of Nov. 1685, Art. VI, pag. 1238, of the first edition.

(2) In the second edition, p. 1250.

(3) Du Moulin, Défense du Roi de la Grand' Bretagne, pag. 45, Edit. of Geneva 1631.

(4) Daillé, Réplique à Adam & à Cottribi, Part. ii, pag. 78.

(5) Schoock, de Fabula Hamel, pag. m. 222.

(b) This confutation is intitled Fidelis servus infidelis subdito Reipublico, and was printed in the year 1573.

(c) Le Grand, Hist. du Divorce de Henri VIII., pag. 9, 10.

the confutation (b) of the seventh book of his visible monarchy of the Church, that author is upbraided not with having invented what he wrote but with trusting somewhat too rashly to common reports in matters of importance (c). It is the general fault of those who suffer persecution for their religion. This was the case of Sanders. He embraced the sentiments of the Spaniards and Italians touching the Pope's authority, and strongly defended them in his book de visibili Monarchia Ecclesiæ, printed for the first time in the year 1571 (d) at Louvain in folio (e), and in another work intitled de Clave David, which was one of his last productions (f).

(d) Ibid. pag. 3.

(e) Epit. Biblioth. Gefneri. (f) Nicolaus Sanders cygnæ sua cantione in Libris de Clave David egregie fecit hujus (pontificis) dignitatem extulit. Schultingius, Epist. Dedic. Tom. I. Bibliothecæ Catholicæ.

over, said he, from beginning to end the said work, and have corrected some passages, which had been either corrupted by the fault of the transcribers, or not sufficiently explained by the author; through the haste he was in: and to the end that the thread and order of the History might be the better kept up, I have curtailed some things, which seemed to be intangled with too long disputes. I have likewise added many that were wanting, particularly such as happened after the death of Mr Sanders: and whereas the bulk and size of the work did not appear to be very large, I have comprehended the whole under the title of one single book. Last of all I have delivered it, thus corrected, to my said friend M. Joffe, together with this epistle, to the end that he might send it to his Printer, who desired it so earnestly (11). In this manner did they publish the first edition, which was that of Cologne 1585. Rihthon had no hand in the following editions where many things were added (12); for he died the same year at St Menchou (13). This book of Sanders had such a prodigious sale, that being reprinted at Rome in the year 1586, a Bookseller of Ingolstadt (14) immediately counterfeited that edition. He dates his Epistle Dedicatory to the Archbishop of Salzburg on the 5th of November 1586: which makes me conclude that his edition came out that year, and that the copy which I make use of, and which has the year 1588 marked in the title, is of a second edition at Ingolstadt. Note, that in the edition of Rome the work contains three books, according to the division of Sanders with the passages which Rihthon had curtailed. Mr le Grand observes (15) that the editions of Rome and Ingolstadt are so different from the first that one may say it is a new work; and he pretends (16) that no edition has yet appeared which is better than the first. Others were published at Cologne in the year 1610, and the year 1628. The latter is the fullest of all; for it contains several additions taken from a book of Ribadeneira upon the same subject.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Le Grand, Hist. du Divorce de Henri VIII., Tom. II, pag. 6.

(13) A French town in Champagne.

(14) Named Wolfgangus Ederus.

(15) Ibid.

(16) Ibid. p. 7.

A man who marked his name only by the initial letters J. T. A. C. translated this book of Sanders into French the same year that it was published at Cologne, I mean in 1585; but afterwards, adds he, this History having been augmented at Rome with licences in the year 1586, and sent to me some months ago, I have revised and translated it into our French tongue. The advertisement where he speaks in this manner is dated the 9th of July 1587. This translation was printed in the year 1587 in 8vo. We are not told in what place; but the title informs us that it was printed by the command of the most illustrious and reverend Cardinal de Vaudemont, at the request of certain English gentlemen who had been obliged to fly their country for the Catholic Faith. I have seen another French translation printed in the year 1587 in 8vo. It is very different from the former: I do not pass this judgment upon it, because the words that are in the title of the one are not in the title of the other, or because the Preface signed J. T. A. C. and dated the 9th of July 1587, is in the one and not in the other. There are not proofs of a different edition. The Booksellers sometimes change all the first pages without reprinting the body of the book. But here are my proofs: it is impossible to give more convincing ones. The translation printed by the command of the Cardinal de Vaudemont, contains 281 leaves, the other contains 296, although it be printed in smaller characters. I have found in the latter several passages otherwise translated than they are in the former. I shall give an example of it. We read in the 187th leaf of that translation which wants the Preface signed J. T. A. C. that Millon Coverdale being gone to Oxford, got up into the pulpit to discourse upon the Eucharist, and because people rallied him on account of his bringing with him 'Sororem quamdam suam, --- a certain

'sister of his,' he sharply replied 'qui in eum flo-machati fuissent quod vas commoditatis haberet (ita enim suam meretriculam appellabat) --- those who had rallied him for his having always with him his vessel of convenience (for so he called his whore).' Here follow the terms of the other translation in the 166th leaf (17). 'Milon Coverdale... having heard that the University of Oxford was wonderfully addicted to the Catholic Faith, and for no consideration in the world could be prevailed upon to abandon it, in order to embrace Herefy; and that, besides this, there were some who girded at him on account of his carrying every where along with him a certain sister of his, imagining that he should find a great many copies of himself, and being persuaded that he should be able to seduce a vast number of people, he came to Oxford, got up into the pulpit, every body was very attentive. For this reason after he had first of all sharply reproved those who were offended at his having the Vessel of Con-venience (for so he called his little whore) he added, that, &c.'

(17) Note that I have not cited word for word the whole passage of the other translation, as I do of this. It is sufficient that in some words we see the difference.

The title of these two translations is extremely barbarous and unpolished, even for that time: the author who marks his name by the initial letters J. T. A. C. does justice to himself when he owns that he has had more regard to the sense and meaning, or corruption of Sanders, than to a show and orderly placing of quaint words, contenting himself with being understood by those who consider rather the marrow and truth of History, than the ornaments and figures of Rhetoric. We must nevertheless own that his translation is not so barbarous as the others, and contains fewer passages misunderstood, for example, he has not blundered in this, as the other has done. 'The river Thames which waters the city of London, on the 17th of December 1550, in less than nine hours, ebbed and flowed three times contrary to custom. The same year a certain sweating disease, pestilential and mortal, and before that time unknown to Physicians, spread all over England, and killed an almost infinite number of people, so that in less than seven days there died in the city of London alone eight hundred persons: several thousands more being infected with the same distemper in other places: it had nevertheless nothing of the nature and quality of the Plague: but it was a kind of miracle and prodigy, by which the almighty and merciful God thought fit to warn the English of the enormous sin which they had committed against him: it has done no service however to a wicked and reprobate generation (18).' In the other translation the Latin words Sudatorius quidam pestifer morbus nunquam antea Medicis cognitus (19), have been rendered a certain disease called the Pox formerly unknown to Physicians. Here are two errors fit for a school-boy: the Pox, which was not the thing in question, had already been the subject of several printed volumes. My reason for quoting this passage of the Historian somewhat at length, is to shew the turn of his mind, and because he has published a gross falsity not to be excused in an Englishman. He says that the English sweating disease which was felt at London in the year 1550 had never before that time been known to the Physicians (20). He was then ignorant it seems that it began to be known in the year 1486 (21), and that afterwards it frequently made great havoc. Do not fancy that the least bad translation of the two was written by a man that understood the Latin well. You are going to see a mistake which will be pretty sufficient to convince you that he sometimes misunderstood the sense of the original. 'The Printers made every where strict search after the works of Mr Nicholas Sanders and especially those which had not yet been printed, but which he had either deposited with his

(18) Sanders, du Schisme d'Angleterre, II, fol 168 of an old French translation.

(19) Sanders, de Schismate Anglicano, lib. II, pag. 233, Edition of Ingolstadt, 1588.

(20) Nunquam antea Medicis cognitus, id. ibid.

(21) See the remark [D], of the article AMMONIUS (ANDREW) & Sebastianus Calverius, ad ann. 1486, who observes that the Scoury likewise began this year in Lower Germany.

' particular friends, before his death, or left to his 'adversaries.' It is in this manner that he translates these Latin words of Rihston: D. Nicolai Sanderi . . . Opera . . . à Typographis undique conquiri ad præzium, maxime verò ea quæ nondum impressa, sed ab illo . . . vel apud amicos deposita, vel in adversariis relictæ. You see how by a gross ignorance he imagined that in adversariis, that is to say, among his papers, signified to his enemies. Mr Maucroix gave a new French translation of this book of Sanders in the year 1677. It is very polite: we have three editions of it (22). To know whether this History of the Schism be impartial and of any weight, we must consult the criticism which Bishop Burnet has given of it (23), and what Mr le Grand has answered in behalf of Sanders (24). How passionate this author is has been said in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres at the sixth article for the month of November 1685. An anonymous writer had already criticized upon that Historian in the year 1593. His book was printed at Cambridge, and is intituled, Anti-Sanderus, duabus Dialogis Venetiis habitis in quibus Sanderi & aliorum calumniæ in Elizabetham Reginam refelluntur. See likewise Schoockius in the fifth chapter of the third part of the Fabula Hamelenfis (25).

(22) Two of Paris, and one in Holland: this last was printed in the year 1683.

(23) In the second volume of his History of the English Schism. Some pieces have been written pro and con since the first. These too may be consulted.

(24) Pag. 222. Edit. secunda.

(25) He has observed at the end of the first part of the History of the Reformation of the Church of England, 127 errors in Sanders, and at the end of the second part 87 errors in the same, and 12 in the continuation. The edition he goes by is that of Cologn 1628.

S A N S O N (JAMES) a bare-footed Carmelite, known in his order by the name of Ignatius-Joseph de Jesus Maria, was born at Abbeville on the tenth of February 1595. He took the habit of this order at Paris on the thirtieth of November 1618, and was sent to the convent where the Noviciate of the province was, and where Father Clement de Sainte Marie, a native of Geneva, and nephew to Calvin (a), was Prior, and Father Alexander, nephew to Pope Leo XI, minister of the Novices A year after his profession he was sent to study Divinity, at which time he continued the exercises of the Noviciate 'He took holy orders, and about three months after his ordination, he was employed by his superiors in hearing confessions and preaching; afterwards he was sent to Limoges to begin that foundation, where he had the happiness to converse familiarly with the venerable mother Isabelle des Anges, one of the first six Carmelite Nuns that came from Spain, to establish the order in France. At his return from Limoges he was chosen sub-prior of the convent at Paris, then master of the Novices at Charenton He was afterwards appointed master of the Novices in the convent of Toulouse.' He was chosen some time after that to be confessor to the Dukes of Savoy, and to govern the Carmelites newly established at Turin. It was he that persuaded Madame la Peftrie to found a convent of Ursuline-Nuns in Canada, by giving a hundred thousand livres for so good a work. This happened at his return from Turin, while he was at Paris; he applied himself at the same time to found a convent of bare-footed Carmelites in Abbeville, and succeeded therein beyond his expectation [A]. He died in the convent of Charenton on the nineteenth of August 1664 (b). Strange things are said of his devotion [B]. He has written some books [C]. He had two brothers, the one a Capuchin and the other a Carthusian Fryar [D]. He was of the same family with the

(a) See the remark [DD], of the article CALVIN.

(b) Taken from a book intituled, Les Fleurs du Carmel cueillies du Parterre des Carmes Dechauffés de France, par le R. P. Pierre de la Mere de Dieu Carme Dechauffé, pag. 292. 2^e fig. Edit. of Amsterdam 1670. in 4to.

[A] He applied himself . . . to found a Convent of barefooted Carmelites in Abbeville, and succeeded therein beyond his expectation.] I shall quote what one of his brethren says: 'He obtained more than he had asked, since he not only saw the foundation of our Fathers in Abbeville, but likewise in the city of Amiens, where I had the happiness to accompany him: and I am obliged to declare this truth, that the people held him in such veneration that they did not call him otherwise than the Holy Father: notwithstanding that some Fryars turned this into ridicule, it did not hinder his reputation from increasing daily, nor parents from presenting their sick children to him, in order to receive his blessing, as being persuaded that this would contribute towards their recovery (1).' To know what hand he had in establishing the Monks of his order at Abbeville, we must consult the Annals of the barefooted Carmelites (2) written by Father Lewis de Saint Theresia.

(1) Les Fleurs du Carmel, p. 299.

(2) Ad ann. 1640: I have been informed of this by Mr Lancelot, one of those who take care of the books in the Mazarin library.

(3) Fleurs du Carmel, p. 297.

[B] Strange things are said of his devotion.] During the exercises of the Noviciate, 'He was sometimes so powerfully drawn and transported out of himself that he rather suffered than acted, and the sweetness of Heaven was such, that, as he himself writes, it was difficult for him to bear it. These infused lights and inward riches of virtue made him sensible that supernatural prayer cannot be acquired by any human means: how a soul ought to behave when, according to St Dionysius the Areopagite, it suffers divine things passively (3): . . . Several believed that he conversed familiarly with, and that he even saw, his good angel, to whom he paid a singular devotion: as he was one day with the reverend Father Eulaise de S. Marie upon the moving sand, hastening towards the little town of Crottoy, the sea had like to have buried them in its waves, had not a child, as beautiful as an angel, appeared to shew them the way, and obliged them to double their pace, who after having conducted them into a place of safety, disappeared. His companion was firmly persuaded that this child was an angel who had taken that visible form in order to rescue them both from the manifest danger of losing their lives. Our venerable Father confesses that he never was in such an extremity; and indeed he was very thankful upon that account, since he prepared himself for a happy death with more application than before. He gave directions in writing how he would have every thing done at this last hour; among other things he desired to have a halter about his neck; to die upon the flat ground; to do amande honorable to the whole society for the ill example which he fancied he had given from the time that he had the happiness to wear the holy habit of the Holy Virgin, and to be received into our holy order. I confess that having read all that he writes upon this head, the ardent ejaculations he makes to his God, and the heroic acts he brings forth from the bottom of his heart, I have been very much edified, especially by his profound humility (4).'

(4) Ibid. pag. 299, 300.

[C] He has written some books.] In the year 1646 he caused his Ecclesiastical History of the city of Abbeville, and of the Archdeaconry of Ponthieu, to be printed at Paris in 4to. Eleven years after he published at the same place in folio the History of the Earls of Ponthieu, which I have cited in the article of Abbeville. In this last book (5) he frequently refers to the former. For the rest, Mr de la Roque, in the 153d page of his Traité de la Noblesse, should not have called him Ignatius Sanfon, but James Sanfon (6). This was joining his family name and his religious name together. After this Carmelite's death there was found written with his own hand a piece, intituled, Preparation for Death, wherein he speaks of himself without mentioning his name. He dedicated it to his good guardian angel. That Epistle Dedicatory is singular: you will find it in the 290th and 291st pages of the Fleurs du Carmel de France.

(5) See particularly pag. 825.

[D] He had two brothers, the one a Capuchin, and the other a Carthusian Fryar.] I am going to cite a passage which contains something that ought not to be believed. 'When he was about fourteen years of age

(6) He tells us in pag. 830, of his Histoire des Comtes de Ponthieu, that in the world he was called James Sanfon. Mr Lancelot communicated these remarks to me.

the famous Geographer Nicholas Sanfon (c).

(c) He was second cousin to that Geographers father. I was informed of it by Mr Lancelot.

'he made a trip to Paris, where he had the happiness to see his eldest brother, the Capuchin named Peter Matthew d'Abbeville, who died in the convent of St Honoré, having been poisoned by the Heretics who could not endure the great conversions which God wrought by him, in the city of Alençon where he was the guardian. The poison having not immediately killed him made him suffer a long martyrdom and pains for several years. He led such an exemplary life, and died such a holy death, that his name has deserved to be inserted in the Gallican Martyrology. He saw him but once lying upon a 'poor bed in his cloaths, and overwhelmed with sickness: he was so sensibly touched with the example of this good brother's humility, and with the words he said to him, that the tears gushed from his eyes for joy and grief: for joy to see him, and for grief to find him so emaciated. He had another brother, a Carthusian, named Dom John Sanfon, who did not live long in his order: his life however was so exemplary that it deserved to be written, that it might serve posterity by way of an incentive to virtue (7).'

(7) Fleurs de Carmel, p. 294.

SAPORTA (ANTONY) royal professor of Physic in the university of Montpellier, and chancellor of the same university, lived in the XVth century. His treatise de Tumoribus præter naturam was published at Lyons in the year 1624 in 12mo by the care of Henry Gras (a), Physician of the faculty of Montpellier, and fellow of the college of Physicians at Lyons. It had been for a considerable time deposited among the papers of Francis Ranchin to whom it was dedicated. I cannot tell whether or not our Saporta was the son of LEWIS SAPORTA a famous Physician [A]; but I know that he was father to JOHN SAPORTA author of a treatise de Lue venerea, which was printed with that de Tumoribus præter naturam.

(a) And not by the care of the author himself, as Mr König affirms.

[A] LEWIS SAPORTA a famous Physician. He was Doctor and Professor in the University of Lerida, where he had taught Physic for the space of nine years (1). After this he retired to Avignon; but before he could settle there, he was obliged to go through all the necessary forms in order to be made a Doctor of that University. From thence having an inclination to retire to Montpellier, he was obliged to go through the same degrees again, in order to be made a Doctor of the University there, as Laurence Joubert informs us; so that he was thrice created Doctor (2).

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 166.

(a) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 425. Suidas, in Σαπφώ.

(b) Suidas, ibid. (c) Servius in Virgil. Dionys. Halicarn.

SAPPHO was one of the most famous women of all antiquity for her verses and her amours: she was a native of Mitylene in the isle of Lesbos (a), and lived in the time of Alcæus her countryman, and in the time of Stephichorus, that is to say, in the XLIIId Olympiad, six hundred and ten years before JESUS CHRIST. She composed a great number of odes, epigrams, elegies (b), epithalamiums, &c (c). All her verses run upon love [B], and had such natural and moving charms that one ought not to be surprized if she

(1) Preface to Anacreon.

[A] She lived . . . in the XLIIId Olympiad. This fully confutes the story of the amours of Anacreon and Sappho; for though we ought not to place between them an interval of 100 or 120 years, as Mrs le Fevre does (1), yet it is true, that their ages do not well enough agree for a commerce of gallantry. We may very well suppose that in the LIId Olympiad Anacreon was capable of love; but since the Chronologers place Sappho in the XLIIId Olympiad, we must conclude that she was then in her greatest reputation, and that she might be about thirty years old. Now when she threw herself headlong from the rock, she was in love with a young man she had hoped to regain: therefore there is no probability that she lived till the time when Anacreon was born, and we may be well assured he never saw her, nor ever was in love with her. It was only to give his fancy a full scope that Hermesianax supposed she was beloved by Anacreon. 'Εν τούτοις ὁ Ἑρμηνιάναξ σφάλλεται συγχρονεῖν οἷον Σαπφῶ καὶ Ἀνακρέοντα, τὸν μὲν κατὰ Κύρον καὶ Πολυκράτην γενόμενον, τὴν δὲ κατ' Ἀλυττὴν τὸν Κροῖον πατέρα. . . . Ἡ γὰρ καὶ παλαιὸν τὸν Ἑρμηνιάνακτα περὶ ταῦτα τὴν ἔρωτα. In his fallitur Hermesianax qui Sappho cœvram Anacreonti fuisse putat, cum ea sub Alyatte Croci patre vixerit, Anacreon verò sub Cyro & Polycrate. . . . Hermesianactem per lulum de Anacreontis amore id scripsisse arbitror (2). . . . In this Hermesianax is mistaken, who fancies that Sappho and Anacreon were contemporaries; whereas she lived in the time of Alyattes, the father of Croesus, and he in the time of Cyrus and Polycrates. . . . For my part I imagine that Hermesianax only writ of this intrigue to give his fancy a full scope. Others (3) by the same poetical liberty handed about some verses, wherein Anacreon played the gallant to Sappho, and she answered him. Diphilus (4) a comic Poet introduced Archilochus and Hipponax courting Sappho in one of his Plays. This is a witty conceit of the same kind. Madam Scuderi has not therefore made use of this anachronism without examples, when she supposes (5) that Anacreon courted Sappho. If Sappho had been such an one as she is characterized in the Grand Cyrus, she had been the most accomplished person of her age. The lady, who made her so great a model of perfection, went a long time by the name of Sappho in the ingenious writings wherein she was spoken of. This was to do a great deal of honour to the antient Sappho, since they gave her name to a lady who writ perfectly well in verse and in prose, and whose virtue was admired. Of whom one might have said, Castior hæc & non doctior illa fuit (6).

In learning equal, she surpass'd
The other by her manners chaste.

For the rest, there is reason to think that if Anacreon and Sappho had seen one another in their youth, they would have made love to one another, and that we should have had a more certain account of the gallant's good success than we have of that of Alcæus (7). Nay perhaps they would have married together, but I do not know whether they would have long agreed; each of them loved too much his like. I do not know where Tanaquillus Faber (8) found that Diphilus made mention of their amours; it should be in Athæneus, but he says nothing of it. I have already said that Mrs le Fevre puts between them the space of a hundred or sixscore years; but I add that this does not agree with what she asserts, that Anacreon was cotemporary with Solon, Æsop, Cyrus, Croesus, and Pisistratus. These two last remarks are equally against the father (9) and the daughter.

[B] All her verses run upon love. Pausanias observes that Anacreon was the first, who, after Sappho, writ scarce any thing but love verses (10), and that Sappho writ a great many things upon this subject which did not agree well together (11). The meaning of it is that she turned this subject so many ways,

(c) In the Grand Cyrus.

(6) Martial. Epigr. lxxviii, lib. vii.

(7) See the article ALCÆUS.

(8) Vie des Poëtes Grecs, pag. m. 49. Mrs le Fevre says so too in the Life of Anacreon.

(9) Mr le Fevre, Vie des Poëtes Grecs, places Anacreon in the LXXIIId Olympiad; and in his Latin notes upon Anacreon he makes him cotemporary with Solon, Æsop, Croesus, and Pisistratus, &c.

(10) Pausanias, lib. i. pag. 239

(11) Pausanias, lib. ix, 302.

she was called the tenth Muse (d). Strabo looked upon her as a wonder (e), and said that never any woman could come near her in Poetry. There remains nothing of so many Poems she made but some small fragments which the ancient Scholiasts have cited, and a Hymn to Venus, and an Ode to one of her mistresses [G]; for you must know that her amorous passion extended even to the persons of her own sex [D], and this is that for which she was most cried down. Suidas has preserved the names of three of her mistresses (f), who ruined her reputation and disgraced themselves by a strange singularity which was imputed to their commerce. He has also preserved the names of three of her female disciples whom she did, in all probability, initiate into her mysteries. Since Lucian (g) does not observe that the women of the isle of Lesbos, who he says were very subject to this passion, learned it of Sappho, it is better to believe that she found it already established in her country than to ascribe to her the invention of

(d) Antholog. lib. i, cap. lxxvii. Aulonius, Epig. xxiii.

(e) Θυμασθόντι χρῆμα, ad mirandum quid. Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 424.

(f) Ovid names two more, Epist. Sapph. ad Phaon. See the remark [D].

(g) Dialog. Metretic. Tom. ii, it. pag. 714.

that she spoke of it sometimes in one manner and sometimes in another. The sport pleased her. Among other things she had made a calculation of the signs by which one might know an amorous person; and she had so good success in it that the Physician Erasistratus knew by those signs the distemper of Antiochus (12). Every body knows that this young prince was desperately in love with Stratonice, his mother-in-law, and that not daring to discover it he pretended to be sick, and the cause of his illness being known, his father parted with her to him: but as often as this adventure is spoken of, people do not think, as it is fit they should, of Sappho who afforded the Physician the necessary expedients. Those, who intended to denote the Poems of this woman by their true character, called them her fires and her amours.

(12) Plutarch. in Demetrio, pag. 907.

Spirat adhuc amor
Vivuntque commissi calores Æoliæ fidibus puellæ (13).

(13) Horat. Od. IX, lib. iv.

And Sappho's charming lyre
Preserves her soft desire,
And tunes our ravish'd souls to love.

CREECH.

Plutarch compares her to Cacus the son of Vulcan, of whom the Romans write that he cast out of his mouth fire and flame: what she sings is a composition of fire, says he, her verses are the expulsion of the flame she has in her heart. Αὐτὴ δὲ ἀληθῶς μεμιγμένα πυρὶ φέρεται καὶ διὰ τῶν μελῶν ἀναφέρει τὴν ἀπὸ τῆς καρδίας θερμότητα. Ipsa autem vere igni mixta loquitur, & per carmina calorem corde conceptum emittit (14).

(14) Plutarchus de Amore, p. 762.

[C] There remains nothing . . . but some small fragments . . . a Hymn to Venus, and an Ode to one of her mistresses.] The Hymn to Venus was preserved by Dionysius Halicarnassensis (15), who inserted it in his works as an example of a perfection he had a mind to characterize. With the same view Longinus (16) has preserved to us the Ode to her mistress. Catullus has translated part of this Ode (17): all these circumstances are a proof of the singular esteem the ancients had for her verses.

(15) De colloc. verborum, cap. 81.

(16) Περὶ ὕψους, cap. ix.

(17) See in Isaac Vossius's Commentary upon Catullus, pag. 113, those two pieces of Sappho corrected.

Tanaquillus Faber was resolved to publish some observations upon that ode; but he abstained from it because he was brought into trouble for some things he had put in his edition of Anacreon (18). 'Ut ne tandem bona fide ætos . . . fiam, scitabbe (19), quod sane haud necesse est, decrevi nil quidquam ad hoc admirabile odarium dicere. Fuit olim, fateor, cum Sapphonem amabam; sed ex quo illa me perditissima femina pene miserum perdidit cum scelertissimo suo congerone, (Anacreontem dico, si necis, Leclor,) noli sperare quidquam à me dictum iri, unde aut ipsa, aut ipsius opera, (queis tamen olim in Græcia nil elegantius, nil magis tersum aut venustum quidquam extitit,) probari videantur. Itaque quando mihi imposita fubula est, hic lacuna esto. . . . Left I should be excommunicated in good earnest, which is a thing that I am by no means fond of, I have taken a resolution to say nothing at all upon this admirable ode. I confess that I formerly looked upon it as such; but having been ruined by that lewd woman, and by her most wicked and tattling companion, (if you are at a loss, reader, to know who that is, I mean Anacreon), do not expect that I should say any thing by which I might seem to approve either her or his work, (ibo', in Greece, no productions were esteemed

(18) See above remark [D] of the article of the first BATHYLUS.

(19) Tanaq. Faber, Not. in Longinus, pag. 292.

'more elegant, polite, and beautiful). Since therefore silence is imposed upon me, here let there be a gap.' The fragment which he cites (20) out of his notes on Anacreon, shews us that he was persuaded that Sappho writ this ode for a woman she was in love with. We shall see in the following remark that his daughter was not of this opinion; and that nevertheless it is a very probable one. For the rest, if there is no better proof than the above quoted Latin passage of this author (21), to pretend that he ceased to esteem Sappho (22), it is to rely upon an ill foundation.

(20) Id. ibid. pag. 293.

(21) Above citat (19).

[D] Her amorous passion extended even to the persons of her own sex.] I cannot blame the charity of Mrs le Fevre (23), who has endeavoured, for the honour of notes upon the Sappho, to render the fact uncertain; but I think her too reasonable to be angry with us for believing our own eyes. The ode which Longinus has mentioned, is not in the file of one female friend writing to another: it favours of love all over, and not of friendship: otherwise, Longinus, who was so good a judge, would not have brought it as a model of the art with which great masters represent things: he would not, I say, have given us as an example of that art, the manner wherewith the symptoms of an amorous fury are collected in that ode, τὰ συγκαίνοντα ταῖς ἐρωτικαῖς μανίαις παθήματα; and Plutarch would not have cited this same ode to prove that love is a divine fury, which causes more violent enthusiasms than those of the priests of Delphos, or the Bacchantes, and of the priests of Cybele. Τὴ τοσούτου ἡ Πυθία ἀπέκρινεν ἀλαμίνην τῷ τρίποδι; τίνα τῶν ἐνθεασσομένων ἔπος ὁ αὐλὸς καὶ τὰ μνηστῆρα καὶ τὸ τυμπανον ἐξισῶσιν (24). The poetical translation of this is to be found in these verses of Horace, if instead of ira, anger, you put amor, love:

(22) See the Greek Poets by Mr le Fevre.

(23) In the Life of Sappho.

(24) Plut. de Amore, pag. 763. Here is Xylander's version, Quid tale aut tantum accidit Pithiæ cum tripodem attigit? Quemnam orgia agentium tibia & Magnæ matris carmina atque tympanum sic animo abalienaverunt.

(25) Horat. Ode XVI, lib. i.

Non Dindymene, non adytis quatit Mentem sacerdotum incola Pythius,
Non Liber æque, non acuta
Sic geminant Corybantes æra, Tristes ut ira (25).

Not Cybele such heat inspires
Nor Phæbus with such raging fires
His prophet's soul possess'd,
Nor Bacchus self can raise a man
Half so much as anger can,
When once it burns the breast.

CREECH.

People were so persuaded in Ovid's time, that Sappho loved women as men do; that he makes no difficulty of introducing her making a sacrifice to Phaon of the female companions of her debauchery.

Nec me Pyrrhiades Methymniadesve puellæ,
Nec me Lesbium cetera turba juvant,
Vilis Anactone, vilis mihi candida Cydno:
Non oculis gratia est Atthis, ut ante meis.
Atque alie centum quas non sine crimine amavi
Improbe, multarum quod fuit, unus habes.

Lesbides infamem quæ me fecistis amatæ,
Definite ad citharas turba venire meas (26).

(26) Ovidius, Epist. Sapph. ad Phaon.

No more the Lesbian dames my passion move,
Once the dear objects of my guilty love;

M

All

VOL. V.

(5) Mascula Sappho. Hor. Epist. XIX, ver. 28, lib. i, Aufonius, Cupid. Crucif.

it. Be it as it will, Sappho passed for a famous Tribas, and some are of opinion that this was the reason why she was surnamed Masculine (b) [E]. If her design was to dispense with the other half of mankind, she was frustrated of her expectation; for she fell desperately in love with Phaon, and did in vain all that she could to make him love her: but he despised her and forced her by his coldness to throw herself headlong from a rock [F], to extinguish her devouring flame. How cruel he was

*All other loves are left in only thine,
Ah, youth ungrateful to a flame like mine!*

*Ye Lesbian virgins, and ye Lesbian dames,
Themes of my verse, and objects of my flames;
No more your groves with my glad songs shall ring,
No more these hands shall touch the trembling string.* P O P P.

Horace is another evidence against her in the complaints he supposes she made of the maids of Lesbos;

*Et Aëolis fidibus querentem
Sappho puellis de popularibus* (27.)

(27) Horat. Ode XIII, lib. ii, & ibid. Lambinus, Cruquius, Mr Dacier, &c.

*And Sappho, in Æolian strains,
Who of the Lesbian maids complains.*

for if she had reason to complain that the ladies of her country envied her merit, she would not have chosen the young ones for the subject of her complaint: but because she had spoke to them of love, and the greatest part of them were either too simple, or, to speak better, too crafty to be caught, and those who had complied, had made her infamous; for this reason she complained of the young maids. This verse of Ovid, Definite ad citbaras turba venire meas, shews, that the women of Lesbos had done justice to her fine verses. For the rest, I leave it to a new Father Sanchez to decide, whether a married woman, who had complied with the passion of Sappho, would have committed adultery, and made her husband a cuckold, properly speaking? I do not know whether this question has escaped the inexhaustible curiosity of the Casuists about matrimonial causes.

Let us confirm this by the testimony of a great wit, who did not believe that his complaisance for Mrs le Fevre should go so far as to approve the pains she has taken in favour of Sappho. After the death of her husband, says he (28), Sappho, tho' young, renounced marriage, but not the pleasure of loving. She had a soul too amorous to be without it; which may be easily judged by the tenderness which runs through her poems, and which undoubtedly sets her above all the Poets as to that point. Thus finding herself too weak to vanquish so violent an inclination as that, she wholly gave herself up to it, and loved all manner of ways, going even far beyond the bounds which modesty naturally prescribes to her sex. It is in vain to justify her on that head; it cannot be done but at the expence of truth: and neither her aversion for the shameful love of Charaxus, nor all the honours she received from the Lesbians, can wash off a stain, which all those who have spoke of her could not disguise, notwithstanding the encomiums they have given her, and which her own works evidence more clearly still. Several beautiful women are put in the number of her mistresses.

(28) In Horat. Epist. XIX, lib. i.

(30) Chabot quotes in Epigr. ad Philenim. lib. vii.

[E] She was surnamed Masculine.] It is not so easy as it is thought to know truly what Horace means by Mascula Sappho; but if he pretended to reproach her with her love against nature, it is easy to know he took the wrong time. The epithet would be very cold, and too far fetched without any necessity. There are, notwithstanding, learned men who understand it so. Chabot (29) places among them the interpreter of Juvenal and Porphyrio, an ancient scholiast upon Horace; and gives us Domitius for his author as to the latter. Without doubt he means Domitius Calderinus, whose commentary upon Martial I have not (30), but, according to Chabot, we find there, that Porphyrio has interpreted the word mascula both in a proper and figurative sense, 'Vel quia Sappho in poetico studio versata est, in quo sapius enituit, vel quia tribas diffamata fuit. . . . Either because she made Poetry her study, in which she frequently excelled, or because she was an infamous tribas Cruquius, who has published the old scholiasts upon Horace, has not published these words of Porphyrio. As for the interpreter of Juvenal, cited by Chabot, it is reasonable that we should take him for the scholiast of that Poet; but I do not find that he says what is imputed to him: It is Britannicus who says it upon the forty-seventh verse of the second satire (31). However it be with the ancient commentators, it is certain that the moderns do commonly mention three opinions about the sense of mascula Sappho. 1. That this word means that she was a tribas. 2. That it denotes the inclination she had for the sciences, instead of handling the spindle and distaff. 3. The courage she had to precipitate herself at Leucas. This last opinion is Scaliger's (32), and Turnebus's (33), which is strongly confirmed by the following verses of Aufonius (34).

Et de nimbo saltum Leucate minatur, Mascula Lesbias Sappho peritura sagittis.

*And manly Sappho, with the Lesbian dart
Sore wounded, to relieve the cruel smart
From steep Leucate's formidable height
Threatens a furious leap. . . .*

See the article LEUCAS, and the following remark.

Thevet rejects the first sense of mascula Sappho, and follows the second and third, but not without confounding himself childishly. Horace and Aufonius, says he (35), when they called this Lesbian woman mascula, meant nothing else but that she did what was proper for men, in composing so excellent verses, or that she had undertaken to get into those beautiful places of Leucas, near which the men durst not come. What an absurdity to give the name of beautiful places to a dreadful precipice, whither none went but out of despair? This therefore, continues he (36), is to wrong our Sappho, and to calumniate her without a just reason, since the divine Philosopher Plato admired her for her dexterity and vivacity of wit, and for her profound wisdom, which set her, not only above the rest of her sex, but also above the most able men. I make no manner of doubt but Thevet is a false witness here: I do not believe that ever Plato spoke of her profound wisdom, and if he had given her that elogy, it should not be understood in the sense of Thevet, but in the sense wherein it is taken at this very day among the Walloons, and was formerly taken in France. The midwives were called sages, wise, not because of their virtue, but because they knew many things that other women knew not. They are called at this day femmes sages in Guienne and Languedoc, but in other provinces, where they speak more exactly the French, to avoid the equivocation, they make use of a transposition, and call them sages-femmes. Tell at this day a Walloon, that he is happy in his children, that his daughters are sages, he will think you laugh at them, and he will tell you they are not, that it is not proper for their sex, and that it is enough for a maid to fear God, and understand housewifery. This shews that he understands, by being sage, to be learned, to know Latin, &c. The Greek word σοφός signified sometimes a knowing man, and in this sense Plato takes it sometimes, and particularly when he speaks of Anacreon. This is what a very good Critic has observed (37). In the same manner this word ought to be understood, if Plato had made use of it in praising Sappho. Let us conclude with these words of a commentator upon Tanaquillus Faber (38): 'It is very well known why Horace and Aufonius called her mascula, not for her courage, but in the same sense as γυνή ἀνδρική in Lucian, where an impudent woman explains herself, saying, ἡ ἐπιθυμία ἀνδρῶν ἐστὶ μοι, and τὸ αὐτὸ ἀνὴρ εἰμι. . . . I have the inclinations of a man, and am thoroughly masculine.'

[F] Phaon forced her, by his coldness, to throw herself headlong from a rock.] Mrs le Fevre says that Sappho could not forbear following Phaon into Sicily, whither

(31) Tale monstrum libidinis &c. Sappho cruciata, unde mascula est appellata ab Horatio in Epistola. . . . Sappho is said to have invented such a prodigy of love, from whence she was called Mascula by Horace in his Epistles. See Vianus upon Aufonius Cupid. crucif. ver. 25.

(32) In Aufon. Cupid. crucif. & in Virgil. Cirin.

(33) Advert. lib. x, cap. ii. Cupid. crucif.

(35) Thevet, Eloges des Savans Hommes, Tom. i, pag. 226.

(36) Id. ibid. pag. 227.

(37) See Mr le Clerc in the first volume of his Arts Critica, pag. 194, 195.

(38) Reland, Remarques sur les Vies des Poëtes Grecs, folio G 4.

(7) Soidas, in Σαπφά.

was [G]! She had been long before the widow of one of the richest men of the isle of Andros, called Cercala, by whom she had a daughter called Cleïs (i). So the mother of Sappho was called. I do not know her father's name, for we have eight to chose upon (k), there being just so many different fathers assigned to her by authors (l). She had three brothers, one of whom, called Charaxus, sold Lesbian wine in Egypt (m), and fell in love there with a famous courtesan, by some, called Rhodope; but Sappho calls her Doricha. She was very angry with her brother for this shameful engagement

(8) Id. ibid.

(l) See the remark [K], in the article ANA- CREON.

(m) Strabo, lib. xvi, pag. 556. Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 596.

whither he retired that he might not see her; and that during her stay in that island, she made the finest verses in the world; and that it is very probable she made there the hymn to Venus, that is still extant, in which she begs so ardently the assistance of that goddess. Her prayers proved ineffectual; the sweet and tender verses she composed so often on this subject (39) were to no purpose: Phaon was cruel to the last degree. The unfortunate Sappho was forced to take a dangerous leap; for so I may justly call the remedy to which she had recourse, which was to go upon the promontory Leucas, and throw herself into the sea. It was looked on in those days as the true means to cure the pains of love, and for this reason that place was called the Lovers' Leap. Some say (40) that Sappho was the first that made a trial of this way of curing love: others say, she was the first woman that did it; but that, before her time, some men had done it (41). Several Poets have spoke of this despair of Sappho: one of them (42) having exhausted all the counsels he could give to an unfortunate lover, and at last referring him to the great remedy of all evils, makes use of this expression.

Quod tibi fuaserunt Phædra & Elissa dabant, Quod Canace, Phyllis, & fœdita Phaoni.

What Phædra and the Tyrian queen advis'd,
And she whom Phaon cruelly deserv'd;
What Canace and Phyllis did approve
As the best remedy for hopeless love,
That may you chuse, by their example taught.

See here what Statius says;

Stefichorusque ferox, saltusque ingressa viriles
Non formidata temeraria Leucade Sappho (43).

And fierce Stefichorus with Sappho join'd,
Who, when she took her manly leap of old,
With rash, unshrinking courage did behold
Leucade's dreadful precipice. . . .

Pliny tells us a story about the cause of Sappho's love for Phaon. It was said that the occult qualities of a certain herb had excited that passion. Here are the words of Pliny, Ex his: he speaks of the different sorts of eryngo, or hundred-headed thistle, *candidam nostri centum capita vocant Portentosum est, quod de ea traditur: Radicem ejus alterutrinus fixus similitudinem referre, raram inventu: sed si viris contigerit mas, amabiles fieri. Ob hoc & Phaemon Lesbium dilectum à Sappho. Multa circa hoc non Mago- rum solum vanitates, sed etiam Pythagoricorum (44). That is to say, according to the version of du Pinet, the Latins call the white eryngo Centum capita . . . and certainly it is a wonderful thing, if what they say of this root be true. For there are some that say, that the root of white eryngo (which is very rare) resembles the parts of a man or a woman: and it is held, that if a man meets with one that represents the parts of man, he shall be beloved by women: and it is thought, this made Sappho in love with Phaon. And indeed, not only the Magicians, but also the Pythagoreans, tell strange wonders of this root. These are idle stories. Sappho was so well tempered for love that she needed no occult qualities of roots to enflame her.*

[G] How cruel he was! The cruelty of Phaon will not surprise us so much, if we reflect that Sappho was only a widow upon the decline, who had never been handsome, who was ill spoken of in her widowhood, and who kept no measure in shewing the violence of her passion. A man that is never so little nice, does not care for such unbecoming addresses, and draws ill conjectures from them. Add to this, that Sappho had not the endearment of novelty, which often, even with nice people, makes amends for the defect of beauty and the flower of youth. Phaon knew all she was capable of; the trees and the grass had been her confidants; and perhaps his flight proceeded more from being spent than from indifference. Consider what she herself writes to him by the pen of Ovid.

Hæc quoque laudabas, omnique à parte placebam,
Sed tum præcipue cum sit amoris opus,
Tunc te plus solito lascivia nostra juvabat,
Crebraque mobilitas, aptaque verba joco:
Quique, ubi jam amborum fuerat confusa voluptas,
Plurimus in lassio corpore languor erat.

Invenio silvam quæ sæpe cubilia nobis
Præbuit, & multa texit opaca coma.
Agnovi pressas noti mihi cespitis herbas;
De nostro curvum pondere gramen erat.
Incubui tetigique locum qua parte fuisti.

In all I pleas'd, but most in what was best;
And the last joy was dearer than the rest.
Then with each word, each glance, each motion fir'd,
You still enjoy'd, and yet you still desir'd,
Till all dissolving in the trance we lay,
And in tumultuous raptures dy'd away.

I find the shades that did our joys conceal,
Not him that made me love those shades so well.
Here the press'd herbs with bending tops betray,
Where oft entwinn'd in am'rous folds we lay;
I kiss that earth which oft was press'd by you.

POPE.

She was not then so capable of hearkening to reason, as when she represented to a young man, who courted her for marriage, that being older than him, she would not marry him (45). The younger Phaon had been, the more she would have found her account in him. If I have said that she was not handsome, it was because I thought we should prefer to the authority of Plato, who calls her the beautiful Sappho (46), the authority of Ovid, who makes her speak thus:

Si mihi difficilis formam natura negavit,
Ingenio formæ damna rependo mez.
Sed brevis. At nomen quod terras impleat omnes
Est mihi: mensuram nominis ipsa fero.
Candida si non sum: placuit Cepheia Perseo.

To me what nature has in charms deny'd,
I well by wit's more lasting charms supply'd.
Tho' short by stature, yet my name extends To Heav'n itself, and Earth's remotest ends.
Brown as I am, an Ethiopian dame
Inspir'd young Perseus with a gen'rous flame.

POPE.

Mrs le Fevre had set me an example for not giving credit to Plato or Athæneus; for she says that Sappho was not beautiful, that she was neither tall, nor little, that she had a very brown complexion, and very lively and sparkling eyes. What shall I say of Maximus Tyrius (47), who pretends that as she was black and little, Socrates (48) called her beautiful, only by reason of the beauty of her verses.

[H] She

(45) In a fragment of a letter quoted by Mrs le Fevre.

(46) In Phædra, pag. m. 1214. Athenæus calls her also the beautiful Sappho, lib. xiii, p. 196, and so does Plutarch de Amore, pag. 763, and Julian the Apostate, Epist. ad Alypium Cæsar.

(47) Orat. VIII, pag. m. 36.

(48) Id est Plato, ubi supra.

ment [H]. It is said that the Mitylenians did her the honour after her death to stamp their money with her image [I]. Some authors make mention of another Sappho [K].

(*) See the remark [K] towards the end.

Mr Moreri found one in Martial, only through an extreme inadvertency (n). We read in Aristotle the proof Sappho made use of to shew that death is an evil. The gods, said she (o), have judged it so, for otherwise they would die. There was in the Prytaneum of Syracuse, a most beautiful statue of Sappho: see what Cicero says of it, when he reproaches Verres with stealing it (p). It was the work of Silanion, and probably the same that Tatian speaks of in reproaching the Gentiles with the honour they paid to dishonest women. See citation (59).

(o) Ἡ ὡς περ Σαπφὸς ἔειπε τὸ ἀποθνήσκειν κακόν· οἱ θεοὶ γὰρ οὕτω νεκροῦσθαι ἀπὸ θανάτου γὰρ ἄν. Aut quemadmodum Sappho, mori malum esse, Dii enim sic judicaverunt: alioqui mortui essent. Aristot. Rhetor. lib. ii, cap. xiii, pag. m. 445. B.

[H] She was very angry with her brother for this shameful engagement. See how Ovid tells us this particular.

Arist inops frater victus meretricis amore,
Mistaque cum turpi damna pudore tulit.
Factus inops agili peragit freta cerula remo,
Quasque male amisti, nunc male querit opes.
Me quoque, quod monui bene multa fideliter, odit;
Hoc mihi libertas, hoc pia lingua dedit.

My brother next, neglecting wealth and fame,
Ignobly burn'd in a destructive flame.

P O E T.

I leave you to judge what reprisals he might have made, and what weight the remonstrances of such a sister could have. Athenæus observes that the invectives against the courtesan of Naucratis, were grounded upon the excessive fums she extorted from her lovers. Ἦν ἡ καλὴ Σαπφὸς ἐρωμένην Χαράξην τὴν ἀπαιεμένην, διὰ τῆς ποιήσεως διαβάλλει ὡς πολλὰ τὴν Χαράξην νοσοῖσάμεν. Quam pulchra Sappho Charaxi fratri suo mercaturæ gratia Naucratis profecto nave dilectam versibus suis profecit, quod multa illam pecunia emunxisset (49). Herodotus calls that courtesan Rhodopis, and says that Charaxus, who had spent a great sum to redeem her, was ill treated by the invectives of his sister Sappho (50).

(49) Athen. lib. xiii, cap. viii, pag. 596.

(50) Herodot. lib. ii, cap. cxxxv.

(51) Ex lib. i, pag. 23.

(52) Lambin. in Horat. Od. XVII, lib. i.

[I] They say that the Mitylenians stamped their money with her image. I shall observe on this occasion, that Lambinus, for want of understanding a passage of Pausanias (51), says falsely, That there was in the citadel of Athens a statue of Sappho. Anacreontis Teii, statua in arce Atheniensium prima post Sapphonem locata est. Here is the Greek. Τὸ δὲ τὸ Σανδρίππυ ἀνακρεὼν ἐκπνεύει Ἀνακρεὼν ὁ Τῆος, πρῶτος μετὰ Σαπφὸν τὴν Λεσβίαν τὰ πολλὰ ἂν ἐγχεύεν ἐρωτικὰ ποιήσας. It is evident that these Greek words mean nothing else, but that the statue of Anacreon was put near that of Xanthippus; the statue, I say, of Anacreon, who is the first after Sappho, who consecrated to matters of love the greatest part of the things he writ.

(53) Thevet, Elog. des savans Hommes, Tom. i, pag. 223, Edit. 1671, in 12mo.

(54) Le Fevre, Vie des Poët. Græcs, p. m. 23.

(55) See the Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres. Od. 1700, pag. 461.

(56) Thevet, ubi supra, p. 224.

(57) Aristot. Rhetor. lib. ii, cap. xiii, pag. 445. Mr Reland in his remarks upon Mr Le Fevre, quotes the words of Aristotle.

I should be glad to know whether Thevet is mistaken or not, when he assures us, That the Romans erected in memory of Sappho a statue of Porphyry richly wrought (53). It is Tanaquillus Faber, who has observed, that the Mitylenians stamped their money with the image of this heroine, and by this treated her like a queen when she was dead (54). He cites no body for it; but Mr Reland, who has made notes upon this work of Tanaquillus Faber (55), quotes this passage of Julius Pollux, οἱ μυτιληναῖοι μὲν Σαπφὸν τῷ νομισματι ἐνεχέοντο, and observes that there are still in being some medals of Sappho, which bear the name of the Mitylenians, ΜΤΙΛΙΝΑΙΩΝ. Thevet says, that he has taken the picture of Sappho from an ancient medal, which he brought from the isle of Lesbos, and that one like that, was given with several others, to the Baron de la Garde, then the French ambassador at Constantinople, by the first Physician of Sultan Soliman (56). Aristotle observes that the Mitylenians had paid honours to Sappho, but he does not tell us in what those honours consisted (57). Tatian reproaches the Greeks with the statue of the courtesan Sappho, made by Silanion; of that courtesan, says he, who sung her own incontinency, and was amorous, even to madness (58). Καὶ ἡ μὲν Σαπφὸς γυναικὸν πορνικὸν ἐρωτομανὲς καὶ τὴν αὐτῆς ἀσελγείαν ἔδειξε. Et quidem Sappho meretricia muliercula infans amoris capta suam ipsa lasciviam cantat (59). Pliny speaks of a Painter called Leo, who had drawn the picture of Sappho (60).

[K] Some authors make mention of another Sappho. Mr Moreri says there are some, who mention a second maid of this name of Erythræ, who made verses, and that this is the opinion of Athenæus, lib. 13. Athenæus does not say that this other Sappho was a Poetess, or that she was born at Erythræ: he says that she was of Erethus (61), by profession a courtesan, and that she fell in love with Phaon. According to this opinion the great Sappho, the Sappho of Mitylene, who made such excellent Poems, might, without much trouble, be restored to a good reputation; there would be nothing else to do but to transport her bad fame upon the other Sappho. The worst is, that a lame passage of Athenæus, seconded as much as you please by the evidence of Ælian (62), is not to serve us for a guide preferably to a thousand authorities that are against it. Mr Lloyd, and Mr Hoffman advise us to distinguish well between the two Sappho's, the one of Eretria, and the other beloved by Phaon, as we see, say they, in Athenæus lib. 13. This is copied out of Vossius (63), and is not the more true for all that; for Athenæus only speaks there of one Sappho a native of Erethus, who was desperately in love with Phaon: whether their love was mutual or no, he does not say. Suidas might occasion a doubt, were it not probable that he has divided what ought to remain united. He speaks of two Sappho's: what he says of the first, beyond all doubt belongs to her that excelled in Lyric poetry: what he says of the second, viz. that she was of Mitylene in the isle of Lesbos, that she threw herself from Leucate into the sea for the love of Phaon, that she played on instruments, and was famous for Lyric Poetry, certainly agrees no less with the first. I therefore see no reason of any weight for admitting two women of that name, especially if we must distinguish the one from the other, by the qualities which Suidas and Charles Stephens attribute to them.

Here is a very absurd fault. (64) Canius, a Latin Poet, a native of Cadix (65), and a friend of Martial . . . married two wives, Theophila a learned woman, but a little too free, and Sappho, not so well learned, but more reserved. . . . Martial mentions what I write, lib. 3. epig. 63. & lib. 7. epist. 68.

Castior hæc & non doctior illa fuit, &c.

This is what we read in Moreri's Dictionary. But if we consult Martial, we find (66) that he only mentions one wife of Canius, and says she was called Theophila; that she was learned and made verses which Sappho might praise; that the latter was not more learned than Theophila, but that Theophila was more chaste than Sappho. The verse which Moreri quotes is the last of the epigram. He should not therefore have added an Elcatera. This is but a trifle in comparison of his blunder in giving to Canius a wife called Sappho, less learned, but more modest than Theophila. I say nothing of two other faults which are in the article Canius of Moreri's Dictionary. He quotes the 19th epig. of the third book of Martial, instead of the 20th, and emulator is put instead of emulatur.

(p) Cicero in Verrem, Orat. VI, fol. m. 78.

(58) Tatian. Orat. contra Græcos, pag. m. 168, B.

(59) Id. ibid.

(60) Plin. lib. xxxv, cap. xi, pag. m. 235.

(61) A town in the isle of Lesbos.

(62) Ælian. lib. xii, cap. xix. Var. Hist.

(63) Vossius, de Poët. Græc. pag. 17.

(64) Moreri, at the word Canius.

(65) This appears from the LXIII epigram of the first book of Martial, not quoted by Moreri.

(66) Mart. Epigramm. LXVIII, lib. vii.

S A R A H, sister and wife of Abraham [A], was his faithful companion in all his travels. She was already married to him, when they retired from Ur of the Chaldees to go to Haran (a). The barrenness, with which she was afflicted in her own country, did not leave her in foreign countries; and this made her take the resolution of giving her husband a substitute, that she might become a mother in the person of that substitute, since she could not be one in her own person. Hagar, her servant, whom she chose for this employ, was quickly with child and paid her with ingratitude (b). She despised Sarah; but Sarah not being able to bear this insolence, made such use of the full power her husband gave her over Hagar, that she forced her in a little time to fly out of the house. One may see in another place (c) the return of this ungrateful servant and the extremities she was reduced to, when she was turned out a second time. We shall not repeat it. It is better to say that at last by a particular blessing of God, Sarah proved with

(a) Genesis xi. 29, 31.

(b) Genesis xvi.

(c) In the article of AGAR.

[A] Sister and wife of Abraham. That is to clear from the XXth chapter of Genesis, that were it not for the ill habit contracted by some, of sacrificing the natural sense of the words of Scripture to the least difficulties that arise, there could not be two different opinions about the matter. Let us take right the circumstances of the fact. Abraham being come into the country of the Philistines, made Sarah pass there for his sister. Whereupon Abimelech taking her to be a maid, or a widow, so that nothing could hinder him from making her one of his wives, caused her to be brought to him. But knowing by revelation that she was Abraham's wife, he restored her, complaining of their lies, which had exposed him to great mischief. I say, their lies; for, on the one side, Abraham had said of his wife, she is my sister; and Sarah had said of her husband, he is my brother. Abraham excused himself, in the first place, on account of the fear he was in for his life, if he had said she is my wife; in the second place, because she was truly his sister, the daughter of my father, said he (1), though she is not the daughter of my mother. After this, he endeavoured to justify his wife by saying, that he had asked of her as a favour, that wheresoever they came she should declare that he was her brother. I admire that they do not see in this discourse, that Sarah was Abraham's sister, not by the mother's side, but by the father's side. These are my reasons.

(1) Genesis xx. 12.

I. In the first place, if Sarah had not been the sister of Abraham in this manner, the apology of her husband would only have still more deceived the good prince, who upbraided him with his former dissimulation; for if the Patriarch's excuses found credit, it was impossible to take Sarah for any other than the true and real sister of Abraham by the father's side, nor could any man living gather from such discourse that she was only his niece. I leave all knowing people to judge whether Abimelech could form any other ideas from Abraham's apology. But then I require that they be capable of placing themselves in the exact situation, and in all the circumstances of this adventure. It is to no purpose to suppose that Sarah was the daughter of Haran, and consequently the grand-child of the father of Abraham; and to add, that a nephew is sometimes called brother (2), and that a grand-son is sometimes called son; that, I say, is to no purpose in this affair, for the circumstances required that Abraham should use the words in the most proper signification; for if he had not, he must have passed for a man who designed to impose upon Abimelech.

(2) Lot, Abraham's nephew, is called his brother, Genesis xiv. 16: but this example is of no use to those who suppose that Sarah was Lot's sister; for upon this supposition Lot would be called brother, as being a brother-in-law, rather than as being a nephew.

II. Besides to what purpose should he make use of this distinction, Daughter of my father, daughter of my mother, if he meant only that he was the uncle of Sarah? put the case that he might have called sister, her that was only his niece; to what purpose should he say that his mother was not the grand-mother of this niece? It is, will some say, to represent ingeniously the degree of his kindred in respect of Sarah. But why did he use the word daughter in an ambiguous signification? Why does he not use it in its right sense, as I suppose he did. Besides, the ingenuity spoken of would have been very unreasonable; it would have weakened the apology of the Patriarch; for it would make the bonds of kindred appear less strong. If it be objected, that in my supposition that same ingenuity weakens the apology more then it strengthens it; I will give a reason why Abraham declared that Sarah was not his sister by the mother's side. They made a difference between the marriage of a man with his sister both by the father's and mother's side, and the marriage of a man with his half sister. The Athenians who permitted the marrying of the sister by the father's side, forbade the marrying of the sister by the mother's (3). Solon decided it so. On the contrary, Lycurgus permitted the Lacedemonians to marry the sister by the mother, and not by the father (4). Some have said, that as the community of blood is more certain between a brother and a sister by the mother, than between a brother and a sister by the father; the permission of Solon was, generally speaking, less odious (5) than the permission of Lycurgus. Will any one pretend, after this, that, on my supposition, Abraham would have said without any necessity, that his wife was not his sister by the mother's side; as by the contrary supposition it would have been to no purpose to say, that his mother was not the grand-mother of Sarah?

(3) See the proof of it aoud Murtum, lib. xvi. c. w, Variar. Lect. & apud Gebhardum in Corn. Nepotem Vit. Cimonis. Consult the article C1-MON remark [D].

(4) See the same authors.

(5) Filia patris (foror, non uterina) jure continentur Noachidi, quoniam inter gentes ratio consanguinitatis paternæ non habebatur. Tarchius, apud Hieronymum, Hyst. Patriarch. Tom. ii, pag. 78.

III. Add to this, that if Abraham meant nothing else but that his father Terah was the grand-father of Sarah, he took the terms of father and sister in a large and less proper signification. Why therefore did he declare that his mother was not the mother of Sarah. Was she not so, in the sense that he took the word father in relation to Terah; that is to say, was she not the grand-mother of Sarah, just as Terah was her grand-father? Some think to clear the difficulty by supposing that Haran was the father of Sarah, and that he was not the brother of Abraham by the mother: they assign therefore two wives to Terah, and they suppose he had Haran by the one and Abraham by the other. Consequently if Sarah was the daughter of Haran, her grand-father was the father of Abraham; but her grand-mother was different from the mother of Abraham. I answer, all this falls to the ground as soon as it is supposed that this Patriarch made use of the words sister and daughter in a large signification; for upon this foot it is certain, that the mother of Abraham is grand-mother to the children of Haran, whether she bore Haran, or whether she was only the wife of him who begat him. As soon as you leave the proper and strict signification of the words which denote the kindred, and follow the custom observed in families, the word mother agrees to the wives in relation to all the children of their husbands, and by consequence that of grand-mother, with respect to all the children of all the children of their husbands: so that if Abraham had taken the terms in the large signification, which the title of friendship or civility has introduced into families, he could not have denied, as he did, that his mother was the grand-mother of Sarah. Some with they could say that he took the same words sometimes in a proper, and sometimes in an improper signification. But would not this be to suppose that he acted the Sophist, and imposed upon the honesty of Abimelech?

IV. My fourth reason is taken from thence, viz. that it cannot be supposed upon any good grounds that Sarah was adopted by Terah. If it were so, Abraham might have made use of his distinction without departing from exactness of speaking; for in that case his father might have been called the father of Sarah in a signification proper enough. But see here what ruins this evasion: they have recourse to it only to avoid the imputation of incest, and they do not avoid it by that; for a fraternity or brotherhood, founded upon adoption, properly so called, was no less an obstacle to marriage than a natural fraternity. According to the laws, a brother who should marry, his adopted sister, committed incest, properly so called. Inter fratrem fororemque nuptias esse prohibitas.

N

(d) Moret says
fully 137.

with child being ninety years old, and was brought to bed of a son called Isaac. She lived 127 years (d). We ought not to forget that she was very beautiful, and that her beauty and the complaisance she had for her husband, not to call herself his wife but his sister, exposed her to the danger of two rapes [B], whereby her chastity had suffered shipwreck,

(6) Justinian.
lib. i. Instit.
See the text of the article
OCTAVIA.

bitas five eodem utroque parente, five altero tantum nati sunt: verum si per adoptionem foror facta sit: quandiu manet adoptio, etiam nuptias prohiberi: at si per emancipationem adoptio dissoluta sit, posse inter eos ritè iniri connubium (6). --- Marriage is prohibited between a sister and brother, whether they have both parents or only one in common: if the woman be a sister by adoption, so long as that adoption continues, marriage is likewise prohibited: but if the adoption should happen to be dissolved, then they may lawfully marry.

V. From hence I draw one of my chief reasons. If any thing should determine us not to take in a literal sense the precise declaration of Abraham, that Sarah is truly his sister, daughter of his father, but not of his mother, it would be the incestuous marriage that results from this fraternity. But does not that very thing refute those, who say that Sarah was Abraham's niece (7)? Is it not agreed upon that this degree of kindred renders marriages incestuous? Our adversaries therefore must seek out excuses for the incest of Abraham. If they can find any, it will be as well for us, as for them; the differences being only less or more, it will not be hard for us to give their reasons the extent that will be needful for us; especially considering that Jacob made no scruple to be married at the same time to two sisters, which in other times would have been an abominable thing. Clemens Alexandrinus looks upon this to be so small a difficulty, that he tells us very coldly, that the words of the Patriarch teach us, that men must not marry a sister by the mother's side. Τὰς ἑπομένους μὴ δὲ τὴν ἀγνοῦσαι πρὸς γάμον δὲ δὲ ἀκούειν. Docens eas quæ ex eadem matre nate sunt non esse ducendas uxores (8). It is certain that head; I shall not mention them; you may easily find them in other books. I shall only tell those, who would accuse me of undervaluing the conscience of Abraham with respect to the crime of incest; that before they come at me, they must overthrow and defeat a great many ancient and modern Divines, both Catholics and Protestants (9). I set no great value upon what is found in the Annals of Eutychius (10), that the first wife of Terah, mother of Abraham, was called Jona, and that his second wife, mother of Sarah, was called Teheviha; however it is a sign, that there is an ancient tradition for the opinion I have followed.

(8) Clem. Alexandr. Stromat. lib. ii, pag. 421.

(9) Clemens Alexandrinus, St. Jerom, Lipomannus, Olearius, Cajetanus, Sotus, Petavius, Codmannus, Father Abram, Musculus, Piffator, Heidegger, &c.

(10) Pag. 66, apud Heidegger, pag. 78.

(11) Chap. xi, var. 29.

VI. Here is another reason. If Sarah was not the daughter of Terah, but his grand-daughter, she must be the daughter of Haran, or of Nachor. But she was married. I prove it thus. We find in Genesis (11), that the wife of Nachor was called Milca, and that she was the daughter of Haran, father of Milca and Jisca. Since the latter is named without there being the same reason for doing it as there was for naming the other, (for no husband is assigned to her as to the other) it is probable that if Haran had had other daughters, they would have been named at the same time, and above all, Sarah would not have been forgotten, since mention had been made just before of her marriage with Abraham. We may then safely conclude that Haran had only two daughters, Milca and Jisca. This reason is so convincing, that it obliges several of our adversaries to suppose that Sarah and Jisca are the same person. They do no great honour to the sacred Historian. What an admirable writer would he be, if in three lines he should give two different names to a woman, without telling us that they are only two names of the self-same person? See in the XXIIId chapter of Genesis, the list of the children of Nachor: you will not find Sarah there, and you will see that his first-born came into the world after Abraham went out of his country; for it was at his return from mount Morija; where Abraham would have sacrificed his son Isaac, that he heard that Milca had brought forty eight children to her husband Nachor, viz. Huts, her first-born, &c. Besides, were it possible, that if Sarah had been the daughter of Haran, the Scripture should never have mentioned Lot as her brother?

VII. It is easy to answer those who object the words of the Scripture (12), where Sarah is called the daughter-in-law of Terah; for a married woman is considered rather by the relations of her marriage, than by those of her birth.

[B] To the danger of two rapes.] They resemble one another as much as two drops of water. In both one another as much as two drops of water. In both of them Abraham concealed his being Sarah's husband; and bid her say he was her brother; and he did it because he was afraid they would kill him, if they knew he was her husband, and to the end that they might be kind to him for her sake, if they believed that she was not his wife. In both of them the ravishers were punished from above, before they could satisfy their lust, restored Sarah, gave large presents to her husband, and reproached him with his lies. The first rape happened in Egypt by king Pharaoh; the second in Guerar by Abimelech, king of the Philistines. Sarah was at least sixty-five years old when Pharaoh took her away, and ninety when she was ravished by Abimelech; for she was ten years younger than her husband (13), and their voyage into Egypt was after their going out of Charan, that is to say, after the seventy-fifth year of Abraham (14). As for the journey to Gerar, it was after the foretelling of the birth of Isaac, that is to say, when Abraham was a hundred years old. Say what you will, this history is a proof that Abraham feared death more than any conjugal dishonour, and that he was far from being a jealous husband. He leaves to the paternal care of Providence the honour and chastity of Sarah; but he is beforehand for the preservation of his life, and neglects no human means. Not to acknowledge therein the infirmity of corrupt nature is to be voluntarily blind. That patriarch might have said on this occasion, Homo sum, humani nihil à me alienum puto. (15) - - - I am a man, and therefore think myself liable to any thing which may happen to men.

Those who believe that the fear of danger made him reason ill, are mistaken; there is no fear of GOD in this country, said he (16), and they will kill me because of my wife. He believed therefore that those, who would make no scruple to kill a man, would make some to take away a married woman. Yes, he believed it, and not without reason. The good of society, without doubt, more than the love of virtue, made the rape of a married woman to be looked on as an enormous injustice, the ill consequences of which sovereigns themselves dreaded; but it was not looked upon as so great a matter, if a great lord took away a woman that was not married, in order to increase the number of his concubines. Therefore Abraham reasoning solidly, might be sure, that at least the fear of men would hinder the Egyptians and the Philistines from taking away his wife, suffering him to live at the same time, because he would be a perpetual witness of the violence done to a married woman. The reasonable conclusion of this was to be afraid, lest they should privately dispatch him, that they might keep Sarah, and yet not be reproached with taking away a married woman, for the public would have had no knowledge of that husband, if he had been quickly dispatched. This fear is not the worst passage of this history. Who does not know the underhand dealings of David, in order to destroy the husband of his mistress. The desire of being well treated, as being the brother of the beautiful Sarah, is more blameable than the fear of being killed. However we ought to abhor the brutality of Fauftus the Manichee (17), and content ourselves with what St Jerom says of the matter (18). St Chrysostom (19), and St Ambrose have found here matter for a Panegyric on the charity of Sarah, who was willing, in favour of her husband, to expose her chastity to the greatest dangers. 'Extrema adit, fororem se ejus asseruit, contenta, si ita esset necesse, periclitari pudore potius quam virum salute: ut tueretur maritum mentita est germanitatem, ne in-

(13) It is said
Genesis xvii. 17.
that she was ninety years of age when Abraham was a hundred years old.

(14) Genesis xi.
Heutont. A9.
I, Scene 1, pag.
m. 112.

(15) Terent in Heutont. A9.
I, Scene 1, pag.
m. 112.

(16) Genesis xi.
Heutont. A9.
I, Scene 1, pag.
m. 112.

(17) He accused Abraham, Quid matrimonium suum infamissimum nundinator avaritiae causa duobus regi-
bus Abimelech & Pharaoni diversis temporibus, Saram conjugem forem mentitus, quod
erat pulcherrima, in concubitum vendidit. ---
For that, like an infamous vender of his marriage rights, he had at different times, to gratify his avarice, and glutting
sold his wife Sarah to the embraces of two kings, Pharaoh and Abimelch, falsely putting her off for his sister, because she was extremely handsome. Vide Augustinum contra Faustum, lib. xxii,
cap. xxxiii.

(18) He calls it studium necessitatem. - - - A just dilectus necessitatem.

(19) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(20) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(21) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(22) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(23) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(24) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(25) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(26) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(27) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(28) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(29) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(30) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(31) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(32) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(33) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(34) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

(35) Homil.
xxxii, in Genes.
See the remark
[A] in the article ABIME-
LECH.

shipwreck, if God had not prevented it [C]. A singular providence saved her in this danger, and restored her to her husband, with her honour safe and sound, besides the favours that were heaped upon him by the two princes who fell in love with her. This might sweeten the sad experience he had of the inconveniences which they find, who carry about with them a beautiful wife, which are sometimes greater, than if they travelled with an ugly one. One cannot easily clear Abraham [D] and Sarah in this matter, nor about the business of Hagar; therefore they are in the wrong who are so angry with Calvin, for reproving them on this subject (e). We ought to keep at an equal distance from the irreverence of Faustus the Manichee (f), and from the superstitious

(e) See Rivet, in Exercit. lxxvii, Tom. i, Oper. pag. 333. Heidegg. Hist. Patr. Rom. ii, pag. 151, and the remark [1] of this article.

(f) See remark [B], citat. (17).

(20) Abrof. de Abrah. cap. ii.

'fidiatores pudoris ejus tanquam æmulum & vindicem uxoris necarent (20). - - She exposed herself to the greatest dangers, and affirmed that she was his sister, chusing rather to hazard her own chastity than the life of her husband: to save him, she falsely called herself his sister, for fear that her lovers should put him to death, as their rival, and his wife's defender.' Origen was of another opinion; he found such a scandal in the literal sense, that he had recourse to types and allegories. 'Alioquin, says he (21), quæ nobis edificatio erit legentibus Abraham tantum Patriarcham non solum mentitum esse Regi, sed pudicitiam conjugis prodidisse? Quid nos edificat tanti Patriarchæ uxor, si putetur contaminationibus exposita per convenientiam maritalem? Hæc Judæi putent & si qui sint amici literæ non spiritus. - - Otherwise what edification shall we have in reading that so great a Patriarch as Abraham was, not only told a lie to the king, but also betrayed the chastity of his wife? Or how shall the wife of so great a patriarch edify us, if we suppose that she was prostituted by the connivance of her husband? Let the Jews imagine these things, and such who are friends to the letter, and not to the spirit.' Others have recourse to inspiration, and pretend that Abraham was directed by a prophetic spirit (22). This is the way never to be silent. This remedy ought to be better managed, and never to be used but as extremum unctio. Some (23) apply it to Sarah as to her desiring her husband to lie with her servant maid. As for those who say (24), to excuse Abraham, that his life was so necessary for the accomplishment of the divine promise, that he was obliged to preserve it at any rate, even at the expence of his wife's honour, they confute themselves: they alledge for his justification, what is against him; for if his life was necessary for the fulfilling of the divine decrees, he might have been assured that no body could kill him.

(21) In cap. vii. Genesios. Heidegger. pag. 149, pretends that Origen insulted and censured Abraham, quod per convenientiam maritalem Saram contaminationibus exposuerit. But how could he reproach him with it, since he rejects the literal sense?

(22) Paulus Burgensis, apud Heidegger. pag. 149.

(23) Joseph. Antiq. lib. i, cap. x.

(24) Apud Heidegger. ubi supra.

The loose Casuists and protectors of equivocations, take a great advantage of this conduct of the Patriarch. See the last answer to the Lettres Provinciales, that is, the Entretiens de Cleandre & d'Eudoxe (25).

(25) Pag. 128, & seq. of the Dutch Edit. 1696.

(26) Genes. xii. 17.

(27) Genes. xx.

[C] Her chastity had suffered shipwreck, if God had not prevented it.] The Scripture does not tell us what distemper it was that hindered Pharaoh from lying with Sarah; it says only that God struck him with great plagues, and all his house (26). As to Abimelech, the Scripture says, that God threatened him, in a dream, to kill him with all his family (27); but at the end of the chapter, it says, that at Abraham's prayer God cured Abimelech, his wife, and his servant-maids, and that afterwards they had children; for, adds the Scripture, The Lord had entirely shut up the wombs of the house of Abimelech, because of Sarah the wife of Abraham. I believe one might sooner have killed the interpreters, than hindered them from making conjectures upon those plagues of Pharaoh: the field is more large, in this respect, than in relation to Abimelech; for the Scripture seems to denote a sort of distemper, with respect to the latter. But they, probably, have judged of the one by the other, and, as it is likely, that the personal chastisement of Abimelech fell upon the parts designed for generation, since his wife and maid-servants were afflicted in those parts, it is believed that it was so likewise with Pharaoh (28). The Rabbinists say (29), he was tormented with so violent a gonorrhœa, that he had no pleasure to think of women, so far was he from being able to lie with them. They add, that Sarah had a guardian angel, who struck in such a manner all those who would have him strike, that they had neither the desire nor the power to come near her; and that it was by means of that angel that the preserved herself from the lascivious pursuits of Pharaoh. Philo (30) says only, that this prince endured insupportable pain and vexation,

(28) See Pterorius in Genes. cap. xii, ver. 17.

(29) Apud Lyrannum, citante Salliano, pag. 413.

(30) In Libr. de Abrah.

and was so far from thinking of the pleasures of love, that he only thought of his distemper, and the means how to get rid of it. His whole court was visited with the same scourge, because they had assisted or applauded him in the rape of Sarah. Eupolemon (31) says, that the plague got into the house of Pharaoh, and that Sooth-sayers having answered, it was for the rape of a woman, he restored her without touching her. Josephus (32) adds seditions to the plague. A modern author (33), who bears him an ill will, criticises him pretty smartly on this head. The reason he goes upon is, That a popular sedition does not hinder a prince from diverting himself with a woman, and that neither it, nor the plague has any particular relation with the sin of Pharaoh. This author therefore would have it, that he was afflicted in those parts that should have been the instruments of his debauchery, and he confirms his thought by the maxim of the wise man (34), Per quæ peccat quis per eadem & torquetur. - - By what a man commits a sin, by the same is he punished. Be it as it will, it cannot be denied, but that Sarah stayed some time in the houses of her ravishers: this is certain, at least, as to the last rape, since they had leisure to find out, that it was upon her account that the wombs of all the women in the court of Abimelech were shut up. From thence arises this small difficulty. That prince restored Sarah, as soon as he understood by a dream, that she was the wife of Abraham; he therefore knew nothing of it till she had been some time in his house. What did he design to do with her, seeing he let her alone all that time? Was it for this that he took her into his house? Those who make this objection, know not the custom of the Eastern princes. They have many wives, and others are sent to them from time to time: but we must not fancy that they care for them one after another by turns; there are some, whose turn never comes, tho' they be most beautiful. Abimelech was contented to have Sarah in his house, knowing that he could lie with her when he pleased: but God prevented it, before he chose his time. We may say the same of Pharaoh. I do not take him to have been so great a monarch, as to observe the ceremonies that were practised in the court of Persia, where a woman that pleased the king, was ordered to wash and perfume herself a year before she was brought to him (35). I shall not therefore insist on the conjecture of St Jerom (36), who explains by this method, the reason why Sarah was sometime unemployed in the house of Pharaoh. But let us say of this last king, what we have just now said of the king of the Philistines; or we may say that they were struck with a dangerous distemper the very first day they took her. Josephus says Abimelech was so sick that his life was despaired of by the Physicians. Others specify the nature of his disease; they say he had such violent pains in his genital parts, that he could not perform the act of copulation (37). For the rest, St Chrysostom (38), and St Jerom do well agree; quidam cum in veretro sit esse divinitus percussus, ut nec coire cum muliere posset ne dum vellet, & magnis ea in parte cruciatibus affligeretur. Pterorius in Genes. cap. xx, sub. fin.

(31) Apud Eupolemon, Fræp. lib. i, cap. 10.

(32) Lib. i, cap. vii.

(33) Sallian. Tom. i, pag. 413.

(34) Cap. xi, ver. 17.

(35) Esther, cb. ii.

(36) In Tradit. Hebraicæ in Genes. Vide Pterorius, in cap. xii, ver. 19.

(37) Tradunt quidam cum in veretro sit esse divinitus percussus, ut nec coire cum muliere posset ne dum vellet, & magnis ea in parte cruciatibus affligeretur. Pterorius in Genes. cap. xx, sub. fin.

(38) Homil. XXXI, in Genes.

[D] One cannot easily clear Abraham.] For besides what we have said above, would it not be an authority for the pernicious doctrine of equivocations if it was once certain that neither he nor Sarah told a lie? Those who attack the ill morals of Lessius, and some other Jesuits, say

(39) Apud eundem Pterorius, in cap. xii, ver. 19.

stitious flattery of some others. The beauty of Sarah had something peculiar in it, which ought not to be forgotten; viz. that it continued, at least, till she was ninety years old [E]. Several reasons are given for it. Some say, that it was because she had no children, and because she had renounced all matrimonial commerce, after she saw herself barren [F]. In case these reasons do not satisfy, there is added to them a particular say that those lie who make answers which have no relation to the intention of him who asks a question. Such answers, tho' they contain nothing but truth, do not cease for all that to be lying; for example, if a son of Cain had been juridically interrogated who he was, with a design to know who was his father, he was, with a design to know who was his father, and had answered that Cain was his uncle, he had said nothing but truth, for his mother was Cain's sister; yet his answer had not been exempt from deceit. The same may be said of Sarah. Abimelech asked her what relation she had to Abraham; he had all the right imaginable to ask her, for he was king of the country; his intention was to know whether she was married, or no; and upon this he was to regulate his conduct as to her. She answered, I am Abraham's sister; her husband who had suggested to her this answer, said on his part, I am Sarah's brother. Is it not the same thing, as if he had answered, the relation of brother and sister is the greatest relation that is between us, and would not this answer have been a formal lye? If one, that knows all the circumstances of a great conspiracy, should be asked, what do you know of it, and should answer, I know such a thing of it, which should not be the chief matter of the conspiracy, would not he be a deceiver, would he not be a liar? For his answer would be equivalent to this, I only know this. A commentator upon Genesis (40), designing to prove that marriage between brothers and sisters was not practised in Abraham's time, makes use of this remark. Sarah answering, says he, that she was Abraham's sister, was presently believed not to be his wife; therefore, at that time, these two relations were concluded to be incompatible. This reasoning is false; for suppose that these marriages took place in a country, the custom there would be, that the sister, after her marriage, would no longer be called the sister of her husband, but his wife; so that every sister, not called the wife of such a one, but only his sister, would be looked upon then not to be his wife; and for this reason, Abraham and Sarah necessarily, and visibly deceived the Egyptians and the Philistines, by suppressing the relation of marriage, and speaking only of that of brotherhood; though those nations were not ignorant of the compatibility of those relations. But it was enough to be deceived by Abraham, that they should know that the one swallowed up the other, much as the quality of father absorbed that of uncle in the person of Cain, with respect to his children. In a word, the suppression of a truth is a real lye, as often as it is designed to make the hearer form a false judgment, and when according to the use of the language spoken it cannot fail to produce that effect. Abraham and Sarah are in the case. Those who deny that marriages between brothers and sisters, were known among the Canaanites, ought to read the chapter of Leviticus, where marriages in such and such degrees are forbid to God's people. Let us not forget that Isaac made use of the dissimulation of his father upon a like principle; he said also, for fear of being killed, that Rebekah was his sister (41).

(41) Genesis xxvi, 9.

[E] The beauty of Sarah . . . continued . . . till she was ninety years old. This is proved by the twentieth chapter of Genesis, where it is said, that Abraham, being gone into the country of Gerar, would only pass for the brother of Sarah; which was the reason why Abimelech took her into his house with a design to marry her. The birth of Isaac had been already foretold to this patriarch: but his wife was ninety years old when this happened; therefore, &c. I know the Scripture does not say in this passage, that Sarah was beautiful, but it is no hard matter to collect it from the circumstances of that journey. We find in the twelfth chapter, that the reason which obliged Abraham to say, in Egypt, that Sarah was his sister, was, because he saw she was beautiful, and was afraid that they would kill him, that they might the more easily enjoy her. Sarah no sooner appeared, but they took and carried her to the king's house. There is no doubt but Abraham dissimulated his marriage in Gerar upon the same motive. He himself declares (42) (43) Genesis. xz. that he was afraid of being killed because of his wife; 11. he knew therefore she was beautiful enough to inspire love. The event speaks it still more clearly; for as soon as she was seen by the king of Gerar, he took her to his house in order to make her his wife. It was without doubt for her beauty; for to say with Father Salian, that he took her as a venerable widow, who understood the management of a house, and as the sister of a man whose alliance he looked on to be very advantageous to him, is a meer illusion. It is probable, that Abraham went only into the country of the Philistines to avoid the famine that pursued him; it was therefore easy for the king of that country to gain Abraham without making himself a sacrifice to the marriage of a widow fourcore years old. He would have purchased, at a dear rate, the friendship of Abraham, if Sarah had been decayed as commonly women are at that age. Let us therefore acknowledge as a certain truth, that she was still a beautiful woman. An honest Capuchin of Paris (43) pleasantly imagined that Abimelech took Sarah only to talk with her about devotion: he was, says he, a prophet and a man who reckoned it a singular happiness to hold familiar conversation with Sarah upon the subject of a future state. He thought this reverend mother would teach him many things concerning the kingdom of God. But would he have been chastised for such good and spiritual intentions? What a strange fancy! Flesh and blood, without doubt, would have had a greater share in their discourses than devotion, if they had let him do what he pleased.

We ought not to mind the thought of Hugo de St Victor; the consequences of it are dangerous: let us not open a breach in the holy Scripture; prophane men would enter into it that way, like wolves into a sheep-fold, and commit a thousand disorders. This author pretends (44) that Moses has not put in its proper place the taking away of Sarah by Abimelech, but in a time distant from the true time above thirty years. Let us maintain that Sarah was really ninety years old, when Abimelech designed to marry her. Nor ought we to have recourse to the expedient of those who say (45), that it is no greater wonder that Sarah should have been handsome at ninety, than to see a handsome woman at forty now a-days; for, say they, women lived then to be 130 years, as now they live to be fourcore. By their leave, they calculate wrong: where would they find, according to their supputation, the deadness of Sarah's womb of which the Apostle speaks (46)? Why did it cease to be with Sarah after the manner of women (47)? What would become of Abraham's celebrated faith with respect to the birth of Isaac? Is it strange, at this day, that a woman at forty, should conceive? Let us adjust their calculation better: ninety years are to 130 much as fifty-six to eighty. It is therefore with our beauties of fifty-six years that we must compare Sarah. Now I confess that though it be very rare that a woman of fifty-six should be taken away for her beauty, much less be designed for the bed of a sovereign, as a dainty and royal bit, yet there are some for all that, that have beautiful remains at that age. See what I have related elsewhere out of Brantome concerning Joan of Arragon and the Dukes of Valentinois. We may therefore say, without having recourse to miracles, which ought to be kept as much as possible for a great necessity, that the good constitution of Sarah, and her being exempt from lying-in and nursing, might preserve her beauty even to the age of ninety. Procopius thinks that when she was made capable of conceiving, she recovered her lost beauty (48), and that God, by a special favour, made her those two presents at once. Procopius may say what he pleases.

[F] Some say . . . she renounced all matrimonial commerce after she saw herself barren. Let us cite Pererius: Deinde id accidit Saræ ob summam ejus castitatem & continentiam, quippe quæ statim ut sensit se sterilem & invalidam ad generandum abstinuit à copula carnali, (40) Pererius in Caput xi. Disput. vii. Beltramin. Lib. de Matrimon. cap. xxviii. argues in the same manner.

(43) Bonducus de Ecclef. ante legem, lib. iii. cap. iv. apud Heidegger. pag. 157.

(44) Apud Pererium, l. Disput. in Genes. cap. xx.

(45) Id. ibid.

(46) Rom. iv.

(47) Genesis xviii. 11.

(48) Addit Procopius divinitus cum fecunditate Sara restaurata fuisse prætinam pulchritudinem. Cornel. à Lapide in Genes. p. 149.

particular providence of God, who, as they say, preserved from all the attacks of old age, the beauty of Sarah, amongst other motives, to try the faith of Abraham [G]. This was not attended to by those, who in the heat of their homilies exaggerated so much her decay [H], to make the greater wonder of the milk that filled her breasts. It is pretended (g) that she had so great a plenty of it, that she was forced to take several children to nurse; and that the day that Isaac was weaned, she gave all the children of those that came to the feast, her breast to suck. They add, that she herself would suckle her son, to remove all suspicions that might arise from her age of Isaac's being a supposititious child. St Chrysostom approves this thought (b). There is no probability that this holy woman died of grief, when she was told that Isaac was sacrificed by Abraham; and we may boldly place this among the fables of the Rabbins (i). Josephus says, that Sarah died a little after the return of her husband and son: But according to his own calculation, she lived twelve years longer; for he says with the Scripture, that she was 90 years old when she was brought to bed of Isaac, and 127 when she died; and, on the other hand, he assures us, that Isaac was twenty-five years old when his father would have sacrificed him.

It is here that I must shew, 1. That Calvin is wrongfully accused of having thrown the grossest reproaches upon Sarah [I], because she desired her husband to make use of their

carnali, ut supra ostendimus super illis verbis quæ sunt in capite 18. Postquam consensui & Dominus meus vetulus est, voluptati operam dabo (49)? It will not be improper to see on what he grounds his opinion. He makes use of these words of Sarah, Postquam consensui & Dominus meus vetulus est voluptati operam dabo (50)? That is, after I am waxed old, shall I have pleasure, my Lord being old also? There are two difficulties that Sarah started to her self when she heard the promise that was made to Abraham, that his wife should be brought to bed of a son the year following. Must I then, said she, notwithstanding my great age, receive the caresses of my husband? this is the first difficulty: but is not my husband too old for that? This is the second difficulty. So that according to Pererius the must have started almost the same objection which the virgin Mary did, how shall this be, seeing I know not a man (51)? I think we cannot reasonably deny to this author that the words of Sarah signify, that she and her husband observed then a perfect continence; but all the rest is nothing but mere conjecture, viz. That they had already above fourteen years agreed on a mutual abstinence; that is to say, from the time that Hagar became the concubine of Abraham. But let us suppose it to be so: we must infer from thence, that Sarah put an end to matrimonial comforts when she came to be seventy-five years of age. How then comes Pererius to draw from this one of his reasons, why the beauty of that lady was preserved to ninety years? Intemperantia Venere cito mulierem inveterat & vehementer deformat ac turpat (52). That is to say, the immoderate use of Venereal pleasures makes a woman soon grow old, and ugly. Be it so. I leave the discussion of it to Physicians; but does it follow from thence, that a total abstinence from that exercise has a quite contrary effect, upon women; I mean that it puts off old age, and preserves their beauty? No Logician will find any strength in such consequences, generally speaking, considering the great number of things, of which the two extremes are bad, and pernicious both for the body and soul. In particular, the consequence here in question, is strongly impugned by Physicians (53). But if we should be so complaisant, as to grant it to Pererius, what service would it do him in relation to Sarah, who, according to him, deprived her self of the matrimonial right, only at the age of seventy-five years.

[G] To try the faith of Abraham.] This seems at first sight to be very strange: for men can scarce conceive a greater temporal happiness, than the perpetual beauty of what they love. What vows or wishes are so favourable to new married persons, as to wish that they may never seem old one to another?

Diligat ipsa senem quondam, sed & illa marito
Tunc quoque cum fuerit non videatur anus (54).

May she love him, when he shall antient grow;
And when she's old, may he not think her so.

But if you consider it well, you will find that for a man who is to travel with a family, a beautiful woman is no small burthen. However, Abraham found it so, and may serve for an example. What fears was he not under of being killed, and what mortifying expedients was he not thereby obliged to have recourse to? Be it as it will, a famous Divine of Zurich spoke in this manner: 'Puto pulcritudinis Saræ causam non fuisse aliam quam supernaturale Dei donum & specialem ejusdem providentiam, qui eam in extrema senectute voluit fieri matrem Isaac, atque simul cotem fidei & patientiæ Abrahami, quæ in hac ob formam uxoris immixta tentatione non parum explorata fuit (55). . . . I think that Sarah's beauty was owing to nothing else but a supernatural gift, and an especial providence of GOD, who designed that she should be the mother of Isaac in her extreme old age, and at the same time a whet-stone to the faith and patience of Abraham, which were not a little tried by the temptation, which was exposed to on account of his wife's beauty.'
VOL. IV.

[H] Those who . . . exaggerated so much her decay.] St Chrysostom says, that the rod of Moses, which made water spring out of the rock, wrought a less difficult miracle, than was done when milk sprung out of Sarah's breasts. Non sic admirabile fuit quod ex petra in deserto scaturierint fontes aquarum quando illam virga Moyses percussit, sicut de vulva jam emortua parum nati, & lactis fontes scaturire (56). Here are the words of another Father: Portabat uterum gravem talis mater quæ inanis ambulare vix poterat (57) August. Marcidæ mammae quas in vacuos folles subditi succi detrimenta laxaverant, lactis fontis ubertate tenduntur (57).

[I] Calvin is wrongfully accused of having thrown out the grossest reproaches upon Sarah.] Let us begin with the words of the accuser. 'Non est prætereundum impie loqui Calvinum qui Saram quasi lenam & Abraham quasi adulterum ancillæ suæ carpit (58). . . . It is not fit I should pass over the impiety of Calvin, who reflects upon Sarah as being little better than a barrow; and reflects on Abraham as if he had committed adultery with his own maid.' These words, and several others that follow, are so like those of Cornelius à Lapide, that there is reason to think Merfennus transcribed them from him. His work was printed in 1623. And that of Cornelius à Lapide in 1616. Carpit hic Calvinus Saram quasi lenam, Abram quasi adulterum ancillæ suæ Agar (59).

This calumny against Calvin goes yet higher: I have, as much as I could, sought for the first author of it, but I dare not say, I have found him in the person of Feuudentius. What is certain is, that this Monk preceded the Minime (60), and the Jesuit (61) whom I have cited. His accusation was not well known to Leonard Coqueus, who certainly would have named Calvin, and cited the Theomachia Calvinistica, if he had known what is to be found there. He has done neither of them; his reproaches are indeterminate; they fall in general upon the Modern Heretics, de Civit. Dei. and he cites another work of Feuudentius. First he says that Pausanias, the Manichee, blamed the conduct of the Patriarch Abraham, as a thing that betrayed his incredulity, and ardent desire of having children (62), and

(49) Pererius in Genes. cap. xx, ver. 2. Torniellus & Cornelius à Lapide, are of the same opinion.

(50) Genesis, xviii. 12.

(51) St Luke i, 34. Zecharias, in ver. 18 of the same chapter, alleges a difficulty like that of Sarah.

(52) Perer. in Genes. cap. xx, Dissert. i.

(53) See Gaspar à Ries, Elysio jucund. Quest. Campo, XLVI. vivere be maintain, quod omnimoda coitus diffinitio magna damna parit præsertim in ætatis, in feminis frequentissime, in viris rarissime & cum minori noxa.

(54) Martial. lib. iii, Epigr. xiii.

(g) See Pererius in Genes. cap. xxi, Salian, pag. 473, 474.

(b) Homil. xlv. in Genes.

(i) Who say so apud Tofatum. See Salian, pag. 439.

(55) Heidegger, Hist. Patr. Tom. ii, pag. 148. Rivet had said the same before him, Oper. Tom. i, pag. 277, and Pererius in Genes. had said so before Rivetus.

(56) Chrysost. Homil. xlv.

(57) August. Serm. lxxviii, de Temp.

(58) Merfennus Observat. in Problemata Veneti, num. 119, pag. 165.

(59) Cornel. à Lapide in Genes. cap. xvi, ver. 2. pag. 170, Edit. 1623.

(60) Father Merfennus.

(61) Cornelius à Lapide.

(62) Crimen inurebat & quod habenda proliis infana flagrans cupiditate, & Deo, qui id jam sibi de Sara conjuge promiserat minime credens, cum pellice volutatus sit. Leonb. Coqueus, in August. lib. xvi, cap. xxv. He cites D. August. lib. xxii, contra Faust. in Genes. cap. xxi.

their maid-servant. 2. That St Augustin has not made a good apology for this conduct of Abraham [K].

and afterwards he adds: 'Refert etiam Feuardentius in appendice ad libros Alphonsi à Castro contra hereses lib. 1. verbo Abraham, quosdam hereticos modernos . . . non minus impios fuisse in sanctissimum Patriarcham Abrahamum, ut cui crimen adulterii impingant (63) . . . Feuardentius alio relatus in his appendix to the books of Alphonsus à Castro against Heresies lib. 1. at the word Abraham, that certain modern Heretics . . . did with no less impiety reflect upon the most holy Patriarch Abraham, whom they accused of adultery.' The particular accusations against Calvin are contained in the following quotation. 'Pissimam aviam Christi Saram multis vexat contumeliis, multis jactat injuriis: † Sarai rationem alienam à verbo Dei apud se querit. In ipso progressu non leviter peccavit, quod orbitatis impatiens, à verbo Dei discessit. Obreptit desperatio. Connubii legem pervertit, lectum conjugalem pollucendo. Nec culpa etiam vocat Abram, quod stulto ac præpostero uxoris consilio obsequutus est. Reprehensioe digna est Abrahamæ facilitas. Utriusque autem claudicat fides. Dei virtutem non debuit alligare ordini naturæ, vel restringere ad suum sensum. Et in sequentibus †. Admittit concubinam quæ instar pellicis futura erat. Ad eandem qua ipsa serviebat impatiens maritum sollicitat. Vacillat quidem Abrahamæ fides, cum à verbo Dei declinans, uxoris impulsu ad remedium prohibitum transferre se patitur. Memento uno tentationi succumbit. Deinde, dolosissimo schemate utens, id ipsum quod negare se de illa fingit, palam adfirmat †: Neque enim domui suæ voluit erigere lupanar, nec ancilla suæ productrix, vel mariti lena esse . . . O hominem in disputando vafum, veteratorem, & malitiosum! Ecquid enim aliud est Abrahamæ, uxorem prostituere, pudicitiam ejus nudare præsidio, pudicitiam proderet (quod Calvinus palam tribuit Abrahamæ) quam ei lenocinari? Aut quid, Conjugii legem pervertere, lectum conjugalem pollucere, pellicem viro querere & subministrare, alienam in thorum mariti inducere (quorum à Calvinio infimulatur Sara) quam domi suæ lupanar erigere, & mariti lenam esse, quod hic simulate Calvinus negat & damnat (64) . . . He throws out many gross reflexions and reproaches upon Sarah the pious progenitrix of Christ. Sarah seeks a contrivance of her own not warranted by the word of GOD. In the course of her proceedings she transgressed not a little, for not bearing the want of children with patience she swerved from the word of GOD. She gave way to despair. She perverted the laws of wedlock, by polluting the marriage-bed. Neither is Abraham blameless, since he complied with the foolish and preposterous counsel of his wife. The easiness of Abraham deserves to be censured. Both of them were deficient in their faith. They should not have tied down the power of GOD to the order of nature, nor have confined it to their own sense. Afterwards he says. She introduces a concubine who was to act the part of a harlot. She inspires her husband with the same impatience by which she herself was transported. Abraham's faith did stagger, when swerving from the word of GOD; he suffered himself to be prevailed upon by the instigation of his wife, to make use of the forbidden remedy. In a moment he yielded to the temptation. After this, carrying on his deceitful scheme he openly asserts what he pretends to deny concerning her. For neither would she convert her house into a brothel, nor do the office of a procuress in bringing her husband and maid together . . . O arch caviller and spiteful old fox! If Abraham prostituted his wife, and betrayed her chastity by leaving it exposed and defenceless (which Calvin plainly imputes to Abraham) what else did he do but . . . for her? Or what else was it but to pervert the laws of wedlock, to pollute the marriage-bed, to seek out and provide a harlot to her husband, and to lodge a stranger in his arms, of all which things Sarah is accused by Calvin, I say, what else was this but to convert her house into a brothel, and to be her husband's . . . which Calvin here artfully denies and 'blames?' We may observe two frauds in the proceeding of this Franciscan. He suppresses the expressions, wherein Calvin endeavours to extenuate the fault of Sarah and that of Abraham: this is the first foul play. He asserts impudently, that Calvin uses a shameful turn of sophistry, to accuse, in effect, under a false appearance of negation, this holy woman of having been a . . . to her husband. This is, the second fraud, and it is of such a heinous nature that it may be called a dreadful calumny. The free manner with which Calvin judges of the conduct of the husband and the wife, clearly shews that he sought no artful evasions: he speaks his thoughts with the greatest liberty; and makes use of all the right, that reason and Scripture give us of passing our judgment upon the quality of an action. It is therefore manifest, that he speaks sincerely, when he denies that Sarah acted as . . . &c. This appears further by the words which follow, and which Feuardentius has suppressed. 'Improprie tamen vocatur uxor, quæ præter Dei legem in alienum thorum inducitur. Quare sciamus hunc concubitus hic illicitum fuisse ut inter fornicationem & conjugium quasi medius fuerit. Idem omnibus commentis accidit quæ Dei verbo assequuntur. Quamlibet enim honesto tegantur prætextu corruptela subest, quæ à verbi puritate degenerat, eamque vitiat (65) . . . Nevertheless a woman that is introduced into another's bed, in a manner not warranted by the law of GOD, is improperly called a wife. Let us therefore conclude, that as this commerce was unlawful, so it was a kind of middle state between fornication and matrimony. The same thing happens in all those inventions which are patched to the word of GOD. For however they may be disguised under a plausible pretence, there is a corruption in them which degenerates from the word of GOD, and taints the purity of it.' This is the language of a plain and sincere Calvinist; one may therefore be well assured that this is the worst that Calvin designed to say. Now he says plainly, that the commerce of Abraham and Hagar was a kind of middle state between fornication and marriage. Feuardentius has suppressed this remarkable passage of Calvin's commentary: 'Benedictionis (quam sciebat divinitus promissam esse) potiundæ voto, conjugalem thorum sponte alteri cedit . . . sic laudabile fuit votum Sarai quoad finem vel scopum in quem tendebat, ut tamen in ipso progressu non leviter peccavit . . . Utriusque autem claudicavit fides, non in substantia quidem, sed in medio ipso (ut loquuntur) vel agendi ratione (66) . . . It was from her desire to obtain the blessing (which they knew GOD had promised) that she voluntarily resigned the conjugial bed to another . . . Thus the desire of Sarah, as to the end and scope to which it tended, was laudable, yet not so but that she sinned greatly in the way she took to compass it . . . But the sin of both was defective, not indeed in the substance, but in the medium (as they say) or manner of acting.'

Observe, that copiers are very apt to magnify things. Cornelius à Lapide and Marinus Mericennus say plainly and absolutely, that Calvin accuses Sarah of . . . and Abraham of adultery. Feuardentius was contented to say, that the accusation was proposed indirectly, and under a deceitful shew of a justification.

[K] St Augustin has not made a good apology for this conduct of Abraham.] He made use of four reasons. The first is, That Abraham was not induced to this act by any motive of sensual love, but in order to have children: Uxor est ea (concubina) quippe ad generandam prolem, non ad explendam libidinem (67). The second is, That he did it, not to injure his wife, but rather out of complaisance to her, and to give her the consolation which her state of barrenness made her wish for. The third is, That this conduct was grounded upon the right, which St Paul speaks of in the seventh chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians: Likewise the man has not power over his own body, but the woman. There is no fault here, either on the wife's, or on the husband's side; she gives her maid to her husband, in hopes of issue, and he takes the maid with the same view. Nulla est hic cupido lascivie, nulla nequitie turpitudine. Ab uxore causa proles ancilla marito traditur, à marito causa proles accipitur; ab utroque non culpa luxu sed nature fructus exquiritur (68). The fourth reason is, That Abraham sent away Hagar as soon as his wife desired it. I have cited elsewhere (69) the words of St Augustin on this subject: Leonard Coqueus, a commentator on that Father, makes no scruple to refute him. He alledges against the first reason this axiom of St Paul, It is not lawful to do evil

(63) Id. ibid.

† In cap. xvi. Gen. v. 1.

† Ver. 2.

† Ver. 3.

(64) Feuardentius, Theom. Calvinisticæ, lib. ix, cap. 1, pag. m. 426.

(65) Calvin. in Genes. cap. xvi. ver. 3. pag. m. 83, 84.

(66) Calvin. ibid. ver. i, pag. 83.

(67) August. de Civit. Dei, lib. xxv, cap. xxv.

(68) Id. ibid.

(69) In remark [C] of the article AGAR.

(70) Rom. iii. 8. that good may come (70); and the common doctrine of the Moralists, That to make an action good, it is requisite not only that the motive be good, but also that it be about a lawful matter. Ad hoc quod sit actio honesta, requiritur non modo bonus finis & reliquæ circumstantiæ, verum etiam quod sit circa debitam materiam (71). This furnishes him with the refutation of the second reason; for if the commerce of the Patriarch with his maid was bad in itself, it did not become lawful by Abraham's compliance with the desire of Sarah: the counsels or suggestions of a wife do not excuse a husband in regard to unlawful things; which appears clearly by the fall of the first man, who, in vain alledged, that the wife whom God had given him had persuaded him to eat the forbidden fruit. The third reason is no better than the rest; for a wife cannot convey to another woman the right of which St Paul speaks, any more than a husband can yield to another man the right of which the same Apostle speaks. Non potest uxor sui illud quod habet in corpore viri transferre in alteram mulierem, ut congressum viri sui cum alia muliere assensu suo possit facere licitum, ut nec vir potest transferre in alterum virum illud quod habet in uxorem (72). Leonard Coqueus says nothing on the fourth reason, because he did not look upon it as part of the apology: but the most stupid reader may easily perceive, that it serves only to shew that the Patriarch was not moved to it by any impurity. It is a very good thing readily and easily to quit an unlawful intercourse, but that does not prove that the enjoyment was lawful. This commentator supposes, that St Augustin did not alledge these reasons as proofs of the purity of the commerce of Abraham and Hagar, but only as proofs sufficient to refute the assertion of the Manichees, who affirmed that this Patriarch was desperately in love with Hagar, and lay with her only to satisfy his passion. He supposes also, that the same Father knew very well the true reason that cleared Abraham, which was, that there was a real marriage between Hagar and her master. He examines afterwards the three reasons of St Ambrose. The first is taken from this, That Abraham lived before the law of God had forbidden adultery. 'Abraham ante legem Moysi & ante Evangelium fuit, cum nondum interdictum adulterium videretur, poena criminis ex tempore legis est, quæ crimen inhibuit, nec ante legem ulla rei damnatio est' (73). - - - 'Abraham lived before the law of Moses, and before the Gospel, when adultery does not appear to be forbid: the punishment of a crime, takes place from the time that the law forbids it; nor is there any condemnation of a thing before the law is in being.' The second is the same with the first and second of St Augustin. The third is taken from hence, That the conjunction of Abraham and Hagar was one of the types of the Old Testament. The commentator observes (74), that Sixtus Senensis (75) found in the first reason of St Ambrose, two principles widely different from the common opinion of Divines. First, That the action of Abraham was adultery. Secondly, That adultery was at that time lawful, seeing the law had not forbid it. He maintains that Hagar was the lawful wife of Abraham, and that adultery was a crime even before it was forbid by any positive law. It was enough that it was contrary to the law of nature: Erat tamen, per se illicitum & prohibitum lege divina naturali (76). As to the third reason of St Ambrose, he refutes it by this aphorism, that the quality of a type does not infuse any morality into things, nor consequently take from them what is bad. 'Plerumque, says St Gregory (77), res quælibet per historiam virtus est, per significationem culpa, & aliquando res gesta in facto causa damnationis est, in scripto autem prophetia virtutis. - - - Frequently a thing is, as to the history, a virtue, but by signification, a fault; and sometimes the thing done, is, in fact, the cause of damnation, but in writing a prophecy of virtue.' St Augustin follows the same principle. 'In peccatis, faith be (78), magnorum virorum aliquando rerum futurarum figuram animadverti & indagari posse - - - In the sins of great men, sometimes we may observe and discover the figure of things to come.'

(71) Leonh. Coqueus, ubi supra, pag. m. 351.

(72) Id. ibid.

(73) Ambros. lib. i. de Abrah. cap. iv. apud Leonh. Coqueum, ibid.

(74) Leonh. Coqueus, ibid. pag. 352.

(75) Sixt. Senensis, Bibl. Sanctæ lib. v. Annot. xciiv. apud Coqueum, ibid.

(76) Idem, Coqueus, ibid.

(77) Gregor. lib. iii. Moral. cap. xvi. apud Coqueum, ibid.

(78) August. lib. iii. de Doctr. Christ. cap. xxiii. apud eund. ibid.

Let us observe here four things. In the first place, Coqueus makes St Augustin take an injudicious and insincere course. He knew, says he, the true proof of the innocence of Abraham, and suppressed it; he contented himself with clearing him as to the reproach of being in love with his servant-maid. But was this enough? Had not the Manichees scope enough to load him with reproaches, tho' they had granted that he was not in love with Hagar? It is therefore to reproaches of this kind that St Augustin ought to have answered, and he did certainly do it. He pretended, that supposing the circumstances, as he put them, a man was justifiable who lay with his wife's maid. But was there ever a looser morality than his? Would they not at this day run down the Bauni's, and the Escobar's, if they taught that provided a man thinks only of leaving successors behind him, his wife may prompt him to lie with her maid, and he may follow her counsel? Do not tell me that St Augustin considers only the age that Abraham lived in; for since he grounds his reasoning on the right which St Paul gives to a husband over his wife, and to a wife over her husband, he proposes, without doubt, to account for it at all times. We have seen, in another place (79) what he says of the action of Acindynus. My second remark is, That the doctrine of Calvin is much purer on this point, than that of the ancient Fathers. He condemns the conduct of Abraham and Sarah, plainly and directly. He seeks no excuse for them from the use of Polygamy already established among the nations. He says they had no right to oppose the law that ties married persons one to another. 'Nec valet excusatio quod concubinam uxoris loco esse voluerit, quia fixum illud manere debuerat, mulierem viro adjunctam esse, ut essent duo in carne una. Tam-men istam quæ duo inter se mutuo obligantur convul-

(79) See the remarks in the article ACINDYNUS (SERI-MIUS).

tere nunquam fuit hominum arbitrio' (80). - - - 'Nor is it any excuse that be defined the concubine to be in the place of a wife: for this ought to remain for certain, that the wife is joined to the husband, so that they two should be one flesh. Notwithstanding that polygamy had prevailed among many, yet that law by which the two are bound one to the other, was never to be dispensed with at any man's pleasure.' Nay, he observes, that this fall of Abraham ought to let us upon our guard against the ambushes of Satan, who attacks us, not only by persons that are manifestly criminal, but also by good people. 'Porro cum Sarai tam sancta mulier instar flabelli, ad eandem quæ ipsa servebat impatientiam maritum sollicitet: hinc dicamus quam sedulo nobis agenda sint excubiæ ne qua occulta fraude nos circumveniat. Neque enim improbos tantum & sceleratos subornat qui ex professo fidem nostram oppugnent: sed ut incautos opprimat, clam interdum ac furtim per bonos & simplices nos adoritur' (81). - - - 'Now as Sarah, so holy a woman, sollicit her husband to the same impatience wherewith she herself was transported, hence let us learn how diligently we are to be on our guard, lest by any secret fraud Satan circumvents us. For he does not only suborn wicked and reprobate men openly to oppose our faith; but that he may catch us unawares, he sometimes attack us secretly, and by stealth, by means of the good and simple.' In the third place, I observe that the liberty Calvin took of censuring severely this action of Sarah and Abraham, is of much greater use to Christian morality than the pains the Fathers have taken to justify Abraham and his wife. They have sacrificed the general interests of morality to the reputation of a private person: I could almost find in my heart to apply to all those, who are animated with that spirit, this fine saying of Cicero: Urbem philosophiæ proditi dum castella defenditis (82). - - - 'You betray the town of Philosophy while you defend the outworks. Lastly, I observe, that Josephus supposes a thing, of which the Scripture says not a word; that God commanded Sarah to put Hagar in her husband's bed. Σάρρα τὴν θεῶν κελεύσαντι ἐπικλίνει μίαν τῶν θεραπαινίδων. Sara Deo jubente in thalamum ejus adducit unam famulidarum (83). Here is truly the Deus ex machina, - - - God in the plot, of the tragic Poets, and the ancora sacra, - - sheet-anchor, of the proverb. Several commentators upon Genesis alledge the authority of this Historian, and observe that St Augustin has insinuated the same thing. Idem insinuat St Augustinus lib. 10. contra Faust. cap. 32 (84). There is no Gordian-knot but may be broke that way.

(80) Calvin. in Genes. xiii. 1.

(81) Id. ibid. ver. 2. See also what he says a little after.

(82) See the article FRANCIS I. remark [P].

(83) Joseph. lib. i. Antiq. cap. xi. pag. 19, C.

(84) Cornel. à Lapide, ubi supra. See also Mercianus, ubi supra.

polygamy

SARISBERI

(a) Or Sarisberienensis, or Sarisber-ienfis, &c.

SARISBERI (a) (JOHN OF) in Latin Sarisberienfis, an Englishman, Bishop of Chartres, was born about the year 1110. He went into France at the age of sixteen or seventeen. He afterwards had a commission from the king, his master, to reside near Pope Eugenius about the affairs of England. Some would have done him an ill office with that Pope, and falsely accused him; but at last the truth came to light, and he was continued near Eugenius, with all the favours he deserved. He was still more esteemed by the successor of that Pope, and being recalled into England, he received great marks of esteem from Thomas Becket who was then High-chancellor. This chancellor wholly governed his master, Henry II, and as he wanted assistance under so heavy a burthen . . . he made use of the counsel of Joannes Sarisberienfis, especially about the education of the king's eldest son, and of many young noble English lords, whom he had undertaken to educate in good manners and learning. He desired him also to take care of his house, whilst he was abroad in Guienne with the king, his master. Being returned from that voyage, he was made Archbishop of Canterbury, and left the court to reside in his diocese. Sarisberienfis accompanied him, and faithfully followed him, when this prelate was obliged to retire into France, and when about seven years after he was recalled into England. It is well known that he was murdered in his own archiepiscopal church. Sarisberienfis undertook to ward off a blow that one of the assassins aimed at the head of his master, but he received it on his arm: the wound was so great, that the Surgeons after they had attended him near a twelve month, despaired of his cure. It is pretended that he was cured by a miracle of Thomas Becket. He was made Bishop of Chartres at the earnest intreaty of the province some years after [A], and he lived in this Episcopal see with the same modesty, and the same virtue which he had always preached up and recommended in his writings. He died about the year 1180 (b). He composed, among other books, a treatise in Latin intituled Polycraticus [B]. He was one of the greatest wits of his age, and one of the most polite and most able men in good literature (c).

(b) Taken from the Life of Joannes Sarisberienfis, prefixed to the French translation of his book de Nugis Curialium.

(c) Du Pin. Bibl. Tom. ix, p. 167. Dutch. Edit.

[A] He was made Bishop of Chartres . . . some years after.] Here is again one of those writers of eulogies, who neglect the dates (1). He could not mark in a more uncertain manner the time of the promotion of Joannes Sarisberienfis to that bishopric, since he had not assigned the year of Thomas Becket's Death. Let us supply this defect, and say that this archbishop was killed about the end of the year 1170. This is certain, but it is not agreed in what year Joannes Sarisberienfis was made Bishop of Chartres. Vossius says it was in 1164 (2), but he is mistaken. Father Labbe, who reproves him for it, places the promotion of that bishop in 1172 (3), and adds, that he died in 1182, and was buried in the abbey of Notre Dame de Josphat. Father Oudin says the same (4). But Mr du Pin has not followed their chronology, except in the year of his death. Joannes Sarisberienfis, says he (5), was at last made Bishop of Chartres in 1179, and died three years after.

(1) See the remark [D] in the article RUF-FL.

(2) Vossius de Hist. Latins, pag. 421.

(3) Labbe, Differt. de Script. Eccles. Tom. 7, pag. 606.

(4) Oudin, in Supplem. de Script. Eccles. pag. 441.

(5) Du Pin, Bibl. des Auteurs Eccles. Tom. ix, pag. 167. Dutch. Edit.

(6) Labbe, ubi supra.

(7) Du Pin, ubi supra.

(8) Lipsius in Tacit. Ann. lib. xii.

[B] He composed, among other books, a treatise in Latin, intituled, Polycraticus.] This is a well known book, and there are several editions of it. It is intituled, Polycraticus, seu de Nugis Curialium, & vestigiis Philosophorum. Father Labbe tells us that the first edition is that of Paris 1513, and that Constantine Frandinus procured it (6). I make use of the Leyden edition, ex officina Plantiniana apud Franciscum Raphelengium 1595, in 8vo. Mr du Pin looks upon it as an excellent book, 'relating to the employments, the duties, the virtues, and vices of great men, and especially of princes and great lords, which contains a great many moral thoughts, sentences, fine passages of authors, examples, apologues, pieces of history, and common topics (7)'. Lipsius says, it is a patch work, that contains several pieces of purple, and fragments of a better age. In quo centone multos pannos purpure agnoscit & fragmenta ævi melioris (8). Janus Douza uses this author too severely; for he puts him in the class of compilers, who take on every hand, and are like Horace's crow. Omnium disertissimè, says he (9), quoting the testimonies of authors who have said, that a certain workman had found out the secret of making glass malleable, Joannes Sarisberienfis, quamvis ab exemplis supra dictis in partem nonnihil distans, libro de Nugis Curialium iv. cap. v. qui Polycraticus inscribitur, non quidem de suis, ne quid erres, sed verò de alieno (id quod Corniculæ isti cum factoribus illis semiprecis, Solino puta, Macrobio, Isidoro, atque aliis ejusdem farinae mangonibus commune) solens utique, præsertim de Satura Arbitri nostri. See what James Thomafius has answered to this censure of Douza (10). Note, That this work of Joannes Sarisberienfis has been translated into French, and printed at Paris in 4to, 1640, with the title, Les Vanitez de la Cour. The author of the translation only puts for his name D. M. at the bottom of his Epistle Dedicatory to the Marquis d'Asserac.

His other books are Metalogicus, seu Tractatus de Logica, Philosophia, &c. printed at Paris 1610, and at Leyden 1639, in 8vo. Vita atque passio Sancti Thomæ Cantuariensis Archiepiscopi & Martyris. A book of letters published at Paris 1611, in 4to. Ex Bibliotheca Pappii Massensis. Seven other historical letters inserted by du Chelne, in the fourth volume of his Collection of the Historians of France. There are many other letters of our author among those of Thomas Becket, collected by Father Lupus, and printed at Brussels in 1682, in two volumes in 4to. Balesus says, that this bishop composed a comment upon the Brunellus (11) of Vigelli; but a learned Critic (12) denies it for this reason, because that poem was dedicated to William de Long-Champ, whom Richard, King of England, made Bishop of Ely, in 1189, and who died in exile in 1197, fifteen years after the Bishop of Chartres, who is the subject of this article.

(9) Janus Douza Prædian. in Petronium, lib. iii,
cap. ix. pag. m.
594, 595.

(10) Thomaf.
de Plagio Literar.
pag. 240.

(11) It is the title of a Latin poem, which is also called Specu-lum futurorum.

(12) Reinesius, Epist. ad Daumanium, pag. 197.
He does not say Vigellus but Nigelius.

SARNANUS, or DE SARNANO (CONSTANTIUS) so called because he was a native of Sarno in the kingdom of Naples (a), lived in the XVIth century. He was a Monk of the order of St Francis, and was accounted a very subtle Philosopher and Divine. He taught Philosophy at Padua, and Divinity at Rome and Perugia (b). Pope Sixtus invited him from this last city to Rome where he honoured him with a cardinal's cap, and made him Bishop of Vercelli (c). We have several books written by this Monk [A]. He died at Rome in the year 1595, and was

(a) And not in Umbria as Quenstedt says, de Parr. Viror. il. lustr. pag. 346.

(b) Nomenclat. Cardinal. p. 170.

(c) Quenstedt, ubi supra.

[A] We have several books written by this Monk.] The epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca mislacks him Constantinus Sarmanus, and only mentions his book upon the Universalis printed at Venice in 8vo in the year

1576 (1). He composed besides that, a book De sanctis intentionibus juxta doctrinam Scotti: Summa Theologica: Directorium Theologicum: Conciliatio Aureoli & Capreoli: Conciliatio Thomæ Aquinatis & Scotti, &c. This

(1) Epit. Gel-sæ pag. 174.

was buried at Sarno in the church of St Francis which he had caused to be built in a magnificent manner (d). His family name was Buccafoco. You will find his article in Moreri under the word Bucafoci. (d) Nomenclat. Cardinal. p. 1711

(a) Apocalypse de Meliton, pag. 25. This book was printed in the year 1663. The author was called Mr Pitheois. He had been a Friar Minime, but afterwards turning Protestant, he was Professor of Philosophy at Sedan, where he died very old in the year 1676.

having said that the minister, who, in answer to the Franciscan Feu-ardent, author of a book intitled, Entremangeries Ministralles, --- The dissensions among the Ministers, had published, Les Entremangeries Monachales, --- The dissensions among the Monks; had taken great advantage of the continual disputes of the Jacobins and Franciscans.

SAVONAROLA (MICHAEL, or JOHN MICHAEL) a native of Padoua practised Physic with so much reputation that Nicholas D'Este sent for him to Ferrara (a), and took him into his service, giving him a very considerable salary (b). Leonel the son of Nicholas, and Borfa (c) brother to Leonel continued him in his employment (d). He obtained the freedom of the place, acquired an exceeding great character, and made a good deal of profit by his business (e). He was a man of piety, and took no fee from the poor (f). He died at Ferrara knight of the order of St John of Jerusalem in the year 1431. The books he wrote were well received by the public (g), and have been printed in divers places (h). They treat of Physic. He left two sons, the younger of whom was father to the famous Dominican (i) who is the subject of the following article.

(a) Joh. Franc. Picus, in Vita Hieron. Savonarolæ, pag. m. 108.

(b) Ghilini Teatro, Part. ii, pag. 197.

(c) He was the first that had the title of Duke of Ferrara and Modena. Jo. Fr. Picus, ubi supra.

(d) Ghilini, ubi supra. (e) Id. ibid. (f) Jo. Fr. Picus, ubi supra. (g) Ghilini, ubi supra. (h) See Lindenius renovatus, pag. 643. (i) Jo. Fr. Picus, ubi supra.

SAVONAROLA (JEROM) grandson to the foregoing was born at Ferrara on the twenty-first of September 1452, and, without the knowledge of his parents, took the habit of a Dominican Fryar at Bologna in the year 1474. His superiors employed him to teach Physics and Metaphysics; but after having followed that business for several years, he took a disgust at these vain subtleties, and applied himself wholly to the reading of pious books, particularly of the holy Scripture. He was employed to preach and confess, and did both with great assiduity, till such time as he quitted the latter, that he might have the more leisure for the former (a). He was sent for in the year 1492, to prepare Laurence de Medicis for death (b). It is certain, 1, that he distinguished himself in an extraordinary manner by the austerity of his life, and by the fervent eloquence with which he preached against immorality [A], without sparing the disorders of the clergy, nor even the court of Rome; 2, that he pretended to partake in divine revelations; 3, that by all these means he acquired a great authority in Florence and the veneration of the whole city [B]; 4, that he lost his credit, was excommunicated, degraded from his Ecclesiastical orders, hanged and burnt, in the year

(a) Taken from his Life, written by John Francis Picus, Count of Mirandola, in Collectio one Batifiana, pag. 108, & seq.

(b) Politianus, Epist. IV. ltr. ii, fol. m. 92. voss. See likewise John Francis Picus, in Vita Savonarolæ, pag. 115.

[A] He distinguished himself by the austerity of his life, and by the fervent eloquence with which he preached against immorality. To the end I may not cite partial evidences, I shall quote the words of Paul Jovius, who has observed a pretty exact neutrality. Hieronymus Savonarola, says he (i), . . . utque adeo austeritate vitæ disciplina, ac erudito subtilique ingenio & in sacris concionibus admirabili facundia valuit, ut &c. Savonarola distinguished himself in such a manner by the austerity of his life, his learning, his subtle genius, and his admirable eloquence in preaching, that &c. He expresses himself still more strongly in another book. Tanta rerum atque animorum commutatio, . . . Florentiæ consecuta est, ut Hieronymus, qui modo singulari sanctimonia, virtutisque nomine animis civium imperitaret & in numerum divorum ut vivens referretur, publico consensu meruerat, concursu populi, senatusque decreto damnatus sit, & in area curiæ fœdissimo supplicio concrematus. . . . Atque ita qui ab excellenti doctrina ac vitæ continentia, & honestate, facundiaque incredibili in admiratione hominum aliquandiu fuerat, omnibus contumeliis & cruciatibus affectus, miserabile, & fortasse indignum tanta virtute, incerto levique populo spectaculum præbuit (2). . . . There followed such a change of affairs and sentiments, . . . at Florence, that Savonarola, who, a little before, had obtained a great power over the citizens by his singular sanctity, and the reputation of his virtue, and had, in the opinion of all, deserved to be canonized alive, was now condemned by a decree of the senate, and with the approbation of the people, and was ignominiously burnt in the yard of the court. . . . Thus he who for some time had been universally admired on account of his excellent doctrine, temperate life, and incredible eloquence; was forced to undergo all manner of indignities and torments, and afforded a miserable spectacle, and perhaps, unworthy of so much virtue, to a fickle and inconstant populace. If you have a mind to see what has been said touching the great success of his sermons, you need only consult the appendix to Dr Cave's book (3). It is pretended, that the Florentines were converted by his preaching, much more than the Ninevites were by that of Jonas; for the city of Florence was reformed, not for a day, but for a long time, and cast all the instruments of luxury into the fire. Quæ de Hieronymi Savonarolæ eloquentia Christiana narratur, mira essent & incredibilia, nisi fidem facerent ejus scripta, quæ incredibilem spirant pietatem & ardorem; & facile persuadent quod ferunt, efficacia verbi Civitatem Florentinam, deliciis abundantiam opum diffuentem, fere totam non solum ad meliorem frugem ac modestiam Christianam revocasse, sed & ad planctus Ninive vitam civium convertisse, unde illis nomen gementium adhæsit, omniaque lux instrumenta, appensa Pyramidi flammis absumperunt. Neque ad tempus & boram putes id genus vitæ arripuisse, aut servasse, superstitie Savonarola; non minus diuturna & perennis fuit quam mira & repentina conversio (4). I give you notice that it is from one of Savonarola's brethren, and an apologist for the Dominicans, that I borrow these words.

(3) Wharton, in Appendix ad Historiam Literariam Guil. Cave, pag. 162, 163. He quotes John Francis Picus, in Vita Savonarolæ. See also Spizelius in Infelice Literato, p. 642.

(4) Vincentius Baronius Apolog. Ordini. Prædicat. Tom. ii, pag. 220, 221.

[B] He acquired a great authority in Florence, and the veneration of the whole city. They considered him as a prophet sent by God for the reformation of manners, and did not think that any thing ought to be undertaken without his advice, neither in the senate, nor in the houses of private persons. Thus Jovius speaks of him. Hieronymus Savonarola . . . literis admirabilis præsertim eloquentia insignis, qui in sacris concionibus, & in privatis colloquiis ita multitudinis animos opinione virtutis ceperat, ut illum rerum omnium, quæ immincebant, verum vatem, divinumque depravatis moribus censorum

(1) Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. xlii, pag. m. 99.

(2) Idem, in Vita Leonis X. pag. m. 52.

fickle
mob

VOL. V.

P

who strive to justify the revelations of Savonarola, but as he mentions a prophecy which

(28) Comines.
ibid. p. 499.

continues he (28), 'was because he had always preached very much in the king's favour, and his words had kept the Florentines from turning against us: for never had a preacher so great an influence over a city: he had constantly foretold the king's coming, (notwithstanding all that was said or written to the contrary) affirming, that he was sent by God to drive the tyrants out of Italy, and that nothing could resist nor withstand him: he had likewise said that he would come to Pisa, and that he would enter the city, and that on the same day the Florentine state would come to an end: and so it happened; for that very day was Peter de Medicis expelled: and many other things had he foretold in his sermons before they came to pass, as the death of Laurence de Medicis: and he likewise said publicly that it was revealed to him. He had preached, that the state of the Church should be reformed by the sword. This is not yet accomplished, but it is very near the point: and he still maintains that it shall be.' Several persons blamed him for pretending to divine revelations, others believed him. For my part I think him a good man: and I asked him, whether the king could proceed in his journey without any danger to his person, considering the great preparations of the Venetians against him, of which he was able to give a better account than I could, who was just come from Venice. He answered, that the king would meet with some difficulties by the way, but he would overcome them all, and gain immortal honour by it, though he had not above a hundred men in his company; and that God, who had conducted him hither, would guard him in his return; but because he had not applied himself as he ought, to the reformation of the Church, and because he had suffered his soldiers to plunder and rob the people, as well those of his own party, and such as had opened their gates freely to him, as his enemies, that God had pronounced judgment against him; and that he should shortly feel a lash of the whip. However, he bid me tell him that if he would have compassion on the people, keep his army from doing mischief, and punish them when they did it, as his duty required, God would revoke or mitigate his sentence; and that it was not sufficient for him to plead, I myself do no harm. He added, that he would go himself to meet the king, and would tell him these words, and so he did, and spoke of the restitution of the Florentine places. When he mentioned that sentence of God, the death of the dauphin came very fresh into my mind; for I knew nothing else that the king could lay so much to heart: and this I likewise say, to the end it may the better be understood, how the whole of this expedition was a mystery conducted by God himself. It is thus that he speaks in the second chapter of the eighth book. Let us see what he says in the nineteenth chapter, where he relates the tragical end of this Dominican. Friar Jerom, who foretold many things before they came to pass, . . . had always maintained, that the king would pass the Alps, and he preached it publicly, saying, that God had revealed to him as well that, as other things which he spoke of. He said that the king was chosen by God to reform the Church by force, and to punish the tyrants; and because he gave out that he knew things by revelation, several people murmured against him, and he drew upon himself the hatred of the Pope, and of several in the city of Florence. His life was exceedingly virtuous, as it plainly appeared, and his sermons were levelled against vice, by which means he brought many of his fellow-citizens to live well, as I have said. . . . He has all along affirmed publicly in his sermons, that the king would return once more into Italy, to fulfil that commission which God had given him, to reform the Church by the sword, and to drive the tyrants out of Italy, and that in case he did not do it, God would punish him severely. He printed all his first sermons with those which he preached lately, and they are now to be sold. As for that severe punishment with which, as he said, God threatened the king, if he did not come back; Savonarola frequently wrote to him concerning it, not long before his death; and to the same purpose were the words which he said to me, when I talked with him at the time of our return from Italy: for he told me that sentence was given out in heaven against the king, in case he did not execute the will of God, and if he did not keep his men from plundering (29). He says (30), that the crimes laid in Savonarola's charge, were only that he forced discord in the city, and that as to what he pretended to speak by prophecy, he had private information of it from his friends that were of the council. I will neither accuse nor excuse them, continues he; I do not know whether they did well or ill in putting him to death: but he said many true things which the Florentines could not possibly have told him: and as touching the king, and the evils that were to befall him according to Savonarola's prediction, you see what has happened to him; first his son's death, and then his own. I have seen some letters which he wrote to that prince. Note he observes (31), that there were some Florentines who still expected the king's return, and wished for it, on account of the hopes which Savonarola gave them, and that they wasted and exceedingly impoverished themselves by reason of the expense they were at, from an earnest desire to recover Pisa, and the other places which they had delivered to the king: among which, Pisa was then in the hands of the Venetians.

I. This may induce us to believe that Savonarola foretold the return of Charles VIII, in a precise and absolute manner; for if he had only foretold it as a thing probable, and grounded himself on this, viz. that God required and threatened to punish the king if it was not executed, he would not have inspired the Florentines with so much confidence. It is then very likely, that he promised to them absolutely as a certain fact, the second expedition of Charles VIII; but that in addressing himself to that prince, he did not hold the same language, but only gave him to understand, that it was the will of God he should return into Italy, and, in case of failure, denounced against him the indignation and the severe judgments of his Creator. He found no better way than this to verify the prophecies which he gave out at Florence. Philip de Comines, who was better acquainted with affairs of state, than with the intrigues of prediction-makers, did not distinguish these two springs, or this duplicity of language: he confounded the one with the other, and supposes that the Monk added an if in his sermons, as he did in his letters (32); which is contrary to all likelihood. It is proper to observe, that if this prophet had been very sure in the matter, he would not have denounced these terrible judgments of God to Charles VIII; for in so doing, he believed it possible for that monarch not to make the second expedition. How then durst he foretell it, and say that God had revealed it to him? When God reveals that such a thing will happen, is it in the power of man to hinder it from coming to pass? Can they chuse any measures that will prevent it? Is it necessary to threaten them with some misfortune, in case they should make it miscarry? Let us conclude, that the threatnings used with Charles VIII, and the certainty of the revelation touching his return into Italy, are things which can never be reconciled in any wise head. If you should answer, that these threatnings were to serve as the means to bring about the event, and that therefore they were no sign of Savonarola's uncertainty, I will deny the fact; for Charles VIII did not return into Italy, and consequently the threatnings of that Monk were not one of the means which God had fore-ordained to that end. Turn yourself which way you will, you can never disprove his being a false prophet in this point. He puts me in mind of the Drabicius's and Knotterus's of our days, people that began by wishing earnestly for the ruin of the emperor, and who proceeded by foretelling it, afterwards by looking every where round for a prince able to procure it; and last of all, by signifying to that prince that he was predestinated to that great work, and that if he did not set about it, God would punish him severely (33). There is sometimes more malice than enthusiasm in this proceeding, a war is only aimed at; for as a man very well skilled in these artifices said, it is certain that prophecies, whether supposed or true, have often inspired the persons for whom they were made, with the design of undertaking the things that were promised to them (34).

II. I

* That might relate to the future taking of Rome, and the ransom of Pope Clement VII, in the year 1527. This marginal note which I find in my edition, is not made by Philip de Comines, and I do not understand why he expresses himself in the present tense, and he still maintains it, since he wrote his Memoirs, after Savonarola's death.

from church by force

Va. Sale

REFLECTIONS upon this narrative of Philip de Comines.

(32) For example the king will return, or if he does not return, God will punish him.

prophecy

(33) See the remark [H] of the article KOTTERUS. See also the remark [C], of the same article near the end.

(34) See the remark [H] of the article KOTTERUS. See also the remark [C], of the same article near the end.

which proved false, I mean that which affirmed that Charles VIII would come a second time into Italy, he serves as a witness to those who censure the said prophet. This will appear from a passage that I quoted out of Gabriel Naudé [E], one of the authors who blame the conduct of our Monk. He does not do it with so much harshness as Volaterranus who has roundly affirmed that Savonarola was an arrant cheat, and that riling

II. I shall make another reflection upon the narrative of Philip de Comines. This author is too ready to help Savonarola out with the accomplishment of his predictions. He verifies the threatnings of that monk in the death of the Dauphin, and in that of Charles VIII. They were loose threatnings, and did not much expose him; for that prince might meet with vexations from a hundred quarters, and more easily than persons of a private condition; so that one risked nothing at all in threatening him with some misfortune. A prophet has nothing to fear when he keeps to such generalities. He may even save himself by a backdoor, in case the princes whom he threatens should fall into no affliction: he may say, that such long prosperity is a judgment from God, that it hinders them from minding their salvation, as they would have done in adversity. Comines is too charitable and good-natured; he might have very well excused himself from making the applications. This fault has produced others; there are writers who have very falsely alleged his authority, for saying that Savonarola prophesied, that the King of France would not long survive the Dauphin. Neque inficias tamen ire Comineus potuit, Savonarolam multa verè prædixisse, de quibus nemo mortalium potuisset admonere, Nam & Regi, inquit, fore prædixit, ut extincto filio ipse quoque non diu superesset (35).

(35) Spizelius, in Infel. Literato, pag. 666. He quotes p. 636. a passage of John Francis Picus contra capitulum 11, Samuelis Calfinensis vultus that error is to be found.

(36) Comineus, ex Verhione Latina Sleidan Edit. Amst. 1656, in 12mo. As I have not this translation at present by me, I quote it upon the authority of Mr Crenius, Pref. ad Christop. Helvici Elenchum Judicium, &c. Edit. Lugd. Batav. 1702.

(37) It is scut in the editions of Sleidan, but the whole series of the discourse shews that we ought to read scut, or scut.

(38) See Guicciardin and Jovius at the beginning of their Histories.

Sleidan is perhaps the cause of the error which I have just taken notice of; for thus he has translated the end of the passage of Philip de Comines: Nam & Regi prædixit, fore, ut extincto filio, ipse quoque non diu superesset, atque bas illius ad regem literas, ipse legi (36). Nothing could be more unfair than this translation; it does not at all answer to these words of the original: 'Et touchant le Roy, & les maux qu'il dit luy devoir advenir, luy est advenu ce que vous voyez, qui seut (37) premier la mort de sons fils, puis la sienne, & ay veu des lettres qu'il escrivoit audit Signeur.' The translation has so confounded things, that it directly and formally ascribes to the prophet what is no more than a pure comment of the historian. Besides, it affirms, that the historian had seen the letters which contained that pretended prediction; but Comines only says, that he had seen some letters from Savonarola to the king. To make a faithful translation, it should have been expressed thus: Et quidem quoad Regem mala ipsi contigerunt quæ is eventura dixerat, quod ipsimet cernitis, nempe primo obitus filii, ac deinde ipsius Regis. Nonnullas vidi epistolas supradicto Principi ab eo scriptas. This simplicity without elegance is much better than a fine Latin style which corrupts the sense of the original.

III. Here follows a third reflexion. The event has proved, that Charles VIII was not chosen by God to reform the Church by the sword, and to drive the tyrants out of Italy. He no ways reformed the Church: Historians (38) mark his expedition as one of the æra's of the greatest calamities of Italy; and it is certain that no advantage accrued from it to that part of the world. What else can we conclude from this, but that the Monk was deceived in his pretended revelations. He did not see farther than another into the decrees of God; but he had the confidence to boast that he knew them. Let it not be alleged that if Charles VIII had reformed the Church by his sword, and caused his soldiers to observe an exact discipline, Savonarola's predictions would have had their full accomplishment. These are idle evasions. When God predestinates to the end, he likewise predestinates to the means: so that if the means of reformatory to the Church her primitive form, and to Italy her liberty, had depended on the sword of Charles VIII, and on the good discipline of his troops, that prince would have been predestinated to these means, and if so, he would have put them in execution, for nothing can hinder the decrees of God. It is then false that providence had pitched upon him for this work; and consequently Savonarola, who affirmed it, ought to be looked upon as a false prophet in that respect.

I shall not repeat what has been said elsewhere (39) in answer to the evasions and subterfuges of those who, after not succeeding in their predictions, lay the fault on the sins of men. If these sins were to hinder the event, there was no decree in heaven concerning the existence of that thing: for which reason, every man who foretold that it would come to pass was mistaken; and if he had been truly inspired, he would have known the real obstacles that would happen, and not the pretended existence of what was not to happen.

I do not know what authority Varillas had for saying that when there was a dearth at Florence, it did no service to Savonarola that he had foretold it, that on the contrary, the Florentines were so much the more offended at his not having applied a proper remedy (40). They would not have been altogether in the wrong: for he governed the whole city; and if he was obliged as a prophet to foretell the barrenness of the earth; as director of the affairs of state he was obliged to provide supplies of corn: otherwise, his prediction was to no purpose.

I must not omit that his conversation with Philip de Comines has been ill related by Varillas, who has not only tacked to it extravagant additions and enlargements, but likewise an intolerable falsity, viz. that Savonarola affirmed that Charles VIII would not return into Italy (41).

[E] Philip de Comines serves as a witness to those who censure Savonarola. This will appear from a passage of . . . Gabriel Naudé. Since all the praises which have hitherto been bestowed upon that person, are to be ascribed either to the affection of his friends and followers, or to the artifice and subtlety of heretics, who would gladly make him more zealous than St Paul, more learned than St Augustine, and more eloquent than St Chrysostom, because they appropriate him to themselves; I reckon that in order to judge of him with more reason and equity, we may in the first place say of the predictions which brought him into such vogue and esteem, that so far were they from being occasioned by a divine enthusiasm, like those of the prophets, and of many other saints and favourites of God, that on the contrary, they have been almost every one false; as appears in his having affirmed that Charles VIII would come a second time into Italy, that the person who should grasp at the dominion of Florence would come to a miserable end, that John Picus would recover of the illness of which he died two days after, and in many more of his prophecies, still more vain, which are amply deduced and told in the book that John Poggius wrote upon the falsity of them: and that if any of them proved true, it must be owned, that this happened either by chance, or because he had private information given him of what was to be done by a great number of friends that he had in the council of the Florentines, and in that of the King of France. Lastly, As to what concerns the rest of his actions, we may truly judge by these, that he was a very great politician, dignified sometimes with the most honourable employments, and endowed with such a ready and persuasive eloquence, that he may justly be compared to those ancient orators, who had no less dominion and influence upon popular and democratical states, than the winds have upon the sea, keeping them at pleasure in the calm of peace, or in the storms of war, making them roll sometimes one way and sometimes another, turning them upside down, and, in short, managing them at pleasure, and to the tune of their discourses. Savonarola may boast of having done this for above the space of ten years at Florence, although he likewise made use of his revelations, and of his counterfeit and dissembled piety, to keep up his credit and reputation so long, knowing from the examples of Arius and Mahomet, that the respect of religion has an extreme influence upon our minds; and that when once a man has got the fame of living holily, he makes the people believe what he pleases, especially if he be endowed with a

(39) See remark [E] of the article St BER-NARD.

(40) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, p. 214.

(41) Varillas, Hist. de Charles VIII, book 10, pag. 345, 346. Dutch Edition.

+ Comines, lib. viii, cap. xix.

rising up in rebellion against the Church he endeavoured to found a new sect (c). What he adds, that Savonarola, when he went to church in order to preach, got armed men to accompany him (d), is no small proof of a factious spirit. It cannot be denied that he concerned himself too much with political affairs [F]. This is always blameable in persons who have dedicated themselves to the ministry of the word of God; but they are chiefly to be condemned when they meddle with the government, in a state which is divided into factions. Now this was precisely Savonarola's case. There were two factions in the republic of Florence: the one endeavoured to support the house of Medicis, or at least the Aristocracy; the other wanted to extirpate that house, and to set up a popular government. In these divisions he made himself the head of a party, and the soul or primum mobile of the Democratical faction (e); so that he may be well compared

(c) Volterrano, ubi infra.

(d) Non religiosus sed Militum gladius atque lictoribus stipatus ad templum divinumque verbum predicandum accedebat. Volterrano, lib. vi, pag. m. 181.

(e) See remark [G].

(42) Naudé, Apologie des grands Hommes accusés de Magie, chap. xvi, pag. m. 455, & seq.

(43) Id. ibid. pag. 460.

(44) That which I have observed in the remark [C], viz. that Charles VIII was determined to procure the reformation of the Church, and the deliverance of Italy.

(45) Excerpta ex Diario Johannis Burchardi, pag. 55. Edit. Hannoveranae 1696. See also pag. 46, and the Preuves & Observations sur les Mémoires de Comines, pag. 335, the Hague Edition 1683.

graceful delivery, and an uncommon eloquence (42). Naudé concludes, that it was easy for Savonarola to bear rule at Florence, quando, as Jovius, in speaking of him, has very well observed; 'Nihil validius esset ad persuadendum, specie ipsa pietatis, in qua etiam tuenda libertatis studium emineret' (43). - - - Since there it not a more powerful instrument of persuasion than a show of piety, in which also a great zeal for the support of liberty is conspicuous.

We shall see below some other strokes of his censure. Take notice, if you please, that he might have found in Philip de Comines another proof of Savonarola's illusions (44), and do not forget what he observes touching the information which that prophet could receive from the court of France, and the council of the Florentines. 'This was no bad method of foretelling. It has been said, that there were confessors who revealed to him the secrets of their penitents, and that he owned it in prison. Another good way of making it to be thought that he had revelations from above. Frater Hieronymus carceribus mancipatus postquam septies questionibus & tormentis expositus fuit, supplicavit pro misericordia, offerens dicturum & scripturum omnia quibus deliquisset. Dimissus est de tortura & ad carceres repositus, & assignata sibi carta & atramento scriptis crimina & delicta sua in foliis, ut afferbant, LXXX & ultra, scilicet quod non habuit unquam aliquam revelationem divinam, sed habuit intelligentiam cum pluribus ex Fratribus in civitate Florentia & extra eam per multa millia residentibus qui ei Confessiones Christi fidelium revelarent cum contentum nominibus & cognominibus, ex quibus sibi plura dicebantur, & contentes ipsos pro hujusmodi peccatis & criminibus privatim, aliquando in genere publice corripiebat, assersens sibi a Salvatore nostro Domino Jesu Christo esse revelata (45). Savonarola being committed to prison, after he was seven times put to the rack, begged for mercy, promising that he would make a full discovery of all his crimes in writing. He was released from the torture, and remanded back to prison, and having paper and ink given him, he wrote down his crimes and offences in eighty leaves and upwards, as it is affirmed, viz. confessing that he never had any divine revelation, but that he held a correspondence with several Friars residing in the city of Florence, and many miles out of it, who revealed to him the confessions of their penitents, together with their names and surnames, which gave him still farther information; and that he sometimes publicly reproved in general those who had confessed the like crimes in private, affirming that they had been revealed to him by our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.' This is what we meet with in the journal of a master of the ceremonies under Pope Alexander VI. I have not the book where John Poggius gives the particulars of Savonarola's prophetic lies; but the following passage specifies some of them. A person named John Poggius wrote a treatise which was printed at Rome, containing thirteen chapters, in all which, addressing his speech to Savonarola himself, after having proved his predictions to be false, particularly, for that having sent his cap to Charles Strozza, when he was upon his death-bed, and foretold that he should be instantly and thoroughly cured by putting it on, the said Strozza had no sooner touched it, but he gave up the ghost; and in the like manner, having sent it to a Goldsmith called Cosmo, and to several other sick persons for the same purpose, viz. of a cure, foretold and promised, they all of them died in a very small time: and likewise for that he had publicly affirmed that John Picus of Mirandula, would recover of the illness of which he died two days after that prediction. I say, the said

John Poggius after having confuted the reasons of Savonarola, and exhorted him to return under the obedience of the Pope, proves him to be an infidel, an infamous apostate, a seditious man, a disturber of the public peace and happiness, a schismatic, a rebel to the supreme bishop, and therefore justly excommunicated (46). Read also this other passage: Quam ille multa de Ecclesie reformatione, de Turcarum & Maurorum conversione, de Florentinorum felicitate, quae max adimplenda & asstantium multi erant visuri antequam moreretur, praedixit? addens (in revelationum compendio) illas absolutas & immutabiles Prophecias esse? Attamen nihil horum ferè adhibere contigit, pleraque omnia intra tantum ferme annos contraria contigerunt (47). Martin del Rio reproaches him in these words, with having foretold absolutely, and without condition, three or four things as immutable and near events, the reverse of which had happened before the revolution of a century. He had foretold the conversion of the Moors and Turks, and the felicity of Florence, that is to say according to the principles of Democracy. But so far were the Florentines from recovering that government, that they fell under a monarchical one. He seemed to be so firmly persuaded of the certainty of his predictions, and had so rivetted that persuasion in the Monks of his convent, that he and they consented to verify by the test of fire (48), the following positions; I. The Church of God wants reformation: II. It shall be scourged; and III. It shall be renewed: IV. Florence shall be so too after having been scourged: V. There shall be hopes after that, and the infidels shall be converted to Jesus Christ: VI. All these things shall happen in our days: VII. The excommunication of Friar Jerom is void, those who pay no regard to it do not sin (48*). He affirmed, that he had such a distinct view of futurity, and was so thoroughly satisfied with the evidence of that object, that it would have been as difficult for him not to give his assent thereto, as to deny the first principles (49). It is in this strain that a person must speak, who desires that what he preaches up in a prophetic manner should make a deep impression upon peoples minds; but the return from this voyage is somewhat dangerous.

[F] It cannot be denied that he concerned himself too much with political affairs. He began by little and little to shew some marks of his secret ambition, when so soon as in the year 1484, as he himself says in the book he wrote on his prophecies, he mixed with Politicians, and procured himself to be called to the council, which at that time was held at Florence for establishing a popular government, where he excited all the citizens to embrace it with one consent; and proposed to them four or five points of great consequence, in order to support themselves in it, saying, that these were revealed to him by GOD Almighty, and that they ought punctually to observe them, if they were desirous of making their state the most flourishing in all Italy. Whereupon, tho' affairs had not taken the turn that he expected, he nevertheless did not fail to improve, day after day, his credit with the people, teaching in the sermons he preached in the year 1489 on St John's revelation, that the Church was threatened with a speedy reformation, after that of Francis Picus, in the petty kings and tyrants of Italy, who were shortly to feel the avenging scourge of all their iniquities. He proved this in such a manner by passages of the holy scripture, and by maintaining the certainty of his revelations, that after the expedition of Charles VIII into Italy, which he had foretold and proclaimed two years before, every body so confidently expected that he would return again, as Savonarola affirmed, that they did not lose hopes of it till the year 1498, in which King Charles, and

(46) Du Vésillet Vauvrière, Prosopographie, Tome iii, pag. 2333, 2334.

(47) Martin. Del Rio, Disquis. Magicar. lib. ix, cap. i. Quest. III, §. vi, pag. m. 197.

(48) See the remark [G].

(48*) Excerpta ex Diario Burchardi, pag. 46. Preuves sur Comines, pag. 331, but instead of fideles, we must read infidèles.

(49) Adeo clarescunt futura, sique praebent assensum; ut neque facile sint negaturi prima, & receptissima notissimaque Sententia, quod de Savonarola ille dicebat. (in Compendio Reveli) de de quodam suo familiari, quem non nominat, Picus affirmat, quem ego Hieronymum hunc fuisse opinor. Mart. Del Rio, Disquis. Magicar. lib. ix, cap. i. Quest. I, pag. 199. See John Picus, in the petty kings and tyrants of Italy, who were shortly to feel the avenging scourge of all their iniquities. He proved this in such a manner by passages of the holy scripture, and by maintaining the certainty of his revelations, that after the expedition of Charles VIII into Italy, which he had foretold and proclaimed two years before, every body so confidently expected that he would return again, as Savonarola affirmed, that they did not lose hopes of it till the year 1498, in which King Charles, and compared to the tribunes of the people, who favoured Marius against Sylla in the Roman republic, or rather to the Athenian Demagogues, who so frequently became the directors of the state. Can a Fryar, a minister of the altar, in a word, a clergyman, embark in this stormy sea? Is it not a kind of engagement to sin? Will not such a man be almost necessarily obliged to support himself by foul intrigues, and by plots that generally end in popular tumults (f), in plunderings, in massacres, in proscriptions, and in sentences of death hastily passed, and no less hastily executed, by the faction which hath prevailed. Savonarola's party redressed themselves odiously by such an execution upon several considerable persons (g), and he thereby sowed the seeds of his own ruin. He did no less contribute to it by his contempt for the thunders of the Vatican, and his declamations against the Pope; but what completed his destruction was, that having agreed that his doctrines should be verified by the trial of fire, he visibly fluffed, and his heart failed him, when the time came for executing his engagement [G]. By

(f) In Republics seditions are commonly the Sacra Anchora, the last resource, or the last reason of one of the parties. They are the same that great gusts are in kingdoms, Ratio ultima Regum. -- The last argument of kings. They are Deus in Machina, the God that unravels the incidents of the plot, and who decides the cause.

(g) See Paul Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, pag. m. 51.

(50) Naudé, ubi supra, pag. 447, & seq.

and he that had favoured him so much in his sermons, were translated from this life into another (50). . . . He had incurred the hatred not only of Pope Alexander VI, and of the greatest part of the clergy, against whom he used to declaim in the pulpit; but likewise of all the principal citizens of Florence, by the execution which he advised to be made of seven or eight of the chief noblemen amongst them: so that having no friends left but the partisans of Paul Antony Soderini, who made use of him to support the popular government, in opposition to Guy Antony Vespucci, who wanted to establish an Aristocratical form, they were not able to resist those of the contrary party, who, during this commotion, broke open the gates of his convent, and dragged him to punishment. This they did in order that their city might have rest and quiet, by the death of that man who kept them at variance with the Pope, on account of his new doctrine, and nourished factions and divisions amongst them, which, if they had been suffered to go any further, could not have failed to end in the ruin of their state and authority (51).

(51) Id. ibid. pag. 449, & seq.

Had he meddled with the government, with no other view but to maintain concord, and had succeeded in his design, he could hardly be excused; for as laymen have no business with things appertaining to the altar, so Monks have as little to do with political affairs: every one should keep within the bounds of his own profession. What shall we say then of a man who immersed himself wholly in cabals of state and occasioned so many troubles and divisions? Paul Jovius is moderate enough in the censure which he passes upon him. 'Is Mediceo nomini maxime erat infestus, oppugnabatque eum Reipublicæ statum, quem paucorum potentium, uti prædicabat, vis & libido regere posset: ob id civitatem in partes jam plane diduxerat, ita ut à gravibus famisque civibus non inepte reprehenderetur, quod a religione divinarumque rerum contemplatione, ambitiosius quam sacrum virum deceret, ad munia regendæ Reipublicæ transivisset (52). . . . He was chiefly set against the family de Medicis, and opposed that form of a Republic, which, as he said, was liable to be governed by the violence and lust of a few great men. For this reason he had evidently divided the city into parties, and was very justly censured by grave and wise citizens; because, that laying aside his religious profession, and the contemplation of divine matters, he had concerned himself in the management of the state, with more ambition than became a man of his holy profession.' See in Guicciardin (53), how he declared it to be the will of God, that the government of the people should be set up, and nevertheless, he confessed that they should infringe the prerogatives of that form of government, in the point of executing four or five persons that were condemned for high treason. 'Their relations having appealed from the sentence to the great council of the people, by virtue of a law which had been made at the establishment of the Democracy; those who had been authors of the condemnation, fearing lest compassion for their age and quality, and the multitude of their relations, should mitigate in the minds of the people the severity of the sentence, bestirred themselves so much, that they procured it to be debated before a smaller number of citizens, whether they should be suffered to proceed in their appeal or not; where, as the advantage both in number and authority was on their side, who maintained, that it was a dangerous thing, and might very possibly end in sedition; and that the laws themselves allowed they might be dispensed with in the like case to prevent tumults; some of the chief magistrates were impetuously, and in a manner by force and threatnings, forced to consent, that, notwithstanding the appeal lodged, the execution should be performed that very night; and in this the friends of Savonarola were more zealous than the rest, to the great scandal of him who did not dissuade, even his own followers, from violating a law which he himself had proposed a few years before, as very useful, and almost necessary for the preservation of liberty (54). We may discover in this conduct of Savonarola, some marks of the unregenerated man, and of the unchristian Politician. Note, That Varillas supposes that this Monk endeavoured to save the lives of these state-criminals (55). Had that been true, Guicciardin would not have laid just the reverse. I add, that Antony Maria Gratiana, Bishop of Amelia, observes, that the relations of the condemned persons in vain besought Valori and Savonarola upon their knees; they could not obtain for them that they should enjoy the privilege of an appeal to the people (56).

(52) Paulus Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, pag. 48.

(53) Guicciardin, lib. ii. folio m. 45, verso.

(54) Guicciardin, lib. iii. fol. 124.

(55) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 216.

(56) Gratiana, de Casibus Virorum illustrium, pag. 133.

[G] What completed his destruction was, that having agreed that his doctrines should be verified by the trial of fire, he wisely fluffed . . . when the time came for executing his engagement.] Guicciardin has discovered so great an inclination to justify Savonarola, that I cannot chuse a less suspected narrative than his. I shall quote it somewhat at length, that I may shew all the causes of this Monk's ruin. Savonarola . . . having been long before accused to the Pope of the following crimes, that he preached scandalously against the manners of the clergy, and of the court of Rome, that he nourished divisions in Florence, that his doctrine was not entirely Catholic, and having, for these reasons, been summoned to appear at Rome by several apostolical briefs, refused to go there, alledging divers excuses; and, on this account, he had at last in the preceding year been excommunicated by the Pope. By reason of this sentence he abstained some months from preaching, and if he had abstained longer, he might have obtained his absolution easily; because the Pope, who made no great account of Savonarola, had proceeded against him rather by the instigation and persuasion of his adversaries, than for any other cause. But he, concluding that it was owing to his silence that his reputation declined so fast, or that the end which he had in view was thereby interrupted, as he had chiefly raised himself by his vehemence in preaching, despised the Pope's orders, and returned as to the public discharge of that office; affirming that the censures published against him were unjust and void, as being contrary to the will of God, and prejudicial to the interest of society. He railed most severely at the Pope and the whole court: which occasioned a violent uproar. His adversaries (whose authority with the people increased daily) detested this disobedience, and laid to his charge that by his rash conduct the Pope's mind was altered, and that too at a time when he was treating with other confederates about the restitution of Pisa, and when it was proper to do every thing that might confirm him in that inclination. On the other hand, his followers defended him; saying, that people ought not, for the sake of worldly considerations, to disturb the works of God; nor consent that, under such pretexts, the Pope should begin to meddle with the affairs of their Republic. This dispute having lasted several days, and the Pope being strangely provoked, and thundering out new briefs and threatnings of excommunication against the whole city, he was at length commanded by the magistrates to desist from preaching. He obeyed their orders, but several of his brethren did in divers churches the same thing that

By this means he lost his reputation, and the very next day (b) a number of armed men hastened to his convent, and having dragged him from thence delivered him into the

(b) Two days after according to some authors.

he had done. As the clergy was no less divided than the laity, the monks of other orders did not cease to preach against him with great vehemence: and they were inflamed at length to such a degree, that one of the Friars who adhered to Savonarola, and one of the Friars minor, agreed to enter into the fire in the presence of the whole people, to the end, that, according as Savonarola's Friar should escape or be burnt, every one might plainly see whether he was a prophet or an impostor: because formerly he had several times affirmed in his sermons, that, as a sign of the truth of his predictions, he would obtain of GOD, when it should be necessary, the favour to pass unhurt through the middle of the fire. Being nevertheless vexed, that the proposal of coming to an immediate proof of it should have been made without his knowledge, he dexterously tried to divert it. But as the thing had already gone too far, and was pressed by some citizens, who desired to see their country rid of so much vexation, it was at last necessary to proceed. Wherefore the two Friars, accompanied by all their brethren, being come on the day appointed to the place which is before the public palace, where were assembled, not only all the people in Florence, but likewise several others from the neighbouring towns: The Friars minor were informed, that Savonarola had ordered his Monk to carry the sacrament in his hand when he entered into the fire. As they began to protest against this, and to allege, that by such means an attempt was made to endanger the authority of the Christian faith, which would decline very much in the minds of the ignorant, if the Host should burn; and as Savonarola, who was present, still persisted in his resolution, there arose such a discord between them, that they did not proceed to make the experiment. He left so much credit by this, that the next day his adversaries, encouraged by some accidental tumult (57), took arms, and joining to these the authority of the supreme magistrate, they entered by force into the convent of St Mark, where he resided, and carried him, together with two of his brethren, to the public goal (58).

(57) Bullart, Académie des Sciences, Tom. ii. pag. 6, says that Savonarola raised this tumult among the people.

(58) Guicciardin, book iii, near the end. fol. m. 127, ad ann. 1498.

(59) In the rem. [2], citat. (48).

(60) My author, who says this pag. 46, quotes pag. 51, some extracts from a discourse of Savonarola which intimate that the Franciscans were the first that proposed the test of fire. See below citat. (72).

(61) Bench' io credo ardere, ma per salute dell'anime son molto contento che lo ardi. Excerpta in Diario Burchardi, pag. 43.

(62) Ibid. p. 50.

not worth his while to enter into the fire with a single Franciscan; but that if his adversaries, and especially such of them as resided at Rome, and their adherents, would expose themselves to the fire, he was ready to accompany them; being well assured that he should come off in the same manner as the three Hebrews that were cast into the furnace at Babylon. Si massimamente per che il mio entrare nel fuoco con un solo frate non farebbe quella utilità nella chiesa che richiede una tant' opera, quanto e questa ch'iddio ci ha posta nelle mani. Et però mi son offerto & mi offerirò de novo, di far io proprio l'esperienza, ogni volta che gl'averfarai di questa nostra dottrina & maxime que' de Roma e lor adherenti vogliano commettere la causa in questo padre & in altri, & mi confido nel nostro Salvatore Gesù Christo & non dubito punto ch'io andaro per il fuoco come fece Sidorac, Mesach & Abednago nella fornace ardente, non non per miei meriti & virtù, ma per virtù di Dio, il quale vorrà confirmare la sua verità & manifestare la sua gloria in questo mondo (63). I pass by the other answers which he made to the objections: they are to be seen in this book which I quote (64).

(63) Ibidem.

(64) Ibid. & pagina sequenti.

The magistrates of Florence having well considered all these challenges, and the commotions which this thing bred in the city, gave orders that they should proceed to the execution of their engagements on Saturday the seventh of April 1498. The Friar minor, accompanied only with one of his brethren, went to the place of execution before the hour appointed; but Dominic de Pefcia let it pass, and came, a little after, in procession with the cross and the Host, and with Savonarola, and all his brethren, and a great multitude of people. The Friar minor declared to the magistrates that he did not at all doubt but that he should be burnt, and begged of them not to pass a judgment in Savonarola's favour, unless the Dominican should come out of the fire without receiving any harm. This was promised to him: and because there were people who suspected, that the one or other of the Friars, or perhaps both, had hid some charm under their gown, they were ordered to pull off their clothes, and to put on new ones, which had been just made for them. The Friar minor consented to it, and even offered to go naked into the flames. The Dominican on the other hand made use of subterfuges to keep his gown; and it was granted him at the request of the Friar minor himself, who represented, that since it was of cloth it would infallibly burn with the person that had it on. Afterwards, the Dominican protested that he would not enter into the fire without the crucifix. This was agreed to at the entreaty still of the Friar minor, who represented that the crucifix was of wood, and that consequently instead of being a preservative against the fire, it would be burnt with the Dominican. The latter asked, as a new favour, that he might be allowed to enter into the fire with the holy sacrament, and declared, that without that he would not expose himself to the trial. The magistrates refused to grant his petition, and thereupon the assembly broke up; every one returned to his own house; and this was the issue of an affair which had drawn the attention of the whole city (65). People murmured, chafed, and entertained suspicions against Savonarola; and on the Monday following, which was the ninth of April, they attacked the monastery of the Dominicans, and took that Friar out by force (66).

(65) It might well have been laid upon that occasion, Spectatum admitti ritum tenebris amici? Would you not laugh to see this foolish show? Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 5, or Parturient montes nascetur ridiculus mus. The lab'ring mountain breeds a silly mouse. CREECH. Id. ibid. ver. 129.

I take this from the Journal of John Burchard, who was clerk of the chapel to Pope Alexander VI, and master of the ceremonies. He says, that these things were thus notified to the Pope by the Florentine ambassador. I confess, that the narrative of an apologist for Savonarola (67) does not agree in every circumstance with this, and that it contains a curious particular, which is not in the other, viz. that Savonarola offered to forfeit his life, in case the very silk that covered the holy sacrament should receive the least damage by the fire. The Apologist adds, 1. That Dominic de Pefcia would have entered into the flames without the consecrated Host, if one of his companions (68) had not been warned by Angels, that it was not fit he should enter otherwise: 2. That perhaps this angelical warning was designed to hinder people from imputing this miracle to some magic virtue, the (66) Taken from the Excerpta ex Diario Joh. Burchardi, pag. 49, & seq.

(67) Joannes Franciscus Picus, in Vita Savonarolæ, pag. 128, & seq.

(68) He was called Sylvester of Florence.

the hands of justice. He was put to the rack; and it is said that he confessed his impoſture [H]. He was hanged and burnt with two other Jacobin Friars, Dominic of Peſcia and Sylveſter of Florence, of whom the one had reſuſed to enter into the fire the effects of which are reſtrained by the preſence of the holy ſacrament. I obſerve, that Volaterranus has not related this adventure well; for he ſuppoſes (69) that Savonarola having boaſted that he had the gift of miracles, and that he could paſs unhurt thro' the middle of the fire, the magiſtrates ordered him to make the trial, and diſcovered the cheat, by ſeeing him reſolved not to do it without the Hoſt in his hand. This error of Volaterranus in ſuch an eſſential circumſtance of a fact, which he had almoſt ſeen with his own eyes is unpardonable.

REFLECTIONS
upon Savonarola's conduct, with regard to the challenge of the Franciscan.

For the reſt, we cannot accuſe thoſe people of being raſh, who entertained ſuſpicions to Savonarola's diſadvantage; all appearances were againſt him. It was already a prejudice againſt him, that being perſonally challenged to enter into the fire, he declined to enter himſelf, and ſubſtituted a deputy. He made a very fooliſh excuſe, when he pretended that by reaſon of the great work to which he was deſtined by God, it was beneath him to engage with a ſingle Franciſcan; for he could have done nothing more uſeful towards the advancement of that work, than the good ſucceſs of the trial would have been. What more authentic proof could he give of his extraordinary miſſion, than to convince the people that he paſſed unhurt thro' the middle of the flames which conſumed his accuſer? Would not this have been as ſufficient to legitimate his miſſion, as the puniſhment of Korah was to confirm that of Moſes? Obſerve well, that this Monk did not expreſs any doubt of the activity of the fire. He ſaid, he was fully perſuaded that he ſhould receive no manner of damage (70): ſince therefore he was to ſurvive the trial, he had no reaſon to believe that it would incapacitate him for executing his deſigns. On the contrary, he had reaſon to believe that it would render him the more capable of bringing them about. We ſee then that he gave grounds for a violent ſuſpicion, that he was afraid of loſing his honour and his life at the ſame time; and it was no ſign of courage his offering himſelf to the perſonal proof, provided his enemies at Rome would undergo it with him: for there is no manner of difference between promiſing nothing at all, and promiſing upon ſuch conditions as one knows will not be accepted.

Do not object to me his conſenting that one of his brethren ſhould enter into the fire, and let it not be concluded from thence that he acted ingenuouſly. I confeſs that he hazarded his reputation, as he ſays himſelf, and that he would have been obliged to abſcond, if his deputy had loſt his life. Si uno di queſti tali andando ſotto la mia fede & per ſar l'ubediencia da me impoſta come ſi ſono prompſſiſſamente offeriti, ardeſſe nel fuoco, chi non vede ch'io & che queſta tutt'opera & impreſa di Dio andarebbe meco in ruina & ch'io non potrei piu in alcun luogo comparire (71). But that does not prove his ſincerity; for the challenges of the Franciſcans had him reduced to ſuch a non-plus, that he could not preſerve his reputation but by expoſing himſelf to that teſt of fire, or by conſenting that one of his brethren ſhould do it. He confeſſes, that without this, the honour of God, and his holy truth, would fall to the ground: Concluſa che noi non habbiamo offerito queſta tale ſperienza & fuoco, mà loro ſono quelli che ce l'hanno meſſo inanzi; & noi ſiamo coſtanti ad accettar la, accio che l'honor di Dio & la ſua ſanta verita non vadi per terra (72). What was to be done in ſo great an extremity? It was neceſſary to ſhew confidence at leaſt in the perſon of a deputy, truſting to this, that the magiſtrates would not order the proof, or that, at worſt, expedients might be contrived to elude it, which would be of leſs conſequence, being employed by Dominic de Peſcia, than if Savonarola himſelf ſhould make uſe of them. Such were actually invented. It is true they were of no great ſervice; but the thing was gone ſo far, that it was not now the queſtion, whether one ſhould hazard nothing at all, but whether one ſhould hazard more or leſs.

(72) Ibid. p. 51.

The Friars minors obtained an indiſputable advantage: their champion diſcovered both a great deal of charity, and a great deal of courage; for he preſent-

ed himſelf to a certain death; he had good ſenſe enough to be perſuaded that the fire would give no quarter to him, he was ready to die for the ſalvation of ſo many ſouls, who, as he thought, were miſled by Savonarola. He hoped, that their eyes would be opened, and that the deceit would laſt no longer than they ſhould ſee the ſubſtitute of the deceiver periſh in the flames. He had ſome grounds to fear leſt they ſhould judge that, ſince the two antagoniſts periſhed alike, both ſides were in the wrong; but without doubt he hoped that the evil would entirely ceaſe, provided it was once believed that Savonarola erred. Note, That if the Dominicans, who offered themſelves to the trial, were fully perſuaded, that the fire would reſpect them, they did not ſhew much courage. Note alſo, that by virtue of that perſuaſion, they thought themſelves innocent of the crime of ſelf-murder. 'Mi confido, ſaid Savonarola (73), nel Sig. & Salvatore Jeſu Chriſto, & nel ſuo S. Evangelio, che ciaſcuno di loro ne uſcirà illeſo, cioè ſenza alcun danno, & quando di queſto dubitaſſe punto, non lo direi, per non eſſer homicida. - - - I truſt in our Lord and Saviour JEſUS CHRIST, and in his Goſpel, that every one of them ſhall come out unhurt, and if I had the leaſt doubt of it, I would not ſay ſo, for fear of being a murderer.' He laid that crime to the charge of his adverſaries, who offered themſelves to the proof, believing at the ſame time that they ſhould periſh in it (74).

[H] It is ſaid that he confeſſed his impoſture.] What Guicciardin relates, favours of a man who is tender of unfortunate peoples reputation. Savonarola, ſays he, was examined with tortures, although they were not very ſevere; and upon the examination, a proceſs was publiſhed, which (laying aſide all the injurious reproaches that had been thrown out againſt him, of avarice, or bad morals, or of his having carried on ſecret intrigues with princes) contained, that his predictions had not proceeded from divine revelation, but from his own opinion, grounded upon the doctrine and obſervation of the holy ſcripture, and that he had not been induced thereto from any ill deſign, nor from a deſire of acquiring high preferments in the Church by that means: but that he had earneſtly wiſhed to be the inſtrument of calling a general council, in which the corrupt manners of the clergy might be reformed, and the ſtate of the Church of God, which had deviated ſo far, might be reduced to as great a reſemblance as poſſible of thoſe days that were neareſt to the times of the Apoſtles; and that he would have thought it a much greater honour to finiſh that great and uſeful work, than to obtain the papal dignity; becauſe the former could only proceed from a moſt excellent life and doctrine, and a ſingular reſpect for all men, whereas the latter was very often obtained by ill means, or by the favour of fortune. In conſequence of this proceſs, confirmed by him in the preſence of ſeveral Friars likewiſe of his order, but (if what his adherents publiſhed afterwards be true) in few words, and in ſuch as were capable of divers interpretations; by ſentence of the general of the Dominicans, and of Biſhop Romolino, who was afterwards Cardinal of Surrente, the commiſſaries deputed by the Pope, he and the other two Friars were with the uſual ceremonies in the Church of Rome degraded from their holy orders, and being delivered over to the ſecular arm, they were hanged and burnt (75). He adds, that Savonarola ſuffered death courageouſly, without ſaying one word that might ſhew either his guilt or his innocence; but that this did not put an end to the difference in the opinions and paſſions of men; becauſe ſeveral perſons conſidered him as an impoſtor; and, on the other hand, ſeveral believed that the confeſſion which was publiſhed had been falſly invented, or that the torture had more power than truth, upon a man of his conſtitution, which was very delicate. They excuſed his frailty by the example of the prince of the Apoſtles, who, without being imprifoned, or conſtrained by any torture or extraordinary violence, did at the bare words of chambermaids and ſervants, deny that he was the diſciple of that Maſter, from whom he had ſeen ſo many holy precepts and miracles proceed.

There are three things to be conſidered in this narrative. The firſt is, That Savonarola was delivered over (73) Ubi ſuper; pag. 48.

(74) Nè per queſto ſiamo noi crudeli & homicidi, ancorche li auverſari, quali ſi ſono ſottoſcritti publicamente confeſſano d'aver in queſto fuoco à morire & però non già noi, mà loro ſono crudeli & homicidi di ſe medefimi. Ibid. pag. 51.

(75) Guicciardin. lib. iii, near the end. ſ. l. 123.

fire without the consecrated host (i), and the other had exhorted him to it under the pretext of a revelation. The vigorous resistance, which the Jacobins made when mark (G). their over to the secular arm, because, as he himself confessed, he had known things to come by acquired lights, and had aimed at nothing else in his actions, but to bring back the Church to her antient purity. The second is, That the confession he made thereupon was expressed in ambiguous words. The third is, That at his execution he neither owned that he was guilty, nor protested that he was innocent, and that nevertheless there were a good many persons who continued to look upon him as a saint, though they made no doubt of his having denied the truth in prison.

GUICCIARDIN censured.

I. I observe upon the first of these three articles, that Guicciardin has not discharged the duty of an historian well; for he has not only suppressed the greatest part of the accusations which were acknowledged as true by Savonarola, but he has likewise unfairly represented those which he has related. It was very allowable for him to believe that the Judges had oppressed the innocence of that Friar; but he had no right to mangle or disguise the representations which had been published of that case. Now he has done both, since it is certain that they contain several heads of accusation and confession which he has passed over in silence, and that in those which he has mentioned, he has struck out what things were criminal, and only left an idea of innocence. If an historian can be allowed thus to discharge the office of an advocate, he ought at most to do so by some reflexions apart, and not in the thread of the narration itself, which should be strictly conformable to the publick records. Guicciardin is too hard upon the Judges, and too easy to the party accused: it is not his fault if it be not believed that they caused a man to be burnt for having dared to affirm that by a strong meditation upon the oracles of the Bible, he had learned that certain things would happen. The pretension of such a man may be very rash, and liable to censure; but it does not render him worthy of corporal punishment: and consequently Savonarola's Judges would have been murderers and assassins, if they had put him to death for an offence of that nature. Let us see wherein the artifice and misrepresentation of the historian consists. He has separated two things which should have been put together; the one is what Savonarola confessed in prison, the other is what he had preached before. This Friar confessed that his knowledge of things to come was not infused, or an immediate revelation of the Holy Ghost; but he had boasted of such a revelation (76); and it is upon that account that his confession, which otherwise would have been a trifle, rendered him vastly guilty. He found himself convicted by his own confession of an horrible and infamous imposture. Guicciardin has taken great care not to furnish his readers with hints for this remark: he witholds, no doubt, that they might not compare Savonarola's confession with his preceding conduct. If you have a mind to know part of what Guicciardin has suppressed, read the following passage of Naclerus;

(76) Guicciardin himself affirms it in another place, viz. book ii, fol. m. 44, verso. Affirmando non predire questo, & molte altre cose, le quali continuamente predicava, per discorso humano, ne per Scienze di Scrittura; ma semplicemente per divina rivelatione. --- Affirming that he did not foresee this and many other things which he constantly preached up, by any human reasoning, nor by the knowledge of the Scriptures; but purely by divine revelation.

we find there, that, according to the acts of the process which was published, Savonarola acknowledged that his conduct had been one continued series of vanity and ambition, to which he had made his pretended prophecies subservient. 'Die nona mensis Aprilis, dictus F. Hieronymus, presentibus multis testibus, fuit interrogatus & examinatus in aula Baroncelli, primò verbis, post minis, dein cum tortura. demum 19. ejusdem mensis sine lacione dixit, omnia per ipsum prophetizata, fuisse ficta, & quòd ob gloriam humanam aucupandam talia predicaverit, & quòd videbatur civitas Florentia bonum instrumentum ad faciendum crescere suam gloriam. Et ad coadjuvandum suum finem, confessus est se prædicasse res, per quas Christiani cognoscerent abominaciones quæ fiebant Romæ, & quòd reges & principes se congregarent ad faciendum concilium: quòd ubi factum fuisset, sperasset deponi multos prælatos, etiam Papam: & quando fuisset assumptus in concilio, mansisset & itersisset in magna reputatione in toto mundo: & si non fuisset in papam electus, saltem primum locum tenuisset. De renovatione ecclesiæ & conversione infidelium, dixit se habere ex scriptura sacra, sed quòd fieri deberet citò, non habuerit

VOL. V. No. CXIX.

ex scripturis aut revelatione. Quòd offenderit se ivisse in paradysum, hoc fecisse se ad attribuendum sibi reputationem & gloriam. Circa factum inobedientie pontificis, quòd non ivit Romam, fecisse se, ne occideretur in via. Circa factum excommunicationis respondit, quanquam multis aliter videretur, crediderit ipse tamen illam esse veram & observandam, observaverit per aliquod tempus. Sed ubi viderit quòd ibat opus suum in ruinam, cepit modum non observandi, & quòd pertinaciter steterit contra pro honore, reputatione ac manutentione operis sui. Hæc & multa alia interpretatus est, prout in examine quod impressum est, continetur (77). --- On the ninth day of April the said Savonarola was, before many witnesses, interrogated and examined in the hall Baroncelli, first with words, afterwards, with threatenings, and last of all with the torture. At length, on the nineteenth of the same month, he freely owned, without being racked, that all his predictions had been feigned, and that he had preached up such things for the sake of human glory, and because the city of Florence seemed to him a proper instrument for procuring it. He confessed that in order to promote his ends, he had preached things, by which Christians might know the abominations which were practised at Rome, and kings and princes might jointly procure a council to be called; in consequence of which he had expected that many prelates, and the Pope himself, would have been deposed; that after he had been once respected in the council, his reputation should have been firmly established throughout the whole world; and that if he had not been chosen Pope, he would at least have held the first rank. As to the reformation of the Church, and the conversion of the infidels, he said, he had the knowledge of those things from scripture, but as to their happening soon, he neither knew it from scripture nor revelation. With respect to his saying that he had been in Paradise, he confessed, that he did it for the sake of acquiring glory and reputation to himself; and as to his disobeying the Pope, in not going to Rome, he attributed it to his fear of being killed by the way. Concerning the fact of excommunication, he answered, that though many were of a different opinion, he himself had believed it true and proper to be complied with, and that therefore he had submitted to it for some time. But when he saw his designs go to ruin, he took a resolution not to mind it, and that he had opposed it obstinately for the honour, reputation, and support, of his undertaking. These and many other things did he confess, as they are contained in the process that was printed.'

II. The second thing which I said was to be considered in Guicciardin's narrative, is, that Savonarola made use of expressions which had a double meaning. His apologists are perplexed a little upon that head, and they own that some votaries of that new faith wavered upon that occasion (78); but there were others who justified him by the example of the antient prophets, whose answers seemed to signify quite the reverse of what they intended. 'Illud affirmantes fuisse in usu prioribus illis veteris Testamenti prophetis, perdis interrogantibus oblique adeò ambigueque respondere, ut quæ affirmaverant negavisse viderentur, contraque quæ negaverant viderentur affirmasse. Sic Michæam Acabo Regi de Assyriis expugnandis respondisse; sic Prophetam Amos nec se Prophetam esse, sed nec Prophetæ filium dixisse. Sic Joannem Baptistam dum de Prophetia munere rogaretur loquutum fuisse. Et in hanc quoque sententiam Prophetæ Ezechielis nonnulla, deque responso Elisæ ad Hazaelem depromi dicebant (79). --- Affirming that the antient prophets of the Old Testament were used to make such oblique and doubtful answers to the questions of the wicked, that they seemed to deny what they affirmed, and, on the other hand, to affirm what they denied. Thus such was Micah's answer to king Abab concerning his victory over the Assyrians; thus did the prophet Amos say, that he was neither a prophet, nor the son of a prophet. Thus, said they, John the Baptist answered, when he was asked whether he was a Prophet; they add, that some things to the same purpose might be quoted out of the Prophet Ezechiel, and out of Elisæ's answer to Hazael. They alledged (80) that

(77) Naclerus. Part. ii, Gen. L, pag. m. 990. See in Spisellus in Infel. Literato, pag. 659, a confession of Savonarola, in terms that are still more barbarous: it is taken from the book of John Poggius, Edit. 1498.

(78) See John Francis Picus, ubi supra, pag. m. 132.

(79) Id. ibid.

(80) Ibid. pag. 133.

(H) See in the remark [H], the words of Guicciardin.

their convent was attacked [I], did not well become the disciples of a prophet of the New Law, especially since this attack was countenanced by the authority of the magistrates (k). Some believed that Savonarola was very justly punished; but others considered him as a martyr, and endeavoured to have part of his ashes that they might keep them as a relick (l); for which reason they were thrown into the river. Books were written for his justification [K], and we must not omit that the Protestants have that Thomas Aquinas affirms, that a person accused is not obliged to confess the truth before unjust judges. They remembered (81), that there had been martyrs whom the violence of torture had compelled to speak against their conscience; and thus they confirmed themselves in the credit which they had given to that new prophet. Such are the effects of being infatuated with a man, who acquires the reputation of an inspired saint. Such an infatuation is generally an incurable disease. Let the event give the lie to that man's prediction, let him vary, let him recant, let him contradict himself, let him fall into weaknesses and gross faults; for all this, people are not cured of their prepossession, they seek to justify him at the expence of the greatest faults of the ancient and new law, they will rather strip faults of their vicious nature, than believe that he is guilty of any faults (82).

(I) Sixt. Senensis, Biblioth. lib. iv, apud Pope Blount, Conf. Auth. pag. 345. See likewise the Protopographic of Du Verdier, Tom. iii, pag. 2333, and what I quote from John Francis Picas, in the remark [H] near the end.

The prepossession of Savonarola's votaries was so extravagant, that they religiously preserved all they could of the wood-pile where he was burnt. This superstition of theirs was foreseen, and for that reason all the ashes had been suddenly taken away and thrown into the river: but something remained, and there was even a bone that fell from amidst the ashes, and part of a finger which was carried off, during the time that they were throwing stones at the gibbet, where the three Dominicans were hanged. All these were kept as relicks, and, as some say, wrought a good many miracles. 'Corporum absumentur cineres quoscumque potuerunt in unum redactos, plaustrisque delatos, in Arni fluvium iniecerunt. Ex incendio superfuere nonnulla, quæ cautè rapta, religioseque servata sunt. Item os, quod puer quidam dum veheretur in Arnum, delapsum vehiculo pertulit ad matrem: Item & digiti cujusdam pars dum penderent de cruce, faxorum decussa grandine. Ab ipsis reliquiis quæ prodierunt signa divinitus suis referemus locis (83).

III. My third remark upon Guicciardin's narrative is, that St Peter's example does but little serve to justify the Florentine prophet; for that Apostle's fault was followed by a quick repentance, and repaired by a long fidelity; but we do not find that Savonarola made use of the only means left to atone for his fault. It was to declare upon the scaffold, that he entreated God to forgive him, for having been so weak as to deny in prison, what he had affirmed in the pulpit. Guicciardin observes that he did not say a word, either to accuse or clear himself.

Let us not forget to observe that it is a difficult matter to reduce the apologists for certain people to a non-plus, for they almost continually find examples, which they place before us, as a barrier which we are obliged to respect. You see how Savonarola's friends endeavoured to shelter themselves under the ancient prophets, and the martyrs of the primitive church; and though they should be forced to confess that he had been seduced by the illusions of the devil, they would have modern saints to alledge in his justification. This is the observation of a Protestant divine.

Et dato intervenisse, says he (84), illi imaginationi illusionem aliquam & allocutionem diabolicam sive internam sive externam, hoc non magis ipsius orthodoxie, pietati, & particulari causæ, ob quam passus est præjudicare potest, quam Jordani, aliorumque sanctorum Papalium monachorum: de quorum illusionibus passim legendæ, & vitæ, Delrio l. 4. c. 1. qu. 3.

Theophilus Raynaud says that, according to Baptista Fulgofius, Savonarola confessed his impurities (85); but I do not find this in the chapter which he (86) cites. Father Baronius answering that passage of Theophilus Raynaud takes no notice of this false quotation (87). The testimony of Pierius Valerianus would have turned to better account (88).

[I] The vigorous resistance which the Dominicans made when their convent was attacked. They made provision of fire-arms, and killed five persons. Three of them were killed, and particularly the brother of Savonarola. Quem (conventum S. Marci) Fratres ejusdem conventus bene claustrant & in eo bombardis & aliis armis offensivis muniti erant, quæ in populum traxerunt, qui tandem conventum vi intravit interfecit. quinque ex suis, tribus autem ex monachis, quodam Fratris professo Ordinis predicatorum germano dicti fratris Hieronymi & duobus aliis (89). They were obliged to set fire to the convent, in order to get the better of the Monks who defended it (90).

[K] Books were written in his justification. 'Dominic Benivenius published a book of his miracles and prophecies, and Francis Picas † was so warm in his defence that, notwithstanding he was extremely religious and a strict Catholic, he did not scruple to attack and very much to abridge the power and authority of the Pope, in order to shew that Alexander VI had no reason to forbid him the pulpit and to excommunicate him (90*).' This is what Gabriel Naudé says. He does not observe that this Benivenius published his book before Savonarola's death; I shall therefore add this particular as I find it in Du Verdier Vau Privas. Savonarola had acquired among the great est part of the Florentines the character of a holy man and of a prophet, and as such had been cried up and defended in printed pieces, particularly in a treatise written by Dominic Benivenius, a Florentine Priest, in order to vindicate and prove the truth of the doctrine and prophecies preached up by the said Savonarola; which treatise was printed at Florence by Francis Bonacorso, in the year 1496 (91). Gilbert Voëtius observes, that this Benivenius published after the author's death the abridgement which Savonarola had written of his prophecies, and that he prefixed to it a Preface full of commendations (92). The same Voëtius adds, that Sabellicus in the IX book of the X Ennead, and Ferronus in the II book of the History of France, make a professed apology for this Dominican. He is mistaken (93) as to Arnoldus Ferronus, who only said, that there are people who pretend that Savonarola was justly put to death as an impostor, but that no body refuses him this commendation, that he was temperate, and besides a man of wit and learning. Hunc quod esset Galorum studiosior quam alii vellent, à Florentinis adnente Pontifice quasi violatæ persuasione reum damnatum: alii, cum importunis plebem falleret, & Auguris divini nomen aucuparetur, jure casum volunt: certe ad temperantiam & sobrietatis laudem, doctrinæ & ingenii gloriam adjecisse cum nemo diffidetur (94). Without doubt what misled Voëtius was his seeing Sabellicus and Ferronus quoted near one another in the margin of Martin del Rio, and his not considering the disjunctive which that author makes use of. It plainly insinuates, that Ferronus is only alledged as an Historian who doubts whether Savonarola deserved death. 'Ex partium studio, & Alexandri VI atque Medicorum odio factum, ut non consideranter Historici nonnulli † defensionem Savonarolæ susceperunt, vel damnationis justitiam in dubium vocarent (95). - - - It was owing to party-zeal, and their hatred to Alexander VI and the family de Medicis, that some Historians rashly undertook the defence of Savonarola, or called the justice of his sentence in question.'

Naudé is in the right to say that John Francis Picas was warm in the defence of Savonarola. He makes him a Saint who wrought miracles; and he intreats his readers to remember him in their prayers to God, and to Jerom Savonarola (96). He says (97) that the heart of that holy man was found in the river, that he has a part of it, and that it is so much the dearer to him as he has found by experience that it cures sick people, and drives out Devils. He observes (98) that a great number of those who persecuted that Dominican died miserably (99), and among these he reckons Pope Alexander VI. He mentions two traditions touching that Pope's death, which, as he says, happened

(89) Excerpta ex Diario Burchardi, pag. 54.

(90) Conceramus templi foribus nec incurta irruptione (Savonarola) comprehenditur. Jo. vius, in Elég. cap. xlii, pag. 190. See him also in Vita Leonis X, pag. 52.

† In Apolog. pro Hieron. Savonarol. viri prophete innocentia.

(90*) Naudé, Apologie des grands Hommes, pag. 452.

(91) Du Verdier, Protopogr. Tom. iii, pag. 2333.

(92) Voëtius, ubi supra, p. 1068.

(93) He has misled Spizelius, ubi supra, pag. 628.

(94) Arnoldus Ferronus, de Rebus gestis Gallorum, lib. ii, circa fin. f. 45. Edit. Paris. 1555, in 8vo.

† Sabellicus. Ennead. 10, lib. ix, Arn. Ferron. lib. ii, Rerum Francicar. & alii.

(95) Mart. Del Rio, Disquis. Magic. lib. iv, cap. i, 298ff. ii, §. vi, pag. m. 197.

(96) Jo. Francis Picas, ubi supra, p. 108.

(97) Id. ibid. pag. 136, 137.

(98) Id. ibid. pag. 137, & seq.

(99) Father Baronius, Apolog. Ord. Predicator. Tom. ii, pag. 88, theates Theophilus Raynaud in the following manner. Non videt vinctam capiti suo impendentem, qualem ferent adversariarum 80, qui in illum con-juraverant, cognoscere eam hunc over his head, such as was felt by eighty of his adversaries, who had conspired against him, and who all came to an untimely and miserable end.

(81) Ibid.

tort Johanna

(82) See the remark . . . of the article . . . or what Seneca says of Cato's drunkenness.

(83) Jo. Francis Picas, ubi supra, p. 166; he says, in that very place that Savonarola's heart was found in the river Arno two days after. He boasts that he had a part of it. See the following remark citation (97).

(84) Voëtius, Disput. Theolog. Tom. ii, pag. 2070.

(85) Theophilus Raynaud, de immunitate Cyriacorum, Distr. vi, pag. 298, Apompeiæ.

(86) Theophilus Raynaud, quotes Baptista Fulgofius l. tit. de Religio cultu. c. i. I make use of the edition printed Coloniz 1604, in 8vo.

(87) Vincent. Baronius, Apolog. Ordinis Predicator. Tom. ii, pag. 88, & seq.

(88) See his words in the remark [M].

have declared for him [L]. He died however like a good Roman Catholic (m). There is

(m) See the passage of Coëffeteau in the remark [L].

(100) Had multo post tempore.
Fr. Fr. Picus,
ubi supra, pag.
139.

self to the

(102) Id. ibid.
pag. 125.

(103) Spizelius,
ub supra, pag.
633, quotes a passage of it. I believe it is of this book that Mr Du Pleffis,
Myſtère d'Iniquité, p. 571, ſays, when he ſays that John Picus Mirandolanus, (he ſhould have ſaid John Francis) wrote a book on purpoſe to defend Savonarola againſt the Pope.

(104) See the Journal des Spa-vans of the 20th of January 1676,
pag. 23. Dutch edition.

(105) In Tom.
xviii, Annalium.

(106) In Apolo-
get. Ord. Præd.
Tom. ii, pag. 88,
& ſeq.

(107) In Select.
Hiſt. Eccleſ.
Capit. Sæc. xv,
xvi.

(108) See in the following remark the paſſage of Coëffeteau.

(109) In the Life of Savonarola.

(110) Cocheus, Append. Part. iii, ad Conradum Brunum de Seditionibus, p. 350.

(111) See Voëtius, ubi ſupra,
Part. ii, p. 1068, ubi ſequitur Sandæus lib. iii,
theolog. var.
comment. 22,
pag. 567.

(112) In Prelo
illuſt. Viror.
Italæ.

(113) Jovius in Elog. pag. 100.

pened ſoon after (100). There were however four years between Savonarola's death and Pope Alexander's.
One of theſe traditions is that the Devil ſtrangled him;
the other that the poiſon which he prepared for ſome cardinals was given to him by miſtake (101). Note that according to the firſt tradition he had made himſelf over to the Devil upon condition that he ſhould attain to the Papal dignity. The apologet makes mention of another book which he had written in defence of Savonarola's revelations. 'Ad hæc viſa quæ
' ſibi divinitus offerrebantur ſcriptis mandata, uno com-
' plexus eſt libro, cui titulus eſt *Revelationum Com-
' pendium*, in quem inſipienter inſectus eſt quidam
' Samuel Caſſinenſis ex ordine Minorum, qui vulgo
' Zoccolanti dicuntur libello proprio & peculiari,
' quem vix in publicum datum inita deſenſione *Hie-
' ronymi* conſutandum ſuſcepi, deſenſionemque illius in' ſcripti Hieronymo Tornelio præſidi ordinis Minorum
' (102). . . . Moreover he comprehended his celeſtial vi-
' ſions, which he had deſcribed at large before, in one ' book intitled Revelationum Compendium. Againſt
' this one Samuel Caſſinenſis, of the order of Fryars Mi' nor, who are commonly called Zoccolanti, inveighed
' ſo ſlightly in a particular book, which was no ſooner pub-
' liſhed than I undertook to confute it and defend Savona-
' rola. This vindication I inſcribed to Hieronymus
' Tornelius, general of the ſaid order of Fryars. He had likewiſe written a book to ſhew that Savonarola had been excommunicated unjuſtly. Deſenſio Hieronymi Savonarolæ ſive de injuſta ejus excommunicatione ad Her-culum æſteſem (103). He delayed publiſhing the life of our Dominican till the year 1530. Dr Bates has inſerted it in his Vitæ ſelectorum aliquot Virorum, printed in the year 1681 at London. Father Quetif, the Jacobin, had publiſhed it at Paris in the year 1674: he was the firſt that publiſhed it entire. He added notes to it, and ſeveral other tracts (104); and he is one of the moſt conſiderable apologetiſts for Savonarola. Several of his brethren have ſignaliſed themſelves in the defence of that prophet. See particularly Bzovius (105), Vincent Baronius (106), Noel Alexander (107), &c.

I am ſurprized that Gabriel Naudé has made no mention of the apology written by the Dominican Thomas Neri (108), nor of that which was compoſed by Ambroſe Catharinus. One Timothy Peruginus (109) was likewiſe an advocate for Savonarola. Note that Catharinus did not adhere to his firſt ſentiments. 'Anno Domini 1494, Hieronymum Savonarolam, Ordinis ſui fratrem, propter fructum prædicationis deſendit, licet per errorem, at nunc ſenex in tertio de Conſideratione libro ſuo fatetur (110). . . . In the year 1494, he defended Savonarola, a Fryar of his order, on account of his great ſucceſs in preaching. But therein he did wrong, as he confeſſes, now when he is old, in his third book upon Conſideration. He is even numbered among thoſe who have attacked Savonarola (111). I ſhould never have done if I were to give the liſt of all thoſe who have praiſed that Dominican: we ſhould find there particularly Marſilius Ficinus, Matthew Toſcanus (112), and Flaminius. The laſt made four verſes which Jovius has thought proper to give (113) in that very place where he owns that out of tendernels he paſſes by the inſulting epitaph which another Poet had compoſed. That which Flaminus wrote is as follows.

Dum fera flamma tuos, Hieronyme, paſcitur artus, Religio flevit dilaniata comas;
Flevit, & ô dixit crudeles parcite flammæ;
Parcite, ſunt iſto viſcera noſtra rogo.

While, holy Jerom, the devouring flame
Prey'd on thy tender limbs, religion came;
The goddeſs wept, and tore her ſacred hair,
Then, in an agony of wild deſpair,
Ob ſtop, ſhe cry'd, ſtop cruel flames, a wile,
And ſpare my bowels in the burning pile.

[L] The Proteſtants have declared for him.] Let us begin with a paſſage of Gabriel Naudé: it is in page 453 of his apology for the great men that have been accuſed of Magic. Beza, Vigner, Coppel, du Pleſſis Mornai †, and all the Lutherans of Germany commonly call Savonarola in their books the faithful witneſs of Truth, the forerunner of the Evangelical Reformation, the ſcourge of the great Babylon, the ſworn enemy of the Roman Anti-Chriſt, and to conclude in a word with Jeſſenius à Jeſſen, the Luther of Italy. I wonder they do not likewiſe call him the John Huſ of the ſame country, ſince they were both put to the ſame death, were both Hereticks, and both have their names marked with great letters in the Register and Journal of their Martyrs, witneſſes the following verſes which they put under his effigies,

En Monachus ſolers: rerum ſerutator acutus Martyrio ornatus, Savonarola pius.

Behold acute Savonarola, here
The Monk, the Martyr, and the Saint appear.

He adds that Beza ſays expreſſly when he ſpeaks of him in his eulogies, that his having ſo far diſpleaſed Alexander VI., was a great proof of his fingular piety, that this wicked Pope could have no reſt till he had cauſed him to be moſt unworthily burnt. Homini tam perditè ſcelerato, quàm ſuit Alexander ille Borgia Pontifex bujus nominis ſextus uſque adeo diſplicuiſſe, ut non niſi te indigniſſimè damnato & cremato quieſcere potuiſſet, maximum eſſe videtur ſingularis tuæ pietatis argumentum (114).
It is an argument good enough for an Orator, but not for a writer that would ſpeak hiſtorically or dogmatically, ſince the moſt cruel tyrants put ſome people to death juſtly (115).

Naudé might have quoted Bale, Flacius Illyricus, John Wolfius, and Verheiden. This laſt author ſpeaks of Savonarola in a ſtile of admiration (116). It muſt nevertheleſs be acknowledged that he only conſidered Savonarola in an advantageous light: a great ſource of false reaſonings. Mr du Pleſſis Mornai gave into the ſame ſnare; he did not ſhew this perſon but on the ſide that appeared fair to him (117). This was the reaſon that when one of his antagoniſts preſented the other ſide to the readers, the diſpute became more intricate, and there was a neceſſity for going back. I ſhall cite Coëffeteau's words. He that deſires to ſee Savonarola's doctrine defended againſt thoſe who accuſed him of Heresy, let him read the learned apology which Thomas Neri a Florentine Monk of his order wrote for him;
and particularly as to what concerns the article of Juſti-fication, which du Pleſſis does moſt of all inſiſt upon, let him read the answer to the firſt objection, and he will know that never any man ſpoke more like a Catholic than he, nor in a manner more agreeable to the doctrine of the Church of Rome. . . . Such reaſon is there to believe that he died a Catholic, and here follows the account which his great friend the learned Prince of Mirandola gives of the matter. Savonarola, ſays he, having notice given him of his being condemned to die, called immediately for a Prieſt to whom he might confeſs his ſins, and deſired to receive the moſt holy communion, which being brought to him, he begged earneſtly that they would allow him to take and hold the Sacrament between his hands; and this being granted to him, he began to ſay, with great chearfulneſs and devotion, that he knew and was aſſured that therein was the great and true God, the fountain of ſupreme goodneſs, and the maker of heaven and of earth, and of all creatures: that he knew for certain that therein alſo was preſent the moſt holy, indiviſible, and inſeparable Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, &c. Do you think, Mr du Pleſſis, that a Lutheran or Calviniſt would have died in this manner, and made ſuch a confeſſion of faith? Let your Beza therefore take him from among the idols of your party: let not Luther call upon him any more, as a voucher to his impiety, and as for you do not perſiſt in making him an Heretic contrary to his own confeſſion. Certain it is, that if he had been ſuch, neither Picus Mirandolanus, nor Marſilius Ficinus, nor Neri, nor ſo many other famous men, who have always lived in the Communion of the Church of Rome, would have taken it into their heads to celebrate his praife, even

(114) Naudé, ubi
ſupra, p. 455.

(115) See the remark [A] of the article of the Marſhal de MA-RILLAC,
num. II.

(116) Verheiden,
in Iconibus, pag.
14, 15. Note, that he is mi-ſtaken in ſaying that Savonarola was burnt at fifty years of age.

(117) See the Myſtère d'Iniquité, pag. 570, & ſeq.

J. Pic. Mirand.
in Apolog.

w 20

is some foundation for doubting whether the title of Martyr, which has been bestowed upon him even after his death. But with what face can you reckon among the Lutherans and Calvinists, a Monk who lived continually in his cloyster, strictly observing his vows, and so earnestly exhorting his brethren to do the like, that he appeared to be superfluous in his way of life? With what face can you reckon among the Lutherans and Calvinists, a Monk who constantly celebrated the holy sacrifice of the Mass, and who has even written books to explain the mysteries of it, and to teach us how we must partake of the fruit which God communicates to us therein? How can people place in the list of Lutherans or Calvinists, a man that always believed in the seven Sacraments of the Church, always invoked the Saints, and always prayed for the dead, whom he believed to be in Purgatory. Let any one take the pains to read Savonarola's books, and if he does not find there all that I have been saying of him, I am willing to pass for a calumniator. What if he had some particular opinions? We do not call people Heretics who only err, but such as join obliquity to error. To conclude, it was not for having groaned under the heavy load of abuses after a Reformation, that he was burnt: but his greatest crime was a state-crime, inasmuch as he preached in a Republic that was divided into factions, the most powerful of which, being opposed by him, put him to death as a seditious person (118).

† Liber Savan.
de Myft. Milie.

(118) Coeffeteau Réponse au Mystère d'iniquité,
pag. 1217.

(119) Rivet, Remarques sur la Réponse au My-
stère d'iniquité,
Tom. II, p. 632.

† Oracolo della riformazione della Chiesa. In Venetia al Segno del
Pozzo. ann.
1560. Index
lib. prohib. sub Clemente VIII.

† 1 Thefl. II.
vet. 4.

(120) We shall see in remark
[M], that his crime included an execrable imposture, viz. his making people believe that he had immediate Revelations.

(121) Rivet, ubi
supra, pag. 633.

This passage did a little surprize the apologist for Mr du Pleffis, and obliged him to give good words. True it is, replied Andrew Rivet (119) that either Savonarola did not know all the doctrine of Luther and Calvin, amidst the darkness of the time, or else he durst not in every point make an open profession of that doctrine, being surrounded by Inquisitors. It cannot be denied however that he saw the necessity of a Reformation in the Church, that he sighed after it, and expected it: and upon that account we place him in general among the witnesses of truth: knowing also, that in several particulars he taught more purely than the Monks of his time, as still appears by the books we have of his, especially by the collections of his Sermons preached at Florence upon the subject of reforming the Church. It is a sign that his writings were not relished by the Church of Rome, since Pope Clement VIII forbids the greatest part of his Sermons, and his Italian dialogue upon truth, to be read till they had undergone a purgation. If this truth were for his advantage, he would not consent to have his eyes shut. . . . It is a great prejudice in our favour his being among the prohibited authors. As for the circumstances of his death, it is very possible that there were some things which we should be unwilling to approve. But that does not at all oblige us to reject what he either did or said well. For in this and other things of the like nature, we follow St Paul's advice, Try all things, and hold fast that which is good, receiving no man, as the author of our faith who is only a man. . . . For the rest, if his crime had only been a state-crime (120), it is not at all likely that they would have burnt him: and what our History had advanced upon the authority of Guicciardin, shews that there was something else, namely that he pressed hard for a council to reform the corrupt manners of the Clergy, and to bring back the state of the Church of God, which had deviated so much, to the model of the Apostles. Upon this account it is that we consider him as one of us, notwithstanding that he was a Dominican (121). All this is weak; for he finds himself obliged tacitly to acknowledge that Savonarola died an idolater, and that he taught several doctrines which Luther and Calvin held in abomination. If his mind was earnestly set upon the Reformation of the Church, that might only concern bad morals, and the abuses which had crept into discipline; and in that case he would not deserve to be excluded from the number of true Roman Catholics. It is not at all to be doubted but that in the most corrupt ages, those who were the most devoted to the decisions of Councils, and to the Pope's authority, were nevertheless sensible that strange disorders were committed in the distribution of Indulgences, and in the election of Popes, and by the non-observance of the rules of discipline, that there was an excessive worldly pomp in the court of Rome, and that it were to be wished a stop could be put to these disorders. Do we not see at this day monks (122), and parish-priests (123) write books against the abuses which are committed in religious worship? Are they for all that the less averse to what is called the sect of Calvin, the sect of Luther? Let us therefore say that Mr Rivet does not extricate himself well. He was to prove that Savonarola condemned the decisions of Councils which Calvin and Luther have condemned. But this is what he has not done; he contents himself with saying, that the Pope did forbid several of Savonarola's pieces to be read till they had undergone a purgation. This remark is too loose, for we know that the congregation of the Index does sometimes take the same method with certain books where there is nothing but trifles, or equivocal expressions, to be corrected. Rivet exposes some faults of Coeffeteau concerning the dispute between John Fisher and Luther; he says (124), that as Fisher does not make the least mention of Savonarola's writings, it is without any reason asserted, that he has shown by all the writings of this great man, that he was entirely against what Luther taught. Rivet also observes, that it is false that Luther quoted anything from Savonarola in point of doctrine; he only said, that he seemed to de-

(122) Father
Mabillon in his traité de igno-torum Sanctorum cultu.

(123) Mr Thiers,
in several books,
and particularly in that of the Dévotion la plus nécessaire & la plus négligée.
See also the tra-tise on the Jubilee of which the Journalists of Trevoux have given an extract in their month of July 1702, édition of France.

(124) Rivet,
ubi supra, pag.
632.

whom the murderers had burnt in divers places. It is nevertheless true (125), that Luther quotes him as an author that is very orthodox upon the subject of justification and the merit of good works; but if he had known that this Monk died in committing acts of idolatry, would he have presumed to reckon him among the saints of JESUS CHRIST?

If you have a mind to know what Savonarola's Orthodoxy was, read this passage of Mr du Pleffis. He explodes human traditions as much as possible in his books, acknowledges no salvation but in gratuitous justification by faith in CHRIST, and to that he adheres without depending upon any other merit: he is for giving the sacrament in both species, absolutely condemns indulgences, and, as well in point of life as in point of doctrine, owns Antichrist to be in the court of Rome. The doctrine of free justification, in particular, is excellently handled in his Meditations upon the Psalms xxx and l, which Possévinus, the Jesuit, acknowledges to have been written by him the evening before his execution. As for his ser-

• Possévinus in Apparat. Tom. I.

mons, and other books, the Index Romanus has maimed and disfigured them at pleasure (126). Since Mr du Pleffis only cites Possévinus, a man, who sometimes judged of books that he had never read (127), it would have been proper that Rivet, his defender, had opposed to Coeffeteau good extracts from Savonarola's works, to the end that the reader might certainly know whether that Monk condemned the doctrine itself of indulgences, or only the abuses in the practice, and whether, setting aside all traditions, he was for retaining nothing but what was contained in the Scripture. It is not at all probable that his views were such, since he approved of monastic vows. It is not a sure way to judge of what an author believed dogmatically concerning gratuitous justification, and the merit of good works, from a work which he composes in order to prepare himself for death; for in that situation people humble themselves as much as they can, and have recourse to the most certain remedy, which is the grace and mercy of GOD (128). Lastly, it is necessary to distinguish whether an author swerves from the decision of councils, or from the particular sentiments of schoolmen. These sentiments did sometimes acquire such a large extent, that they almost hid the decision of the council under their shadow. It may therefore appear that a man, who opposes them, does really swerve from the doctrine of the Church of Rome, but sometimes it is only a false appearance: the doctrine of justification is no longer so great a subject of dispute, since it has been thoroughly sifted and explained: I say this without adopting entirely the following words of Mr Peliffon. 'A great part of Germany is long ago weary of being called Lutherans and Protestants rather than Catholics. They are privately ashamed of having made a breach for the sake of questions that are forgotten, and which

(125) In the preface which he prefixed to the Meditations of Savonarola, Edit.
1523. Mr Sec-kendorf Histor.
Lutheran. quotes
this subtle preface.

(126) Du Pleffis, ubi supra, p. 572.

(127) See the remark [F], of the article MA-CHIAVEL.

(128) See what I have quoted from BELLAR-MINE, in the text of his article citation (2).

him by some authors, justly belongs to him [M]. It is said that the council of Pisa promised cease to be questions, now that people are less warm; and more willing to hear and understand one another: disputes which made so great a noise in the beginning of the schism, and which no body mentions now, concerning justification by faith, or by the merit of good works, concerning the efficacy of the sacraments, by the opus operatum, or by the opus operantis, and other things of the like nature (129).

(129) Pelisson, de la Tolerance des Religions, pag. 141, 142.

As Coëffeteau was a Dominican, and consequently very much disposed to save the honour of Savonarola, I see, without surprise, that he does not complain of Du Pleſſis, for having left out of the long quotation of Guicciardin what concerns the trial of fire. I think it as little strange, that he does not find fault with an explication of his, which is very liable to censure. Guicciardin alleging here, they are the words of Mr Du Pleſſis, no other crime but this, that whereas he had formerly ascribed his predictions to divine revelation, at his death he acknowledged that he had them from the observation and interpretation of the holy Scripture, without doubt of the Apocalypse, which with us signifies the same thing as Revelation, and which we are very well assured is divine (130). This interpretation cannot agree with Guicciardin's text; for as we have seen above (131), that history affirms (132) that Savonarola had not grounded his sermons upon the knowledge of Scripture, nor upon human reasoning, but merely upon a celestial revelation; that nevertheless he confessed before his judges (133) his having foretold things to come, not by a divine revelation, but by a particular opinion into which he had been led by the study of the word of God. It is then evident that there is a contradiction between what he confessed to his Judges, and what he said before: and it is not necessary to point out the illusion of Du Pleſſis; every body may readily perceive it, and conclude from thence, that the force of prejudices is very apt to seduce people, and that it strangely misleads such authors as have a mind to justify, at any rate, those whose testimony seems useful to them.

(130) Du Pleſſis, ubi supra, pag. 572.

(131) In the remark [H].

(132) Guicciardin, lib. ii, fol. m. 44, verso.

(133) Id. ibid. fol. 100.

partial

(134) Jo. Franc. Picus, ubi supra, pag. 112, 113.

(135) In the remark [L], citation (126).

(136) Reaſner, in Diario, p. 79, & in indice.

(137) Heidegger, in Histor. Papat. pag. 191, 192, & in indice.

[M] There is some reason for doubting whether the title of martyr . . . justly belongs to him.] We have seen (135), that Luther gave him this title. Reuſner (136), Heidegger (137), and some other Protestants, give it to him; but Rivet, who had read Coëffeteau, was more reserved, as has been seen in the foregoing remark. It is not very easy to conceive how the Protestants could place among the martyrs of JESUS CHRIST a man who had celebrated the mass, and invoked the saints all his life, and who, in the article of death, had communicated, according to the ceremonies of Rome, with an act of faith touching the real Presence, and with an act of adoration to the sacrament, which he held between his hands. This, according to the principle of the Protestants, was to live and die in the bosom of idolatry, and consequently out of the way of salvation. Now a reprobate and damned person cannot be a true martyr, although even he should lose his life for the sake of orthodox opinions. Is it not certain that if Alexander VI had put a man to death, who preached up the greatest part of the Protestant doctrines, but who at the same time was an Antitrinitarian, the ministers would think that neither such a person's sufferings, nor his declamations against Rome, nor his zeal for the reformation of the Church did any honour to their party? Why? Because dying in the guilt of an heresy, which damns people, he could not be considered otherwise than as a son of Gehenna, and slave to the Devil. The very same thing must be said of those who die in a state of idolatry.

Among so many authors who affirm that Savonarola suffered the punishment of fire for the zeal which had moved him to preach against the Pope, there is not, perhaps, one that has duly examined his trial. It is nevertheless highly necessary to read, with attention, all the acts of a martyrdom, before one pronounces that this or that person died the martyrs of JESUS CHRIST. For if the Judges, who condemn an orthodox man to death, declare in their sentence that they do not punish him for the sake of his opinions, but because he had endeavoured to establish them by seditious ways, he cannot be accounted a martyr, unless it be certain that he was fairly accused of sedition. It is therefore requisite to examine maturely, and without prejudice, all the parts of a trial, and if we find by this examination that the orthodox man was convicted of having spirited up the people to demolish the altars and plunder the churches, and of having even set his hand to the work, we ought to acknowledge that the sentence, which condemns him to death for this cause, is not the condemnation of a martyr. A minister who should return at this day (138) into France, and who should be taken and hanged for preaching privately, would deserve the title of a martyr, altho' even the Judges should expressly affirm in their sentence, that they condemned him because he had acted against the edicts of the prince; but if they grounded their condemnation wholly upon this, that he had been convicted of acting as a spy, and of plotting insurrections in favour of the enemies of the state, there would be no more any room for pretending that he was a martyr. I suppose the proofs to be legal and suitable to the practice of criminal courts with respect to the depositions of witnesses, or intercepted letters, or the accused party's own confession, should it even be extorted by the rack; for this last proof is a legal one in several countries, and it cannot be invalidated juridically under pretence that pain forces some people, of a delicate make, to accuse themselves of what they have not done. It would not be sufficient to say at random, that the Judges had suborned false witnesses, and forged letters: it would be necessary to bring good proofs for this, without resting upon probabilities. All the world knows that the Jesuits are reproached with having converted into martyrs some of their brethren who were punished as state-criminals. The compilers of Martyrologies ought to have the delicacy of Julius Cæsar, who desired that his wife should be not only virtuous, but also free from suspicion (139). If Judges are to be arraigned in the case of martyrdom, things should be brought to a moral demonstration; for otherwise the innocence of the martyrs will be a perpetual subject of dispute, a dubious virtue, and liable to suspicion at least.

I put this question now to those who say that Savonarola was burnt for no other reason, but because he had incurred the displeasure of the court of Rome. Have you read the acts of his trial? Did you find there that he was charged with no other crime but railing at the Pope, despising the excommunications of Rome, and preaching, that the Church wanted to be reformed? In that case I yield the point to you. But as you cannot have read them without finding that among several other shameful confessions which were drawn from him, he acknowledges that his predictions were only grounded upon the consequences which he had deduced from Scripture it is impossible for you to justify yourselves, your report is very unfaithful.

In effect, this acknowledgment of Savonarola convicted him of an imposture that was full of prophana-tion and impiety, since he had said, for some years, that his knowledge of things to come proceeded from an immediate and prophetic inspiration. This, no doubt, was the principal reason which the Judges alledged for sentencing him to be burnt. The manner in which Mr Du Pleſſis Mornai endeavours to reconcile these two things, is wrong; I have shewn the invalidity of it (140). Those who would excuse Savonarola by the goodness of his intentions, do not deserve a hearing; for it is certain that Numa Pompilius, and some other antient legislators had the public interest in view, when they gave out that God dictated to them the ordinances which they established. Is this pretext sufficient to clear them from the infamous character of impostors? But granting that they might be excused, it would be impossible to excuse Savonarola. A Christian, a Monk, who profanes the name of God to such a degree as to put off his particular opinions for immediate revelations, is infinitely more criminal than the Gentiles, who were wanting in their respect for the false gods of Paganism.

(138) I write this in the year 1704.

strange talk on tortur

(139) Τὴν Καὶ οὐρανοῦ γυναικαὶ καὶ διαβολῆς διὰ καθάρσεως εἶναι. Cæsar uxorem etiam criminatam (and not criminals as Xenander has translated) immunitum, Plut. Apoph. p. 306. A. See him also in Vita Cæsar, pag. 712, and Sueton. in Cæsar. cap. lxxv.

the more shame then

(140) In the foregoing remark.

promised his canonization to the Dominicans, provided they would take part against Pope

If you answer, that this was not the true reason of Savonarola's punishment, it was only the pretence, I ask you, is a man allowed, upon certain facts, to give his conjectures, and interpretations, which are charitable, with respect to the party accused, and malicious with respect to the Judges? And after all, this does not justify the persons whose narratives he examines; for they say not a word concerning the motives which the Judges alledged. They decide the point without setting forth the tenor of the acts. Does not this shew a conduct full of temerity and passion?

This does not concern those who acknowledge that the records of the trial charge several great crimes upon Savonarola, but who pretend that foul play was used in drawing up these records, and that there appeared falsified copies of them. Spizelius tells us, that the famous Mr Magliabechi communicated to him several remarks concerning this falsification. 'Quid, quod inquisitionis etiam seu examinis libellus & commentarius duplex fabricatus sit; sincerus unus, alter a Cecone quodam Astuario falsatus & legitimo suppositus referat Timotheo Perusino, cap. 49. Vit. Hieron. §. Qui de iniquissima & sceleratissima pro-† Narrat. ibid. Perusinus, verum & sincerum Processum Hieronymi, ab eodem Cecone nequam, Lucretia de Medici, Leonis Papae X sorori, Jacobi Salviati conjugii fuisse postea concessum, cuius & ipsa lectione commota mitior exinde & equior fuerit. --- Perusinus relates in the same place, that the true and genuine trial of Savonarola was afterwards communicated by the said villain Cecco to Lucretia de Medici, after to Pope Leo X. and wife to James Salviati, and that the reading of it made such an impression upon her as to give her a more favourable opinion of Savonarola from that time.

(141) Spizelius, ubi supra, pag. 662.

(142) Gratianus, de Causis, Viros. illustr. pag. 140.

(143) See the remark [K].

(144) Liplius, Monit. & Exempl. Politic. lib. i, cap. iii, pag. m. 139, 140.

who come under that class, are not at all favourable to our Dominican. One of them declares, without any ceremony, that he was burnt for the imposture and impiety of which he was convicted. Savonarola quot concrematus est (145). -- Savonarola the Dominican was not only learned himself, but likewise a man of great authority among the learned, and an excellent preacher of Christian discipline. His doctrine was thoroughly admirable, if he had not corrupted it by an evil disposition. By his eloquence he induced the people of Florence to dissent from Pope Alexander, and consequently from the institutions of the Romish church. He took upon him a greater authority than the Pope of Rome, as St Peter's successor, had received, handed down to him from God himself. He persisted with an unreasonable obstinacy in defending his doctrine, and boasting of his familiarity with God, which he publicly declared had gone so far as to be admitted to converse with him. At last, being convicted as a liar and impostor, and condemned for his impiety, he was burnt, with some of his under-agents, in the middle of that city which he had deceived. The judgment which Gratianus passes upon him is much of the same nature (146). I cannot tell whether the Judges knew of the letters which Savonarola wrote to Charles VIII, exhorting him to return into Italy, and to reform the Church by the sword (147). They would have found there a just cause to condemn him for treason, for it is an act of rebellion to call in foreign armies: the heads of a faction cannot lawfully use such means to render it the uppermost in their country. On the other hand, it was a strange, if not a mad, project, to think of making the sword of a king of France the instrument of reforming the Church. Did he want him to employ dragooning? Or was it only his desire, that he should oblige the court of Rome, by the terror of his arms, to call a council? But what freedom could there be in an assembly held by the will of a conqueror? Would people dare to give their opinions otherwise than he should think fit.

Divi Dominici sacris initiatus non modo literatus, sed magnae apud literatos omnes auctoritatis, Christianae disciplinae concinator egregius, admirabilis omnino doctrinae, nisi pravo eam ingenio contaminasset, postquam facundia fretus fuit Florentinum populum eo compulerat, ut ab Alexandro Pontifice Maximo, atque adeo ab Ecclesiae Romanae institutis dissentiret, majoremque sibi adrogaret auctoritatem, quam ab ipso rerum optime per manus traditam adlocutus esset Petri successor Rom. Pontifex; de doctrina sua, deque Dei familiaritate, quae se ad colloquium usque dignatum palam profitebatur, fidem equo pertinacius tueri perleverat, mendacitatis & imposturae demum convictus, impietatisque damnatus; in urbis, quam deceperat, medio cum affectis ali-

(145) Pierius Valerianus, de Literat. Infelicitate, lib. ii, p. m. 78, 79.

(146) Gratianus, ubi supra, p. 141.

(147) See in the remark [D] the words of Philip de Comines.

To say something of Savonarola's sentiments with respect to excommunication, I shall observe that the Protestants are mistaken, perhaps when they conceive him to be orthodox upon this point. Take notice, I pray, that on his being excommunicated by Alexander VI, he left off going into the pulpit for some time; but when he perceived that silence diminished his credit, and put a stop to his designs, he began to preach again, and continued to do it till the magistrates forbade him (148). This unequal conduct is neither worthy of a Prophet, nor of a new Apostle: the same reason which hindered him from submitting to the Pope's orders, should have hindered him from submitting to the orders of the magistrates; for if the interests of the great work, to which he fancied himself commissioned in an extraordinary manner, required that notwithstanding the Pope's orders, he should exercise the function of a preacher, since it is better to obey God than men (149), they likewise required him to exercise it notwithstanding the prohibition of the secular arm. There is some probability that he would have alledged the same reasons against a council which he did against Alexander VI, in case the council should have treated him in the same manner that the Pope had done. He would have believed then that there was no tribunal upon earth which could put him to silence; and who knows if he did not fancy that as a prophet he ought to hold immediately of God, and enjoy the privilege of a special commission to bring all his causes directly before the court of Heaven?

(148) Taken from Guicciardini, lib. iii: I have quoted his words in the rem. [C].

(149) Cuius Man- dato (Papae) non obediunt aliter: Deo obediunt oportere magis quam hominibus. Bur- chardus in Dicitur, pag. 46.

Pope Julius II, but that they refused to buy it at that price (n). He wrote many books wherein we find a great deal of unktion and piety [N]. I say something of a letter which he wrote to the Pope, wherein he examines, among other things laid to his charge, (n) Baron Apolog. Ordinis Prædict. Tom. ii, pag. 91.

tyranny

Heaven? The discipline of the Protestants does not allow of such notions: it establishes tribunals which forbid preaching, suspend, and excommunicate; it requires that their authority should be submitted to, and treats as schismatical and contumacious persons, those who shake off this yoke, under the pretence that they have been unlawfully condemned (150).

But what shall we say of the submission which Savonarola promised in his letter to the Pope, dated the twenty-ninth of September, 1497. He clears himself as well as he can from every thing that had been said of him to the Pope; he alleges strong reasons why he had not taken a journey to Rome when the Pope sent for him. He treats as slanderers those who termed it disobedience: he declares that he is ready to retract any thing said or written by him, which his Holiness shall judge worthy of censure. He concludes by submitting his person, his writings, and his words, to the authority of the Church, and to that of the Pope.

Dignetur Sanctitas vestra mihi significare quid ex omnibus que scripti vel dixi sit revocandum, & ego id liberrime faciam; nam & hac vice & semper, sicut sepius dixi, ac etiam scripsi, missum & omnia mea dicta & scripta subijcio correctioni S. R. E. & S. P. cui semper missum & fratres meos ejusdem pedibus prostratus plurimum commendo (151). If he had pretended that as a Prophet, he was exempted from all Ecclesiastical jurisdiction; and if he had been such a man as the Protestants extolled, what I have just now quoted would be the language of a great hypocrite.

Let us observe, that if this Dominican was not an impostor, he must necessarily have been a prodigious Fanatic. I prove it thus: He foretold, among other things, the approaching conversion of the Mahometans, and shewed himself to be so fully persuaded of the certainty of this prophecy, that he declared, that whoever should enter into the fire for the support of it, would come off without receiving any damage (152). If he spoke sincerely, his persuasion was as strong as it could possibly be. Now since the falsity of the prediction makes it plainly appear that he was not inspired, we ought to conclude that his Fanaticism was come to the highest pitch. Every body, I think, must know that the virtue of a Fanatic, his zeal, his mortifications, are not words of a double meaning. It is generally a virtue proceeding from vapours, an irregularity of the organs, a disorder in some fibres of the brain. I am willing to believe that those who have so much cried up the martyrdom of Savonarola had never read the facts which I have mentioned in this remark, nor made the reflexions which naturally arise from them. I must do this justice to Voëtius, that altho' he has disputed the ground by inches in favour of that Dominican, he does not fail to acknowledge that he had somewhat of a vertigo. He does not make him a true Prophet of the New Law, as others have done

(153). 'Ego, ut viri illius sanctitas & zelus communiter describitur & in scriptis ejus, præsertim prædictis elucet, partim politicis conjecturis, (ut erat peripicacissimus politicus), partim ferventissimo studio & forti imaginationi talium rerum, quas prædictabat, & inde ortæ phantasticæ infirmitati ac vertigini prædictiones illas tribuerem' (154). - - - As the zeal and holy life of that man are generally described, and as they shine forth in his writings, especially in his practical ones, I am tempted to impute his predictions, partly to his political conjectures, (for he was a most discerning Politician) partly to his fervent study and strong imagination of such things as he foretold, and to a sanctifical infirmity and vertigo proceeding from thence.

When he says that the Protestants contented themselves with alledging this man to their adversaries as a domestic evidence, and for an argument ad hominem, he shews what they all should have done, but not what they all did. 'Nec obscurè perstringit nostros (Nau-dæus) qui propter communionem scilicet hæreticos virum illum laudaverint. Sed duo illi repono: quorum primum est in illo quinque admiranda prædicari, eruditionem; eloquentiam; sanctitatem & zelum; studium orthodoxiæ & reformationis ecclesiæ: prophetias & hinc tantam ejus æstimationem apud optimum quemque in orbe Papali: nil ergo mirum, si nostri ad hominem (uti ajunt) hunc domesticum testem adversariis suis opposuerint; quidquid ipsi de eo senserint. Alterum est, &c. (155). - - - (155) Id. ibid. pag. 1069. Neither does he (Naudé) obscurely glance at the Protestants, as if they had praised this man on account of his being a joint partaker with them in Heresy. But I say two things in answer to him; first, that five admirable qualities were ascribed to him, learning, eloquence, sanctity and zeal, a concern for orthodoxy and the reformation of the Church, and the gift of prophecy, for which he was so much esteemed by the best of the Roman Catholics; so that it was no wonder if the Protestants in an argument ad hominem (as the phrase is) opposed this domestic evidence to their adversaries, whatever their own private opinion of him was. The other is, &c. It is certain that Savonarola not only knew the corruption of the Church, but also shewed a great desire to correct it. If he had only known it, he had been in the same case with other people; for even the most licentious priests knew very well, that a clergyman guilty of concubinage, simony, &c. was in a disorderly way; but they did not wish for a reformation of abuses. There are few people at this day in Rome itself who do not think that the intrigues made use of for the election of the Popes are an evil; and how many good Papists are there who wish to see a stop put to this disorder, and to several others? What was particular in Savonarola was, therefore his daring to say, that it was necessary to banish the corruption: and upon that footing, the Protestants might place him in general among the witnesses of truth. I do not believe that the compilers of these witnesses have always acted with a suitable discernment. This by the by. If Ferrante Palavicino, who was hanged for his books against the Pope; if the authors of the Syndicat of Alexander VII, and the Historian of Dona Olympia, had lived in the XIIIth or XIVth century, Flacius Illyricus might have put them in his catalogue; nevertheless there are no persons less worthy of that place than such authors.

Note, That there are Protestants who maintain that Savonarola was an impostor. Read the thesis Artes tyrannicas Hieronymi Savonarolæ representant, - - - Representing the tyrannical arts of Jerom Savonarola, which was defended at Lëna in the year 1690, under the presidency of Mr Buddeus.

[N] He wrote a great many books, wherein we find a good deal of unktion and piety. This is Mr Du Pin's judgment upon them: He has composed (says he) a prodigious number of books, moral, spiritual, and practical: they abound in the unktion and maxims of piety: he there freely censures vice, and teaches the purest and the most sublime morality (157). Mr Du Pin has given us the catalogue of this Fryar's works, we find it also in the Appendix to Dr Cave, with a great many particulars concerning the different editions (158). Some of them were put in the Index Librorum prohibitorum & expurgandorum, and there arose a great dispute under Pope Paul IV, whether or not they should all be treated in the same manner; but by the extraordinary vigilance of the Dominicans it was carried in the negative, and it was resolved to stand to what had already been decreed against some of them, and that even these should not be branded as heretical or erroneous: the penalty of suspension was thought sufficient (159). Of all the many books written by Savonarola, none has been more universally approved of than that which is intitled, Triumphus Crucis, seu de Fidei Christianæ veritate, - - - The Triumph of the Cross, or of the Truth of Christianity. Cardinal Onophrius (160), who died at Rome in the year 1646, ordered by a codicil annexed to his last will, that they should cause it to be reprinted in good characters. . . . with the Paraphrase of the same author upon the Miserere, and left five hundred crowns for that purpose (161). Let us observe that Savonarola's book against Judicial Astrology, was printed in Italian, at Florence, in the year 1495, and that it was translated into Latin, and illustrated with notes, by Thomas Boninsegni. This translation was printed at Florence in the year 1581, in 8vo (162). The same book was translated into High Dutch, by Thomas Erastus (163). It is said that Savonarola encouraged John Picus to write against Judicial Astrology (164). The reason that is given for his hatred to know & blab - 2 things

(150) Witnesses what passed in Holland in the year 1667, against the minister Labadie, who among other books caused one to be printed with this title, Traité de faison ecclésiastique & théologique tout ensemble, des Confessions, des Ecclésiastiques, Suspendus, Interdits ou Excommunications, &c.

(151) Savonar. Epist. ad Alexandrum VI, in the Preuves sur l'Histoire de Comines, p. 346. A Proof of Savonarola's Fanaticism.

(152) See the remark [G].

(153) Gurtlerus, (for example) professor of Divinity at Deventer. He proves it by the passage of Philip de Comines, which he quotes according to the bad translation of Sleidan. See his Systema Theologicæ Prebæticæ, cap. xxiv, pag. 430, 431, Edit. Amst. 1702.

(154) Voëtius, ubi supra, Part ii, pag. 1070.

(156) Du Pin, Biblioth. Tom. xii, pag. 115, Dutch Edition.

(157) Ib. p. 116.

(158) Wharton, Appendix ad Histor. Literariam Gul. Cave, pag. 164, & seq.

(159) See Wharton, ibid. p. 163.

(160) He was brother to Urban VIII, and had been a Capuchin Friar. Pierre de S. Romuald, Journal Chronol. Tom. ii, pag. m. 289.

(161) Ibid. See also the Preuves sur Philippe de Comines, pag. m. 346.

(162) Wharton, ubi supra, pag. 164.

(163) Verheiden, in Iconib. p. 15.

(164) Bullart, Académie des Sciences, Tom. ii, pag. 6.

(o) See in the remark [K], the words of Arnol-dus Ferronus.

(P) See Naucle-rus, Geno. L.
Part. ii, pag. m.
989.

charge, the accusation of his boasting that he conversed with God [O]. He had great conflicts with the devils, and rendered himself formidable to these princes of darkness [P]. I must not forget that one of the things which served to make him odious was his affection for the King of France (o). There is room to believe that he was attached to that prince, because having presumed to prophecy that great revolutions would happen, and turning his eyes on all sides to seek out the Cyrus destined by God to fulfil that great work (p), he found none so fit for that purpose as Charles VIII. From that moment he declared him to be the chosen Cyrus of God, and dedicated all his services to him. It is the common practice of these false prophets, and we have examples of it to Astrologers appears to me very chimerical: however, I shall recite it, it will serve to shew the credulity of Florimond de Remond. The excessive vanity of Savonarola, who pretended to be a prophet, was presently found out by the very Astrologers; for as there was a conjunction of Venus and Saturn, and the Moon was in the meridian of her hemisphere, on the twenty-first of September, 1452, at forty-four minutes past five in the afternoon, they immediately saw the pride and arrogance of that Monk. For this reason was he such a bitter enemy to Astrology, having armed Picus Mirandolani against it (165).

(165) Florimond
de Remond, Hist.
de l'Herésie,
liv. i, chap. v.
num. 4, pag. m.
30.

[O] I say something of a letter . . . wherein, among other accusations, he examines that, of his boasting that he conversed with God. There is no doubt but that this is no proof that he himself had acknowledged it expressly. Those who are fond of a devotee, ascribe many more things to him than he himself pretends to. They presently go beyond bounds, by amplifying. If he confesses that God has been graciously pleased to reveal some event to him, and that he partakes of immediate illumination, they officiously decide the manner of it, and affirm, at last, that God converses with him as he did with Moses. Be it as it will, the prevailing opinion was, that he himself pretended to talk with God. Here is a great witness for this opinion. The people of Florence are not foolish, whom, nevertheless, Friar Savonarola persuaded that he conversed with God. It is thus that Gabriel Naudé (166) cites the testimony of Machiavel. I shall give it more at large, to the end that the tenderness of the author, and the occasion of his discourse may be seen. He had just said that, tho' it be more easy to persuade ignorant people into a new thing, it is not impossible to do the same by people of sense. After that, he quotes the example of Friar Jerom. 'Al popolo di Firenze non pare essere né ignorante né rozzo, nondimeno da Frate Girolamo Savonarola fu persuaso che parlava con Dio. Io non voglio giudicare s'egli era vero o no, perché d'un tanto huomo se ne debbe parlare con riverenza. Ma io dico bene che infiniti lo credevano, senza havere visto cosa nessuna straordinaria, da farlo loro credere; perché la vita sua, la dottrina, il soggetto che predicava, erano sufficienti a fargli prestare fede (167). . . . The people of Florence neither seem to be ignorant nor foolish, and nevertheless they suffered themselves to be persuaded by Friar Jerom Savonarola that he conversed with God. I will not pretend to judge whether this was true or false, because one ought to speak with reverence of so great a man: but this I may say, that vast numbers of people believed it, without having seen any thing extraordinary to make them do so; because his life, his doctrine, and the subject that he pitched upon were sufficient to gain credit to him.' We have seen above (168) the testimony of Pierius Valerianus. I could cite a great many others, but where is the necessity of compiling? Do we need any other proofs but the letter which Savonarola wrote to Pope Alexander VI, to vindicate himself from the accusations contained in a brief of the said Pope? The fourth of these accusations is, that he was said to converse with God (169). He answers, that he never spoke so in express words, but that, supposing he had even made use of that expression, he should not deserve to be punished, since there is no law for punishing those who say that they converse with God. He adds, that such a law would be absurd and impious, since no man can impose a law upon God, who may converse with whom he pleases. Quarto dicitur & cum deo loqui: hoc etiam nunquam expressè dixi, nec unquam utroque modo loquendi, ut testis est universus populus Florentinus: quod etiam si dixissem nullam propter hoc incurrerem poenam: non enim invenitur in aliquo loco scriptum, nec in

(167) Machiav.
Discorsi sopra Tito Livio, lib. i,
cap. xi, p. m. 32.

(168) In the remark [M], citat. 146.

(169) Quarto dicitur & cum deo loqui. Savon.
Epist. ad Alexan-dram VI: It is in the Preuves for les Mémoires de Phil. de Comines,
p. m. 317,
& seq. Burchard, in his Diarium,
pag. m. 46, says
In predicationibus suis publicis dicebat Salvatorem nostrum
sepe sibi loqui.
- - - He said publicly in his sermons that our Saviour often conversed with him.

toto corpore Juris Canonici nec Civilis nec in aliquo authentico libro, quod qui dixit se cum deo loqui puniatur: stultum etiam esset & impium facere talem legem, cum nullus possit imponere legem Deo; potest enim ipse loqui cum quibus vult, & eis præcipere ut dicant, Hoc dixit Dominus meus, sicut Prophetæ faciebant (170).

(170) Savonar.
ibidem.

His answers to the greatest part of the other accusations go almost upon the same foundation. He denies (171), for example, that he had boasted of being a prophet; but he maintains, that if he had done so, 340. he should not be liable to punishment. He does not acknowledge (172) that he said absolutely, and with a design to make himself equal to God, If am a liar, Jesus Christ is so. He confines himself to certain particular cases, wherein he pretends that he might lawfully use that expression. He has recourse to a distinction of the like nature, when he tries to justify himself for having said (173), that such as did not give credit to his predictions were out of the way of salvation. I only meant that, says he, of such people as opposed me through a spirit of obstinacy. He was no bad proficient in the art of Sophistry, that art which is so necessary to those who deal in predictions (174).

(171) Ibid. pag.
340.

(172) Ibid. pag.
339.

(173) Ibid.

[P] He had great conflicts with the devils, and rendered himself formidable to these princes of darkness. Naudé puts him 'in the rank . . . of those Monks of whom St Jerom says, qui demonum contra se pugnantium portenta fingunt, ut apud imperitos & vulgi homines miraculum sui faciant, - - - who invent strange stories of their fighting with devils, in order to excite the admiration of vulgar and ignorant people, since the half of the book, which he wrote upon his prophecies, contains nothing else but the conference he had with the devil whom he mistook for a hermit (175).' John Francis Picus affirms, that the devils which tormented the bodies of possessed people, or haunted the convent of the Dominicans, very much dreaded the sight of Savonarola, and that out of pure spite and rage they always pronounced his name, with some alteration or abridgment of the letters. They threatened him often, and fled as fast as they could, being awed by the words which he pronounced against them. He drove them from the cells of the monastery, among other means, by the sprinkling of holy water, accompanied with the singing of Psalms. For this reason they desisted from tormenting the other Monks, and redoubled their efforts against him alone. He was sometimes obliged to stop short, while he was walking the rounds in the convent, with a design to protect the Friars from their insults; for they had thickened the air to such a degree, that he could not go any further. I shall quote my author words; they are more emphatical than the idea which I give of them. Dæmones qui vel obfessa corpora vexabant, vel ad hominum terriculamenta per ades sancti Marci strepabant, mirum in modum ab aspectu Hieronymi formidabant, nec unquam ejus sincere nomen prærabie exprimebant, sed aut literas inverberantes, aut nomen decurrantes aut in aliud ludicrum transformabant (176).

(174) See the remark [K] of the article DE-JOTARUS.

(175) Naudé, ubi
supra, p. 451.

(176) Jo. Franc.
Picus, in Vita
Savonarolæ, pag.
123.

it which are of a fresher date still than that of Drabicius. I do not know whether Savonarola had not attended to a maxim which Machiavel has published since, quoting him for an example of it [Q]. This maxim is, that Prophets who are not supported by the secular arm, nor by any other weapons besides their own tongue and the prepossession of the people, sola Majestate armati, armed with nothing else but majesty, are exposed to terrible changes of fortune. I shall make a remark upon the different ways of writing his name [R].

Juls -
Ho

(177) Id. ibid.
pag. 124.

mkmt

(178) Id. ibid.
pag. 123.

REFLECTIONS
upon a passage of Mr Claude, concerning Luther.

Luther's

(179) Claude
Défense de la Réformation, pag.
136.
Jeau
aux Préjugés Legitimes contre les Calvinistes,
p. 364: the Brussels edition 1683.

† This second question is, whether the Monks in Luther's time used to stuff books with their exploits against the Devil by rhetorical figures like the story which Luther tells of his conference with the Devil, which story Mr Claude would gladly put off for a rhetorical figure.

Et cellas omnes psalmis & aqua sacra guttis seu propugnaculis armatis, sic densarunt aërem (mibi postea sicut ipse retulit) ulterius ut sibi facultas omnino per cenobium incendendi præclusa videretur; hisque sunt illi verbis interminati. Quot tibi malorum aceruas & queris; Nos in te namque tot & tanta concitabimus, ut sustinere non valeas. Ad quæ latus ille respondit, quæcumque vellet pararent & exerèrent, bonum nihil se formidare, quia adiutorium ejus in nomine Domini qui fecit cælum & terram (177). This passage is in the chapter where the author relates the extacies of Savonarola, and that the Holy Ghost appeared in the shape of a dove, and put his bill to that Friar's ear. Silvester ejus vite comes & Martyrii confors, roganti mibi de Hieronymi sanctitate, atque obsecranti ut occulti quippiam in rerum ejus confirmationem (sciebam enim eum multorum secretorum conficium) affirmavit, columbe speciem, quæ sancti Spiritus præsentiam gratiamque indicaret, semel atque iterum se vidisse Hieronymi humero insidentem, argenteis aureisque coruscantem pennis redimitam, & rostro in aurem ipsius porrecto insulurantem (178). - - - Sylvester, who was companion to Savonarola in his life, and partaker with him in his martyrdom, when I asked him concerning Savonarola's sanctity, and begged that he would give me some secret proof of it, (for I knew that Sylvester was well acquainted with many secret particulars of Savonarola's life) assured me, that he had seen oftener than once the appearance of a dove, which intimated the presence and grace of the Holy Ghost, perch upon Savonarola's shoulder, and glittering with gold and silver feathers, whispering him with it's bill in his ear.

In reading this remark, perhaps, some people will call to mind a certain circumstance in the disputes which Mr. Claude had with the gentlemen of Port Royal, and will possibly imagine that these gentlemen did a rash thing, when they challenged him to prove, that in Luther's time the Monks talked loudly of their exploits against the devils. This makes me say, that Savonarola's example would have been of no service to Mr. Claude. Every body knows that the controverted-writers of the church of Rome object, as a very strong argument, the dispute which Luther relates to have passed between him and the devil concerning the nails. Mr. Claude, when he comes to answer this objection, says, among other things, that Luther, following the stile of the Monks of that time, who used by a kind of rhetorical figure to stuff books with their exploits against the devil, relates that once upon his awaking in the night, the devil accused him that he had caused the people of GOD to commit idolatry, and had committed idolatry himself during the space of fifteen years that he had said private masses (179).

The reply that was made to this passage is reduced to three questions, the last of which I leave out: for it is sufficient to mention here the first and second. The first is, whether a sensible person can believe that Luther's story is a rhetorical figure. The second, whether this figure be an usual thing with the Monks (180).

What was said upon the first question would be superfluous here; I shall only speak of the explication of the second.

The second question † may be decided with as little difficulty; for it consists in a fact which it concerns Mr. Claude to prove, and he deserves to be looked upon as a slanderous person, unless he can justify the same by examples. He says, that the Monks of that time used, by a kind of rhetorical figure, to stuff books with their exploits against the devil. We confess that we know no examples of such figures. There are Monks who relate apparitions of devils, but then they relate them as true, and with an intention to make them pass for such. If these apparitions are well-grounded, they were in the right to relate them, and the holy fathers have done so before them. If they have believed them upon too slight a foundation, their credulity is to be censured. If they have related them without believing what they told, they deserve the character of knaves and impostors. But Mr. Claude cannot prove that any one has related stories like that which Luther tells, and with circumstances as particular as those inserted by him, at the same time that he only wanted to make them pass for rhetorical figures. We therefore still expect that Mr. Claude should explain himself upon this point, and unless he do so, he cannot escape being condemned by wise people, as guilty of a dishonourable malignity (181).

It is manifest that Savonarola's exploits against the devils cannot be alledged as a proof of what Mr. Claude had advanced; for they are not at all things that were related by a kind of rhetorical figure.

[Q] A maxim that Machiavel has published since, quoting him for an example of it. I shall cite him according to the French translation of Mr. Amelot, and with his notes. To (182) understand this point well, it is necessary to see whether these Legislators stand by themselves, or depend upon others, that is to say, whether, in order to carry on their enterprize, they are obliged to make use of prayers and entreaties, and in that case they are always unsuccessful: or if they are able to force an obedience, and then they hardly ever fail to succeed. From thence it comes that all the princes, whom I have named, with arms prevailed, and without them were undone. For, besides the reasons mentioned, there is a fickleness in the nature of people. It is easy to persuade them of a thing, but difficult to keep them up in that persuasion. Things should therefore be so well ordered, that when they no longer believe, they may be compelled to believe by force. Moses, Cyrus, Theseus, and Romulus, could never have got their laws to be observed long, if they had been unarmed, as it happened in our days to the Dominican Jerom Savonarola, who was ruined for want of having the means in his hands of obliging those who had once believed his words to persist in their faith, and of compelling the incredulous to believe them †.

[R] I shall make a remark upon the different ways of writing his name. The true name is Savonarola; but the French have been allowed to change the termination a little by saying Savonarole. They should be satisfied with this alteration, and not say Savonarole, as they almost all do. Some have carried their liberty a great deal further; Du Verdier Vauprivas (183) writes Savonarole: Prateolus (184) Savanarola: Du Pleffis Mornai (185), and James Gohori (186), Savonaroola: Florimond de Remond (187) Savanarolle: a disciple of Mr. Buddeus (188) Savanorola. This confirms what I have said in other places (189).

(184) In his Prosopographie, Tom. iii, p. 2350. (185) In Vol. II, of his Histoire de l'Eglise, fol. 304. (186) In the translation of Machiavel upon Titus Livius, lib. i, ch. xi. (187) Hist. de l'Herésie, liv. ii, ch. i, p. m. 121. (188) In a thess maintained at Jena, in the year 1690. (189) In the remark [B] of the article EPHORUS. See likewise the article MONTMAUR, at the beginning of the text, in the margin.

(181) Ibid. pag.
372, 373.

(182) Machiavel,
in his treatise,
Del Principe,
chap. vi.

Whoever reads the Bible with a sound judgment, says Machiavel, (in the 30th chapter of the third book of his Discourses) will see that Moses,
to render his laws inviolable, was obliged to put to death an infinite number of people, who opposed his designs out of envy.
Moses having called the Israelites together, said unto them: Thus saith the Lord, God of Israel, put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbour.
And the children of Levi did according to the word of Moses:
and there fell of the people that day about three thousand men. (Exod. xxxii. 27, 28.)

† Machiavel says, he had persuaded the people of Florence, that he conferred with God (Disc. lib. i, cap. xi.) Nardi says that those of Savonarola's party were called at Florence, Prag-noni, that is to say, the Weepers or Hypocrites:
and his enemies,
Arrabati, that is to say, the mad or undisciplinable
(Hyst. Flor. lib. ii.)

SAWICKI (GASPAR) a Jesuit, was born at Vilna in Lithuania in 1542. He entered into the society of Jesuits at Rome in 1566, and after having studied Divinity, he returned into Poland and taught controversy at Vilna. He was for nine years Prefect of the novices at Cracow, and superior of the professed house five years in the same city. He had in other places no less honourable employments. He was also a preacher. He followed the ambassadors of the King of Poland into Muscovy, and was a great assistance to them during the three years of a close imprisonment he spent with them. Notwithstanding his great age, and his sickness, he was obliged to accept the office of procurator of the Jesuits at Rome, and acquitted himself very well in it: but as he was returning into Poland, he died in a post-chariot near Francfort upon the Oder, the nineteenth of January 1620. He composed many books, wherein, instead of his own name, he took a supposititious one (a) [A]. I do not believe now that it is he, who treated Erasmus ill, in a book published under the name of Gaspar Cichocius [B].

(a) Taken from the Bibliothèque of Alegambe, p. 152.

[A] He composed many books, wherein, instead of his own name, he took a supposititious one. That which he intitled, Anatomia consilii editi de stabilenda pace Regni Polonie, Jesuitis pulsus, was published in 1611, under the name of Gaspar Cichocki. He published in the Polish tongue a dialogue, Curforis & Nautæ in quo de violentia Gedanensium Monialium S. Brigittæ per Hereticos facta proscriptio narratio instituitur; and he took the name of Lunowki. He composed under that of John Golubski, Replica rumorum Polonianum ab heretico Ministro per Prussiam sparsorum. Triplica contra duplicem Ministri Torontensis. Mirabilis concordia, seu potius verissima rabies Evangelicorum inter se, contra Joannem Triviecki Hereticum (1).

(1) Taken from Alegambe, Bibl. Scripior. Societas Jesu, p. 152, 153.

(2) Th. Raynaudus, Erotomat. de malis ac bonis Libris, p. 25.

[B] That he treated Erasmus ill. Father Theophilus Raynaud having mentioned some things very disadvantageous to Erasmus, refers his reader to Gaspar Cichocius: Videndus qui varias ejus impietates & adversus eum judicia sapientum addens Gaspar Cichocius, lib. 1. Alloquiorum cap. 19. & 20 (2). Guy Patin, who knew books well, and had a good library, was short in the matter: it is probable he thought he could hear no news of that book at Paris, since he consulted the oracle at Lyons, I mean the author himself, who had cited Cichocius. Give me leave, says he to his friend of Lyons, to be a little importunate with you: When you see Father Theophilus, try to know of him who Gaspar Cichocius is, lib. 1. Alloquiorum, who writ against Erasmus, and where that book was printed (3). He gives us no account of any answer. As for me, I ingenuously confess I never saw that book: those whom I have consulted about it, told me that they had never heard of such an author. I thought it was Gaspar Sawicki, and I affirmed it in the first edition of this Dictionary; but I am now of another opinion: I find it was a canon and curate of Sandomir. He is cited in a book of Stanislaus Lubieński (4). I have read in Simon Starovolski, that Gaspar Cichocius, born at Tarnowitz, a city of the lesser Poland, was made Master of Arts in 1567, and that afterwards he obtained of Cardinal George Radziwil, this canonry and rectory, and that he composed two books, the one called Anatomia, to justify the Jesuits, and the other Alloquia Oficiana, to refute the errors of Heretics (5). This last work would have brought a great mischief upon him, for he treated the King of England very ill in it; but death freed him from the danger. Fecit . . . librum . . . Alloquia Oficiana dictum, quo Hereticorum errores ostendit ac refutat simul, quamvis successu parum felici, quod minus honorificam in eis Regis Angli mentionem fecisset: tulissetque sane multa acerba & gravia, ni mors senem opportune liberasset (6).

(3) Patin, Tm. letter cxxxvi.

(4) Gaspar Cichocius Canonici & Parochi Sandomiriensis in Alloquiis Oficibus memorie prodidit. Stanislaus Lubieński, Hist. Reform. Polon. pag. 20.

(5) Simon Starovolski, Elog. & Vit. centum Poloniarum Scripior. cap. lxxix, pag. 100.

(6) Id. ibid.

(a) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. p. 616.

(b) Politian. Epist. III, lib. v, & Ep. xviii, lib. xii.

(c) As culx in the feminine gender, and monstrum in the masculine gender. Polit. Epist. viii, & xvi, lib. xii.

(d) See the 12th book of Politian's letters. You will find also three letters of Scala in the fifth.

SCALA (BARTHOLOMEW) a learned man in the XVth century, was born at Florence in the year 1424 (a). He was the son of a Miller [A]; but he raised himself by his industry and learning. He was a domestic of Cosmo de Medicis, after which the Florentines raised him by degrees to several considerable employments, and ennobled him, and gave him a place in the senate [B]. He was also secretary to that Republic (b). He wrote Latin tolerably well for those times, but now and then a barbarism escaped him (c). Politian having criticized on a little Poem of Scala, opened the way to a quarrel, which increased much by the answers and replies (d). It is said that Scala bore him already a private grudge, because several letters he had writ in the name of the Republic had not pleased Laurence de Medicis, who had employed Politian to write others (e). Be this how it will, Scala undertook to write the History of Florence, from the foundation of that city till the year 1450. His work comprehends twenty books, but he only completed five, because death hindered his going on. Nevertheless he lived seventy-three years, for he did not die till the year 1497. He also composed the life of Vitalian Borromeo, and an harangue to Innocent

(e) Scia autem tu quoque literas illum sepe tuas publice scriptas rejecisse, nobisque dedisse mandata, que prima odii livorique in me causa extitit. . . . But you likewise know that he often rejected the letters, which you had written in the name of the Republic, and gave me the charge of composing them, which was the first cause of your hatred and ill will to me. Polit. Ep. xviii, lib. xii.

[A] He was the son of a Miller. It is Leander Albertus who tells us so. Bartholomæus Scala, says he

(1) Descript. Ital. p. 70.

(1), vir doctus, ut potius Mufarum alumnus, quam inter rotas molarum natus videretur. . . . Bartholomæus Scala, a learned man, who rather seems to have been the foster-child of the Muses than one born in a mill. Scala writes himself, that he was of a low extraction. Veni nudus, omnium rerum bonarum egenus ad remp. vilissimis ortus parentibus, multa cum fide, nullis omnino divitiis, aut titulis, nullis clientelis, nullis cognationibus (2). . . . I came to the Republic naked and destitute of every thing, being born of the meanest parents. I brought with me a great deal of integrity, but no riches nor titles, neither dependents nor relations. Politian having called him monstrum fursuraceum, . . . a many monster, gives this reason for it: 'Monstrum quidem qui ex colluvione monstrorum compositus es: fursuraceum vero in prinitio foribus natus, & quidem pistrino dignissimus (3). . . . You are a monster truly, as being made up of a filthy jumble of monsters; and many, as having been born in a dirty

(2) Scala, Epist. ad Ang. Politian. It is the 16th of the 12th book of Politian's letters. Paris 1526, in 4to.

(3) Politian. Epist. xviii, lib. xii.

grinding-house, which is indeed much the fittest place for you.

[B] The Florentines raised him, and gave him a place in the senate. Speaking of this in the letter just now cited, he says: 'Cosmus tamen pater patriæ nostræ me complexus est, recepitque in familiæ obsequia. Interea Florentinus populus ad prioratum me exivit, deinde ad vexilliferatum; tandemque & in Senatorium me ordinem equestrumque collocavit, tanto profecto suffragiorum consensu, ut nihil esse factum unquam popularius multi putarent (4). . . . Nevertheless Cosmo, the true father of our country, cast a favourable eye upon me, and received me into the number of his domestics. In the mean time the people of Florence raised me to the dignity of a prior, afterwards to that of a standard-bearer, and last of all they placed me in the rank of senators and knights, with such an unanimity of suffrages, that, in the opinion of many, nothing was ever done in a more popular way. Politian would have thought, that he had treated him too well if he had said to him, Cabal did as much towards it as merit: He

(4) Scala, ibid.

Innocent VIII &c (f) [C]. Alexandra SCALA his daughter was well versed in the Greek and Latin tongues, as I shall presently shew, and thereby she came to be married to a learned Greek. Politian praised her much, he did not think it at all fit that he should extend to the daughter the reflexions which he had cast upon the father. The daughter on her side had no regard to that quarrel, but answered the civilities of Politian with other civilities.

He pretends that it was a mere sport of fortune. 'De honoribus quidem nihil est quod tibi nimium placeas; vetus enim ludus hic, ut indigni tollantur in altum, videlicet ut hoc quoque posse fortuna declaret, cuius tu solius opus es (5). -- You have no reason to value yourself on account of your preferments, because they are entirely owing to fortune, whose old game it is to exalt men of no merit, on purpose to shew that to this also her power extends.'

[C] He also composed . . . an harangue to Innocent VIII, &c.] The list of his works, if I am not mistaken, is pretty complete in the catalogue of the Florentine writers, composed by Pocciantius, and printed at Florence in 1589. There were then but few of Scala's writings printed. Two learned Danes took care to publish the chief of them, viz. the Florentine History (6), and the Life of Vitalian Borromeo (7). I cannot tell whether the Apologies, which Marullus Ficinus very much esteemed, and the Letter which he writ upon the question, Whether a wife man ought to marry (8), have been published. Apologi centum ad Laurentium Medicem, quos miris encomiis exornat Ficinus in 8vo, libro epistolarum (9).

It is mentioned in the same Journal of Italy. (8) This question was handled by Heinſius. See in Baudii Amores the letter, An & qualis viro literato sit duenda uxor? To which is added the dissertation of an anonymous writer, De Matrimonio Literati, an coelibem esse an nubere conveniat? It is in a collection of several pieces, printed in the year 1606. (9) Pocciantius de Scriptor. Florentinis, p. 24.

(f) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. p. 616.

(6) Oliget Jacobus published it in 4to. It is mentioned in the fourth Journal of Italy 1677.

(7) Christopher Bartholinus published it. It is mentioned in the same Journal of Italy.

SCALA (ALEXANDRA) daughter to one learned man and wife to another, was her self well skilled both in the Greek and Latin tongues (a). Her father was the abovementioned Bartholomew Scala. I have spoken in its proper place, of Michael Marullus her husband. Politian lived in a more amicable way with her than with her father. He praised her often in Greek; she answered him in the same language (b). They writ verses to each other, which were printed: but what Marullus and Politian writ to one another, was the farthest thing in the world from compliments (c); it was a war of erudition, full of animosity and injurious words. The reason why Marullus married Alexandra Scala, was because he would perfect himself in the Latin tongue [A], if we may believe Paulus Jovius: but if we may believe her husband, she was very beautiful, and very virtuous, and why should we doubt that those good qualities, and the employments of her father might not have procured to her the courtship of Marullus? It would be a very edifying thing to see this Poet make verses in praise of his wife [B]; for we scarce see any

(a) Vossius, Hist. Lat. p. 616.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Cum Politiano . . . maledicentissimis epistolis lites extendere. Jovius, Eleg. cap. xxviii.

[A] Because he would perfect himself in the Latin tongue. I shall set down a passage of Paulus Jovius. Nihil jam Græcè doctum esse satis ad laudem putabat, nisi tota patrii sermonis facultas Romanæ facundia jungeretur, PROPTEREA Florentiæ Alexandriæ eruditi ingenii puellam uxorem duxit (1). --

(1) Jovius, Eleg. cap. xxviii.

He did not think it a sufficient praise to him that he was master of the Greek tongue, unless to his native stock he could likewise join the Roman eloquence, for which reason he married, at Florence, Alexandra, a young woman of wit and learning. Mr Varillas paraphrasing according to his custom what he finds in books, enlarges upon Paul Jovius in this manner: 'The love Marullus had for the Latin tongue, made him marry the daughter of Bartholomew Scala (2), who understood and spoke it admirably well. She taught him so well, that Laurence de Medicis found him capable of translating the Morals of Plutarch (3). I have already shewed that Marullus made Latin verses before he married Alexandra Scala; and therefore Jovius says too much, and Varillas, instead of rectifying it, amplifies it. We may compare his pen to spectacles.

(2) The Printers have put Scala.

(3) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, p. 179.

[B] Make verses in praise of his wife.] We are not to believe, that all the verses we find in Marullus's poems to the praise of Alexandra Scala, were made after he married her; we can, at most, only suspect this little epigram to have been so (4).

(4) Lib. iv, pag. m. 80.

Quod tam tota decens, formosaque tota venusta
Rara quidem, sed non unica Scala mea es;
At quod casta, decens, at quod formosa pudica,
Dispeream si non unica Scala mea es.
Nam cum Pieridum reputo commercia sacra,
Jam non ulterius unica, Scala dea es.

My Scala, while I mark and trace
Your ev'ry charm, and ev'ry grace,
I own such beauty to be rare;
Yet others may be found as fair.
But when your heav'nly charms I see
From all immodest tincture free,

Then let me perish, but I find Scala the phoenix of her kind.
While left, as president of wit,
I see you with the Muses sit,
Scala no more a phoenix, is
A goddess mix'd with goddesses.

But if we consider it well, we shall find no expression here that signifies any thing of marriage; mea Scala may as well be applied to a mistress as to a wife; and we see that Marullus makes use of the same mark of tenderness towards Sappho,

Hoc Sappho melior mea,
Cujus facta domi distaque plurima
Præstans ingenium inquinant.

In this my Sappho's overcome, Whose actions and discourse at home
Defile her noble wit.

says he (5), praising the good manners which Alexandra Scala learned in the service of the Muses. All the other verses he made in her praise, do manifestly relate to the time that preceded their marriage. There are some wherein he praises her (6), because when she was about fifteen years of age, she made admirable verses.

(5) Epigr. lib. iv, pag. m. 71.

(6) Lib. iii, p. 64.

Cum versu referas novem sorores,
Vix lustris bene adhuc tribus peractis,
Cum dulci sale seriisque blandis
Ipsam jam superes puella patrem,
Quo nihil gravius facietisque est.

Since e're threes lustrems of your age
Be reckon'd up, you thus engage In Verse and Poetry divine
To be the rival of the Nine;
Since you at such an age excel
Your father who compar'd so well,

Both

(2) Vossius, ubi supra.

any now of this nature [C]: marriage commonly dries up the Poetical vein, which flowed so abundantly for a mistress. But it does not appear that when he made those verses on her, he was her husband. This learned Florentine woman died in 1506 (d).

*Both in the humorous and gay,
And in the grave and solemn way.*

In this same epigram he calls her mea Scala; yet one cannot believe that he was then her husband. Let us see what he says to her father.

Plus multo tamen, ô beate amice, est
Quod Scalas Latio pater dedisti, Aucturam numerum novem fororum
Caelo carmine, castiore vita (7).

(7) Lib. iii, p. 54.

*But this, O happy friend, is more Than all which you have done before,
In that you gave us Scala. She Will one among the Muses be;
So chaste her numbers are, and still
Her life more chaste . . .*

He was not then his son-in-law, when he spoke to him in that manner. That is plain.

[C] We scarce see any now of this nature. There are many modern Poets, who would look upon themselves to be highly reproached for having prodigally spent their praises, if they should be told that they had praised their very wives. They would think that this expression would have more force, than if it should be said of them, that they had praised all from the scepter down to the shepherd's crook, and from the cedar of mount Lebanon, to the hyssop that grows on the wall. They would believe that this idea would give their flatteries the same extent which is given to love, in the following verses (8):

(8) Histoire Amoureuse Gaules.

SCAMANDER, a river of Phrygia near Troy. It was also called Xanthus; but there was a great difference between these two names: Scamander belonged to human language, Xanthus to that of the gods (a). This is the opinion of Homer. Some writers pretend that this Poet means that Xanthus was the ancient name of this river [A], and that Scamander was the modern: others say, that it was called Scamander before it was called Xanthus [B], and several etymologies are given of those two names (b). It is pretended that the waters of that river had the property of making women's hair that bathed in it, of a light colour, and that the Trojan women

(a) See the remark [A].

(b) See the remark [B].

[A] Some writers pretend, that Homer means that Xanthus was the ancient name of this river. Let us first cite what he says.

Ἄντα δ' ἄρ' Ἡραίοιο μέγας ποταμὸς βαυδίνεις
Ὀν ἔανθον καλέουσ' θεοὶ, ἄνδρες δὲ Σκάμαν-δρον.

Contra autem & Vulcanum magnus Fluvius vortibus profundus

Quem Xanthum vocant dii, homines vero Scamanderum (1).

(1) Homer. Iliad. lib. xx, ver. 73.

*With fiery Vulcan last in battle stands
The sacred flood that rolls on golden sands;
Xanthus his name, with those of heavenly birth,
But call'd Scamander by the sons of earth.*

POPE.

Meziriac makes this remark upon it: 'As, says he, Vigenere has well observed upon the Scamander of Philostratus, when Homer gives two names to some things, one according to the gods, and the other according to men; it is to be understood that that of the gods is the ancient, and almost forgotten name, and that of men the modern and most in use (2). He might have cited the scholiast upon Homer to this purpose, and not Vigenere. Τὸν δ' ἰωνύμων τὸ μὲν περὶ γενέσθαι ὄνομα εἰς θεῶν ἀναφέρει ὁ ποιητής, τὸ δὲ μετὰ γενέσθαι εἰς ἀνθρώπων (3). Observe that Plutarch owns that Xanthus was the ancient name (4). He adds, that this river was not called Scamander till Scamander the son of

(2) Meziriac upon Ovid's Epistles. p. 467.

(3) Schol. in Iliad. lib. xx, ver. 74.

(4) Plutarch. de Fluvio, p. m. 43.

Coribas, had drowned himself in it, having lost his senses by an excess of devotion; that is, by having assiduously at the mysteries of the mother of the gods. For so Meziriac (5) explains the Greek of Plutarch. Mauffac explains it otherwise. Τὴν τῆς Ρίης μυστηρίων τελεμάνων αἰονιδίως θεῶν μανθῶ, ἐμμανῆς ἐγένετο. Dum Rheæ mysteria celebrantur derепente conspectus furere coepit (6). -- Being (6) Plutarch. suddenly discovered and seen by those who were celebrating the mysteries of Rhea, he went mad.

[B] Others say it was called Scamander before it was called Xanthus. Meziriac quotes three authors upon this matter. These are his words (7): 'Aristotle (7) Meziriac, book iii. chap. 12. of his history of animals, speaks thus: Δοκεῖ δὲ καὶ ὁ Σκάμανδρος ποταμὸς ἔανθον, ὅτι καὶ τὸν Ὀμήρου ἀντι Fluvius, p. 281. Σκάμανδρον ἔανθον προσεγορεύειν αὐτόν. It seems quotes that Plutarch, that the river Scamander makes sleep of a reddish colour, and that for this reason Homer calls it Xanthus, instead of Scamander. Antigonus paradox 74, follows Aristotle and cites him. Aelian book viii. chap. 21. de animalibus, says the same more clearly still. Ὁ δὲ ἐν Τροίᾳ Σκάμανδρος, ἐπεὶ ἔανθας ἀποφαίνει πύσας τὰς οἰς, πρὸς τὸν Σκάμανδρον τῷ ἔξ ἀρχῆς, ἄλλο ὄνομα ἢ τὸν προσβατῶν ἐπικτηντος χροῖα ἔδετο. τὸν ἔανθον. The river of Troas called Scamander, because it makes the sheep reddish that drink of its waters, has got the name of Xanthus, besides that of Scamander, which it had before.' After this Meziriac says (8), that the river Scamander, according to some, owes its origin to Hercules. That Hero being ready to die of thirst, fell a digging the earth, out of which sprung the head of a river, which from thence was called Scamander, as if one should say σκάμμα ἀνδρός, the digging of a man. There is a scholiast

(11) Stat. Silv. V. lib. iii.

(10) Martial. Epig. xxi, lib. ii.

(5) Meziriac, ubi supra, p. 468.(6) Plutarch. ubi supra, p. 44.(7) Meziriac, ubi supra, p. 468.(8) Meziriac, ubi supra, p. 468.

women made use of that advantage [C]. It is also said that the maids of that country, as soon as they were betrothed, went thither, to offer their virginity to Scamander; which gave an opportunity to a young Athenian to enjoy Callirrhoe [D]. I do not think that

(9) The scholiast upon Homer, in Iliad. xxi. apud Meziriac, ibid. p. 469.

(10) Ξάνθος δὲ ἐκλήθη ὅτι λευκαίνει τὸ ὤμας αὐτῶν. ὁ δὲ ἔκρινεν αὐτῶν. Meziriac, ibid.

(11) Meziriac, ibid.

(12) Plin. lib. ii. cap. ciii. p. m. 252, 253.

(13) Vigenere, on the Scamander, of Philostratus, p. 8. of the first volume, Edit. in 4to.

(14) It is the tenth. They are printed with Demosthenes. See p. 127. of the Geneva edition 1607.

(15) Æschines, ubi supra.

scholiast (9) who says, that the place where Hercules digged the ground yielded some drops of water, because it had been struck with thunder, as a consequence of the prayers which that hero had directed to Jupiter, when he was much distressed with thirst. This scholiast pretends that the river that flowed out of this place was called Scamander, because it caled Hercules, as if one should say Camander, γέννημον καμάτην ακὼν αὐτῷ. He adds, That it was called Xanthus, because the Trojan women, by washing themselves in it, made their hair become light-coloured (10). The author of the great Etymologicon tells us, that this river took its name from Scamander the son of Teucer, who came into Phrygia out of the isle of Crete his native country; but that afterwards this river was called Xanthus, because the three goddesses, before they set themselves before Paris to be judged by him, went and washed themselves in this river, which made their hair light coloured (11). All this overthrows the hypothesis of those, who say that the name Xanthus preceded that of Scamander.

[C] It is pretended that its waters . . . had the property of making the women's hair that bathed in it of a light colour, and that the Trojan women made use of that advantage.] See the proofs of all this in the preceding remark. It had also the same virtue upon sheep, as may be seen by the three authorities of Meziriac; to which I add these words of Pliny: 'In Bœotia amnis Melas oves nigras (facit) . . . rufaque juxta Ilium Xanthus unde & nomen amni (12). The river Melas in Bœotia makes the sheep black . . . and Xanthus near Troy makes them red, from whence also the name of that river is derived.'

[D] And that the maids . . . offered their virginity to Scamander, which gave occasion to a young Athenian to enjoy Callirrhoe.] I will relate this story as we find it in Vigenere. In this river, (as Æschines relates in his epistles) young maids were wont to bathe themselves when they were betrothed, invoking the river in these words, λέγε μὲν Σκάμανδρε τὴν παρθενίαν. Receive, oh Scamander, my virginity. This gave an opportunity to Cimon the Athenian, who was desperately in love with Callirrhoe already promised to another, to hide himself among the bushes that grew along the water-side, and put on a hat of rushes and reeds; and when the damsel came as usual to bathe, and had pronounced in fingering the afore said words, he came out of his ambush, and told her he willingly accepted of it: And so having carried her upon the bank, he presently deflowered her (13). It is certain that this is found in one of Æschines's letters (14), and therefore the citation is just; but Vigenere has not related all that he should have told his readers: It is necessary they should know some other circumstances to make the most instructive reflexions. I say then that Æschines does not speak of this adventure, as of a history learned by tradition, or read in some old chronicle. If he had spoke of it in this manner, we might place his story in the rank of Boccace's novels; it would be more reasonable not to believe it, than to believe it. He speaks of it as of a thing almost done in his sight: 'Ἡμεῖς ἄμα τε τοῖς οἰκείοις τῶν γαμμένων καὶ τοῖς ἄλλοις ὄχλοις παύροθεν τὴν ἐστὶν καὶ τὰ λεῖρά τῶν παρθένων, ἢ ἡμεῖς τοῖς ἐξωτέρω ὄραν, ἰδομένη. Nos una cum cognatis nupturarum & cæteris turbis eminus festum & lavacra virginum quatenus fas nobis externis erat, spectabamus (15). - - - We, together with the relations of the bride's, and the other multitude, looked on at a distance, and saw the festival and batings of the virgins, as far as it was allowed to us strangers. His fellow-traveller was the person, who committed that infamous act; he censured him for it, and found that he was impudent, and alledged for his excuse, that many had played the same trick before. It is necessary also to know the simplicity of the young maid, who was abused: She was fully persuaded that it was the god Scamander who had got her maiden-head; for, four days after, spying Cimon among those that were looking on to see a procession pass, she saluted him with a great deal of respect, and told her nurse, There is Scamander, on whom I bestowed my virginity. The nurse made a great cry, and so the matter was divulged. Τέτλαρον ὕστερον ἡμέρῃς πομπὴ μὲν ἦν Ἀρεσδίου ἐπὶ πομπῇ δὲ αἱ νεῶς γεγαμμέναι καὶ ἡμεῖς τὴν πομπὴν ἰδομένη. ἡ δὲ νύμφη ἰδὼσα τὸν Κίμωνα ὡς μὲν δὲ αὐτῷ κακὸν συνεδίδα ἄμα ἡμοὶ δέωμενον. προσεκύνησε καὶ ἀποβλήσασα πρὸς τὴν τερεὶν ὄρεσιν, τίθη. τὸν Σκάμανδρον, ὃ τὴν παρθενίαν ἰδὼσα, καὶ ἡ τίθη ἀκῶσα, ἀνέκραγε, καὶ τὸ πρῶμα ἔκπυον γίνεσθαι. Cum quatrīdus post pompa esset veneris, & recens nuptæ ei pompæ interesset, nos quoque illam spectabamus. Spontæ autem Cimonem conficatus, ut nullius mali sibi conficium, unâ mecum spectantem, bonorem ei præbuit: & nutricem intuita, Vides (inquit) mea nutrix, Scamandrum, cui virginitatem dedi? quo illa audito, exclamat: itaque facinus divulgatur (16). When we consider that wit and learning never appeared with so much lustre, as in the age that Æschines lived in, we may the better apprehend the fatal power of a false religion. It destroys good sense, it extinguishes the light of nature, and in some sort degrades a man to the condition of a brute beast. Callirrhoe, was born of an illustrious family (17), and was without doubt, nobly educated; and yet the impertinencies of the poets, canonized by the heathen priests, had so much corrupted her judgment, that in good earnest she believed rivers were deities, who crowned themselves with reeds, and could enjoy a woman. In the reign of Tiberius, an illustrious lady was not less simple (18); she believed she had lain with Anubis, and bragged of it as of a great favour. The Monks, who have played so many tricks chiefly to inveigle women, never durst, that I know of, tell them that such a faint would lie with them. The ideas of purity and immateriality have always been strictly joined in Christianity with those of beatification. But I make no doubt, if they would undertake such a thing, but they might bring some devout women, that now are, to believe what the Roman votary of Anubis suffered herself to be persuaded of. This maxim, The corruption of the most excellent things is the worst (19), is verified by the example of religion. There is nothing so advantageous to man, if we consider either the mind or the heart, as to know God well: On the other hand, nothing is so fatal to all the faculties of a reasonable mind, as to know God ill, as the Pagans did. Observe what Homer says, that the priest of Scamander was honoured at Troy as a god.

Τὴν ὕπερβον Δολοπῆον, ὡς ῥα Σκάμανδρε Ἀρνήρ ἐτίτυκτο, θεὸς δ' ὡς τίς το δῆμον.

Hypfenora nobilem
Filiū magnanimi Dolopionis qui Scamandri Sacerdos factus fuerat, Dei vero inftar honorabatur à populo (20).

Then dy'd Hypfenor, generous and divine,
Sprung from the brave Dolopion's mighty line;
Who near ador'd Scamander made abode,
Priest of the stream, and honour'd as a god.

POPE.

I shall make one observation more upon the small effect which the light of learning had against the darkness of idolatry. Cicero admired the divinity of Romulus, because it was not established in the days of ignorance, when it was so much the more easy to put off fictions, because rude and ignorant minds were brought without any difficulty to believe them; but in an age, when learning was already far advanced, and had entirely abolished the ancient barbarity, under which the uncultivated spirit of the first men had been detained. It seems, that from this principle, he would conclude that neither fiction nor imposture had any share in the belief of the Romans concerning the divinity of Romulus. Magis est in Romulo admirandum, quod cæteri, qui

(17) Παρθὸς δὲ τὴν ἐπιφανῆ, illustre patri nata. Id. ibid. p. 125.

(18) See Josephus, Antiq. lib. xviii. ch. iv.

(19) Corruptione optimi pessima.

(20) Homer. Iliad. lib. v. ver. 76.

that this river merited the reputation which it has acquired by the help of the Poets, but, on the other hand, it was more considerable than some fancy [E]. Julia, the daughter of Augustus, had like to have been drowned in it; Agrippa, her husband, was very much affected with the danger she had been in [F], and shewed his indignation, for what had happened, against the Trojans, tho' they ought not to have been made accountable for it qui dii ex hominibus facti esse dicuntur, minus eruditus bonum feculis fuerunt, ut fingendi preclivior esset ratio, quum imperiti facile ad credendum impellerentur. Romuli autem etatem minus bis sexcentis annis jam inveteratis literis, atque doctrinis, omnique illo antiquo ex inculta hominum vita errore sublati fuisse cernimus. . . . Ex quo intelligi potest, permultis annis ante Homerum fuisse quam Romulum, ut jam doctis hominibus ac temporibus ipsi eruditus ad fingendum vix quicquam esset loci. Antiquitas enim recepit fabulas fidas etiam nonnunquam incondite. Hæc etas autem jam exulta præsertim elu-

(21) Cicero, de Republica, lib. iii, apud Augustinum, de Civitate Dei, lib. xxii, cap. vi, p. m. 1036, 1037.

(22) August. ibid. p. 1037.

(23) See the remark [F], of the article OLYMPIAS.

(24) See Suetonius, in Cæsare, cap. 88.

(25) Horat. Ep. i, lib. ii.

(26) Homer. Iliad. lib. xxi, ver. 2.

(27) Huc ab Idæo monte demissus Scamander exit, & Simois fama quam natura majora flumina. Pompon. Mela, lib. i, cap. xviii.

stasas reddere oves creditur: quamobrem Xanthum pro Scamandro nuncupatum ab Homero autumant. As if Aristotle meant that Homer had taken Scamander for Xanthus; for Xanthus is as much as to say fluvius, fair. Let the question therefore be put, whether Scamander and Xanthus be the same or no (28)? If the last half of this passage had not been full of faults, I had not quoted it. I find there first of all this falsity, that, in the time of Aristotle, the river Scamander was not to be found. In the second place, it is false that the words which are quoted out of Aristotle, do prove what Belon designed to prove. Lastly, He should have said that Xanthus and Scamander are all one. I do not criticise upon the other half of the passage. Belon speaks as an eye-witness. I will not bring into question his sincerity, nor give any credit to Thevet, who says that Xanthus and Simois are great rivers. I should be sorry to contradict such a man. They are Lewis Guion's words (29) concerning Thevet; but what I say of it (30), I have borrowed from Belon, a Physician of Mans, out of the second book of his Observations, and I have often heard him relate it, being at Paris, to Postel, whose company I frequented four years. Besides, one called Albert le Bon, who says he was in those parts, and stayed there a whole winter, perfectly agrees with what Belon has written on that subject. I believe Thevet never was there, and that what he writ was only by hearsay. But as on the one side I do not deny what Belon says, I am sure on the other side, that those rivers were not antiently so little. Their waters may have taken another course, either under the earth, or otherwise: So that tho' the Moderns may say, without any hyperbole, what they assert; they cannot engage us to believe that Pliny is mistaken, when he speaks of the Scamander as of a navigable river (31). Scamander amnis navigabilis, & in promontorio quondam Sigeum oppidum, dein portus Achæorum, in quem influit Xanthus (32) Simeonti junctus, stagnumque prius faciens Palescamander. The words of Strabo are not less favourable to me: They teach us that the Scamander having received the Simois, dragged along so much mud and sand, that they had almost filled up the mouth of the river, and formed lakes and morasses (33). This cannot be said of a little brook or rivulet, but of rivers that are pretty considerable.

[F] Agrippa, her husband, was very much affected with the danger she had been in.] The fragments of Nicolas Damascen tell us that Julia had like to have been drowned there, in the year of Rome 738, and that Agrippa was so angry with the Trojans, under the pretence of their not having sent guides to this prince, that he fined them in a hundred thousand drachms (34). This punishment was unjust, for they had not received any notice of her arrival. Behold, will some say, a man who may be put in the number of cuckolds who have been very obliging and kind to their wives. If ever man was a cuckold, Agrippa was: I appeal to the answer that she gave to those who wondered that her children were so like Agrippa: I never am unfaithful to him, said she, but when I find myself with child. Cumque consilii flagitiorum mirarentur quo modo similes Agrippæ filios pareret, quæ tam vulgo potestatem sui corporis faceret: ait; Numquam enim nisi navi plena tollo vectorem (35). Suetonius observes that one of the reasons why Tiberius made some difficulty to marry Julia was, because she had been too free with him during her marriage with Agrippa (36). How often were the galants of that prince put to the torture? Pliny reckons this inquisition among the misfortunes of Agrippa (37). The cuckoldom of this favourite is therefore a certain thing: but can his good nature towards her be sufficiently proved by the indignation he shewed against the Trojans? I do not believe it; for it is probable his love for Julia was not the true cause of his anger; it was an effect of policy. He was angry, either to make Augustus believe that he seriously espoused the interest of Julia, or to maintain his credit. A subject married gulariter, book ii, ch. vi, p. 182.

(28) Belon, Si-

(29) Louis Guyon, Diver-

les Leçons, Tom. i, book ii, ch. 2, p. 261.

(30) He had just before quoted Belon's words, about the smallness of those two rivers.

(31) Plinius, lib. v, ch. xxxi, p. m. 610.

(32) Pliny should have said that Xanthus and Scamander are the same river.

(33) Strabo, lib. xiii, p. 410.

(34) Nicol. Damascen. in excerptis à Valerio editis, p. 418.

(35) Macrobius Saturnalis, lib. ii, cap. v, p. m. 275.

(36) Julia more improbatum ut quam sensisset sui quoque sub priore marito appetentem quod iam vulgo etiam estimabatur. Suetonius, in Tiberio, cap. viii.

(37) In tormentis adulterii compungitur. Plinius, lib. viii, cap. viii, pag. m. 22.

it. Strabo criticises upon Homer concerning the spring of the river Scamander [G]. There were other rivers of the same name [H]. I shall not have much to say against Mr Moreri [I].

married to the daughter of his sovereign, is not at liberty to forbear punishing such as dishonour his wife: Whatever he may be inwardly, he is outwardly obliged to appear on such occasions revengeful. Besides, Agrippa knew very well, that the Trojans had not grounded their conduct upon any discontent which he could have to his wife. Thus, the contempt they might have shewed for her, had fallen upon himself; and consequently he thought himself obliged, out of policy, to punish them for it, to teach all subjects to fear and honour him.

[G] Strabo criticises upon Homer, about the spring of the Scamander. That Poet says, that this river had two springs, the one cold, and the other hot, near Troy (38); but Strabo (39) assures us, that it had only one spring upon mount Ida, and that this spring was cold. He conjectures the hot spring was destroyed, and consequently he does not accule Homer of being mistaken in that point.

[H] There were other rivers of the same name. There was one of them in Sicily (40), near Egella, and another in Boeotia. The latter was a monument of the frailty of the female sex. The matter of fact was thus. Deimachus, the son of Eleon, accompanied Hercules to the expedition of Troy. The war grew long, he designed to divert himself with a young maid that was much in love with him. She was the daughter of Scamander, and was called Glaucia. She at last moved Deimachus, he gratified her desires, and got her with child.

Some time after he was killed in a battle. Glaucia, who was afraid she could not hide her fault, fled to the protection of Hercules, and told him all that had passed between Deimachus and her, and found him a man full of compassion, who, besides, was glad that the race of his friend was not extinct. He carried her into Boeotia with the son of which she was delivered, and put her into the hands of Eleon. This son was called Scamander, and reigned in the country. He gave his name to the river Inachus (41).

[I] I have not much to say against Moreri. I. According to him, Castaldus assures us, that the Scamander is at present called Simois; but Ortelius cites Castaldus, to prove that the modern name is Simoeres (42). II. It is too general an expression to say, that this river falls into the Ægean sea. He should have said, that its mouth is at the promontory of Sigeum (43). III. These words epotaque flumina Mædo prædente, are ill placed immediately after these, Herodotus in 4to, relates, that the army of Xerxes dried it up; for there is none but would imagine that this Latin is the translation of the very words of Herodotus: which is false. It is Juvenal whom he ought to have cited for these Latin words (44). He ought to have cited Herodotus, 'Ἀπὸ τῆς τοῦ ῥέματος, καὶ ἀπὸ τῆς τοῦ ῥέματος, τῆς τε καὶ τοῖς κλῖμασι πινόμενοι. Hunc (Scamandrum) profluentem sua aqua defluit nec hominibus jumentisque potantibus sufficit (45).

(41) Taken from Plutarch in questionibus Græcis, p. 301.

(42) Ortelius, in Thesuro Geograph. Voce Scamandrus, in Edit. Hancov. in 4to.

(43) Strabo, lib. xiii, p. 411.

(44) Juven. Stat. X, ver. 177.

(45) Herodot. p. m. 400.

(38) Homer. Iliad. lib. xxii, ver. 147.

(39) Strabo, lib. xiii, p. 414.

(40) See Strabo, lib. xiii, and Diodorus Siculus, lib. xx.

(a) It was in the year 1648.

SCHEFFER (JOHN) Professor in the university of Upsal, and one of the most learned men of his time, was born at Straßburg in 1621. He was not thirty years old when he went into Sweden, where Queen Christina gave a favourable reception to all learned men. He had already shewed his learning by the works he had published [A]. The professorship, to which he had been called, was given him (a) in the university of Upsal, by the care and interest of the Barons Skytte. It was the same professorship that Freinshemius had, and which he left to be the queen's library-keeper; it was, I say, the professorship of Eloquence and Politics (b). Scheffer gained great applause in this professorship, and was much esteemed by the learned Christina, who settled a very good pension upon him, which she paid him even after she had abdicated her dominions. He composed, by her order, some books [B]. His employments multiplied afterwards, for he was made library-keeper of the university of Upsal, Regius professor honorary of the Law of Nature (c), and member of an academy which was wholly taken up in illustrating the Swedish antiquities. The works he published in this last quality are a most illustrious proof of his diligence, and of his zeal for the honour of that nation. He died the twenty-sixth of March 1679 (d). The catalogue of his writings has been printed more than once [C].

(b) It was founded by John Skytte in the year 1625.

(c) Professor Juris Naturæ ac Gentium.

(d) Taken from his Elegy prefixed to a book printed at Amsterdam in 1698, with this title, Job. Schefferi Miscellanea, which differs only from the Lectionum Academicarum Liber, printed at Hamburg 1675, as to the title and some Prolegomena.

(1) Prefixed to his Miscellanea, at Amsterdam 1698.

(2) In 8vo.

(3) Likewise in 8vo.

[A] He had already shewed his learning by the works he had published. These three are mentioned in his elegy (1): Dissertatio de varietate Navium, printed in 1643, in 4to. Agrippa liberator seu de novis Tabulis, printed in 1645, in 120. Æliani variae Historiæ Notis illustrata, printed in 1647, in 8vo.

[B] He composed, by her order, some books. Queen Christina obliged him to translate out of Greek into Latin the Strategicum Mauriti, and to illustrate the Philosophy of Pythagoras. The Strategicum and the Æliani Tabula, which he caused to be printed (2) in Greek and Latin, with notes, at Upsal, in the year 1664, were never printed before. He published the same year, and in the same place (3), an essay of his enquiries into the Philosophy of Pythagoras, De natura & constitutione Philosophiæ Italice seu Pythagoricæ Liber prodromus magni Operis de Philosophia Pythagorica, de Vita Pythagoræ, & de claris Pythagoricis.

[C] The catalogue of his writings has been printed more than once. He himself prefixed it to his Lectiones Academicæ, published at Hamburg, 1675; and he informed his reader that the catalogue of his books had been added by his Bookfeller to his Political Dissertations upon Livy, in the year 1665. From that time, continues he, my friends have exhorted me from several places, to publish the sequel of that catalogue. I do it, the more willingly, because I am certain it contains some works, that are not known in foreign countries, and that lie here in the dust, either through the negligence of my Bookfeller at Upsal, or for other reasons. Quem (Indicem) eo libentius juris facio publici quo scio certius, esse quæ foveat Librarij Upsalensis, siue causis aliis hic jacent pulvere sepulta, & iccirco alibi ignorantur (4). I shall observe, by the by, that it is of great importance to an author, that his works be printed by a Bookfeller who knows how to sell them; for among idle or unskillful Bookfellers, the best books lie upon their hands. There is to be seen a more exact catalogue of the works of Schefferus in Suecia literata; and we have a new one prefixed to a book sold at Amsterdam as printed in 1698, with the title of Job. Schefferi Miscellanea. It is divided into four classes. The first contains what he has writ concerning Sweden: I will only mention the Upsalia Antiqua, cujus occasione plurima in Antiquitatibus Borealibus & gentium vicinarum explicantur. This work was printed at Upsal in 1666, in 8vo. The author has left it to his heirs, corrected and enlarged. De situ & vocabulo Upsaliæ Epistola deservior, at Stockholm, 1677, in 8vo. Memorabilium Sueciæ Gentis Exemplorum Liber, at Hamburg, 1671, in 8vo. De tribus orbibus aureis nuper in Scania erutis in terra Disquisitio Antiquaria, at Stockholm, 1676, in 8vo. De antiquis verisque Regni Sueciæ Insignibus, at the same place, 1678, in 4to. Lapponia seu Gentis Regionisque Lapponum Descriptio accurata cum figuris, at Francfort, 1673, in 4to. This work was printed in English at Oxford, 1674, in High Dutch at Nuremberg the same year, in 4to, and in French (5) at Paris, in 1678, in 4to. It was found very much enlarged in the

(5) Father Lubin is the author of that version.

SCHEIBLERUS. SCHESTED.

the study of the author. Suecia Literata seu de Scriptis et Scriptioribus Gentis Sueciae, Opus postumum, Stockholm, 1680, in 8vo. There is in it a catalogue of the Swedish writers and of foreigners who have writ books in Swedish. It is disposed, not according to an alphabetical order, but according to Chronology. There is a great defect in the index, for the authors are placed in it only according to their Christian names. The author, perhaps, would have mended that fault, if he had been alive when it was printed. Mr Mollerus has given a second edition (6) of it, and has added many curious and instructive remarks to it; Hypomnemata, as he calls them, Historico-Critica paucula à pluribus selecta. The supplements he has made to the article of our Scheffer, may be of very great use to those who would know the circumstances or dependencies of the writings of this professor. The second class of his writings contains Autores Græci et Latini illustratos. You may see there that he has published, with Notes, the Panegyric of Pacatus (7), the various Histories of Ælian, the Fables of Phædrus, the Fragments of Petronius, Justin, Hyginus, Obsequens, &c. The third class contains the Miscellanies, that is to say, the work I have already mentioned, de Philosophia Pythagorica, and his book de Militia navali Veterum, printed at Upsal in the year 1653, in 4to, which was found with so many corrections and additions in the study of the author, that it is a new work (8). That de Antiquorum Torquibus, printed at Stockholm in 1656, in 8vo. That de Re Vebiculari Veterum, cum Pyrrhi Ligorii Libro ejusdem argumenti ex Italica Lingua in Latinam versis et Animadversionibus illustrato, printed at Francfort in 1671, in 4to. That de Arte pingendi, printed at Nuremberg in 1669, in 8vo. Index in Libros Grotii de Jure Belli et Pacis. Consilium de Institutione Literaria, &c. The fourth class contains the books not printed, which consist of Notes upon the author of the book concerning the Pre-Adamites, of Letters, Harangues, Programs, Adversaria, &c. In the supplements of Mr Mollerus to the second edition of Suecia Literata, it is observed, that there were published after the death of the author, Breviarium Politicorum Aristotelis, at Stockholm, 1684, in 8vo, and Hugo Grotius de Jure Belli et Pacis, in 8vo, and Hugo Grotius de la Gardie, enucleatus, usum Gustavi Adolphi Comitiss de la Gardie, enucleatus, at Stetin, 1693, in 12mo. Observe that Scheffer, under the supposititious name of Constantinus Opellus (9), printed a letter, wherein he attacks the book of Mark Meibomius de Trirerum fabrica, published at Amsterdam, 1671, in 4to.

(8) Quos in auctoris mutatis atque emendatis reliquit Schefferus, ut haberi possint pro auctoris novis.

(6) At Hamburg 1698, in 8vo.

(7) At Stockholm, in 1651, & 1668, in 8vo.

(9) Joh. Mollerus, Hypomnemata, ad Sueciam Literatam, p. 460.

(a) In Germany in the county of Waldeck in the circle of Westphalia.

(b) In Latin Tremonia. It is in the county of Marck, in the circle of Westphalia.

(c) Taken from the Theatre of Paul Freher, p. 571, 572. The death of Scheiblerus is put there on the 21st of November; but his son has put it on the 10th according to the old style, which is the 20th according to the new.

SCHEIBLERUS (CHRISTOPHER) was born in the year 1589 at Armsfeld (a) where his father was minister. He made such a considerable progress in his studies that he was appointed professor of the Greek tongue in the university of Gießen, and afterwards of Logic and Metaphysics in the year 1610, when he was no more than one and twenty years of age. In the year 1614 he was made professor of Natural Philosophy. He behaved in his employments with great diligence, till such time as the university was transported from Gießen to Marbourg in the year 1624. He was called in 1625 by the magistrates of the imperial city of Dortmund (b), and accepted of the place which they offered to him of superintendent of the church and rector of the college. He contented himself with these during his whole life, for he always refused the more considerable employments that were presented to him elsewhere. He was going to preach a sermon in praise of Luther on the tenth of November 1653, when he was surprised with an Apoplexy of which he died suddenly in the vestry (c) of St Mary's Church (d). He was a laborious man, and most assiduous in discharging his painful functions. He preached twice a week and gave several lectures every day. He taught Divinity, Metaphysics, and Hebrew, and pretty often caused Thebes to be maintained before him (e). He published divers books [A]. Among other children he left JOHN SCHEIBLERUS, who has been professor of church-history in the university of Gießen.

(1) Witte, Diarium Biographicum, ad 10, Nov. 1653.

(a) See the book intitled, Le Comte d'Ulfeld, Nouvelle Historique, printed at Paris in 1677.

(b) See the remark [L] of the article U L F E L D.

(c) Memoir, pag. 141, Dutch Edit.

[A] He published divers books. You may find a list of them in pag. 572, of the Theatre of Paul Freherus, and a better still in the Diarium Biographicum cum (1). I shall only speak of his Logic, which of all his writings, had the greatest run. He began with publishing, in the year 1613, the Introductio Logica; he added to it, in the year 1614, Commentaria Topica; and, in 1619, the treatise de Propositionibus, and another, de Syllogismis et Methodis. Then the work was compleat. There have been several editions of it; but many errors crept into them. The author revised and corrected it some time before his death, a Bookfeller having undertaken to publish a new edition of it, which he actually did in the year 1654, in 4to. It is better than the foregoing editions, without even excepting the Geneva one (2), in 1651 (3). We must observe that Scheiblerus had published his Metaphysics before the two last parts of his Logic were printed. He understood perfectly well the subtleties and abstract notions of the schools.

(2) They call it Ebradunensis in the title of the Gießen edition. This makes me believe that the Geneva Bookfeller, caused to be put in some of the copies, Ebraduni, that is at Iverdun, a town of the Canton of Bern, where they printed for the Bookfellers of Geneva.

(d) See the Epith Deductory of the Logic of Scheiblerus, in the Gießen edition 1654.

(e) Freher in Theatre, pag. 572.

(3) Taken from the preface of Scheiblerus's Logic, in the edition of Gießen, 1654.

SCHESTED (ANNIBAL) a Danish nobleman of great wit and merit, married a daughter of Christian IV King of Denmark, sister of the Countess Eleonora, of whom I shall speak in the article of Count Ulfeld. It has been said (a) that this count and Mr Schefted loved, both at once, the Countess Eleonora, and that this rivalry was the cause of the great hatred that was between them all their life. They were always on different sides; and when Mr Schefted pleaded the cause of the king, who wanted to divorce his wife, the other pleaded for the queen. The Judges pronounced sentence in favour of the wife against the husband, and the breach was made up soon after. Mr Ulfeld married the Countess Eleonora; his rival afterwards married one of her sisters: but his hatred continued, and it is said that he gave sad proofs of it when this count was detained prisoner at Malmoë by the Swedes (b). The Chevalier de Terlon (c) tells us, that Mr Schefted was made prisoner near Copenhagen by a Swedish party, and that the great civilities which the King of Sweden shewed him, made him suspected by the court of Denmark; and on the other side the Swedes suspected that he had suffered himself to be taken on purpose, that he might send advice to Copenhagen of what passed in their camp. This Chevalier says hereupon, that Annibal Schefted always gave to the King of Denmark constant proofs not only of a great respect, but likewise of all the zeal and fidelity that a prince can can expect from the most affectionate of his subjects. He was sent ambassador into Sweden after the treaty of peace concluded the twenty-seventh of December 1659. You will find in the Supplement of Moreri (d), that he died at Paris the twenty-third of October 1666, aged fifty-eight years, and that he was there as plenipotentiary of Denmark for the negotiation of a treaty of peace. (1) At the word Hannibal.

SCHILLER (ELIAS) published in the German tongue a book of controversy, which was confuted by a professor of Divinity at Franeker, in the year 1641. That professor's name was Nicolas Vedelius: he informs us that Dr Schiller's book had been printed a very few years before at Cologne, under the title of The Grounds of the Catholic Truth, that it was a piece well digested and extremely capable of imposing upon the people, and that it was not at all surprising if such a book, considering the situation of affairs at that time, had shaken or perverted several Protestants in Germany: that the author, who presumed too much upon the force of his pretended proofs (A), and who had forsaken Lutheranism to embrace Popery, did at bottom exhibit nothing else but quirks and cavils, and only fought to withdraw the decision of controversies from the tribunal of Scripture (a).

[A] He presumed too much upon the force of his pretended arguments.] Some of hisrodomontados appear in the following words of Vedelius: 'Placet autem Schillerus in labore isto sibi adeo, ut capite nono gloriatur libellum suum esse invictum & irrefutabilem: concidere per eum, totum ministerium Evangelicorum, Confessionem Augustanam, formulam Concordiæ, Catechismi, Reformationem, preteritionem SUB UTRAQUE & omnia. Etiam quomvis indolentem & imperitum Scripturæ Laicum posse omnia nostra beneficio sui trahere refutare, & e contrario totam Catholicam, ut loquitur, Religionem defendere. Hinc capita singula ferè Thrasionica jactatione concludit: Quid quæso, ait, adversum hæc dici potest? Et cap. 14. ex argumentis suis quibus probare volebat Ecclesiam Romanensem habere assentientiam perpetuam Spiritus S. educit confectiones, quas irrefragabiliter inde sequi pronunciat. Eodemque capite gloriatur se posuisse fundamentum Catholicæ veritatis, quod nullo modo everti & concuti possit: idque adeo declarasse & probasse ut etiam idiota & Scripturæ Sacre ignarus quivis homo non solum tuto & infallibiliter superstruere possit omnes & singulos articulos suæ Catholicæ Religionis & fidei, sed etiam omnibus Hæreticis uno ictu os obturare, & omnes ipsorum fidei Confessiones prosternere queat, &c. Sic ille ipse de suo opere judicat oblitus cum reliquâ veritate etiam moniti à Spiritu S. profecti: laudet te os alienum, &c. (1). -- Schillerus, says he, is so pleased with his performance, that in the ninth chapter he proudly asserts his book to be unanswerable: and that by it the whole ministry of the Protestants, the confession of Augsburg, their form of concord, their catechism, reformation, their pretensions of communicating in both species, &c. fall to the ground at once. That by the help of his treatise any ignorant layman is able to confute all our arguments, and to defend every part of the Catholic religion, as he calls it. There is scarce a chapter which he does not end with a vain-glorious insult: and what, says he, can be answered to these things? In the fourteenth chapter, where he endeavours to prove the continual presence of the Holy Ghost with the Church of Rome, he draws consequences from his arguments, which, as he says, follow incon- testably. And in the same chapter he boasts, that he had laid down a true and unalterable foundation for the Catholic truth; and this he pretends to have made so certain, and clear, that any simple or illiterate man, who knows nothing of the Bible, may not only safely and infallibly build every article of his Catholic faith upon it, but may likewise be capable of putting Heretics to silence, and demolishing all their creeds at a blow, &c. In this manner does he extol his own work, forgetting, among other sacred truths, the wholesome advice of the Scripture, which says, Let the mouth of another commend thee, &c. Vedelius undertook to confute him, because he heard that a Protestant gentleman, being staggered with the reading of his book, was ready to fly off. He spent no more than eleven days in confuting him, amidst his other public and private business (2). His answer contains 125 pages in 12mo. (2) Idem, ibid.

SCHILLING (CHRISTOPHER) was one of the learned men of the XVIIth century, especially in Greek (a). He was a native of Franckenstein in Silesia, and taught first at Hirschberg in his own country, and afterwards in the Palatinate, and at last he was admitted Physician in the university of Padua. The reason that made him leave Hirschberg, was because he had a dispute concerning the Eucharist with Balthasar Tilesius, minister of that place; for he inserted in the Catechism which he dictated to his disciples, certain things which he had of Melanchthon (b), and which did not please Tilesius. The conclusion of this dispute was, that Schilling lost his place, as I have already observed in the article of David PAREUS. He retired into the Palatinate, and was made rector of the college, which the Elector Frederic III founded at that time at Amberg. It was in the year 1566. He was afterwards rector of the college of Heidelberg, from whence, I think, he went away because of some dispute about precedence. He is an author [A].

(1) Nicol. Vedelius, Prefation. Ecclesiæ. Catholicæ, folio 42.

[A] He is an author.] There is a collection of his Greek and Latin poems, printed at Geneva in the year 1580 (1), and some letters upon questions of Physic, in a collection of pieces printed in 1598 at Franecort (2).

(a) See the Life of David Pareus, pag. m. 8, 11, 12, 25.

(b) He had been Melanchthon's Disciple at Wittemberg for the space of nine years.

(2) Linden, renovat. p. 180.

SCHOMBERG (NICOLAS OF) Cardinal and Archbishop of Capua in the XVIth century, was a German, of the noble and ancient family of Schomberg in Misnia. He had been a Dominican friar, and it was Savonarola who gave him the habit at Florence in 1497 (a), and who by his preaching had stirred up in him a desire of entering into that order; for Schomberg travelled into Italy only out of curiosity. He had several employments among the Dominicans; he taught Divinity at Rome and Florence; he was prior in a convent of the latter city, and was made Procurator-general of that order by the choice of the famous Thomas de Vio who was General of it, and who has made himself so well known under the name of Cardinal Cajetan.

VOL. V.

X

(a) According to Seckendorf, Hist. Luther. lib. iii. pag. 93. It was in the year 1495.

(b) Cardinal Palavicini, ubi infra says it was Clement VII. (c) Ex Bibl. Ordin. Prædic. Altamura, p. 271. (d) Id. ib. Ruperzæus, Nomenclat. Cardinal. pag. m. 125. Lettere di Principi, lib. iii, fol. 33. Ughellus, Tom. vi. in Archiep. Capuan. (e) Oldoinus, Athen. Roman. pag. 506. (f) It is to be found fol. 33, of the third book, printed at Venice in 1581. (g) Palavic. Hist. del Concil. lib. iii, cap. xvi, ex Relatione Legati Soriani. M. Seckendorf, Hist. Lutheran. lib. iii, pag. 92, demus. (b) Altamura, ubi supra.

Cajetan. Leo X (b) gave to Schomberg the Archbishopric of Capua in the year 1520. Clement VII made him one of his most intimate counsellors, and sent him into France to negotiate a peace between Charles V and Francis I. As he was not a very acceptable man to the French, he had much ado to obtain leave to be at the conferences of Cambray, where he contributed much to the peace that was concluded there. Paul III made him a cardinal-priest by the title of Saint Sixtus in the year 1535 (c). It is said that even before he was made a cardinal, he had like to have been elected Pope in the conclaves, wherein Hadrian VI and Clement VII were chosen (d). He preached five sermons before Pope Julius II upon the temptation of JESUS CHRIST, which were much esteemed [A]. There are some of his letters in the collection of those of princes (e), and one among the rest upon the death of Sir Thomas More chancellor of England (f). It is said that he was cousin of the nun who was married to Luther (g). He died at Rome September 29, 1537, aged a little more than sixty-five years, and was buried in the convent della Minerva near Cardinal Cajetan his good friend (b). Consult the History of Lutheranism by Seckendorf, pag 92. lib. iii. You will find a fine elogy upon this prelate prefixed to each of the two dialogues of Alcyonius de Exilio.

[A] He preached five sermons . . . which were much esteemed.] He preached them in the year 1505 (1). They were printed in the year 1511. The very next year they were re-printed at Leipzig (2), where (2) By the care of John Schleiniz his cousin, Bishop of Meissen. Seckend. ibid.

they were also printed again in the year 1684 (3). (3) Afta Erud. because the copies of them were become very scarce. Altamura had no reason to say, that these sermons were preached before Leo X; for they came out of the press before the creation of that Pope.

SCHOMBERG (THEODORICUS OF) a German gentleman, served in the army of the Reifters, which Prince John Casimir, son of the Elector Palatine brought into France, to the assistance of the Protestants in the year 1567, and performed a very courageous action at the passage of the river Seine [A]. He continued afterwards to do a great many good services, till he was killed at the battle of Ivry in the year 1590, having given great proofs of his valour, and contributed notably to the victory which Henry IV gained (a).

(a) Thuanus, lib. xcvi. Di. vila, lib. xi.

[A] He performed a very courageous action at the passage of the river Seine.] The Royalists had cast into the ford, planks nailed with circles and caltrops, and were in order of battle on the other side of the river. The Protestants placed four hundred Arquebusers, by the willows on the banks of the river, for a guard to those who cleared the ford with rakes. Schomberg threw himself into the river across all this, and made so brisk a charge upon the enemy, that he killed forty upon the spot, and brought two standards to the Prince of Condé, who having no order of knighthood to give him, put about his neck a chain worth two-hundred crowns at the head of the army (1). (1) D'Aubigné, Tom. i, liv. 14, ch. xv.

(a) Thuan. lib. xxv. (b) Magnis Germanorum exercitiis cum supremi castrorum Tribuni dignitate præfuit. Thuanus, lib. xcvi. M. le Laboureur, Addit. to the Memoirs of Castelnaud, says that he had that command under the title of Colonel of the Black Bands. (c) See Thuanus's Life and his History, lib. xcvi, ad ann. 1599.

SCHOMBERG (GASPER DE) Count of Nanteuil, a German gentleman of an ancient family in Misnia [A], being in France during the religious wars, was so much esteemed, that Charles IX took him into his service. He was at first engaged in the Huguenot party; for while he studied at Angers in the year 1562, he put himself at the head of the Protestants, to hinder the Catholics from making themselves masters of that city (a); but not having succeeded in his design, he retired to the Prince of Condé, who sent him into Germany to carry letters to the Duke of Deux-Ponts, to hasten the levies that were expected from him, and to the Landgrave of Hesse, to obtain assistance of men and money. He became afterwards a Royalist, and very much thwarted the designs of his first master. He hindered him dexterously [B] in the year 1568 from being succoured by the troops of the Prince of Orange. He was often sent into Germany to make levies there, and acquitted himself with a great deal of honour in the command that he had of those troops (b). But he was not less fit for the cabinet than for the field, as he plainly made it appear in many important negotiations. Thuanus, who negotiated with him the accommodation of the Duke of Mercœur, and many affairs concerning the edict of Nantes, does very much commend him (c): he assures us, that he was a man of great wit, and of an admirable prudence, very

[A] Of an ancient family in Misnia.] I remember to have read the funeral oration of Henry de Schomberg, son of this gentleman, pronounced at Toulouse by Peter de Bertier, who was afterwards Bishop of Montauban. I have forgot the words he made use of to celebrate the high birth of the deceased: I can nevertheless affirm, that he gave out that his ancestors had been raised to the most eminent employments in Saxony, and that they had been of the first rank for many ages in those parts. But Mr de Seckendorf observes, that his family was never raised in Germany to the dignity of a count; and that Gaspar de Schomberg was of a branch collateral to that of Cardinal de Schomberg. See his History of Lutheranism, book 3. p. 92.

[B] He dexterously hindered.] I shall make use of the very words of d'Aubigné. 'Near Soissons, says he (1), Gaspard Schomberg came by the king's order to the prince (2), with whom he treated of a general agreement to assist his army with money, and make them return into Germany; but he privately managed the greatest part of the captains so well, that when the Prince spoke to them of going to join the Prince of Condé, he found them all cold divines, and bad partisans, discouraging of the justice of war, without forgetting the right of kings, and the affairs they had in their own country. Schomberg went away, having received some abusive language, and even a box of the ear from Genlis; and the Prince was forced to go towards Strasbourg, and fell his

(1) D'Aubigné, Histoire Universelle, Tom. i, liv. v, ch. xxviii, pag. m. 482.

(2) That is, to the Prince of Orange.

very skillful in the affairs of war, dextrous and experienced in negotiations, of a manly persuasive eloquence, of a singular probity, civil, magnificent, officious and obliging to every body. He gave evidence of a particular zeal for the good and glory of France, under three kings successively, during the space of thirty-five years. He loved learned men; and, to say all in few words, he did every thing with so much honour and disinterestedness, that neither the dignities with which he was invested, nor the great affairs that went through his hands both in peace and war, prevented his leaving a great many debts behind him. He died of a sudden death in his coach near St Antony's gate in returning from Conflans, where he had assisted at a council held there by Henry IV, to name commissioners for executing the edict of Nantes. It was on the fifteenth of March 1599. He had been naturalized in 1570, and made some time after governor of the upper and lower Marche (d). He had married Joan Chateigner de la Rochepezai, widow of Henry Clutin Sieur d'Oisel, ambassador of France at Rome, by whom he had two sons and three daughters [C]. I could not discover for a long time whose son the young Schomberg was, who was killed at the famous duel of Quelus and Entraguet in the year 1578 (e). He was one of the seconds of the latter; and this was the first time that seconds fought (f): but at last I have found in Father Anfelme (g) that he was brother to our Gaspar de Schomberg.

Those who have a mind to see a particular account of his actions and employments, with remarks upon the antiquity of his family and the glory of his ancestors, need only consult the elogies of Sammarthanus (b).

'his plate, his tapestry, his moveables, and his spare cloaths, dividing all among the chiefs, and giving them (if not what he ought) at least what he could; and afterwards he mortgaged to them the principality of Orange and Montfort, promising to pay them the interest and principal within twelve years: And he and those, who were better minded, joined the Duke of Deux-Ponts, who was then preparing for the wars of France.' See Mr Varillas in the life of Charles IX, in the year 1568, but especially Thuanus lib. 43. in the same year.

[C] Two sons and three daughters. HENRY, of whom I give an article; HANNIBAL, who was killed in the war of Hungary against the Turks; CATHERINE, who died before her father, without leaving any children by her marriage with Lewis de Barbançon, Sieur de Cany; MARGARET, who was not married, and FRANCES, who left children by her marriage with Francis de Dailon, Count du Lude (3).

(d) Father Anfelme, Hist. des grands Officiers, pag. 248.

(e) Journal de Henri III.

(f) Mezerei, Abrégé Chronologique, Tom. v, pag. 231, ad ann. 1578.

(g) Pag. 678, of Tom. i, of the Palais de l'Honneur.

(b) You find there at the end of the fifth book, Abell Sammarthani Scævola F. Elogium illustriſſime gentis Schombergiæ.

SCHOMBERG (HENRY DE) son of the foregoing, was a Marshal of France, and of a much distinguished merit, not only for his brave actions, but also for his excellent qualities. One may see an account of his employs and actions in Mr Moreri, who has copied it out of Father Anfelme. He might also have copied what follows (a), viz. That Henry de Schomberg was first married in the year 1599, to Frances d'Epinaï (b), sister and heiress to Charles Marquis d'Epinaï in Bretagne; and afterwards, in 1631 to Anne de la Guiche, daughter and heiress to Philibert de la Guiche, Great-Master of the Ordinance of France. He had by his first wife Charles de Schomberg, of whom I shall speak below, and a daughter who was married to Roger du Pleffis, Duke de la Roche-Guyon, Knight of the king's orders, and first gentleman of the bed-chamber. By the second marriage he had a posthumous daughter, who was baptized at Paris the fifth of March 1633, and who was married to Charles de Rohan, Duke of Mombazon, and Prince of Guemené.

(3) Anfelme, Hist. des grands Officiers, pag. 248.

(a) Anfelme, Hist. des grands Officiers, p. 248.

(b) She died the sixth of January, 1602.

SCHOMBERG (CHARLES DE) son of the foregoing, was Duke of Haluïn by his marriage with the duchess of that name, and Marshal of France. You may see an account of his dignities and exploits in Moreri, copied word by word from Father

(a) Histoire des grands Officiers, pag. 257.

(b) The book intitled, L'Etat présent de la France, printed in 1637, says pag. 89, that this Anne d'Haluïn's second husband, was Hen- ry de Foix, and de la Valette, Count de Candali, eldest son of the late Duke d'Eproun, from whom she caused herself to be divorced, in order to marry Monsieur de Schomberg.

ry de Foix, and de la Valette, Count de Candali, eldest son of the late Duke d'Eproun, from whom she caused herself to be divorced, in order to marry Monsieur de Schomberg.

(1) The title says A Cologne, chez Pierre Marteau.

(2) He is the same man who for a long time wrote the Historical and Political Mercury, who composed the Life of Mr de Turenne, the Memoirs d'Artagnan, of the Marchioness de Fresne, the Annals of the Fontaine, of the Marquis de Mombazon, &c. He came back to Holland after the peace of Ryſwick, and took the name of Mr de Mill. His true name is De Courtille: he is of Champagne.

[A] A modern satirist has given her a furious stab. It is the author of a book which was printed at the Hague (1), in the year 1687, with this title; Mémoires de Mr L. C. D. R. concernant ce qui s'est passé de plus particulier sous le règne du Cardinal de Richelieu, & du Cardinal Mazarin. It is not well known who wrote this book (2); it is only guessed that it was one who had been secretary to the Counts de Soissons, neice to Cardinal Mazarin. He has, without doubt, a great deal of wit; but there never was such a packer of all sorts of stories, nor such a compiler of all the satirical rhapsodies that are to be picked up in the taverns and armies. There is nothing more false than

Court and Paris, the Conversations of Colbert and Bouin, the Memoirs of the Marquis de Mombazon, &c. He came back to Holland after the peace of Ryſwick, and took the name of Mr de Mill. His true name is De Courtille: he is of Champagne.

than what we read in the first tome of the Mélanges of Vigneul Marville (3) in these words: 'From that time (4), the Petits Maîtres were not heard of till the time of cardinal de Richelieu, who kept in his service a certain number of bold and resolute fellows, whom he employed in the execution of his designs. Rochefort, whose memoirs are published, was one of them.' This pretended Rochefort was either not born, or at least was very young when this cardinal died. Be this how it will, he says, pag. 93. That the Duchess of Chevreuse was apprehensive, left la Porte nubom, though he was a Taylor by trade, she had taken into her bed, should sacrifice her to the wife of the Marshal of Schomberg, who, after having resisted the king's addresses, could not, according to common fame, defend herself from a person so meanly descended. Before I mention what the Abbot Faydit has published on this

(3) Pag. 324, of the first edition of Rouën.

(4) That is from the time of Henry III.

had a great kindness for her, and she suffered a disgrace which rather heightened than diminished her reputation [B].

this subject, I shall make this little remark; that the time that is allotted for this affair, is that which passed between the death of Cardinal de Richelieu, and that of Lewis XIII. Now at that time the Marshal de Schomberg had not married the lady in question; and therefore, it is an absurd thing to give her that title. Let us see what the Abbot Faydit says.

(5) Vis. The abstract of a sermon preached on St Polycarp's day in the church of St John en Greve at Paris, with the proofs of the facts alleged therein. That book was printed in the year 1689, see pag. 36.

(6) Scarron did it.

(7) The Abbot Faydit, Supplément à la Differtation sur le Sermon de Saint Polycarpe.

* It is in the sixth volume, for the month of August, p. 189.

I confess, says he, 'That what determined me, when I composed my book (5), to set down at length the passage of Celsus, was only the design I had effectually to comfort, by the example of the most blessed virgin, a most virtuous lady, whose honour was attacked by a most unjust and cruel calumny. Those who know me, are not ignorant that I have a long time made profession of honouring illustrious Dukes and Marshalls of France, who having been, in her youth, the ornament and admiration of the court, as well for her eminent piety as for her beauty and wit, is become, in her old age, the edification of all the town by the continual examples of her virtues, and the joy of all those who see her, by the sweetness of her conversation. But as there is nothing so pure but what is attacked by calumny, there is an insolent scribbler, who in a book full of falsities, intitled, Memoires de M. L. C. D. R. has had the impudence to bespatter with his venomous satire so fine a life, and without considering that this lady, of whom he speaks so ill, is the same whom the poets, who are naturally satirical, called in her youth Sainte Haut . . . (6): he has not been afraid, with the basest and most ridiculous detraction that could be thought of, to give her for a galant, a man whom she had never either seen or known. Going one day to visit her, I found her a little astonished to see herself so basely treated in that impertinent book: I could not forbear telling her, on purpose to comfort her, that the most blessed virgin herself, who was the purest of all creatures, had been either not able, or not willing, to escape the calumnies of insolent men; and that a little after her death, a famous writer had the impudence to assert, That she had lived in a criminal correspondence with a soldier called P A N - T H E R, and that he was the father of J E S U S C H R I S T. As this seemed new to her, and was besides a proper ground of consolation in her case; she gave me to understand, that she should take it as a favour, if I would write out that passage for her (7).

I thought myself obliged not to leave out any thing in this discourse; for it seemed to me, that every thing in it might be of some use to one or other. I will add one observation; which is, that so many persons ought not to be suffered to have the boldness to defame the greatest names. I know several persons, who are very much grieved at the impunity of this licentiousness. It would be more tolerable, if those satirical authors were sure of what they publish: but for the most part they have no certainty of it, and sometimes they know they lie, and they would obstinately refuse to retract, if their calumnies were made evident. They would not imitate the act of an honest man, which is published in the Mercur Politique, for the month of December 1695. Let us copy the passage. These are the words of the author of that work: 'Since I am upon the subject of the late Archbishop of Paris, I find myself obliged to say, that I am sorry I have related *, what the author of l'Esprit de Mr Arnaud, has said of the Dukes de la Meilleraye. The author of that satire, who has advanced indiscreetly, so many facts that are found to be false, has put her in the number of some ladies, with whom it is pretended that this archbishop was in a correspondence of gallantry; and yet it is certain, that dukes never in her life spoke with that prelate. It is the testimony which all Paris gives her. I am convinced that Madam de la Meilleraye was little concerned at the report of this chimerical commerce upon the credit of an author, who will never pass for canonical. I am very willing, notwithstanding, for my own interest, to disown what I have said, tho' in truth I believed nothing of it, as I did plainly enough insinuate. (8).

[B] Lewis XIII had a great kindness for her, and she suffered a disgrace, which rather heightened than diminished her reputation. One may see a pretty large account of this amour, in the Intrigues Galantes de la Cour de France. Cardinal de Richelieu, as we are told, was much alarmed at this passion of the king, tho' Mademoiselle de Hautefort had not the same penetration, nor a mind so capable of intrigues (9), as the first mistress (10); he was alarmed, I say, after he discovered that she was wholly governed by the counsels of Mademoiselle de Chennevaux (11). He and St Mars pressed the king so much, that he sent orders to those two ladies to be gone presently from the court, and they entered forthwith into a convent at Paris: But the cardinal would not let them stay long there; he obliged them to retire; Mademoiselle de Chennevaux into Poitou, and Mademoiselle de Hautefort to one of her country seats, forty leagues from the court (12). This passion of the king was mixed with great respect, and great jealousy. He durst not take the least liberty with that lady, as may be judged by what I am going to say. One day the queen having received a billet, of which she was willing to make a mystery, pinned it to the tapestry of her chamber, that she might not forget to answer it, and the king coming in a little while after, the queen not desiring that he should see it, commanded Madam de Hautefort, who was her lady of honour, to take it, and hold it fast, which she did. The king would needs take it from her, and they struggled a pretty while in sport; but Madam de Hautefort, not being able to defend herself any longer, put the billet in her bosom, which proved a sure sanctuary to it; for the king durst not touch there, and had no more the curiosity to see it (13). That is a proof of his respect; here is another of his jealousy.

The Marquis de Gevres was killed, while all things were making ready for his marriage with Mademoiselle de Hautefort. The king, entering some days after into her chamber, found her upon her knees before her praying-desk, and coming softly up to her, he saw that she was reading the vespers for the dead, and imagining that it was for the Marquis de Gevres, he conceived so strong a jealousy, that he would not for six weeks hear her spoken of, tho' he himself had proposed the match; which may be attributed to the usual caprices of love, which often looks upon, as an evil, the things that it has earnestly wished for (14). I desire to be looked upon here, only as a copy; for I will not warrant that this author is exact, as to the bottom of this affair, and much less, that he has not made transpositions of times and places. I have some scruple about this story, in the Continuation of the Menagiana. Madam de Schomberg de Hautefort, was one of the ladies that Lewis XIII used to see; but she was disgusted with the court, and retired to the Magdelonnettes. The Abbot de la Victoire going thither to see her, said to her: Madam, is it then to honour the king that you are retired thither (15)? I make upon this three observations. 1. This lady could never be called Mademoiselle de Schomberg; for the latter name came only by her marriage with the Marshal de Schomberg. 2. Her retreat from the court was against her will. 3. It is very odd, that among so many sorts of convents, she should chuse the Magdelonnettes, a place in some manner designed for public penance. This made me doubt of her having retired thither; but I have been well informed that she did.

As to what further concerns her, she was a second time disgraced under the regency of Anne of Austria. See the stanzas that Benferade made upon that subject (16).

(8) Mercur Historique & Politique, December 1695, pag. 661, 662.

(9) Intrigues Galantes de la Cour de France, Tom. II, pag. 183.

(10) Madam de la Fayette, whom the cardinal had removed from the court.

(11) I think it should be Chennevaux.

(12) Intrigues Galantes, ibid. pag. 186.

(13) Ibid. p. 184.

(14) Ibid. p. 115.

(15) Suite du Menagiana, pag. 379, Dutels Edit.

(16) They are in the 5th volume of the collection of the best pieces of the French Poets, printed in 1692, p. 187, of the Dutch Edition.

SCHOMBERG (FREDERIC DE) created Marshal of France on the thirtieth of July, in the year 1675, and killed at the famous passage of the Boyne in Ireland, on the tenth of July 1690, was one of the greatest captains of his time, and commanded armies under more kings, and was raised to eminent dignities in more countries than any other. He would deserve a long article here; but not having received the memoirs which I expected, I am forced to refer it to another time. He is one of those great men, whose History ought to be written by an able pen. I do not doubt but that the Duke of Schomberg, his worthy son, has already thought of procuring this honour to his family (a), and this fine present to the common-wealth of learning.

In the mean time, one may be informed of many things, by consulting the memoirs of Mr Fremont d'Ablancourt, published in the year 1700. You will find an extract of them in the Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans - - History of the Works of the Learned, for the month of November 1700.

(a) It is different from that of the Marshals of Schomberg, mentioned in the foregoing articles. See Seckendorf, Hiflor. Lutherani, lib. iii, pag. 93, littera b, where he shews that their seat was upon the Rhine, in the diocese of Trier. Theodorice de Schomberg, de quo supra, was of this family, if we believe the State of France, Tom ii, pag. 166, Edit. 1680.

SCHORUS (ANTONY) a native of Hoochstraten in Brabant (a), was one of the best Grammarians of the XVIth century. He laboured very diligently to introduce Cicero's Latin into the schools (b), and composed some books very useful for that purpose [A]. A comedy, which he made his scholars act at Heidelberg, where he taught the Belles Lettres, was the cause that he was forced to fly [B]. He died at Laufanne, in the year 1552 (c).

[A] He composed some books very useful for that purpose. That which is called Thesaurus Ciceronianus, is a methodical abridgment of Robert Stephens, and of the observations of Nizolius. His Phrases Linguae Latinae, ratiocue observandorum eorum in auctoribus legendis quae praecipuum ac singularem vim aut usum habent, were printed at Basil in 1550 (1), and afterwards re-printed a great many times (2). They printed at Strasbourg in 1549, his two books de ratione discendae Latinae & Graecae Linguae (3).

[B] A comedy . . . was the cause that he was forced to fly. This comedy was only acted in his own house, in the presence of few people: Nevertheless, it made a noise, which soon reached the emperor's ears, and obliged him to give orders that this fault should not go unpunished. The Elector Palatine, Frederic II, having read the emperor's letter to him about it, was much troubled; he knew nothing of the matter; but he quickly informed himself of it. Schorus made his escape; some of his scholars were imprisoned by the rector of the university. Here is the ground of the complaint. This comedy introduced religion, desiring to be lodged with great men; they shut the doors against her: she addressed herself at last to persons of the meanest rank, who gave her a lodging. What will people think of the great ones, said the emperor, if it be once permitted to decry them upon the stage as the persecutors of religion? You will find this account in the thirteenth book of the annals of Hubert Leodius. A modern author has cited this, to shew that comedies may be permitted (4), and he observes, that in England and the Low-Countries, the liberty of the comedians was very serviceable to the introduction of the Reformation. Saepe actores quam artificiosius perstringunt vitia inveterata publicaeque grassantia, quod alii certe vix tanta cum avaritia auderent. Nec absque fructu: prout contigit circa Reformationis initia in Anglia, ut observavit vir pietate atque doctrina conspicuus Johannes Foxus in Historia Ecclesiae Anglicanae. Similiter in Belgio comediae;

à viris doctis scriptae, cum exhiberent quam graphice in Theatro Babylonis turpitudinem, hanc parum sub initium Reformationis quam plurimos commoverunt, nec minus cum fructu spectatorum profuturunt Antichristianam doctrinam, quam Orthodoxam veritatem eidem oppositam afferuerunt (5). I must needs say here, that in 1558, there was acted at Rochelle, before the King and Queen of Navarre (6), a comedy, which represented the abuses of Popery, and the remedy that might be brought to it out of Scripture. The clergy was offended at it, and made complaints to the King of Navarre himself (7). Mr Vincent, Minister of Rochelle, adds to the recital of this adventure a solid reflexion. I do not think, says he (8), That, under pretence of the historical account I have given, it will be imputed to me, that I pretend to authorize this manner of treating things that belong to religion. . . . (9). If it be true, as it was loudly said at Rochelle, that all this (10) came from Joan d'Albret, Queen of Navarre, who would, in her turn (11), make use of the liberty of the stage, to make it tell truths, which the doctors of the Church of Rome had but too justly drawn upon themselves (12); we cannot at all give our approbation to it. We know that religion is too grave and too holy to be brought upon the stage under any pretence whatsoever, and that she is too much an enemy of the world, and its foolish vanities, to beg aid of its ministers. Nevertheless, as God is admirable in all his ways, and knows how to draw good out of evil when he pleases; and as, to correct a prophet that was going astray from his duty, he made an ass speak: He permitted here one of the stages of the world to speak, since the pulpits were silent; he permitted, I say, to the shame of the pastors of that time, that some comedians, whose profession it is to represent fables, should at that time be doctors of truth, since the pastors, whose business it was to preach that truth, did no longer teach any thing but fables.

(a) Valer. Andr. Bibliotheca Belg. pag. 76.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Id. ibid. & Simlerus, in Epitom. Bibl. Gesneri, p. 67.

(5) Id. ib. pag. 507.

(6) Antony de Bourbon and Joan d'Albret.

(7) Vincent, Recherches pour les commencemens & les premiers progrès de la Reformation en la Ville de la Rochelle, pag. 40.

See above the second article NAVARRE, remark [E].

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 40, 41.

(9) Id. ib. p. 43.

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 42.

(11) To understand this, the reader ought to know that the author had been speaking of a dramatic piece acted at Paris, in the college of Navarre, against Margaret de Valois, mother to Joan d'Albret. See above the first article NAVARRE, citat. (22).

(12) Id. ib. p. 43.

* Num. xxii. 28.

SCOT (REGINALD) an English gentleman, composed a book, whereof all the copies that could be found were burnt (a). He endeavoured to shew, that all the accounts of Magicians and witches are chimerical. The first part of this work was translated into Dutch, and printed in 1609, and made a great impression upon the readers (b). Mr Voëtius complains much of it [A].

[A] Mr Voëtius complains much of it. The passage I am going to cite, will serve both for a proof of, and a comment on this article. Reginaldus Scot (1) nobilis Anglus magiae crimen aperte negavit, & ex professo oppugnavit, omnes ejus mirabiles effectus aut ad melancholiam, aliosve naturales morbos, aut ad artem, industriam, & agilitatem hominum, agmentis & praestigiiis suis illudentium, aut ad stolidas imaginationes, dictorum magorum, aut ad vanas nugas & fisiones eorumdem magorum referens. Ejus liber tit. Discovery of witchcraft in Anglia combustus est; quem nominatim etiam perstringit Sereniss. Magnae Britanniae Rex Jacobus in Demonologia, eumque tangit diffusissime eruditionis Theologus Johannes Raynoldus, in ens. lib. Apocryph. tom. 2. praefat. 169 (2). In eundem, sed innotinatum clamum strinxit eximius & subacti iudicii Theologus Gulielm. Perkinsius in tractatu de Bafanologia. Pars libri istius Reginaldi

(a) Voët. ubi infra, pag. 544.

(b) Voët. Disputat. Theol. Tom. iii, pag. 573.

(1) He calls him twice Scot, pag. 544.

(2) It should be 196. That fault proceeds from a transposition of figures, which is a thing but too common among Printers.

VOL. V.

Witchery

(3) Giff. Voetius, Disputat.
Theolog. Tom.
iii, pag. 564,
565.

Reginaldi Scot elenctica (nam reliqua in editione Anglicana conjurationes continebat) in Belgicum idioma translata est, ante annos aliquot Lugd. Batav. per Thomam Baffon: ex illius libri lectione, seu fonte perenni, non pauci ab illo tempore docti & indocti in Belgio fluctuare, & de Magia αλεγεινῆς ac λειτουργικῆς, (ut Libertinis & Semilibertinis infesta est patria nostra) quin eo ignorantie sepe prolabi, ut non inique illis applicari poterit, quod Sereniss. Rex Jacobus in Dæmonologia subdito suo Reginaldo Scot: esse quasi novos Sadduceos: cum omnes diabolorum operationes, & apparitiones suaviter exhibant, tanquam anicularum, aut superstitionis meticolosæ phantasmata ac fabellas (3). An English nobleman openly denied, and professedly wrote against the crime of witchcraft, imputing all its wonderful effects either to melancholy and other natural distempers, or to the art, industry, and agility of men, that delude people with their subtle contrivances and tricks, or to the foolish imaginations, idle talk, and groundless fictions of those called witches. His book intitled, The discovery of witchcraft, was burnt in England. His most serene majesty James, King of Great Britain, strikes at it by name in his Dæmonologia. John Reynolds, a divine of a most extensive learning, touches upon it in his censure on the Apocryphal books. Against the same book, tho' without naming it, William Perkins, an excellent divine, and of a well formed judgment, also exercised his pen. The reasoning part of this book of Scot, was translated into Dutch some years ago at Leyden by Thomas Baffon. From the reading of that book, as from a perpetual spring, not a few from that time in Holland, both learned and unlearned, began to waver and to grow Scepticks and Libertines in the article of witchcraft, (as our country is very much pestered with Libertines and Half-Libertines) nay, to such a depth of ignorance do they often fall, that what King James in his Dæmonologia said of his subject Reginald Scot, may be very justly applied to them: that they are a kind of new Sadducees: Since they laugh at all the operations and apparitions of devils, accounting them no better than the fancies and stories of old women, or of a fearful superstition.

(a) From thence comes the fir-name of Libboco- mus.

(b) See the Epistle Dedicatory to his first volume against the Institution of Calvin.

SCHULTINGIUS (CORNELIUS) a licentiate in Divinity and canon of St Andrew at Cologne towards the latter end of the XVIth century, was of Steinwich (a) in Over-Yffel. He applied himself very much to controversy, and after having published several books against the Protestants [A], he undertook as his master-piece to confute the Institution of Calvin. He thought this would be attacking them in their chief fortrefs (b). I shall speak of this confutation, and thereby make a supplement to what I have said already (c) upon the editions of that book of Calvin [B]. There is a great

(c) In the remarks [F] and [BB] of the article CALVIN.

[A] Several books against the Protestants.] Valerius Andreas gives us the following catalogue. Edidit Ecclesiasticæ Disciplinæ Libros VI. Coloniae. Bibliothecam Ecclesiasticam. Ibid. 1599, & 1602. Opus variarum Lectionum & Animadversionum adversus Libr. I. Institutionum Joani. Calvini. Ibid. 1601. 4. Refutationem totius Theologiæ Calvinianæ, præsertim Institutionum ejusdem Calvini. Ibid. 4. Thesaurum Antiquitatum Ecclesiasticarum, & VII prioribus Annalium Baronii Tomis, contra Centuriatores Magdeburgenses ac Calvinistas, totidem Tomis ordine Alphabetico contextum. Ibid. Tragicomediam Constantini Magni & S. Helenæ. Ibid. 1602. Confessionem Hieronymianam, & D. Hieronymi Operibus juxta Locorum Theologorum capita. Tomi IV, apud Mylium, 1584. fol. Denique Hierarchiam Anacrysin adversus varios Calvinistarum Libros & celebratas ab eisdem Synodos. Ibidem apud Herm.

(1) Valer. Andr.
Bibl. Belgic. pag.
164.

Hobergium, 1604 (1). The Oxford catalogue takes notice that the Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica, seu Commentarius de explicatione Missalis & Breviarii, comprehends four volumes, and that the Varia Lectiones & Animadversiones contra Institutiones Calvinæ & Petri Martyris Locos communes, comprehends five, printed in the year 1602. The whole title of this book will be seen in the following remark. Valerius Andreas is not at all distinct upon this head: he has first taken notice of what the author published against the first book of Calvin's Institution; and afterwards he has marked down, in a loose manner, the confutation of the Institution. He should have said that the Opus variarum Lectionum, &c. contains four volumes against the four books of the Institution, and that they were printed in the year 1602, at Cologne, by Stephen Hemmerden, at the author's expence. Observe, he fancied that his books nettled the Heretics very much, and that his pen was so formidable to them that the English would not suffer what he published to be imported into their country. Mordere, fugillare, arrodere Calvinistæ non prætermittunt, cum Hieronymianam Confessionem, de Disciplina Ecclesiastica libros, Thesaurum Antiquitatum Ecclesiasticarum, tum omnium maximè Bibliothecam Ecclesiasticam, seu Comment. sacros de explicatione Missalis & Breviarii, propter eorum cænas, ritus, agendas, & formulas reprehensas ad id in Angliam in primis expleverunt, ut publicè prohiberent in insulam importari (2).

(2) Schulting.
Epist. Dedicat.
Tom. i, Bibl.
Catholicæ.

[B] I shall speak of this confutation, and thereby make a supplement to what I have said already upon the editions of Calvin's Institution.] The title which Schultingius gave to the first volume of his book is Bibliotheca Catholica & Orthodoxa, contra summam totius Theologiæ Calvinianæ in Institutionibus Joannis Calvini & Locis communibus Petri Martyris, breviter comprehensæ: vel

potius, Variarum Lectionum & Animadversionum contra primum Librum Institutionum Joannis Calvini Tomus primus. The title of the following volumes differs only from this in respect of the number as well of the volume, as of the book of the Institution which is confuted. It may be affirmed, with reason, that this book of Schultingius is no more than an indigested heap of collections, and a laborious rhapsody. It is almost nothing but a piece composed of borrowed passages, and an index of the authors who have confuted Calvin on the matters in controversy. The errors of pointing, and orthography, and all others, which Printers are liable to commit, are innumerable in it; but be this how it will, it may serve for a repertory, and I have found in it facts concerning Calvin's Institution, which seemed to me very well worth being taken notice of, allowing them even to be fabulous.

Our canon begins with comparing Calvin's Institution and the common-places of Martyr (3). He finds in both the same disposition of the subjects, the same order of books and chapters, and the same arguments against the Romish religion. He will not declare himself on either side of the question, whether Calvin be the plagiarist of Martyr, as some great men believe (4), or whether he took all from his own stock, as some others imagine; but however it be, he peremptorily decides that Martyr was a more learned man than Calvin. If he had read the preface to the common-places of Martyr, he would have known certainly how to regulate his opinion touching the question of plagiarism; for it appears by that preface that these common-places were drawn up and digested after the death of Martyr. Dr Burnet has made use of this observation to expose a mistake of Mr Varillas (5). Let us remember that Martyr did not embrace the Protestant religion till the year 1542, and that he died three years after the last revival of Calvin's Institution, from whence it follows that neither his common-places, nor even his other books, could have served as models, nor as an original ground-work to the Institution, the third edition of which, as enlarged by the author, was in the year 1543.

After that the canon observes the great credit which this book of Calvin's has obtained among the Protestants. He quotes (6) a minister (7), who has given an abridgement of it in the German tongue, and who assures us, that since the birth of JESUS CHRIST there has not appeared a more pious nor a more useful book than this. He says that Picator, in his epitome of the same book (8), and Beza, in the preface to his Confession of Faith, make the same judgment of it; and that in England they want

(3) Schulting.
Tom. i, Biblioth.
Cathol. pag. 1.

(4) Quod magis
viri sentiant.
Id. ibid.

(5) See the second Criticism of Dr Burnet, upon Varillas's History of Heresy, p. 15, and following.

(6) Schulting.
ubi supra, pag. 6.

(7) Caspar Olearius, minister of the Elector Palatine.

(8) Printed at Herborn in the year 1586.

little great deal of passion and heat in the writings of this canon of Cologne: he observes that the little of preferring Calvin's Institution to the Bible, that the bishops order all the ministers to get that book almost by heart; that they lay it upon the pulpit in their churches; that in Scotland they make the study of Divinity begin with the reading of this Institution; that at Heidelberg, Geneva, Herborn, and in the Calvinists universities, they expound it publicly; that in Holland the laymen as well as ministers have it always in their hands, curiously bound. This is the substance of a more ample discourse, which I shall quote entire, for the rarity of the fact, according to the Latin of the author. In Anglia ejus (Calvini) Institutiones ipsi penè Bibliis scripturis præferuntur, mandant pseudopiscopi omnibus ministris, ut penè ad verbum has ediscant, nec unquam de manibus deponant, collocantur in templis sublimi loco in pulpito, custodiuntur tanta diligentia ac si Sibyllina forent oracula, quæ summa fidelitate apud Romanos asseruata fuisse, veteres Romani scriptores tradidere. In Scotia omnes studiosi adolescentes post susceptum gradum magistratus, studium Theologiæ ab his principiis nempe lectione Institutionum incobant. Omnes Apostolice Monachi, Sacerdotes, Canonici, quotquot à nobis ad ipsos deficiunt, jubentur initio suæ scilicet conversionis fundamenta prima Theologiæ ex hisce Institutionibus addiscere, ut ex Symbolis eorum Belgici collegi. Heidelberg, Genevæ, Herbornæ & in Universitatibus Calvinistarum vel ipsæ Institutiones, vel earum compendia publicè à doctores Studio Theologiæ explicantur. He Institutiones ab ipsis in omnes linguas vertuntur, ut omnium nationum homines hoc veneno pestifero inficere, & corrumpere possint. In Belgio nullus est verbi minister & præco, nullus Senatorii ordinis vir paulo latior, nullus præfex vel præfatus, breviter, nullus sacrarum literarum cupidus (omnes autem penè sunt ejusmodi in Theologia Calviniana versati à supremo consiliario usque ad infimum aurigam & nautam) qui non hæc aureas scilicet eorum judicio Institutiones nocturna verset manu versetque diurna, extrinsecus auro, purpura omnique preciosissimo ornatus vestiant & ornant tanquam præstantissimam margaritam evangelicam & quasi thesaurum cælitus delapsam, ex his libris omnes controversas decidunt & dijudicant (9). Every body perceives that there are too many hyperboles and childish exaggerations in this passage.

Let us see what he says upon the editions of Calvin's Institution.

He finds that they became more correct in proportion as the author multiplied them, and therefore as the first is the most imperfect, the last, which is that of the year 1559, is the most perfect, it seems to him that Calvin, looking on that work as his favourite production, he applied his whole wit and vigour to correct, embellish, and enlarge it, to the end that he might therein give a very compleat system, and a perfect idea of his Theology. Videtur autem mihi Joannes Calvinus, ab eo tempore quo scribere cepit, deinceps usque ad finem vite suæ, omne studium suum omnemque operam & vires ad has Institutiones augendas, locupletandas sic contulisse, ut sua Theologiæ perfectam ideam & speciem exhiberet (10). This notion agrees well enough with the preface which Calvin has put before the edition of the year 1559. Scultingius observes (11), that the first edition is of Basil 1536, in 8vo; that the second is of Strasbourg, 1539, in folio; that the third is of Geneva, 1545, in folio, and in 8vo; and the fourth is of Geneva, 1559, in folio, and in 8vo. That the edition which the university of Heidelberg caused to be published in the year 1572, differs from the rest in several things, and is the worst of all; that two were published at Laufanne, with notes; the one in the year 1576, the other in 1585: that the German translation of Heidelberg differs prodigiously (12) from the text of John Calvin; that the first, viz. that of Basil, 1536, is divided into no more than eight chapters (13), and contains no advertisement to the reader; that the Geneva Catechism has been added to the third edition; that Bellarmine, in the fourth chapter of the first book of Pontifice, quotes an edition of the year 1554, and shews wherein it is contrary to the edition which followed; that the edition of Strasbourg, 1539, carries this title, Institutio Christianæ Religionis nunc vere demum suo titulo respondens, auctore Alcuino: Argentorati apud Wendelinum (14) mense augusti anno Domini 1. 5. 3. 9., and that before the Epistle Dedicatory are to be read these words, Potentissimo Illustrissimoque Monarchæ magno Francorum Regi Principi ac Domino suo Alcuino, which insinuates that it is Alcuinus who addresses his discourse to Charlemagne; the false name of Alcuinus having appeared in the first edition, they wrongfully put in the second nunc demum suo titulo respondens (15); that many variations are found in the doctrine of Calvin when the different editions which he has given of this book are compared together (16); that the editions published by the Booksellers, without his being concerned in them, vary still more, they have added, changed, and left out, many things in them, according to the taste of particular men: Si sæpius & plures editiones inveniantur sunt Typographorum non Calvini, ibi sunt multa adjecta, mutata, ablata pro judicio privatorum hominum (17); that the method of this book is wonderful, and that it may be compared to the Institutes of Justinian, which, as the Lawyers justly acknowledge, have been formed with so much order and symmetry, that nothing can go beyond them. Methodus profecto addi insignis est & artificiosa ut cum Institutionibus Justiniani conferri possint, quo Lib. bro Jureconsulti merito sentiunt, nihil scriptum esse magis methodicè, nisi forte hoc alcuini merito displicere possit quod de Principiis Theologiæ (à quibus omnis ordini debet dispositio) non in 1. statim libro, ut fieri oportuisse multi sentiant, sed in ultimo libro 4. tractant, nempe de auctoritate Ecclesiæ, Pontificis, Conciliorum & Sacre Scripturæ. Methodum Albertus Pighius valde laudat & stilum orationis ac stilum dicendi (18). That as soon as this book of Calvin came out of the press at Strasbourg about the year 1545, Bernard Cincius, Bishop of Aquila carried a copy of it to Cardinal Marcellus Cervinus, the Pope's legate, at the court of the emperor (19); that these two able men, being of opinion that this book was more dangerous than the other writings of the Lutherans (20), put Albertus Pighius upon examining it, who having judged that Calvin was an antagonist worthy of his notice, undertook to confute him; and that he began with the subject of Grace and of Free-will; upon which he published ten books against Calvin; that he had a design to publish others upon justification and the principle of faith, but that death hindered him from finishing them. Hic (Albertus) Calvinum nequaquam contemnendum sed dignum antagonisten, quo cum congregaretur, in quem calumiam stringeret, ac pro pietate & orthodoxa fide decertaret judicavit. Quo factum est, ut decem libros de gratia, & libero arbitrio contra Joan. Calvinum in lucem emisserit, cui si diuturnior vita superstes fuisset, proposuerat etiam de justificatione hominis, & de principiis credendorum contra eundem Calvinum scribere, & ad ista tria primaria puncta ejusdemque annexa, nempe de gratia & libero arbitrio, de justificatione, de Principiis credendorum incubatos non abjolveret, nec in lucem edidit (21).

Let us make some remarks upon this account of the canon of Cologne.

I. First of all we must lay it down as a certain fact (22), that the Epistle Dedicatory of the Institution was dated from Basil, not on the first of August 1536, as several editions have it, but on the first of August 1535, as it is to be seen in some others. It is a strong presumption that the first edition is of the year 1535, since it is highly probable that the book was compleat and ready for the press when the author dedicated his Epistle Dedicatory. If it was, we should have room to conclude that the copy which is kept in the Library of Geneva (23), which wants the forty-two first pages, but which takes notice, at the end, that the impression was finished in the month of March 1536, is not the first edition; for if it were, we must say that Calvin left Basil before his book was printed, and that the Printer made no great haste, and did not finish the edition till the month of March 1536. This is not probable, and it is far less so than to suppose that a book so well written as this, and so fit for the times, was sold off with so great dispatch that it was very soon necessary to think of a second edition, which was finished in the month of March 1536. Observe well, that Theodore Beza assures us (24), that Calvin caused his Institution to be printed at Basil, and departed not from Basil till after the edition of the book (25): Secondly, That he relates so many journeys which the author made

(15) Id. ibid. pag. 20.

(16) Calvinus in tempore editionum diversarum & in doctrina Institutionum non sibi constabat, sed modis variis mutavit. Idem, ibid. pag. 19. See also the beginning of the Epistle Dedicatory of the fourth volume.

(17) Schult. Bibl. Cathol. Tom. i. pag. 19.

(18) Id. ib. p. 7.

(19) Id. ibid. pag. 39.

(20) Reliqua Lutheranorum Scripta esse ditionem, hoc acriter mordere & fortius stringere. Id. ibid. p. 39, 40.

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) See the remark [F.] of the article CALVIN.

(23) See the same remark of the same article.

(24) Beza, preface to the Commentaries of Calvin upon Job, pag. 7.

(25) Editio hoc libro fuisse veluti præstita Patrie fide, Calvinum viscode Ferrarientis Ducis... desiderium inessit. Beza, in Vita Calvini, p. 367, 368. Tom. iii. Operum.

† Libri Institutionum in Anglia in tanto pretio sunt, ut tum Anglicæ exactissime verbi in singulis Ecclesiis à parochiis legendi appendantur, tum in utraque illic Academia, cursu Philosophico absoluti, futuris Theologis hic primum ante omnia prælegantur. D. Stapletonius in Promptuario quadragesimali in feria 4 Hebdomadæ Sanctæ.

(9) Schult. ubi supra, pag. 7: he repeats the same thing, pag. 487 of the second volume, and in the Epistle Dedicatory of the third volume.

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 18.

(11) Id. ibid. pag. 19.

(12) Toto cælo aberrat. Id. ibid.

(13) Nevertheless he says, pag. 39, that it contained sixteen chapters.

(14) He should have added here Ribolium.

the Heretics censured them, and that their coming into England was absolutely forbidden (d). He died on the twenty-third of April 1604 (e). Mr Konig makes, two authors of him, the one called Conrad Schultingius, the other Cornelius Schultingius.

(d) See the remark [A] at the end. (e) Valer. Andreas, Bibl. Belgic. pag. 164.

(26) Id. ibid. See the remark [U], of the article CALVIN. made from that time till the summer of 1536 (26), that Calvin must necessarily have gone from Basil soon after the date of this Epistle Dedicatory. It will be objected, that the Printer has set down the year 1536 in the title page, although the book was to be sold in the month of August 1535. I confess that this way of anticipating upon the following year is frequent among Bookfellers, but generally they do not begin it in the month of August, and after all, that does not remove the difficulty which I ground upon the date of the month of March 1536, which is to be seen in the Geneva copy. I conclude that tho' there be some probability that the first edition was dated in the year 1536, by the Bookfeller, it is likewise probable that it was dated from the year 1535. It is thus that one might expatiate on every side in the vast field of probability, if there was not a fixed point which determines the whole dispute in my favour. They are the words of Calvin himself, which I have quoted in another place (27), and by which we learn that he went from Basil soon after his book had seen the light there. This is a demonstration that the edition, which was completed in the month of March 1536, is not the first.

II. In the second place I observe, that Schultingius was in the right not to reckon for the second and third editions any besides those which were made upon the revivals of Calvin. He does well, according to this rule, in giving the second place to the edition of Strasbourg, 1539, but he is in the wrong to reckon that of Geneva, 1545 for the third: for it was preceded by the edition of Strasbourg, 1543, corrected and enlarged by the author.

DATE of the Geneva Catechism.

(28) To the ministers of Friesland.

(29) Beza, preface to the Commentaries of Calvin upon Joshua, pag. 8.

(30) The same, pag. 12.

(31) In the remark [B] of the article SPAIN (JOHN OR).

IV. I cannot allow to Schultingius the chronology he makes use of, with respect to the edition, which animated Pighius to write against Calvin. It was neither that of 1545, nor even that of 1543, but that of 1539. He was no longer alive in the year 1543. His book had appeared some time before, and was confuted by Calvin in the beginning of the year 1543.

(32) The one of the matters, the other of the places of Scripture.

(33) The Bookfeller of Geneva, who published the Latin edition of 1550, made an excuse for having trusted to the edition of Strasbourg, where the greatest part of the quotations were falsely set down in the margin, which he remedied in the Index.

(34) Marlorat, Preface to the Index.

considering the prodigious number of editions that this book of Calvin has undergone.

It has been so often reprinted, that it is not to be A CATECHISM conceived how the author of the Essais de Literature on the Essais de Literature.

could make (35) an article of the Christian Institution of Calvin, without saying one word which should make us understand that it had been printed oftener than once. He has contented himself with observing (36) that the author published it at Basil about the year 1534. I do not know whether he himself perceived this fault, or whether he was told of it; but he corrected it by an addition at the end of his little book. That addition tells us (37), that this book of Calvin is dated from Basil the first of August 1536; that it was, in some respect, no more than the first draught of a larger performance; that it was then that Paul Thurius (38) composed the distich which made so much noise (39); that there has been five editions of this book; that of Basil, 1535; that of Strasbourg, 1539; the second of Strasbourg, 1543; that of Strasbourg, in 4to, 1544; that of Geneva, which is the fifth, 1550; and that in the year 1558, the author revised his book and divided it into four parts. I wish he had corrected the false date of the first of August 1536. He was more obliged to it than any other, since he was ready to say that the first edition is of Basil, 1535. He would be very much puzzled, if he should undertake to prove that Paul Thurius composed his distich in the year 1535. Nothing is more easy than to prove to him that he has been in the wrong to reduce the editions of Calvin's Institution to five. He reckons up six himself, for undoubtedly he meant, that the revival made by Calvin in the year 1558 was followed by a new edition, and it is very certain that it was so. People will very justly think it strange, that the author of the Essays of Literature, having proposed to himself to speak of none but scarce books, should have made an article of Calvin's Institution; for no book was ever so common as this; it has been so many times reprinted, that copies of it are to be found in the very Brokers stalls through all the towns of Holland; and unless it be a fine edition, and in folio, they do not cost above three pence or a groat. See the margin (40).

An observation has been made which shews that this book of Calvin has been sifted, scanned, anatomized, in all the different manners possible, by the Roman Catholics. They have taken notice that the first word is all, and the last impiety, and this has appeared very mysterious. The fact is certain in the French translation, but not in the original Latin. Institutionem Calvinii observantur quidam hoc verbo omnis incipere et in istud impietas desinere; id tamen præter mentem Autoris, ita divino consilio contigisse censent, ut Argumentum sit Librum totius impietatis esse quasi Encyclopediam, eaque sola constare (41).

The editions of Calvin's Institution, which I have seen, are the following: that of Geneva, 1550, in 4to, ex Officina Joannis Gerardi; that of Robert Stephens, 1553, in folio (42). These two are in Latin, and contain no more than twenty-one chapters, divided each into several sections. The French edition of Geneva, printed for John Gerard, 1553, in 4to. The Latin edition of Geneva, printed for Francis Perrin, 1568, in folio. Six other French editions of the same city: one printed for Conrad Badius, 1560, in folio; one from the Printing-house of James Bourgeois, 1562, in 4to; one from the Printing-house of Thomas Courteau, 1564, in 8vo; the French edition of Lyons, printed for John Martin, 1565, in 8vo; one printed for Francis Perrin, 1566, in folio; and one from the Printing-house of Jacob Stoer, 1609, in folio. I have likewise seen the Latin edition, published at Geneva, by John Le Preux, in folio, in the year 1590. It is augmented with the analysis, and some other pieces composed by different authors. The editions of Geneva, in 8vo, printed for John Le Preux, 1592, and 1602, are agreeable to this. I add, that the Geneva edition of 1617, in folio, apud Joh. Vignon, (35) In the Essays of August, 1702, p. 98.

(36) Ibid. p. 98.

(37) Ibid. p. 98.

(38) He should find it in the remark [F] of the article CALVIN.

(39) You will find it in the remark [F] of the article CALVIN.

(40) There is in the Journal of Trevoux, January 1703, edition of Amsterdam, a Memoir touching the Essays of Literature, in which there is a censure on what concerns the Institution of Calvin.

(41) Vincent. Baronius, Parnet. ad Th. Raynaud. in lucina Apologet. Ord. Dominik. folio, quod prædicti sunt.

(42) The printing of it was finished on the fourth of February 1553.

Vignon, Petrus & Jacobus Clouët, makes the sixth volume of a Latin edition of John Calvin's works. Together with his letters it likewise makes a volume of his works in the Amsterdam edition, printed for John James Schipper, in the year 1667, in folio.

SCHUTZE (JOHN) a Lutheran minister in Germany in the XVIth century, published among other books a piece to which he gave the title of Sacramentarius Diabolus - - The Sacramentarian Devil. One may judge by this of the rage which animated him against the Zuinglians [A]. He likewise published in the year 1579, a book containing fifty reasons why a man should not embrace the communion of the Calvinists.

[A] The rage which animated him against the Zuinglians. To the end that one may judge of the piece by the pattern, I shall quote a passage which I find in George Braunius. We shall see there, that our Schutze represented the Calvinists as persons that were the most turbulent, seditious, and cruel. 'Hic seditionis genius non tantum Lutheranos, sed & Galinistis furoris ministros, magis exagitat quod Lutherani in Confratribus suis accurate observant, dum inter varias causas, quare Sacramentariam Calvinistarum Doctrinam acceptare nequeant præcipuum & illam allegent, quod seditiosi, & tumultuosi sint, pacis publicæ & tranquillitatis politicæ turbatores, quorum hoc unicum institutum est, ut seditionum factiones, tumultum, dissidia, ac tandem cædem ac sanguinis effusionem procurent. Maxime cum duplici nomine latrones existant, non fatiati si hominum animas Doctrinæ falsitate interimant, verum etiam, omnem quam possunt cunque diligentiam adhibeant ut per seditiones, latrocinia, & cædes pro nefario suo genio in civitatibus instituant. Hoc Joannes Schutzius in causarum explicatione, & in Sacramentarii suo Diabolo pagina 354 (1). - - This spirit of sedition, says he, not only possesses the Lutherans, but rages still more among the furious ministers of Calvin, which the Lutherans have taken notice of in their brethren; since among the various reasons why they cannot embrace the sacramentary doctrine of the Calvinists, they allege this for the chief, that they are a disorderly and riotous sect, enemies to the public peace and tranquillity, and that their only principles are to beget tumult, discord, sedition, and at length murder and bloodshed. Especially since they are robbers in a double respect, as they do not satisfy themselves with killing the souls of men by their false doctrine, but likewise apply their utmost diligence to blow up seditions, and thereby to fill cities with murder and rapine, for to such things the wicked bent of their genius prompts them. This says John Schutze, &c.'

It is to be observed, that George Braun, a clergyman of Cologne, here accuses the Protestants of a seditious and violent humour, which is a reproach that is cast upon them by an infinite number of other Popish writers, and which is the same, that on all occasions they object to the Romish party. Juvenal certainly could not have read this passage of George Braun without crying out :

SCIOPIUS (a) (GASPAR) one of the most famous writers of the XVIIth century, was a German. His enemies have published many shameful things concerning his family [A]. He studied at Amberg, and then at Heidelberg, and afterwards at Altdorf, at the charges of the Elector Palatine. Having made a considerable stay at

Ingolstadt,

[A] His enemies have published many shameful things concerning his family. They published (1) that he was born in a village, where his father was sexton, hoc vespillone atque ædituo in pago quodam non ignoto, natus est Gaspar Sciopius; That his father one day made a grave too little, and being unwilling to make it longer, he cut off the feet of the dead body. Hiberno quodam tempore, terra firmiter gelu confixita, sepeliendum accepit cadaver, cui jam sepulchrum effoderat, sed mensura breviora quam pro mole; ibi vir fortissimus ne tanto in frigore terra deducenda esset, pedibus cadaver mutilat, & in fossam quam sepulchrum verius recondit (2). That having got some money together he went into Poland, where he served a Printer; that afterwards he was a pedlar, and went from village to village, as the Savoyards do, to sell small wares; that he left off that trade, and lifted himself a soldier; that he came back into the Palatinate after the death

VOL. V.

Quis tulerit Gracchos de seditione querentes?
Quis cœlum terris non misceat, & mare cœlo,
Si fur displiceat Verri? homicida Miloni?
Clodius accuset mœchos? Catilina Cethegum?
In tabulam Syllæ si dicant discipuli tres (2):

(2) Juven. Sat. II, ver 24.

..... In vain

The Gracchi of sedition must complain.

*'Twould make you swear the planets from their spheres, Should Verres peach thieves, Milo murderers, Clodius tax barwds, Cethegus Cataline,
Or Sylla's pupils, Sylla's rules decline.*

TATÈ.

Be that as it will, let us cite another instance of Schutze's rancour. Sacramentarius Camerina ac festina est quedam, in quam multa hæreses confluent, ultima Satanæ ira, quam furis agitatus contra Christum ejusque Ecclesiam exercet. Et qui Sacramentarium partes sequitur, is manifestus est, atque ejuratus hostis Dei & fidei, quàm in Baptismo Christo dedit, oblitus (3).

This is maintaining that the opinion of the Calvinists touching the Eucharist is the sink of many heresies, and the utmost effort of Satan's rage; and that one cannot adhere to it without becoming the sworn enemy of God, and without forgetting what he promised to JESUS CHRIST in his baptism. Now to maintain such a thing as this, is it not a downright fit of madness. I appeal to the Lutheran ministers of the present time. They are a good deal more moderate than their ancestors, and they doubleless see, that the quality of the tenets in which the two Protestant communions differ, is not of the same kind which they believed formerly, when the sacramentary war heated their spirits too much, and spread on both sides a flood of defamation. That furious storm being calmed by degrees, they have found out at last, that the subject of the dispute was not of that importance. How many things of that nature are discovered by experience (4)? But alas! how little do we profit thereby! There arise very frequent disputes among divines: they are treated as if the fundamentals of religion were concerned, and they do not remember that they treat as a meer trifle now, what their predecessors had looked upon as a debate of the utmost consequence.

(3) Schutzius, Prefat. in Librum 50 Causarum, apud Braunium in Tremontium Catholico Defensione, pag. 294

(4) See the remarks [E] and [F], of the article AMYRAULT, and the remark [D] of the article GOMARUS.

(a) His true name was Sciopius, but he changed it into Sciopius, to bring it to the Italian pronunciation.

of Frederic III, and obtained there a small employment (3); that he sold corn, and gained something by it; that he obtained the judicature of a small place, and at the end of the year lifted himself for the expedition of Cologne, and was made provost of the army; that after the death of the Elector Lewis, he returned to his first post, and made himself a good Miller there; that he was sent to a town that mutinied, and commanded the soldiers there; that he was a Brewer there; that he was there with his wife and his daughter, but would not let them see any body. They add, that his wife was a Hessian, and had followed into Hungary a man who kept her. From the day after he was killed, she lay with Sciopius, who afterwards despised her so much, that he made her work like a servant, without either seeing or speaking to her. On the contrary, he made his maid eat at his table, and admitted her to his bed from time to time (4). The daughter,

(2) In præfatura Burcktwiciana, tenue officium ac vile obtinuit, quod Notarium five Actuarium præfecturæ vocare possit. Ibid. pag. 139.

(4) Contra vero, quasi veris rerum vicibus ancillæ fortissimo Herculi adhaerere, cibum una capere, & si res ita ferret, thorum genalem occupare. Id. ibid. pag. 141.

(b) See the remark [B].

(:) Ibid. p. 142, 143.

(6) Ibid. p. 141.

(7) See the book intituled, Oporini Grubini Amphotides Scioppiana, pag. 28.

(8) Oporinus
Grubinius, Am-
phot. Scioppian.
pag. 31.

(9) His Theses de Injuriis.

(10) Vita & Parentes, Gasp.
Schoppij, init.

(11) lb. p. 151,
152.

(12) See Ampho-tides Scioppianæ,
p. 190, & seq.

• Prolusion, pag
202.

(13) Baillet, En-fans celebres,
пмт. 69.

(14) Octavius Ferrarius, in Prolusione cui ti-tulus Quo pretio viri principes litteras ac literatos habuerint.

Adolefcentem ac pœne puerum id ingeni, atque eruditionis speciem dedidit, ut vix tribus lustris exple-tis non unum opus publici juris faceret, quod exactæ ætatis iudicium, totiusque antiquitatis solidam cognitionem præ se ferret (15). — That noble he was a stripling, and almost yet a boy, he gave such proof of his wit and learning, that before he was scarcely in his fifteenth year he had published more than one book, which showed his ripe judgment, and his well-digested knowledge of all antiquity.' But it will be better to judge of Scioppius by what he says of himself. It appears from the following words, that he was near seventeen years of age, when he published his first book: It consisted of Latin verses.

Extant typis Heidelbergensibus impressa complura Scioppii carmina anno 1593, cum haud etiam septimum decimum ætatis annum compleisset, antiquiora illa plus fatiis, sic tamen ut variam eruditionem accurata probatissimorum auctorum lætione comparatam passim præferant: quo ipso tempore etiam Dialectica & Rhetorica æquales & convictores suos, illustres nobilesque adolefcentes, cum eos à Magistris suis negligi doleat, docere, ausus est (16). — There are extant several poems of Scioppius, printed at Heidelberg in the year 1593, when he was not full seventeen years of age. They have indeed too much of an antique form, but in such a manner, that they evince where shew his various erudition, acquired by a diligent reading of the best books. At the same time he had the courage to instruct several young gentlemen of distinction, that were his fellow-students and companions in Logic and Rhetoric, perceiving them to be neglected by their masters.' To know how many books he published before he was twenty-four years of age, we need only cast our eyes upon the following list. Let us remember that in the year 1593, he was in his seventeenth year, as we have been just told by himself. Verisimilium libri quatuor. Editi Noribergæ in 8vo apud Paulum Kaufmannum Anno 1595, Disputatio de Injuriis. Apud eundem in 4to Anno 1597. Summæ pæctarum Læctionum libri quinque. Apud eundem in 8vo Anno 1597. Commentarius de Arte Critica. Noriber-gæ in 8vo apud Valentinum Furrmannum Anno 1597. Notationes Criticæ in Phædrum cum Ritterhusii in eundem scriptorem Commentario editæ Lugduni Batavor. in 8vo apud Fr. Raphelengium Anno 1597. Libellus de suis ad Catholicos migratione (17), deque auctoritate Ecclesiæ in sacra scriptura interpretanda. Editus Romæ apud Zanetum in 8vo 1599. Epistola de variis fidei contro-versiis ad primarium quandam Germaniæ Jurisconsultum. Ingolstadtis in 4to apud Angermarium Anno 1599 (18).

They say that we must add to this lift the commentary upon the Priapea, whereof the epistle dedicatory is dated from Ingolstadt in the year 1595, and that the author did not think fit to mention it in the catalogue of his works, because his enemies cried him down for having commented upon such an obscene collection of verses as the Priapea are. He defended himself from that reproach by denying the fact, and maintained, that this commentary was a work of Goldastus, who by an egregious fraud had published it, said he, as the performance of Scioppius (19): However, he alledged in his vindication, that Scaliger had made some commentaries upon the Priapea, and upon Catullus, and that Douza had made one upon Petronius. But he changed the state of the question; for the true ground of the accusation was, not that he had commented upon obscene verses, but that he had stuffed his commentary with so great a number of filthy particulars (20). Besides, he complained in that book, that men have not received from nature the same strength as sparrows. His enemies took him up for it, and he was laughed at to some purpose in the satire intitled, Hercules tuam fidem (21). He did certainly deserve it; here is the passage, and his reflexion upon it. 'Cum Ingolstadii agerem, vidi e regione Musei mei passerem coitum vicies repetentem, & inde adeo ad languorem datum, at avolatulum

(15) Id. in Pro-
fusione cui titulus Literatorum fa-
nus.

(16) Oporinus
Grubinius, ubi
supra, pag. 39.

(17) Freherus is therefore mistaken, pag. 775, of his Theatrum, where he says that Scioppius turned Papist, in the year 1601.

(18) These titles are taken from the Indiculus of Scioppius's works prefixed to the Amphotides Scioppianæ.

(19) See the Amphipodides Scioppianæ, pag. 102, & seq, and his letter ad Saulum Mercerum, at the end of the Scylliger hypobolimagus.

(20) Lusus diverforum in Priapum poetarum libero commentario illustravit, quo post hominum memoriam, nihil fecius ab ullo cinædo aut lubricini omnium profuturo in lucem editum fuisset, omnes fantentur. Vita & Parentes Gaspar. Schoppii, p. 142.

(21) Pař. 59.
See also Merici Casauboni Pictas,
pař. 21.

after he had been some time at Verona, he returned into Germany, from whence he went again into Italy, and published at Ferrara a panegyric upon the King of Spain, and Clement VIII. He endeavoured to raise himself at the court of Rome, and used all his industry towards it; nevertheless his fortune was but mean, and he was not well pleased with it, for all the lofty titles he bestowed upon himself (c) [C]. Before he travelled into Italy the first time, he plaid Gifanius a trick, which I have mentioned in another place (d). He turned a Roman Catholic about the year 1599. I do not know the reason why he was so angry with the Jesuits; but it is certain he was their great enemy, and wrote many sharp libels against them under divers supposititious names [D]. On the other side he inveighed with the utmost fury against the Protestants, and solicited

(c) Taken from a book intitled, Vita & Parentes Gaip. Schoppij à Germano quodam contubernali ejus confcripta, printed at Leyden, with Confutatio Fabulæ Burdonum.

(d) In the remark [F] of the article GILFANIUS.

(22) Scioppius, Commentar. in Priapeia, Carm. xxv, pag. 35, Edit. 1664, in 8vo.

rus in terram decideret. En fortem iniquam. Hoc passeribus datum; negatum hominibus? Næ qui facinus hujusmodi imitari auit, faxim ut Picos qui aureos montes colunt, divitiis ille solus superet. Præ milite Plautino omnes eum sectaturas fœminas scilicet (22). - - - While I lived at Ingolstadt, I saw opposite to my study, a sparrow repeating the act of love twenty times, and afterwards so saint and wary that he fell to the ground, when he attempted to fly away. Unequal fortune! Why is this given to sparrows and denied to men? Truly, I will grant that he alone, who can imitate an action of this kind, surpasses in riches the Pici who live upon the golden mountains.

Take notice of these two things, 1. Those who took his part, denied that he was the author of that commentary on the Priapeia. 2. His reflexion about the pretended happiness of sparrows was enlarged upon, and made worse than it was. To prove the first head, I shall set down the words of the author of a small book, intituled de tribus Capellis: He was a Jesuit, as I have said in another place (23). 'De Commentario si tibi, Joseph, Scioppius hoc dicat: Scripsi fateor, commentarium in Priapeia: Sed septenum denum annorum puer, sed in hereticorum scholis institutus, sed exemplo tuo invitatus. Atque nollem id factum. Et si fas dicere (sed fas) cum illa scribebam, Optarem nullas tunc habuisse manus. Quid hoc autem, Burdo, dic, tua fide, ad rem attinet? Num tu idcirco Scaligerum te esse evinces, quia Scioppius nescio quid ineptiarum per ludum atque jocum puer verius, quam adolescens olim chartis illevisit, quod nunc ævi consiliique maturior, vero vultu damnat & opus. . . . Hoc igitur tibi si dicat ille, non te elinguem protinus, & Burdonem efficiat? Quid si autem dicat hoc Scioppius tibi quod dixit jam aliis prius, Non scripsi. Scripsit ea vero, inquit: certe vulgavit quidam quem dicere nolo, quia tu illum ignorare non potes (24). - - - If Scioppius should say to you, Scaliger, concerning his commentary: I confess that I writ the commentary upon the Priapeia: but I was a boy of seventeen years of age, but I was brought up in the schools of heretics, but I was prompted to it by your example. I wish that I had not done it. And if it be lawful for me to say so, (but it is lawful) I could wish that I had had no hands at the time when I writ those things. But tell me truly, you Burdo, what is that to the purpose? Will you therefore prove yourself to be Scaliger, because Scioppius long ago, whilst he was yet a boy rather than a young man, writ some foolish things which, now that his age and judgement are riper, he sincerely condemns. . . . If therefore Scioppius should speak in this manner to you, would not he presently strike you dumb like a Burdo as you are? But what if Scioppius should say to you, as he has said to others before, I did not write it. But it was written, says he, at least published by a certain person whom I will not mention, because you cannot but know him. One would think there are some oblique expressions in those words, that look like an acknowledgment of his fault; but at the bottom, they contain, a plain denial of his being guilty of it. Note, That Scioppius set to great value on the tres Capellæ, that he inserted that piece in one of his books (25). As to the second head, I need only quote the author of the Censure de la Doctrine curieuse of Father Garasse; these are his words: pag. 705. Garasse says, that a small book came out without the author's name, written by one of the new dogmatists, who considering the indefatigable heat of pigeons and sparrows in their fits of love, made a vow to renounce heaven, if G O D would be pleased to change him into a pigeon or into a sparrow. Garasse needs not trouble himself about the name of this new dogmatist:

It is his good friend Scioppius, that wonderful good man, that great wit, who makes this fine and pious wish in his commentaries, in Priap. pag. 63 (26). It is certain, that these words of Mr Ogier (27) contain a calumny against Scioppius; for this vow of renouncing heaven is not to be found in the place quoted by him.

I think I may say, that if one of Scioppius's books gave occasion to have an ill opinion of his morals, all his books in general shewed that he was not a debauched man; for if he had lost his time in making love and drinking, he could not have produced so many books. They must be the fruit of great labour, and required a continual and strong application to study, and the conversation of learned men. Accordingly we find, that he calls the professors of Altdorf and Ingolstadt to witness, that the life he had led was quite different from that of the youth whom they instructed (28). He mentions a poem that he published to exhort the rector Wesenbecius to suppress the debaucheries of the scholars. Cum Petrus Wesenbecius Jurisconsultus Academiæ Rector creatus fuisset, longum Scioppius carmen Noribergæ imprimendum dedit, quo corruptos juventutis mores acerbè describit, ipsumque Rectorem cohortatur, ut disciplinam restituere, frenu nimis laxata contrahere, nominatim vero christatorum peccatorum usu & nocturnis commessationibus juventutis concussationibus interdiceret Academicis vellet, in contumaces vero refractarios severe animadvertat (29). He alleges an epistle dedicatory, wherein he told us why he had so few friends, and why the scholars looked upon him as a Misanthrope: The reason of it was because he shunned their collations, their walks, and their drinking-bouts, and kept close in his study all day long. Frequentes istas adolescentibus computationes ut fugiam suadere mihi potest vel valetudinis ratio, quam diligenter cordi habeo, vel consilium quod à meis præceptoribus neglectus, & ceteroquin ingenio non nimis docili præditus jam olim cepi de studiis solidum diem ab usque mane ad vesperam sine ulla potu & cibo naviter persequendi, vel cura denique quam in majoribus meis imitandis ponere decrevi &c. Aliis itaque pro divinitate & facilitate ingenii sui, ad quæ ego impenso labore meo & indefesso studio adspiro nihil agendo vel commessando consequuntur, per me quidem potare, plurimisque sibi hac comitate suæ amicos parare licet: dum mihi vicissim hoc non ægre largiantur, ut quam illi ex couponis ego ex laboribus voluntatem capiam, & laudem continentie, ut ego voco, ut illi, Morositatis, à majoribus meis acceptam & in me transmissam, studiosè conservem &c (30). He was justly accounted an ill man; but his faults, like those of some other proud, satirical, and passionate learned men, were not irregularities of the body, but vices of the mind.

[C] The lofty titles he bestowed upon himself.] He was made Patrician of Rome, Knight of St Peter, counsellor to the Emperor, counsellor to the King of Spain, counsellor to the Archduke, Count Palatine (31); and lastly, he was adorned with the title of Count de Clara Valle.

[D] He wrote many sharp libels against the Jesuits under divers supposititious names.] It is affirmed in the book I have quoted several times (32), that before he changed his religion, he published some verses, wherein he called their society, Iberam parricidalem cohortem, - - - a Spanish cohort of parricides, and that afterwards he fell violently upon them in a piece that was seen at Rome by several people: Quos petulantissimo postea scripto quod Romæ plurimi viderunt, & è quo nulla hic adferri poterant, petiit. Mention is made of a fragment of a letter, importing, that he said long after his apostasy, that there were few learned persons, and very few honest men in that order (33). He answers as to the Poem, that he spoke of the Jesuits

(26) Censure de la Doctrine Curieuse, p. 190.

(27) He is the author of the Censure de la Doctrine Curieuse de Garasse.

(28) See the Amphotides, p. 40, & seq.

(29) Ibid. pag. 40, 41.

(30) Ibid. pag. 43, 44. See below remark [7].

(31) Vita & Parentes Schoppij, p. 156.

(32) Ibid. p. 146.

(33) Inter Jesuitas viros eruditos paucos, paucissimos bonos reperiri ait. Ibid. pag. 155.

(23) In the article MATMAN.

(24) Cornelius Denius Brugensis, in Capellis, pag. m. 320, 321.

(25) In the Amphotides Scioppius, which he published in 1611. I make use of that edition.

the princes to extirpate them by the most bloody means [E]. He was not contented to (34) Oporinus Grubinius, Amphotides Scioppian. pag. 126.

(35) Ib. p. 129.

(36) Neque etiam ut multum Italici præfati & Græciensibus Jesuitis blandiatur animum inducere potest. Ibid.

(37) Ibid.

(38) Défense des nouveaux Chrétiens, Part. I, ch. i, Art. i, pag. m. 5.

(39) That is, the author of the Morale Pratique.

(40) Morale pratique, Tom. iii, pag. 124.

(41) Id. ibid. pag. 125.

fuits according to the notions Gifanius had given him of them; but he denies that those verses had been made public (34). He also denies (35) what is charged upon him in the fragment of the letter, and only confesses that he does not approve the conduct of the Jesuits in every thing, and cannot resolve to court them (36), though he acknowledges that God is the author of their institution, and that their society is not only of great use to Christianity, but also very necessary; so that he is sure that if they carefully observe their statutes, Herefy will be quickly destroyed. Tamen Societatis Jesu institutum ab ipso deo auctore profectum, et tunc reipublice Christiane non modo summo opere utile, sed omnino etiam necessarium esse credit, cui si convenienter vivant, qui religio Sacramento ei se obstrinxerunt, propediem fore confidit, ut ad tibicines mittatur, Harcique lessus fiat, neque cuiquam sine scelere aliter videri posse, persuasum habet (37). In order to know whether he altered his opinion, we need only read these words of Father le Tellier (38). He (39) must not pretend to have the honour of being the first who formed the design of converting the Jesuits. The glory of it is due a long time ago to his worthy predecessor the famous Gaspar Scioppius, who writ so much upon that matter, making it the subject of several libels. It is no wonder that those, who have inherited his implacable hatred against the Jesuits, should be likewise acted by the odd and hypocritical zeal of that writer, the most furious and infamous calumniator that ever was, as every body confesses, and that they should tread in his steps to this very day. Mr Arnauld, at whom these words were levelled, answered many things: I shall transcribe some of them. (40) Are you searchers of hearts? boldly to decide, that it was through an implacable hatred against the Jesuits, that Scioppius gave an ill character of your society in several books, and that if he shews any zeal for the Church, it can only have been an hypocritical zeal. If this be allowed, what virtue may not be cried down by making it pass for hypocrisy? (41) I am not concerned in the least for Scioppius's good or bad reputation. But since those, who abuse him most, acknowledge that he was a man of great parts, and a very learned Critic and Humanist, he deserves I should say something of him, and observe that whereas you do now furiously inveigh against him, you did formerly bestow great encomiums upon him. Scioppius had three sorts of enemies, who jointly cried him down as being too fatirical and passionate. The first were the Protestants, whom he had forsaken to turn Catholic, and particularly Joseph Scaliger, and his friends, who looked upon that pretended Prince of Verona as the hero of their sect. They were particularly offended because he had wounded their Scaliger in the most sensible part, by making his pretended descent from the Princes of Verona, pass for an idle story; and the most judicious persons are now agreed that he was in the right. His second enemies were the men of letters; he fell under their indignation by his too great fondness for the purity of the Latin tongue. Perhaps, no man since the age of Augustus knew better than he the niceties of that language. But he was so scrupulous that he could not endure any word should be taken in a different sense, from what it had at Rome in the best times, or that any other construction should be put upon it; hence it was that he found barbarisms and solecisms in most authors of this time, who pretended to write good Latin. He would have been serviceable to the common-wealth of learning, had he been contented to observe those faults in civil, gentle, and polite terms. But he did it in too harsh and shocking a manner, so far as to say that the taking of a certain word in a certain sense deserved Naticidium (42). This was, no doubt, very scandalous and pedantic; but it was no sufficient reason to give him so many hard words, and to call him the most cruel of all wild beasts. For those, who took too much pride, as well as he, in speaking good Latin, might have despised those mean things, and profited by his reproofs. But it is well known that Philologists are a sort of choleric people, that are very apt to fall into a passion for meer trifles; and that they are as much vexed at being reproached with a solecism, as if an honest man was accused of having betrayed his friend: and because they know how to give hard words in a very fine style, they inspire many people with their passions. This is the chief reason why Scioppius has been so much cried down. His too free and too vehement criticisms, upon many authors that were the most esteemed for their style, have stirred up against him almost the whole posse of the Latinists. You, Fathers, have been his third and last enemies. But I must observe, that whilst he wrote only against the Protestants, the Scaligers, and the Philologists, you heaped praises upon him. Nay, you forgave him, though he blamed your method of teaching human learning; and you did not take it ill that he was praised and esteemed by Popes, Kings, and Emperors. He published a small piece in 1636, wherein, to vindicate himself against those who reviled him, he mentions a brief of Urban VIII, to the most Christian King, which is very much to his honour, and some other letters of the Emperor Ferdinand II, of his Catholic Majesty Philip IV, of the Dukes of Florence and Mantua, and some very advantageous testimonies of Cardinal Bellarmine, and many other Jesuits, who praise him for his wit, learning, eloquence, zeal, virtue, integrity, piety, religion, prudence, wisdom, and great knowledge of the true sense of the scripture; who profess to admire him as a man famous all over the world, and call him the king of learned men, Perillustri viro Gaspari Scioppio eruditorem Regi. Do you think, Fathers, you can easily make the public believe that a man, whom you have so much commended for so long a time, is become all of a sudden the most wicked man in the world; and that his zeal for the Church, which you highly extolled, is become an odd hypocritical zeal, because he has declared in some of his books what he blamed in your conduct, as so many persons eminent for their piety have done before and after him, such as Arias Montanus, Lanusa, Lewis Sotelo, Diego Colado, Dom John de Palafox, and many others? If he has been too sharp, and too passionate, if he has mentioned some matters of fact too scandalous, I do not pretend to justify him in that respect. But unless you give seven or eight pregnant instances of his falsities, you must not expect to be believed, when you call him the most furious calumniator that ever was.

Mr Baillet says, that Scioppius appeared in print under many false names, that he might attack with more impunity not only several private persons of great note, but chiefly the whole body of the Jesuits, against whom he wrote above thirty treatises, the very titles whereof are enough to strike us with horror. He promises to unmask him in his treatise of authors disguised under the names of Juniperus Anconitanus, Denius, A Fano Sancti Benedicti, Groppius, Grubinius, Hay, Krigloeder, Sotelo, Vargas, and some others (43). You will find in Placcius the titles of a prodigious number of books published or made ready for the press by Scioppius against the Jesuits (44).

[E] He solicited princes to extirpate the Protestants by the most bloody means.] You need only read the book he published at Pavia in the year 1619, with this title, Gaspar Scioppii Consilii Regii Classicum belli sacri, sive Heldus redivivus, hoc est ad Carolum V. imperatorem Augustum Suavia de Christiani Caesaris erga Principes Ecclesie rebelles officio, deque veris compescendorum Hæreticorum Ecclesieque in pace collocandæ rationibus. A Lutheran of Strasbourg (45) answered it, and his answer is worth the reading: it is intitled, Tuba pacis occientia Scioppiano belli sacri classico, Salpistæ Theodosis Berenico, Norico, historiæ et patriæ studio. See also Justus Meyerus's (46) treatise, intitled, Juris publici capitalis questio, sint na Protestantes jure Casareo heretici et ultimo supplicio afficiendi, contra sanguinarium Gaspar Scioppii Classicum. You may see likewise the book intitled, Cancellaria Hispanica, wherein you will find some extracts of that book of Scioppius (47). Note, that he boasts of having been the principal contriver of the Catholic League, which proved so prejudicial to the Protestants in Germany. Having published a list of his exploits, to let the public see in what manner he had improved the talents which God committed to him (48), he reckons in the seventh place, Fœdus Catholicum in Germania, cujus primum auctorem & actorem

(43) Baillet, Joann. sur les Critiques Gramm. num. 555.

(44) Placcius, Anonymus, ch. ix, nam. 248, p. 67, 68.

(45) Matth. Berneggerus, presbiter of Hystoria.

(46) Professor of the Civil-Law at Strasbourg.

(47) Adjecti sunt sub finem Flores Scioppiani ex Classico Belli sacri.

(48) Talenta Christi Gaspari Scioppiani ad negotiandum creata.

(42) See the passage quoted below in the remark [F].

to vent his rage against Scaliger, Casaubon (e), and du Pleffis Mornai [F], &c: he attacked even the King of England, without any regard [G]; which was the reason why the Ambassador of that Prince, at the court of Spain, made use of violent means against such an insolent writer, who afterwards boasted of the wounds [H] which it was thought he had received upon that occasion. Going through Venice in the year 1607, he had a conference with Father Paul, and endeavoured by promises and threatnings to bring him over to the Pope's party. That, and perhaps other reasons besides, occasioned his being imprisoned for some days. He was reproached with it; but the circumstances of his imprisonment were not well represented [I]. One of the things which he most pretended to, was a fine Latin style. He found out Barbarisms in

(e) See the remark [S].

* auctorem fuisse Scioppium, literis ipsius Cæsaris manu confcriptis, & Trevirensis Electoris testimonio doceri potest: sicut etiam Comes Tilius in poculi auri, quod ei donavit, inscriptione, fœderis illius primum auctorem appellat: qui scyphus apud Benedictinos Weingartenses etiamnum servatur (49). - - - The Catholic league in Germany, of which Scioppius was the principal author and manager, may be proved by a letter, written with the Emperor's own hand, and by the testimony of the Elector of Treves; as likewise Count Tili in the inscription of the gilded cup, which he gave him as a present, calls him the chief author of that league: which cup is still preserved in the convent of Benedictines at Weingart.

(49) See the book entitled, Gaspar Scioppius de pœdia humanarum ac divinarum literarum, p. 25.

[F] He vented his rage . . . against du Pleffis Mornai.] The fury with which he endeavours to turn him into ridicule (50) in his Alexipharmacum Regium fœlli draconum & veneno aspidum sub Philippi Mornai de Pleffis nupta Papatus historia abdito oppositum, & Seren. D. Jacobi Magnæ Britannicæ Regi, sive Januariæ loco muneris missum (51), is so excessive, that I do not think any thing more severe can be written against an author. I could, says he (52), make a pretty large volume of the solecisms, barbarisms, and other faults of elocution, which I have found in the Mystery of Iniquity (53); but I will spare the Calvinists the grief of seeing their Heclor deserving not only the ferula of Casaubon, the Prince of Pedants, Alpha Cathedraliorum, but also the rod of the meanest school-master, quem quicunque virgator ubere virgindemia afficiat, & multiplicem jactura natis expiare culpam cogat.

(50) Among other things for exhorting King James to make war against the Pope.

(51) It is a book in 4to of 79 pages, printed at Mentz in 1612.

(52) Pag. 32.

(53) That is, in the Latin edition.

[G] He attacked . . . the King of England, without any regard.] See among other books his Ecclesiasticus auctoritatis Serenissimi D. Jacobi Magnæ Britannicæ Regis oppositum, printed in the year 1611, and his Calvary Regium Britannicæ Regi graviter ex oculis laboranti muneris missum, printed the same year. But see particularly his Corona Regia (54); for I still maintain that he is the author of that piece (55). Ferrarius, who praised him so much, reproaches him with, what he reckons a great fault, his having lampooned and criticized upon all sorts of people, without even sparing the supreme powers, and crowned heads. Cum quæ de ejus ingenio, doctrina, immensisque in re literaria laboribus inficari non possit, quæ essent totius Orbis testimonio comprobata, veritatis accusationem nimiamque ejus ingenii asperitatem, judiciumque subalterum, omnibusque infestum arguebat. Nam ne ipsi quidem Regibus supremisque potestatibus unquam pepercisset, cum nimia, ac pœne Cynica detrahendi libidine omnes ordines non solum multo sale defricaret, sed in omnem verborum etiam prætextatorum amaritudinem effusus, ipsa literarum capita virosque superum cultu reverendos totis voluminibus concideret, asperisque facetiis jocum ac ludibrium faceret (56).

(54) See the article PUTEANUS, remark [F].

(55) See Ferrarius in Mantissa Anatomie Jeuiticæ, pag. 63.

(56) Octavio Ferrarius, in Liberatorum funere.

He was so insolent as to abuse King Henry IV, in a most outrageous manner in his Ecclesiasticus; which was the main reason why that book was burnt at Paris. See the Continuator of Thuanus's History in the fifth book, pag. 314, under the year 1612.

[H] He boasted of the wounds.] I have already quoted the book, wherein he gives an account how he had employed his talents: we find there, that the servants of the English ambassador set upon him at Madrid, in the year 1614, and that they cried out, thinking they had killed him, Well, well, we have at last made away with that great Papist. Sicariorum undecim de familia Oratoris Anglici, qui cum anno 1614, Madridi Scioppium multis vulneribus, ut rebantur, confectum pro mortuo relinquerent, ita sibi per vias rem præclavæ gestam gratulantes audiebantur: Euge, jam tandem magnum illum Papistam jugulavimus. Quæ de re typis descripta extat Narratio, quæ Legatus Latino inscribitur (57). Mr Colomies has published a letter,

(57) Gaspar Scioppius, Pœdia humanarum ac divinarum literarum, pag. 26.

wherein Scioppius declares that he has been persecuted by the Protestants, and that they have shot at him, and given him several thrusts, so as to believe they had killed him; but that, though he had rendered himself odious to the Heretics, for having stoutly maintained the ecclesiastical authority of the Pope, he should think himself to be a more pernicious Heretic than Luther and Calvin, if he should write according to Baronius's principles, in favour of the pretended power of the Pope over the temporalities of kings. Io per difender l'Apostolato del Papa ho scritto tanti libri, quante forse nessun altro, e fui perseguitato da Protestanti, che mi tirarono delle archibugiate, e sfecate, & mi lasciarono per morto. Ma Dio mi guardi che non mi metta mai a dir una parola sola in difesa del Dominato, con che mi farei maggior heretico che Lutero & Calvino, si como piu volte con vostra D. Reverendissima mi sono dichiarato, e spero di morir buon Catolico Romano a dispetto della Corte Romana e di tutti i suoi adulatori (58).

It appears from the last part of this passage, that Scioppius was not well pleased with the court of Rome. He had been saying (59) that it is very proper Baronius should be discredited, as an enemy to sovereign princes, and to acknowledge that the annals of that cardinal contain many falsities, and that a Benedictine Monk had collected two thousand of them (60). Scioppius spoke otherwise, when he wrote, against King James, his Ecclesiasticus, that was burnt at Paris. He glories in the disgrace of his book, and says that his effigies was hanged in England, in a farce that was acted before the king. Nay, he says the Protestant league declared, that the public good required Scioppius should be put to death; which was the reason why the ambassador of his Catholic Majesty sent him to Milan. Here follows the sixth article of the account which he gives of his administration.

(61) Contemptus mortis: cujus specimen est Ecclesiæ & Sedis Apostolicæ defensio. 1. Contra Gallos à quibus Ecclesiasticus ejus publice crematus fuit, quem tamen librum Cardinalis Bellarminus, alique magni Theologi summis tulerunt laudibus. 2. Contra Regem Angliæ, cujus librum quatuor diversis libris editis profigavit: qui propterea scripto publico remedium ei violentum fuit comminatus, ejusque libros in foro exurendos curavit. In Mimo tandem, seu Comædiæ ludicro coram se acto personam ejus induci fecit, hancque in ipsum panem statui, ut faucibus ejus elisis animam per inferiorem gutturem exploderet (62): velut in Hæretici Elenchomeni præfatione videre est. 3. Contra Principes Protestantæ fœderis Hallensis socios, qui Rotemburgi in concilio decreverunt, ipsi Scioppio sublato omnino opus esse: quæ oratori Hispanico D. Baltasari Zunica causa fuit, ut cum Germania relicta Mediolanum concedere juberet, Insubricæque Præfidi salutem ejus literis accuratissime commendaret.

[I] He was reproached with it, but the circumstances of his imprisonment were not well represented.] We must keep to Brother Fulgentius's narrative. Which is as follows (63): 'At the time that those disputes were adjusted at Venice, Gaspar Scioppius arrived there, a man well known in the world by the many books which he has published. He came from Rome in his way to Germany, as he said, whither he was going, as it was discovered, to carry a book injurious to the Republic, in order to get it printed there, with some other pieces full of impious things, as that of a certain Dominican Monk, called Thomas Campanella. . . . (64) Whether it was upon that account, or for some other unknown reason, it is certain, that he fell into disgrace, and was arrested by a public order, and detained three or four days, after which they commanded him to depart instantly. Before this misfortune happened to him, he had a conference with the Father, in which they discussed

(58) A letter of Scioppius to Father Fulgentius, Theologer of the Republic of Venice. It is dated from Padua the ninth of June 1636. Mr Colomies has inserted it in his Observationes Juræ, pag. 6, & 74.

(59) So bene che egli per ignoranza ed inadvertenza scrisse molte cose falsissime: di tal maniera che un Padre di San Benedetto, mio allievo, dice di haver raccolto due mila errori di suoi Annali, ed io giudico che importi non poco, che quest' uomo sia discreditato, come nemico della giurisdizione di tutti i Sovrani Principi, il quali volse ancora in temporalibus loggettare al Papa, Ibid. pag. 8.

(60) See what Patru says in the Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, April 1684, pag. 117.

(61) Scioppius, Pœdia, p. 25.

(62) See Merici Casauboni Pœdia, pag. 23.

(63) Vie du Père Paul, pag. 191, Leyden 1661.

(64) Ibid. pag. 198.

(f) See the passage of Lambecius in the remark [K].

in the writings of the modern authors, that were the most esteemed for their eloquence, and did not even spare the most eloquent writers of ancient Rome [K]. He deserved and did not even spare the most eloquent writers of ancient Rome (f). This as a Grammarian the odious title that was given to Diogenes as a Philosopher (f). This is saying all. He had got himself so many enemies, that at last he was afraid he should not find a place of safety to retire into. It was to no purpose that he kept himself quiet at Padua, and was taken up with apocalyptic chimeras, wherewith he troubled Cardinal Mazarin [L], he did not for that cease to be in fear of some attempt upon his life. This inclines one to believe that there did not want a foundation for saying that he turned ‘couraged a long time about learning, and particularly about the doctrine of the Stoics, which he professed that he would retrieve from obscurity, and let it in the fairest and most advantageous light imaginable, as well as many other of his learned reflexions, intermixing therewith a great deal of state-affairs, and particularly such as concerned the Protestants of Germany. And then taking the Father aside, he represented to him, that the Pope, as being a great prince, had very long hands, and that therefore some misfortune would certainly happen to him, since the Pope thought he had been very much offended by him; and that he would have caused him to be killed, had he been willing to revenge himself in that manner. But that the Pope had no other design but to take him alive, causing him to be fetched away from Venice itself, in order that he might be conducted to Rome. Nevertheless Scioppius offered, if he would give him leave, to negotiate his reconciliation, with as much honour and advantage as he could desire; adding, that he was empowered to treat with the Princes of Germany, even about their conversion. The Father answered that he knew nothing he had done at which his Holiness had reason to be offended (65). . . . (66) That, as for the rest, he thanked him for his good affection, but gave himself no manner of trouble about his advices, and was resolved not in the least to depart from the interest of the public, since he had not undertaken the defence of it till he was fully assured of the justice of his cause. His two propositions, of causing the Father to be killed, or of carrying him away alive, seemed very strange, and almost incredible; but by what happened soon after, one may easily judge that Scioppius knew what he said, and that such designs had been formed against the Father long before. After he was gone from Venice, he wrote a satirical discourse, wherein mentioning his conference with the Father, he declared that he had found him to be a man neither unlearned nor timorous (67).’

(65) The words which I leave out contain the passage concerning self-murder, which I have set down in the article SAINT-CYRAN, citat. (6).

(66) Vie du Pere Paul, p. 195.

(67) See Vita & Parentes Gaspar. Scioppius, pag. 156.

(68) Ibid. p. 150.

(69) Scioppius Monaci jam effe & in transitu jus civitatis Venetæ adeptum biduana carceratione, cum Paulum Servitum insolentius ac minaciter allocutus suspensum fecisset. Lingelshelm, Epistola lxxx ad Bengarsium: It is dated the seventh of November 1607.

It appears from this account, that the friends of Scaliger were grossly mistaken, when they published that Scioppius went to Venice soon after the senate's proclamation against those who had endeavoured to assassinate Father Paul; and that Scioppius was arrested upon a suspicion that he had a hand in the assassination. Venetiam profectus est. Promulgata erat paulo ante capitalis sententia in farios aliquos (assassinos vocant) qui Paulum illum Servitum, cujus scriptum pro asserione juris Venetæ Reip. in manibus omnium versatur, aggressi fuerant, & vulnera aliquot, quæ tamen levisia præter mentem eorum non essent, inflixerant. Eo ergo in tempore in urbem cum veniret, jussu magistratus in carcerem deductus est, quasi rei hujus confcius, aut qui alterius eo explorator venisset (68). Such a falsity must needs have been prejudicial to Scaliger's cause; and the more, because he and his friends made it appear upon other heads, that they received bad memoirs concerning Scioppius. Had they consulted Lingelshelm, they might have known that Scioppius was not arrested on account of Fra-Paolo's assassination; but because he had made himself suspected, by reason of the haughty and threatening words which he made use of in a conversation with that Servite (69). Scioppius says he was arrested, upon information that he was the author of a book injurious to the Republic of Venice; and that he was going to negotiate against it in the Pope's name, with some princes of Germany. Fidem habuerunt Julio Adolpho Weiserhemio, homini Saxoni, qui . . . clam ad eos detulit Scioppium auctorem esse libri cujusdam pro Pontifice adversus ipsos scripti & Monachii typis impressi, hoc titulo, Nicodemi Macri Romani cum Nicolao Crasso Veneto disceptatio, &c. (quod quidem opus perpetuo sale ut facietia diffusus, & eruditiois varietate admirabile, præ quo Ivo tuus Villoma- rus nec bisere auferet, multi docti viri non nisi à Scioppio profecti potuisse persuasum habebant) & tunc quoque Pontificis missu ad Principes quosdam in rempublicam ipsorum inflammandos in Germaniam profecti (70). It is certain, that Scioppius writ that book: Rhodius and Placcius are mistaken in ascribing it to a professor of Bologna called Ascanius Perius (71). See the Visiera Alzata (72) of Peter James Villani of the Academy of the Humoristi, Geniali, & Infucundi.

[K] He did not even spare the most eloquent author of ancient Rome. Read these words of Balzac ‘The accuser of Cicero, about whom you desire to be informed, is the dreadful Scioppius. He has published a book at Milan, in which he accused Cicero of improprieties and barbarisms. There is but one copy of it in France, and Messieurs Du Puy lent it me when I was at Paris. This injustice done to Cicero would prove a consolation to Scaliger, if he was to return again into the world. But I expect that the same Scioppius will shortly put out another book, wherein he will undertake to prove that Cato was a wicked man, and Julius Cæsar a bad soldier (73).’ When he was but twenty years of age, he found out that Phædrus favoured sometimes of the barbarousness of Thrace his native country (74). It is therefore no wonder, that he should accuse (75) Scaliger, Liptius, Casaubon, Thuanus, Possevin (76), Vossius, Strada, &c. of incongruity of speech. His criticisms are sometimes well-grounded, but not always.

See what the learned Borrichius wrote against him, in defence of Vossius and Father Strada (77). A Jesuit (78) of the college of Rome made an apology for the latter, but I do not know whether it has been printed. Those who affirm magisterially, that certain phrases are meer barbarisms and solecisms, venture very much; for how often have the words and expressions, which they condemned, been shewed to them in classical authors? The difficulty that is to be found in such kind of disputes (79), will plainly appear to those, who will be at the pains to examine the books of John Vorstius, De Latinitate merito aut falso suspecta; those of Christopher Cellarius, De Latinitate mediæ & infimæ ætatis, and De barbarismis & idiotismis sermōnis Latini; and those which Vossius, Borrichius, &c. have published upon that subject. But to return to Scioppius, I must observe that he promised a book, intitled Hercules Coprophorus, wherein he had collected a vast number of barbarisms and solecisms: It was there that he was to shew (80) the faults of Julius Cæsar Scaliger's stile. Observe well these words of Lambecius; they fully represent the cavilling and troublesome humour of that critic. ‘Homo, ut notissimum est, ingenii maligni, & oris maledicentissimi, qui propter præstantissimum & de re literaria optime meritum virorum invidas ac injurias calumniationes, merito Canis Grammaticus appellatur (81). . . . A man, as is very well known, of a malignant genius, and of a most slanderous tongue, who on account of his spiteful and injurious way of calumniating men, that are truly excellent and famous for their learning, is justly called the grammatical Cur. See the margin (82).’

His boldness in criticising upon the stile or the expressions of Cicero, will be less surprising, if it be considered, that this father of eloquence has been censured by such men at all times. Their number is incredible. See the preface to the book intitled, Cicero à calumniis vindicatus, written by Andreas Schottus: It is a very curious piece; the eighth chapter is an answer to those who pretend that Cicero is guilty of solecisms.

[L] Apocalyptic chimeras, wherewith he troubled Cardinal Mazarin. This is a particular not very well known. Naudé, in order to refute those who complained that the cardinal did not answer all the letters that

(70) Oporium Grubinius, ubi supra, pag. 163.

(71) See Placcius, de Anonymia & Pseudonymia, in Appendice, pag. 33.

(72) The Journal of Leipzig, for the month of June 1690, pag. 363, mentions it.

(73) Balzac, Letter xii, to Chaplain, Aug. ii, dated the 22d of April 1637.

(74) See Schoffius in the Life of Phædrus. That author is mistaken in the preface, wherein he calls Scioppius Conrad, instead of Gaspar.

(75) See his Scaliger hypobolismus, and the Tract de Scilo Historico.

(76) The Physician who wrote a History of the house of Gonzaga, &c.

(77) It is the Appendix of the book intitled, Olai Borrichii Cogitationes de varia Latine Lingue ætatis & scripto . . . Vossii de Vitiis Sermonis.

(78) Called Pierucci. See Borrichius, ibid. p. 268.

(79) See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for May 1701, pag. 517.

(80) See his Alexipharmacum Regium.

(81) Lambecius, apud Magrum, Eponymolog. Critico, pag. 740.

(82) Mr Grævius has very well described the satirical humour of Scioppius in his preface to the works of Daniel Eremita, printed at Utrecht in 1701.

turned his eyes toward Holland, and expressed some desire of going back to the communion of the Protestants [M]. Authors do not agree about the year wherein he died;

(83) Naudé Dialogue de Malcusi, pag. 454.

(84) Ib. p. 455.

(85) That book of Naudé was written in 1649.

that were written to him, says (83), 'That the office of first minister in France . . . is like a net, in which all mad, melancholy, hypochondriac, and extravagant men are caught; like a rock, on which the ship of fools (navis illa narragomia seu Stultifera Brentii) splits; and like a load-stone, which attracts all the visionaries that are in the kingdom. So that if the first minister was obliged to read all the chimerical designs, all the extravagant proposals, and all the ridiculous and impertinent advices of those men, he would not have time enough to read and examine them, though he should lay aside his most serious affairs, to mind none but those. . . . (84) I have known within these five years (85), three men of great virtue, and extraordinary learnings, of whom the first, who is Cattius, a canon of the city of Arras, maintains, that there is a mountain of gold in Palestine, which the holy scripture promises to Christians, when they shall have conquered the Turks; and that God will have a new temple built for him in the middle of Jerusalem: He has got the plan of that temple engraved, with all the proofs and explications of his opinion, taken from holy writ. The second, who is Scioppius, a person sufficiently known all over Europe, pretends that no father or doctor of the church did ever understand the holy scripture better, or by means thereof more certainly know the end of the world, and the mysteries of St John's Revelation than he: and the third, called Dr Colombi, is now busy to get a general council assembled, wherein the pretensions of the king of France to Navarre and Franche Comté, may be decided in his favour, and has even drawn up all the decrees and canons, which it will be requisite to make for that purpose. As I have seen part of the writings which those three men have sent to the cardinal, with a view to support their chimerical designs by his authority; I am perfectly well assured, that if the cardinal had been so injudicious as to mind them, they would have cut out more work for him than his best secretary could have dispatched. And because every body pretends to be a politician, foolish and extravagant men must needs be more numerous among those of that profession, than among others: Which does likewise multiply the number of advices, counsels, designs, memoirs, and such like pieces, which are all equally impertinent, and alike proper to make the ministers to whom they are addressed lose their time, if they should be simple enough to mind them. And yet because they are not so, and because their experience and knowledge of affairs enable them to know immediately, quid solidam crepet, - - - what things have a solid appearance; those hypochondriac and melancholy gentlemen, thinking themselves repulsed, take from thence occasion to blame them, and to say, that they do not answer letters of consequence, for they look upon their follies as things of great moment, juxta illud, - - - according to the saying,

Quisquis amat ranam, ranam putat esse Dianam.

A frog to him who such a thing esteems,

No more a frog, but fair Diana seems.

That they neglect great affairs, and the certain means of getting money, of making peace, and of saving the kingdom, to mind trifling things, and to play with monkeys. And it happens, by reason of their many complaints and clamours, that a poor minister, whose business sometimes gives him no breathing time, is accused of not discharging the duties of his office, of too much indulging his pleasures, of neglecting the letters and advices he receives, and of being unworthy of such a post: In short, if they were to be credited,

Collige farcinulas dicet libertus & exi,

Jam graves es nobis.

Pack up your baggage, shall the steward say,

And go, for you are burthenfome, away.

Several people will doubtless blame me for not leaving out what does not belong to Scioppius in this long passage; but I refer them to many other readers, who will be very well pleased with the reflexions of Gabriel Naudé which I have quoted.

Such was the fate of Scioppius: After he had spent many years in censuring, biting, and defaming every body, he applied himself to the prophecies of the holy scripture; he looked for the key of them, and flattered himself that he found out the key which St Peter left, which no body had discovered till then (86). Weary of so many engagements, and of the many blows he had given and received, he shut himself up in that tower, he fixed upon that work and imposed this upon himself for the task of his old age. A happy man, if he wholly left off his satirical humour, and had no desire of exciting people to great revolutions, by telling them that the promises contained in the Apocalypse would be shortly fulfilled. All those who have concerned themselves in such an undertaking, did not stay, as he did, till they were weary of their slanders: On the contrary, some made their weapons sharper by it, and grew more satirical; others designed only to excite the passions, and to stir up the people. You will find the plan of Scioppius's book, in a letter written by him from Padua, the twentieth of February 1642. It appears from it, that great things were to happen in a short time, and that he brought the art of prophesying into a system. Quatuor libellos, said he (87), istis indicibus seu titulis jam confectos habeo. 1. Fons sapientiæ intus ad digito monstratus, hoc est, Eclogæ ex Sacra Scriptura & sanctis Patribus de Sacra Scriptura studio, ejusque studii necessitate, utilitate, adjumentis & temporibus. 2. Clavis scientiæ ad aperienda regni cælorum mysteria propediem consummanda, hoc est; specimen Exegeseos Prophetiæ in Psal. xlv. 3. Annunciatio regni Christi ac populi Christiani in orbem terræ futurum usque ad novissimum annorum & expeditionem Gog & interfectionem ejus. 4. Systēma artis prophetandi, continens ejus artis finem, officia, materiam subjectam & instrumenta, exemplo Galeni in systēmate artis medicæ.

[M] That he expressed some desire of going back to the communion of the Protestants.] Mr Arnauld could not believe it. 'There is one thing that would give a very ill opinion of Scioppius, if it were true: viz. That he had a mind, in his old days, to enter into articles with the Dutch, about his religion, and that accordingly he writ to Leyden, that he would turn Protestant if they were willing to receive him. But this is so unlikely, that the bare authority of Hornius is not sufficient to make us believe it. He expresses in all his books so much zeal for the Catholic religion, and so great an aversion for heretics, that it is highly improbable he intended to return to his first religion. Besides, he was a man of so great parts, not to mention his noble birth, that if he had been mean enough to entertain such a thought, he would have found but too many Protestant princes ready to receive him with open arms, without being obliged to ask a livelihood of the professors of Leyden, whom he had cruelly offended by his usage of Joseph Scaliger, their hero and their idol. This is all that I could say, not having Hornius's book by me. But I have just now received the whole passage of that author, which I have inserted at the bottom of the page, because the bare reading of it is sufficient to hinder us from giving any credit to it; it is so full of passion and fury against the Catholics in general, and Scioppius in particular, accusing the former of a barbarous design of murdering all the Protestants, and the latter, of being the promoter of that cruel resolution (88). Here follows the passage that was sent to Mr Arnauld: I take it from the 386th page of George Hornius's Ecclesiastical History (89), continued and commented upon by Mr Leydecker. 'Nunquam res Evangelicorum in majori positæ erant difcrimine, quam post illam Bohemiorum calamitatem. Jesuitæ enim jam quasi parta de Univerſa Germania, imo omnibus Evangelicis, victoriâ, insolenter triumphabant, ac nil nisi cædem Protestantium sperabant, quodam flagitiosissimo Grammatico, & ob scelera Athorſi Noricorum commissa infami, Gaspare Scioppio, (86) Me jam exegesi seu prophetia scripturæ (quam S. Petrus vocat) plus quingenta folia expleville, ea ipsa clave ad aperienda ejus mysteria usum quam idem Apostolus nobis reliquit vix tamen à quoquam adhuc intellectum. Scioppius, Epist. ad Vossium. It is the 334th among the letters written to Vossius, pag. m. 225.

(87) Sciopp. Epist. ad Vossium, pag. 225.

(88) Morale pratique, Tom. iii, ch. vi, pag. 129, 130.

(89) Edit. Lugd. Bat. 1687. I shall observe for the benefit of those who have another edition, that this passage is to be found numero 6, of the third article of the third period.

died, but I think his death ought to be placed in the year 1649 [N]. It cannot be denied that he was a very learned man; and had he had as much moderation and probity as he had learning and wit, he would be justly reckoned one of the heroes of the common-wealth of learning. His application to study, his memory, the multitude of his books, the quickness of his parts, his eloquence, and his ascendant over his enemies [O], are surprising things: but his victories cost him dear, for he was

Schoppio, ex Palatinatu superiore Neagora oriundo, fed indigno, qui tam præstanti nationi apud posteros accensetur, (five, ut se appellari Italice malebat Scioppio) homine in apostasiam prolapsio, classicum canente & totale excidium Protestantium promittente, ac suadente: qui tamen nihil nisi miserabilis literator fuit, ut opera ejus inepta & maligna ostendunt, ac extrema senectâ, scriptis Patavio, ubi præ Jesuitarum, vitæ ejus infidantium, metu delitescerebat, Leidam literis, transitionem iterum ad evangelicos offerebat, si in gratiam reciperetur, sed rejectus Apostata contentusque ob vanitatem fuit. . . . The affairs of the Evangelics were never in a more dangerous situation, than they were after that calamity of the Bohemians. For the Jesuits, as if they had obtained a complete victory over all Germany, nay over the whole body of the Evangelics, triumphed insolently, and meditated nothing less than a massacre of the Protestants; a certain Grammarian of a most wicked life, and infamous on account of the crimes which he had committed at Aldorf, I mean Gaspar Schoppius, born at Neagora in the Upper Palatinate, though unworthy that posterity should reckon him to be of that noble nation, (or as he rather chose to be called after the Italian manner Scioppius) a man that had apostatized, founding the charge, and promising and advising the total destruction of the Protestants: who nevertheless was no more than a miserable smatterer in learning, as it evidently appears from his foolish and spiteful productions; when he was extremely old, he wrote letters to Leyden from Padua, (where he was lurking for fear of the Jesuits, who had designs against his life) in which letters he offered to return to the Protestants, if he could be received into favour, but the Apostate was rejected and despised on account of his vanity. I have hardly read any author, who mentions this design of Scioppius, without quoting Hornius for it. Which makes me apt to think, that no other authority can be alledged; and I doubt one voucher is not sufficient in a fact of such a nature. I have heard a learned Lutheran say, that Scioppius's letters, upon that subject have been in Boetclerus's hands. But why then were they not published; for it is well known, that many people look upon Hornius's narrative as a meer fable? It is at least an infiduciation, which deserved to be censured by the academical senate. One cannot say, that the most illustrious university of Leyden rejected Scioppius's offers, without doing them wrong. Such a conduct would have been neither consistent with human prudence nor Christian charity. It would have been a glorious thing for the Protestants to regain such a man; besides, ought not the Church to open her arms at all times to her revolted children? Must she not, like the good shepherd, go in search of all the sheep that are gone astray? Much more would she be guilty, if she shut the door against the sheep, that are willing to return into the fold. Was it an impossible thing for Scioppius to repent? Could it be certainly determined that his request was a trick? But, however that was, might they not have taken care to prevent his doing any mischief. Take notice, that he observes in his letters to Vossius, that the prophetic books which he desired to publish, contained nothing contrary to the Church of Rome. He gives plainly to understand, that he acknowledges the injustice and usurpation of the court of Rome, but he says nothing whereby it appears that he intended to retire among the Protestants. Vix autem sperare audeo, fore ut quicquam istorum in Italia edendi venia mihi detur, non quod quicquam in eis vel decretis Romanæ Ecclesiæ de fide, vel bonis moribus adversetur, sed quod mores Curie Romanæ omnes Ecclesiæ leges jam olim in potestatem suam perduxerint, nec jam quicquam fas sit quicquam tale dicere aut scribere, quale ipsi Pontifices in D. Bernardo, Brigitta & Catharina Senensi non modo verè recteque dictum falsi sunt, sed etiam pro saluberrimo fidelium dogmate religiosè observari voluerunt (90). Observe also, that this letter contains all sorts of civilities, and several marks of confidence with respect to Vossius.

(90) Scioppius, Epist. ad Vol. sum, p. 225, 226: It is dated the 20th of February 1642.

[N] His death ought to be placed in the year 1649 (91). It will appear from the following words of Mr Baillet, that few people know when Scioppius departed this life. This uncertainty would have vexed him, had he foreseen it, when he made so great a noise all over Europe. (92) I have not been able hitherto to know precisely in what year he died. Mr

Patin, the father, says it was in 1649. Mr † Lambecius tells us he was writing books still in 1652. Others seem to say that he lived beyond the year 1660. Mr † Galois, speaking of him in 1665, says he had been lately dead. Mr † Conigius writing in 1678, has these words, Paucis ab hinc annis vivere desit, - he ceased to live a few years ago. To which I add, that others place his death in the year 1663 (93).

Of all those writers, Mr Patin is he who comes nearest to the truth; for it is certain Scioppius died in the year 1649. Ferrarius speaks of him, as of a man who was no longer alive, in a speech (94) which he delivered in the sixteenth year of his professorship at Padua (95). But he began to be a professor in that university in the year 1634 (96), and therefore he said so in 1650. From whence it ought to be concluded that Patin had not been ill informed about the year in which Scioppius died, when he wrote the following passage, on the thirteenth of July, 1649. (97) This year proves very fatal to men of letters: since

Mr Hofman's and Mr Pietre's decease, we have also lost Mr des Yveteaux, who had been the late king's preceptor; Mr Justel, secretary to the king, a learned man, who did formerly belong to the Marshal de Bouillon. Besides, Vossius and Spanheim are dead in Holland; Paganinus Gaudentius in Italy, and likewise Gaspar Scioppius, who wrote about forty-three years ago a very infamous book against the incomparable Joseph Scaliger. This Scioppius was a Lutheran in his youth; he turned Roman Catholic by reading Baronius's Annals, as he said. Afterwards he went to Rome; where he was a domestic of Cardinal Madrucio's. He had a mind then to turn Jesuit (98); but the society were of opinion that it was better for him to remain a layman, and that he could do them greater services, which he actually did by writing against Scaliger.

He made some journeys for them to Germany and Venice in disguise (99). Afterwards he had a pension from the emperor: but at last he declared himself an enemy to the emperor and the Jesuits, and went to Padua for the safety of his person, where he lived secure from all his enemies, having obtained a pardon for his past life from the Republic of Venice. He is suspected to be the most considerable author of many small pieces published against the Jesuits within these fifteen years, and among others, of the Anatomia Societatis, & de Stragematis Jesuitarum. He formerly told one of his friends, who is also very much mine, that Cardinal

Baronius had solicited him by letters, when he was in Germany, to turn Catholic, and promised, in that case, to procure him a Cardinal's hat (100); and that Baronius himself hoped to be made Pope after Paul V.

[O] His application to study, his memory, the multitude of his books . . . his ascendant over his enemies.]

Ferrarius tells us, in the passage which I am going to cite, that he studied night and day; that during the fourteen last years of his life he kept himself shut up in a little room, and that his conversation with those that went to visit him, run only upon learning; that, like another Ezra, he might have restored the holy Scripture, if it had been lost; and that he repeated passages of it at a breath for several hours together with such a memory, that those who heard dined at Amberg with the Prince of Anhalt, governor of the Palatinate, and was kindly used by him. See Amphibol. Sci. pp. pag. 129, 130.

(91) As Mr Witte does, in Diario Biographico.

(92) Baillet, États célèbres, Art. 69.

(93) In his Letters.

(94) Tom. i. Bibl. Vind. Cel. cap. l. lib. i.

(95) Journal des Savans.

(96) Bibl. vet. & nov.

(97) Obiit anno 1663 octogenario major. Pape Blount, Confessio Auditorum, pag. 692. He would have lived eighty seven years if he had lived till 1663.

(98) That which is intitled Funus Literarum.

(99) Per exedim annos in Patavino Gymnasio . . . Rhetorica partes implet. Ibid. circa fin.

(100) Carolus Patinus in Lyceo Patavino, p. 15.

(91) As Mr Witte does, in Diario Biographico.

(92) Baillet, États célèbres, Art. 69.

(93) In his Letters.

(94) Tom. i. Bibl. Vind. Cel. cap. l. lib. i.

(95) Journal des Savans.

(96) Bibl. vet. & nov.

(97) Obiit anno 1663 octogenario major. Pape Blount, Confessio Auditorum, pag. 692. He would have lived eighty seven years if he had lived till 1663.

(98) That which is intitled Funus Literarum.

(99) Per exedim annos in Patavino Gymnasio . . . Rhetorica partes implet. Ibid. circa fin.

(100) Carolus Patinus in Lyceo Patavino, p. 15.

(97) Guy Patin, Letter xv, of the 1st edition, and xxii of the 2d, page 96, of the first volume, Edit. of Geneva 1691.

(98) Others say he was a Jesuit, and that he left that order. See Mr Baillet, Jesuits, on the Critic-Grammarians, num. 535. It is a mistake. See Amphibol. Sciopp. p. 169.

(99) This seems to be false: The first journey he made into Germany was after his turning Roman Catholic, was in the year 1607, when he was arrested at Venice for some days. He appeared in Germany with pomp, and as being in the service of the Archduke Ferdinand. (See Vita & Peritum Gasparis Scioppii, p. 155, 156.) Nay he

(100) See Amphibol. Scioppianæ, pag. 169.

(90) Scioppius, Epist. ad Vol. sum, p. 225, 226: It is dated the 20th of February 1642.

(91) As Mr Witte does, in Diario Biographico.

(92) Baillet, États célèbres, Art. 69.

(93) In his Letters.

(94) Tom. i. Bibl. Vind. Cel. cap. l. lib. i.

(95) Journal des Savans.

(96) Bibl. vet. & nov.

(97) Obiit anno 1663 octogenario major. Pape Blount, Confessio Auditorum, pag. 692. He would have lived eighty seven years if he had lived till 1663.

(98) That which is intitled Funus Literarum.

(99) Per exedim annos in Patavino Gymnasio . . . Rhetorica partes implet. Ibid. circa fin.

(100) Carolus Patinus in Lyceo Patavino, p. 15.

was strangely abused; nay, he mistrusted sometimes his dreadful pen [P]. He had the whole Bible at his fingers end (g). It is not true that he would not suffer his picture to be drawn [Q]. He left behind him several manuscripts which are very

(g) See Ferrarius's words in the remark [O].

him could not sufficiently admire him, especially considering that he drew from them very singular doctrines, and such as were unknown to the most learned. The number of his books exceeded the number of his years. Ferrarius having mentioned the interest he had with the Popes and several princes, and the public employments bestowed upon him, goes on thus (101): De nec inanium pertæsus in se ipsum recederet, & partim Mediolani, partim in hac Urbe (102) victurus, æternum libris bonæ fidei posteritatis negotium transgeret. Eos libris in ore famæ in commendatione omnium versari. Quumque per omnes fere disciplinas capax ingenium circumtulisset, duo tamen in ipso exemplo satis exprimi, nedum laudari posse, judicii vim in aliorum scriptis æstimandis, & ad latinæ orationis censuram exigendis miram, atque exactam, tantam vero sacrarum literarum peritiam, quantam fortasse nullus ad hanc diem, quantamque nemo credat, qui illam auribus non usurparit. Ut, quod olim de Efdra dictum est, deperditos linguæ sanctæ Codices solus reparare potuerit. Scilicet usque ad extremam senectutem, nuntio rebus humanis remisso, noctu dique in sacrarum literarum commentatione incredibili labore versatum ut ipsum aduentibus per plures horas uno veluti spiritu infinita sacræ paginæ loca inusitata memoriæ felicitate suppetebant, atque attentius repræsentaret, atque ex ipsi divinæ sapientiæ penetralibus arcana etiam doctissimis ignorata exprimeret. Nimirum cum raro alias prodire in publicum sole-ret, extremis temporibus quatuordecim annos domo, ac ferme angusto cubiculo clausum diebus noctibus jungentem lucubrare perpetuo solitum, cumque à doctis inviseretur, ne unquam à literis abscederet variis, ac festiuis de re literaria sermonibus profundæ eruditionis fructus uberrimos communicare consuevisse, huncque ipsi ludum, hoc otium, hoc laborum le-vamen semper fuisse. Nec mirum si etate exacta plures libros à se confectos, quam annos numeraret, ejusque opera vel magnam Bibliothecam instruere possent, ipsæ vivæ ac perambulantes Bibliotheca merito appellaretur.

The ascendant he had over his adversaries is a kind of prodigy. I have quoted above a passage out of Mr Baillet in his book concerning famous children, wherein that author confesses (103), that G O D did almost in every thing reward his indefatigable labour with great success; the sequel of that passage runs thus (104): G O D permitted not that his excessive labours should occasion his death, or prejudice his health; but was pleased to let him live in the world for the space of twenty olympiads, and perhaps more (105), for the execution of his designs, and the trial of many people.

[P] For he was strangely abused; nay, he mistrusted his pen. Soon after the publication of the Scaliger Hypobolimus, some outrageous pieces came out against him. Baudius took Scaliger's part in verse, and Heinsius (106) in prose. Another author made a bloody satire, intitled, Vita & parentes Gasparis Scioppij. Scaliger did not remain idle: he published Confutatio Fabulæ Burdonum, under the name of Janus Rustgerfius, which he denoted only by the initial letters J. R. (107). Barthius came in for one, and wrote three satires against Scioppius, which I have mentioned in another place (108). Here follow the titles of some other pieces against the same man. Alberti de Albertis Lydius lapidis ingenii, spiritus ac morum Gasparis Scioppij. Ejusdem Vindiciæ generales adversus famo-sos Scioppij Libellos in Jesuitarum, at Munich, 1649, in 12mo. Henrici Wottoni Epistola de G. Scioppio cui propter argumenti similitudinem etiam alia adjecta sunt, at Amberg, 1637. One of the chief writers for the Jesuits against him was Father Laurence Forerus, who published Grammaticus Proteus, arcanorum Societatis Jesu Dædalus delolatus, & genuino suo vultu repræsen-tatus: accessit aularium animadversionum in Gasparis Scioppij Ecclesiasticam Astrologiam, at Ingolstadt, 1636, in 8vo. Appendix ad Grammaticum Proteum quid de relatione Alphonfi de Vargas sit sentiendum, in the same place, and in the same year, in 8vo. 'The Je-suits, they are Mr. Baillet's words (109), represent him as the greatest knave, and the most profligate man in the world, and as the public pest of learning and of human society. And indeed the greatest men of that time complained of him, almost all with one voice, Catholics, Heretics, and even the Deists, and all of them voted for his proscription, because he attacked every body without distinction, defamed the most honest men with as much pleasure as impudence, and took a pride in neither sparing quality nor merit.' Ferrarius, who praised him so much, acknowledges that he was forced to hear very unpleasant stories (110).

I have said that he did not always trust his pen: the thing is this. A pretender to great matters in the common wealth of learning took delight in abusing Scioppius, and placing him in the lowest rank of men of letters. He even threatened to write a book against him, which should convict him in the eyes of the whole world to be nothing but a mere ignoramus. Scioppius sent him word that he should hold his tongue, and that if he continued to vex him, he would bring himself into trouble, not in the court of Parnassus, before the Muses, but before the tribunal of the Magistrates; that Scioppius laying down the weapons of learning, would employ no other writings against him, but such as the records of Bologna could afford him; that he would take care to get a copy of the information and sentence, whereby that man was convicted of several crimes. These are, said he, the arms I shall make use of, if he continues to be troublesome to me. When the man had been threatened thus, he gave over the design of writing against Scioppius, but continued to speak ill of him. Nicus Erythræus relates the thing very handsomely; the reader will be glad to see his Latin; the thing would want some of its principal beauties if I did not give it in my author's own terms. 'Cum de singulis, de trahendi gratia, maledice contumelioseque loquere-tur, Gasparem vero Scioppium, qui in literaria Rep. in primis ordinibus numeratur, imi subiectioni virum, atque inter literatos proletarios, ut ita dicam, referendum esse aiebat; quem ille Scioppium, quoniam in quodam libello sua tempora, quasi literatis viris non amica, modeste reprehenderat, cepit contumelias omnibus lacerare, atque palam eum infantem, rudem, & omnino omnis eruditionis expertem atque ignarum asserere, minitaturque, se libro edito ejus infamiam palam omnibus facturum. At Scioppius misit illi, qui diceret, si sibi amplius molestus esset, non se pugnaturum cum eo eloquentiæ doctrinæque armis, sed dictis testium, ac sententiis judicum, in publicas tabulas relatis, quibus Bononiæ, malorum facinorum argutus, evictus, ac condemnatus fuisset; his se armis curaturum, ut ejus projecta ad detrahendum bonis viris audacia infringeretur, ac retunderetur. Hic auditis, a scribendi contra illum sententia destitit, seque tantum intra verba continuit (111).' This may be looked upon as a very mortifying disgrace for Scioppius. Properly speaking, Zoilus Ardelio triumphed over him; for when a man of letters, in a dispute of learning, has recourse to magistrates, bailiffs, and attorneys, it is a sign he mistrusts his pen and his knowledge. He changes the state of the question; he shuns the fight, he dares not enter the list with his antagonist (112).

[Q] It is not true that he would not suffer his picture to be drawn. Thomas Bartholinus says, that Scioppius would never suffer his picture to be drawn or engraved, tho' his friends desired it; and he conjectures that this was owing to his fear of enchantments. But because he is mistaken as to the fact (113), his conjecture ought not much to be minded. However I shall set down his words, which contain some other examples that are a little more certain (114). 'Adduci nunquam potuit. Gaspar Scioppius, quamquam sæpe ab amicis rogatus, ut effigiem suam vel coloribus picturæ vel æri cælatorum committeret. Nescio an fascino metu, quod adversariorum, quos & magnos & multos habuit, prestigias timeret. Hinc maluit cum Actio Poeta, voluminum non imaginum certamina exercere. Certe nec Palestrinus, nec Velfrus (115) nec Pinellus, Viri magni se vivos depingi voluerunt, sicut Calceolarius in Musco prodidit. . . . Gaspar Scioppius could never be prevailed upon, tho' he was often importuned by his friends, to suffer his picture to be

(110) Ita multum in se odit concelle ut aemulas ipse quoque historias audire cohercet, bellique plerumque civilibus Mulierum pacem inquietaret. Ferrarius ubi supra.

(111) Nicus Erythræus. Pinacoth. I, p. 241. He speaks of one Zoilus Ardelio. It is doubtful a just position name.

(112) Compare with this what shall be said in the remarks [D] and [E] of the article THO-MAS.

(113) Scioppius, mentions his Print. p. 51, and 100, of his Am-plius Scioppia-næ. It may be seen in Frehe-rus's Theatrum, pag. 766.

(114) Thom. Bartholin. d. le-gendis Libris, pag. 63, 66.

(115) I speak of it in the remark [G] of his article.

(101) Oslavius Ferrarius, in Prolusione cui titulus Funus Literatorum.

(102) That is, at Padua.

(103) Baillet, Enfances célèbres, Art. 69.

(104) Ibid.

(105) Mr Baillet, Jugum des Scavans, sur les Crit. Gramm. num. 435, says he lived above eighty years: it is certain he lived but seventy-three.

(106) It is he who made the satire intitled, Hercules tuam fidem five Munsteris hypobolimus, and another piece intitled, Virgula divina five Apotheosis Lucretii Vespillonia.

(107) See Thomafius, Præfat. in Orationes Mureti, p. 24.

(108) In the article BARTHO-LINUS, rem. [Q].

(109) Baillet, Jugum des Scavans, ubi supra, num. 535.

very much commended [R]. I have not been able to find the eulogies of Julius Cæsar Capaci, wherein honourable mention is made of him. Two little books have appeared under the name of ANDREAS SCIOPPIUS, Gaspar's brother [S]. It is a supposititious name.

If any one desires to know how earnestly Scioppius applied himself in his youth to get an exact knowledge of the Latin tongue, he must read his Scaliger Hypobolimus folio 401. Being told that the reading of the ancient Poets was dangerous for young people, and being desirous to learn Latin from the best authors, without doing any prejudice to his virtue, he made use of a remedy, which deserves to be mentioned [T].

'be either painted or engraved. I do not know whether this proceeded from his fear of enchantments, because he dreaded the tricks of his adversaries, who were both many and considerable. But he rather chose, with the Poet Accius, to distinguish himself by books than by pictures. Certain it is, that neither Palæottus, nor Vellerus, nor Pinellus, all three great men, would suffer their pictures to be drawn, while they were alive, as Calceolarius has given an account in his Museum.' Batholius might have added to the three examples of Calceolarius, a King of Lacedæmon (116), the Philosopher Plotinus (117), and a famous English Divine (118), &c.

[R] Several manuscripts that are very much commended. Read these words of Morhofius: 'Libri Scioppiani divini multi, atque inter illos ejus Theſaurus, sive abſolutiſſimi de linguâ Latinâ Commentarii apud Joh. Michaelem Pieruccium, Professore Patavinum, latitant, neque hunc in diem lucem, cum indignatione eruditorum, vident; de quibus legentibus est Gregor. Let. Ital. regnante part. 3. lib. 3. pag. 325. Magna hujus libri expectatio apud literatos est, & qui viderunt, ita commendant, ut in illo genere nil simile à quoquam scriptum illis esse videatur (119). . . . Several books of Scioppius are in manuscript, and among them his Theſaurus sive abſolutiſſimi de Linguâ Latinâ Commentarii, remain in the hands of John Michael Pieruccius, professor at Padua, and are not yet published, to the no small indignation of the learned world. Concerning these read Gregor. Let. Ital. regnante part. 3. lib. 3. pag. 325. Great is the expectation of that book which we have mentioned, and good judges, who have seen it, praise it to such a degree, that they think no writing of the kind was ever to be compared with it.' This Pieruccius is probably the same upon whom Scioppius bestowed so many encomiums in his letter to Vossius, and who wished he might have been professor of Philosophy in Holland. Scioppius had taken him into his house, and made him his sole heir (120).

[S] Andreas Scioppius, Gaspar's brother. . . . is a supposititious name. It is thought (121) that the Jesuit Garaffe is the author of two satires, one of which is intitled, Andreas Scioppii Gasparii fratris Horofcopus Anticotoni, ejusque Germanorum Martillarii, & Hardivillerii vita, mors, cenotaphium, Apoteosis (122); and the other, Andreas Scioppii Gasparii fratris Elixir Calvinisticum, seu lapis Philosophicæ reformatæ à Calvinio Genevæ primum effusus, dein ab Isaac Casaubono Londini politus, cum testamentario Anticotoni codice nuper invento (123). Mr Baillet (124) does very well observe that Gaspar Scioppius had no brother, that write any thing; but that, in point of satire, the pretended Andreas deserved to be Gaspar's brother. The son of Isaac Casaubon made the same observation. Præam, says he (125), nisi merueris hic homo quisquis sit, ut Gasparis Scioppii frater credatur esse. He had been saying, Certum est tale illud esse scriptum ut ipse Gaspar Schop. illius auctor esse poterit: adeo mendacii & calumniæ refertum est, adeo plenum maledictis & conviciis, &c. Soon after he speaks of a satire written by Gaspar Scioppius, as Eudæmon-Joannes acknowledges (126). That satire is intitled, Holsernis Kriſtſæderi Landſperga Bavarii responſio ad epistolam Isaac Casauboni, Regii in Angliâ Archipædagogi pro viro clarissimo Gaspare Scioppio (127). Casaubon is accused in it not only of being ignorant of the Latin tongue, but also of being a pimp, a whoremonger, an adulterer, and a thief, and some thing worse still: Ille meo patri, quem scit ipse spectatissimæ semper integritatis fuisse, supra, furta, lenocinia, adulteria, (hec ipsa enim crimina illi impingit, & alia quoque vel dictu sæda) audent obicere? mirum mihi videtur & incredibile, nisi quod Schoppium co-

gito (128). The reading of that book, if Scioppius may be believed, threw Casaubon into a fit of melancholy of which he died (129). Meric Casaubon (130) refutes this by his father's journal, whereby it appears, under the first of the ides of March, that Casaubon despised that satire. Having read the infamous things that are published in it against himself, his father, and his wife, he wrote in his journal that he gloried in suffering with his family all those reproaches for the sake of JESUS CHRIST. His son observes in the margin, that there is nothing in that libel of Scioppius against his mother. He accuses that satirical writer of Atheism, and proves it in the following manner. Scioppius has collected the finest passages of the scripture, wherein we are forbidden to rail at our neighbours; and at the same time the tract wherein he has inserted them is a violent satire: his design was therefore to let the public know that he laughs at the scripture. Quum intenderet alius inaudito exemplo calumniari, & omni convitiarum genere prosequi, congerit præcipuos S. Scripturis locos quibus vetatur aliis ullam omnino contumeliam facere, aut convitiarum dicere: novum ut omnibus palam faciat, quo loco Dei mandata habeat homo perditus, atque Deo ipsi (borresco referens) illudat (131)? The following words of Mr Baillet may be added to that Latin passage. 'Casaubon calls him the most cruel of all wild beasts, and pretends in another book of his that Scioppius was a professed enemy to God, and that he had found in one of his books execrable blasphemies against the divine authority of the holy scripture (132). But it is to be observed that those blasphemies are only strained expressions about the authority, which the Roman Catholics pretend the Church has received from God to explain the scripture. Ducit bodie familiam, they are Casaubon's words (133), inter hujus generis hereticos hostis Dei certissimus Scioppius; in cujus Ecclesiastica leviter inspecio, multas legi superioribus diebus adversus rædæonæus Scripturas, blasphemias longe dirisimas.

After this digression I return to Father Garaffe, and I say he could not have pitched upon a more proper brotherhood. Mr Baillet (134) observes, that there was in the beginning of our century one ANDREW SCIOPPIUS, in Saxony, a Lutheran; but I cannot believe, adds he, that he was Gaspar's near relation. I can say nothing upon this subject, I only know that our Scioppius calls Conrad Schoppius, a learned man, who was still living in 1633, his cousin (135). He taught Rhetoric at Berne (136), and had been Professor of Eloquence and Poetry at Heidelberg (137). I would not affirm that CONRAD SCHOPPIUS, a Taylor of Francfort (138), one of the chief authors of the insurrection which happened in that town in the year 1614, and beheaded two years after (139), was not related to Gaspar. There has been a minister, called CONRAD SCHOPPIUS, who published some Latin sermons (140).

[T] He made use of a remedy, which deserves to be mentioned. It consisted in mortifying his body by a strict diet. He fasted whole days in Germany poring upon his books; and when he was at Rome, he wholly abstained from wine, meat, eggs, and fish: he made but one meal in a day, and eat then nothing but very common things and in a small quantity; half a cabbage, a little rice, a small piece of cheese, a pear or an apple; and both in winter and summer, he had no other bed than boards, two blankets, and a pillow (141). There is no doubt but these are excellent remedies against the rage of incontinency, when a man does sincerely desire to live chaste. Those, who pretend that they are not very effectual, and that marriage is the only true remedy, are such as never tried them, or do not much care

(128) Meric Casaubonus, vid. supra, p. 21.

(129) Scribit hic nebulo patrem meum postquam legerat hunc fœm libellum, ex desperatione vite renuntiasse, æque inde vivere desisse. Id. ibid. pag. 24.

(130) Ib. p. 25.

(131) Ib. p. 20.

† Isaac Casaubon. in Epistol.

† Id. Casub. Exercit. i. in Baron. pag. 109. M.

(132) Baillet,

Jugemens des Savans, ubi supra, tom. 535.

(133) In Apparatu. Baronii, §. xxxiii, pag. 133, Edit. Genevæ. 1663.

(134) In Vol. i. of the Anti, Art. 15, §. 5.

(135) See the 20th letter of the fifth book Supplementum of Gaspar Scioppius.

(136) See the Epistle Dedicatory of Freinhemius's Commentary upon Quintus Curtius.

(137) See the verses he made for Philip Pareus: they are prefixed to the Lexicon Criticum of the same Pareus.

(138) See the Continuator of Thuanus's History, lib. viii, pag. 433.

(139) Idem, ib. x, pag. 658.

(140) Draudius mentions them in his Bibliotheca Classica.

(141) Cubitus . . . affert sine ulla culcita cervicali tantum duobusque lodicibus instructi. Scioppius, ubi infra, fol. 251.

(116) AGESILAUS: see the end of his article.

(117) See his article, remark [A].

(118) Gataker, see the beginning of his Life.

(119) Morhof. Polyhist. lib. i, cap. vii, p. 62.

(120) See the letters written to Vossius, pag. m. 224.

(121) See Mr Baillet, Auteurs deguez, Part. iii, cap. iii, §. 2, and in the Catalogue.

(122) Printed at Antwerp for Jerome Verdussen, 1614, in 4to.

(123) Printed at Antwerp for the heirs of Martin Nutius 1615, in 4to.

(124) Baillet, in Tom. i. of the Anti, Art. 15, §. 1.

(125) Meric Casaubonus, in Pietate, p. 18.

(126) Castigationum, lib. ii, pag. 125.

(127) Printed at Ingolstadt, 1615, in 8vo.

to resist luxury; and therefore their testimony is of no great force: but the affair we are now upon is a relation, not a dispute. Here follow Scioppius's words (142). 'Cum primis ineuntis adolescentiæ meæ annis veteres scriptores, & in primis poetas legere cuperem, & viros autem doctos audirem, qui arma pruriginis, hoc est, obscena illa poetarum carmina isti præsertim ætati propter periculum etiam atque etiam cavenda dicerent: excogitavi rationem, qua cum minimo meo damno aut periculo utilitates, quæ ex lectione ista peti possunt, haurirem. . . . Ego qui lubricas illas poetarum cantilenas tuto, & ut ait Lucretius, mea sine parte periculi percipere cuperem, temperantiæ & abstinentiæ ultro me colligandum præbui. Nam ut Terentius ait, sine Cerere & Baccho friget Venus: five ut ante ipsum Euripides:

Ἐν πλοσμοῦν τοῖς Κύπρις, ἐν πινύντι δ' ὕ.

Saturis adest Venus, non esurientibus.

Monstrum scilicet haberetur libido sine gula (ait Tertullianus) (143). . . . (144) In libidinem ebullire, res laterum est ac virium. Vires autem, ne infirmitas forsan perdat militiam, cibis excitantur. Scitis, ait ille, quid tentare soleat humanam satietatem. Toto itaque biennio sic in Germania vixi, ut integros dies aridus, siccus ac jejunos in studendo consumerem, omninoque prandia ignorarem. Veni postea in Italiam; ubi cum plerisque omnes scriptores veteres tam Græcos, quam Latinos, diligenti lectione contrivissem, excerpissemque sedulo omnia, quæ ad corrigendos ordinandosque mores & affectus & ad vitam quam tranquillissimè agendam usui fore visa essent. . . . Non modo his, quod in sculis sibi non probari Plato ostendit, sed etiam semel in die saturum fieri, & vino carere nolle, non satis eo dignum esse deprehendi, qui sibi legendis sapientiæ magistris illis operæ pretium fecisse videretur. . . . Quare ne in legendis istis oleum & operam perdidissem, tamquam germanus Stoicus quique ad vitam potius, quæ didicisset, quam ad disputationes referenda conferret, vinum aqua ex præfluente Tiberi haurita mutavi, quod ignem scilicet, ut Plato ait, igni addendum non putarem: tum carnes in perpetuum à mensa mea proscripti, non solum † διὰ τὴν καθαρίαν τὴν ἀπὸ τῆς κρεοφαγίας ἐργασίαν, sed etiam ἀσκήσεως χάριν καὶ τὰ μὴ σφραγῶν περὶ τὰ ἀπορροισία τὴν σάρκα, ut idem Clemens loquitur, cum verissime à S. Hieronymo dictum sit: Esum carnis esse feminarium libidinis. Sed etiam piscibus & ovis culina ac mensa mea interdixi, quod hæc quidem * στυγία plus satis experimentis didicissem, piscium vero esu majorem etiam, quam carni, voluptatem capere solem: quare dimidiato caule & aliquantulo oryze cum piro aut pomo & casei frustillo contentus, ipsas viginti quatuor horas durare soleo, eadem opera jentans, prandens, cœnans ac commissans. . . . While very early in my youth I had an inclination to read the ancient authors, and especially the Poets, and hearing learned men say that these instruments of wantonness, I mean the obscene verses of the Poets, ought strictly to be guarded against at those years, on account of their dangerous consequences, I thought of a way by which with the least prejudice or hazard to myself I might reap the advantages of such reading. . . . Desiring to peruse these dangerous productions of the Poets in safety, and without my share in the danger, as Lucretius words it, I frankly bound myself over to temperance and abstinence. For, as Terence says, Love languishes without good victuals and drink: or, as Euripides be-

Love thrives with plenty, but with hunger dies.

Luft without good cheer (says Tertullian) would be looked upon as a prodigy. . . . The babbings of lust are the effects of a vigorous and healthy body. But this vigour is provoked and set on by victuals. You know, says he, what temptations a man generally has after a belly-full, &c. . . . Wherefore like a true Stoic, and one who thought his learning was rather to be applied to his life and manners than to disputes, that I might not lose my labour in reading these books, I changed my wine for the water of the Tiber, because I was unwilling, as Plato says, to add fire to fire. I likewise for ever banished meat from my table, not only on account of the heaviness which is occasioned by the eating thereof, but also for the sake of exercise, and that my flesh might not have too great an itching to love-affairs, as the same Clemens says; and as it is most truly affirmed by St. Jerome: That the eating of flesh is the nursery of lust, &c. Take notice that he says (145) that before he had read Father Collier's books, he practised most of those things only to live in conformity to reason, but after he had read these, he directed them to God. It is also to be observed that he believed the reading of some books could excite the most drowsy tempers. He reckoned among those books some commentaries of Scaliger and their text. (146) Vos autem capulares illi, vieti, edentuli, & jam diu Acheronti debiti, si jam vos opus perdere & tamquam caballos in clivo non facere pudet, ut Satyrion compendi faciatis, familiares hujus mei auctores, in eosdemque notas legite,

--- Accendi queis frigidus ævo

Laomedontiades aut Nestoris hernia possit (147).

But ye, decrepit, shrivelled, toothless old men, whose bodies are long ago due to their graves, if ye be not beneforth ashamed to lose your labour, and to fumble like worn out jades upon the mountain, instead of all provocatives, read the authors of this friend of mine, and his notes upon the same,

So full, so fierce, so vigorous, and so strong
That looking on would make old Nestor young.

DRYDEN.

And because he took hold of every opportunity to insult that great man, he tells him in a reproachful manner that he slighted his father's judgment, in commenting upon certain authors. I shall set down his words, that the reader may see that men of great virtue and learning, though belonging to the same family, are divided in their opinions about obscenities. (148) Scioppius, Cum pater tuus obscenos & immemorabiles Aufonii, Martiali, simulumque poetarum versus negavit à Critico censendos, atque adeo ne legendos quidem omnino, aut audiendos, sed detestandos & flammis expiandos, & pro signis Priapi, adeoque pro libris honori ejus scriptis, sanctorum imagines à nobis habendas esse contenderit. . . . (149) Tu exortus es homo sanctissimus & castitatis ac pudicitie exemplar atque specimen, qui non modò illum ipsum censura patris tui notatum Aufonium, sed hoc etiam Burdigalensi Triphallo nullo deterius mutoniato Catullum, Tibullum, Propertium, & Priapeiorum versuum scriptores, magna temporis curæque impensa à te recensitos, castigatos, nec penitendos (ut gloriaris) commentariis illustratos emittere & adolescentibus commendare auderes. Hoc, satis scio, nullo modo patri tuo probare posses. . . . After your father had declared that the leud and infamous productions of Aufonius, Martial, and the like Poets, did not deserve the remarks of any Critic, and therefore that they were not to be read or heard, but to be detested and burnt, and that instead of the statues of Priapus, and books written in honour of him, we ought to have the images of the Saints. . . . You appeared, a man of eminent sanctity, forsooth, and a singular instance of modesty, who have taken care to publish, for the benefit of the youth, not only that same Aufonius, whom your father marked with a note of infamy, but likewise these other masterpieces of ribaldry Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius, and the authors of the Priapeia, after having revised and corrected them with great loss of time and pains, and illustrated them, with a commentary of which, as you boast, you have no reason to be ashamed. Thus, I am well assured, you could no ways justify to your father.

(142) Idem, in Scalig. hypobolim. fol. 250.

(143) You will find above in the remark [†], num. iv. of the article EREMITA, the sequel of Tertullian's words, and several passages of the like nature.

(144) Scioppius, ibid. verfo.

† Non solum propter hebetudinem, quæ ex carniū esu generatur, sed etiam exercitationis gratia, & ne carnis nimis perprurificat ad Venerem.

* Pruriginem commovetia.

(147) Juvén. Sat. vi, ver. 323.

(148) Scioppius, ibid. fol. 281. verfo.

(149) Ibid. fol. 282.

(a) Marcel, cb.
viii, of the delethful Folie,
pag. 123, Lyons 1650.

(b) Naudé Apo-log. des grans Hommes, cb.
xvii, p. m. 496.

[(§ a) In his 18th Macaronic.
The passage begins with, Ecc Michaelis de incantu Re-
gule Scoti.
R. E. M. CRIT.]

(c) Naudé, ibid.

SCOTUS (MICHAEL) a learned man, and a great lover of Mathematics and Astrology, lived in the XIIIth century. He was well beloved by the Emperor Frederic II to whom he dedicated all his books. They have put him in the class of Magicians, and they tell us that he frequently invited several persons to dinner, without causing any thing to be got ready for them, but that having made his guests sit down at table, he forced the spirits to bring him meat from all parts, and when it was come he told the company, Gentlemen, this comes from the kitchen of the King of France, and this from the kitchen of the King of Spain; that comes from England, &c. (a). Merlinus Coccaius has diverted himself with describing his enchantments (b) (§ 2). The Poet Dante adopted the common error [A]. We have more reason to believe John Bacon, an English Carmelite, and the Prince of the Averroists (c), who quotes (d) Michael Scotus as a great Divine. We have likewise more reason to believe Pitseus who commends him very much [B]. However it be, it is said that this pretended Magician forefaw in what manner he should die, and that he foretold the place where the Emperor Frederick II should lose his life [C]. I shall say something of his books [D].

[A] The Poet Dante adopted the common error.] There are his words at the end of the XXth Canto of his Hell.

Quell' altro, che ne' fianchi è così poco,
Michele Scotto fù, che veramente
Delle Magiche frode fe' pe il gioco.

He there with meagre sides was Michael Scot,
Who truly had the art of Magic got.

[B] Pitseus commends him very much.] He says in express words, that though Michael Scot was accounted a Magician by the vulgar and rabble of the ignorant, yet wise men have entertained a quite different opinion of him. "Prudentum tamen & cordatorum hominum longe aliud fuit judicium, qui potius perspicax ejus in scrutandis rebus abditis admirabantur ingenium, laudabant industriam, quam reprehendendam judicabant curiositatem, inspiciebantque hominis scientiam, non suspicabantur culpam (1)."

• Pitseus 1. vo-
lum. de rebus Anglicis.

(1) Naudé Apologie des grans Hommes, cb.
xvii, pag. 498.

(2) Grangier in his French Commentary upon Dante's Inferno,
pag. 254, 255.

[C] He forefaw in what manner he should die, and marked the place where the Emperor Frederic II should lose his life.] This I find in a commentator upon Dante. "Michael the Scotchman, says he (2), lived in the reign of the Emperor Frederic II, and foretold to him the place where he should die, which he said was Florence. Wherein the said emperor was deceived by reason of the equivocal name; for he did not die at Florence, the chief town of Tuscany, but in a castle of Apulia called Fiorenzola. That Magician forefaw that he himself should die by the fall of a stone, that should break his head. Which accordingly came to pass; for one day being at church bare-headed to worship the body and blood of JESUS CHRIST, the rope fastened to the bell that was ringing, made a large stone fall upon his head, and immediately he thought he should die, which he did suddenly."

[D] I shall say something of his books.] He wrote a treatise about Physiognomy, and a book containing several questions upon Sacroboles's sphere, and a History of Animals (3). He should have been mentioned in the great catalogue of Vossius (4), on account of the second of these three books; but I did not find him there. The treatise about Physiognomy was written at the request of the Emperor Frederic II, I have it in Italian: The title runs thus: Physiognomia laqual compilo Maestro Michael Scotto, à preghi di Federico Romano Imperatore, huomo di gran scienza: & è cosa molto notabile, e da tener secreta però che l'è di grande efficacia, & comprende cose scritte della natura, bastanti ad ogni Astrologo: & è diviso in tre parti. It was printed at Venice per Marchio Sessa, in 1533. It is a book in octavo consisting of seven sheets.

(d) Part. iii.
Sentent. Disting.
xxiii.

(3) See Naudé,
ubi supra, pag.
496.

(4) Vossius, de Scient. Mathem.

SCRIBONIUS (WILLIAM ADOLPHUS) a German Physician and Philosopher, and author of several books [A], was born at Marburg, and lived towards the latter end of the XVIth century. As he had a great esteem for the method of Ramus, he published Logical Expositions of some of the sciences, and I believe that he begun with Rerum Physicarum juxta leges logicas methodica Explicatio. It is a book of 107 pages in 8vo, printed at Francfort in the year 1577. He was one of those who maintained that witches ought to be punished, and that the proof of water was lawful in this kind of prosecution (a). One may see in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (b), that they reprinted in the year 1686 a letter which he wrote upon this subject.

(a) See Voëtii Disputat. Select.
Tom. iii, p. 568,
573.

(b) For the month of August 1686, Art. ii,
pag. 890.

[A] Author of several books.] I have taken notice in the text of what I reckon to be his first production. He caused it to be reprinted oftner than once, and enlarged it considerably, so that in the edition of Basil 1583 he divided it into three books. It was reprinted the same year at London with his Isagoge Sphærica methodicè propostæ, in 8vo. His Physics were reprinted at Cambridge cum Animadversionibus Timothei Brighti, in the year 1584 in 8vo. His Idea Medicinæ secundum Logicas leges informandæ came out at Lemgow the same year in 8vo. He added to it a treatise de inspectione urinarum contra eos qui ex qualibet urina de qualibet morbo judicare volunt. Item de hydropæ, de podagra, & dysenteria physilogia corporis. His book de Jagarum natura & potestate deque his rellis cognoscendis & puniendis: ubi de purgatione earum per aquam frigidam contra Johannem Ewichium & Henricum Newwaldum, was printed at Marburg the year 1588 in 8vo. His Anti-Piscator Logicus ad Logicas exercitationes Johannis Piscatoris respondens was printed at Basil the same year in 8vo. I do not think that he was an Anti-Ramist, as Mr Baillet believed (1) on account of that book. He styles Ramus in an epistle dedicatory (2) Philosophiæ sinceriores antistes, - - - the head of a better Philosophy. Let us not forget that he procured a new edition of Theſaurus pauperum Petri Hispani, and of Theſaurus sanitatis of Liebauld, at Francfort 1578 in 8vo.

(1) Tom. ii, of the Anti, Art.
140.

(2) That of Re-rum Physicarum
juxta leges logi-cis methodica Explicatio.

SCULTETUS (ABRAHAM) professor of Divinity at Heidelberg, and author of several books [A], was born at Grunberg in Silesia on the twenty-fourth of August

[A] He is author of several books.] We have seen in the text of this article that he taught scholars in his room while he was yet a scholar himself. The lectures he read to them upon Morality and the Sphere at

August 1566 (a), and after he had studied there till the year 1582, he was sent to Breilaw to make further improvements. He was quickly recalled from thence, because his father, who had lately lost all that he had in the great fire of Grunberg (b), was no longer able to maintain him at the college, and designed to make him learn a trade. The young man did not like such a proposal, and in order to pursue his studies went in quest of a tutorship. He found a good one in the house of a burgo-master of Freistadt (c); which gave him an opportunity to hear Abraham Bucholcer preach (d). He made a journey into Poland in the year 1584, and the year following went to Gorlitz in Lufatia, where he staid above two years, going constantly to the public lectures, and reading private ones to others (e). He acted those two parts in the university of Wittemberg in 1588, and 1589, and then in that of Heidelberg till he was admitted minister in the year 1594. He exercised his ministry, in a village of the Palatinate (f) for some months, and then he was invited by the Elector Palatine to be one of his preachers. I shall speak of a conference he had with Samuel Huberus [B]. He was chosen minister of St Francis's church at Heidelberg in the year 1598, and two years after he was admitted into the Ecclesiastical senate. He was several times employed to visit the churches and schools of the Palatinate; and notwithstanding those avocations, he wrote some books which required great labour. He followed the Prince of Anhalt to the war of Juliers in the year 1610, and applied himself to settling Ecclesiastical affairs in those parts, with great prudence and vigilance. He attended the Prince Palatine Frederic V in his journey into England, in the year 1612; and got himself acquainted with the most learned men of that country. He went to the court of Brandenburg, in the year 1614, the Elector John Sigismund, who was ready to renounce Lutheranism, having desired to concert with him the measures it was proper for him to follow in this change. He executed well the commissions that were given him in such a juncture (g). Being returned to Heidelberg, he, for very good reasons, accepted of the charge of preacher to the court. He obtained leave to resign it in the year 1618, when he was appointed professor of Divinity. He was soon after deputed to the synod of Dort, and endeavoured at first to reconcile the contending parties; but perceiving that it was in vain, he stoutly maintained the doctrines of the Contra-Remonstrants. He preached at Francfort the year following, during the fitting of the electoral diet; for his master appointed him preacher to the deputies he sent thither. He followed that prince into Bohemia, and having retired into Silesia, after the fatal battle of Prague, he resolved to return to Heidelberg, in order to discharge the office of professor. He was no sooner arrived there, but all academical exercises ceased: the enemies being at the gates, most of the professors fled away. He retired to Bretten, and then to Schorndorf, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, from whence he went to Embden, in August 1622. The King of Bohemia, his master, had consented that the city of Embden should offer him a minister's place. This call was accepted of (h): but the Professor of Heidelberg at Heidelberg, produced a book which was soon after printed and explained in some illustrious schools. In eadem Scholâ meâ privatâ Auditoribus petentibus doctrinam Morum & Siderum explicabam; unde mihi Ethicorum libri duo, Sphericorum libri tres confecti, qui non ita multo post publicati, & in aliquot Illustribus Scholis fuerunt enarrati (1). Samuel Huberus being called to Wittemberg, in the year 1593, made an oration de diffidiis in religione. - - - of diffentions in point of religion. Scultetus published a confutation of it without putting his name to it. Scholâ & Notis in illam, sed sine nomine editi, in quibus homini crassos errores in Logica, crassiores in Grammaticâ, crassissimos in Theologiâ commisit (2). He composed at the same time, 1. An Analysis of the works of the Fathers, which was printed some years after at Amberg, and intitled Medulla Patrum (3). 2. An Agagoe Historica in V. T. libros, together with an Analysis of Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, Polybius, Dionysius Halicarnassensis, &c. He lost that work and several others after the battle of Prague, and particularly the History of the Reformation (4). He took a journey into Silesia in 1594, and returning to Heidelberg he went through Gorlitz, where he made a funeral oration on Laurentius Ludovicus (5), which was printed, and afterwards inserted by Melchior Adam in his lives of the Philosophers. This Laurence had been Melancthon's scholar, and principal of a college at Gorlitz (6). Martin Mylius, who succeeded him, desired Scultetus to pay that duty to his old master (7). Scultetus published in 1611, an exposition of the gospels for Sunday, which was translated out of German into several languages (8), and put into the Index librorum prohibitorum, - - - of prohibited books, at Rome (9). He published two sermons he had preached in the synod of Dort, two other sermons preached by him at Heidelberg in the secular year of the Reformation, and that which he had preached at Prague against idols. Take notice that he did not lose all his Annals of the Reformation; for he published the two first decads before he went into Bohemia with the Elector his master. I find that he wrote Idea concionum in Esaiam, Epistolâ D. Pauli ad Romanos & Hebræos & Psalmos Davidis, & observationes Grammaticæ, Logicæ, Historicæ, & Theologicæ in historiam Jesu Christi nati, educati, baptizati & tentati, & in historiam concionum & miraculorum Jesu Christi, & de precatone tractatio logica & Theologica, & Joannis Baptista logice descriptus. See Freherus's Theatrum (10). He had a hand in the Greek and Latin edition (11) of St Athanasius, and of the councils of Nice and Ephesus; to which, he added a short History of the seven universal councils, and his translation of twenty Greek sermons (12). I shall say nothing of his German books against a Jesuit of Mentz, against M. de Neer's apostacy, and against the confession of Cologne, &c. (13). See again Freherus's Theatrum.

[B] I shall speak of a conference which he had with Samuel Huberus.] In the year 1606 he was sent to Newstad to confer with a mathematician (14), who had been employed to finish and publish a book of Rhetoric (15), and who put off from day to day the publication of that work. He went in the name of the great council, to discourse with him about what was necessary to be done, in order to make an end of that edition. He found Samuel Huberus at Spire, in the inn where he lay. That man was preparing a book for the next Francfort fair, and no sooner knew who Scultetus was, but he proposed to him a dispute upon controversies in religion: It was accepted, and lasted from nine a'clock in the morning till three in the afternoon, in the presence of the Lutheran ministers. It turned upon the doctrine of Predestination (16). Scultetus came off at last by an argument, which was a kind of a personal jeff. Tandem abfolvi

(a) And not 1556, as Freherus, Theatri, p. 424, affirms. He says in the following page that Scultetus died the 24th of October 1625, aged 59 years. It is a wrong calculation.

(b) The 26th of July 1582.

(c) Near Grunberg.

(d) The author of some Chronological books.

(e) Publice didici, privatim docui. Abraham Scultetus, ubi infra, citation (b), pag. 16.

(f) Called Schriesheim, near Heidelberg.

(g) Profectus sum Bellinum ibique rem Christi, pro virili ad mentem usque Octobrem, egi. - - - I went to Berlin, where I exerted myself as much as I could in the service of Christianity till the month of October. Id. ibid.

(h) Taken from a book of Abraham Scultetus intitled, de curriculum vite. . . . Narratio apologetica, printed at Embden 1625, in 4to.

(10) Freher. Theatrum, pag. 425.

(11) Printed for Commelin 1601.

(12) Scultet. ubi supra, pag. 35.

(13) Id. ibid. pag. 24.

(14) Called L. Valentinus Otto.

(15) I think it was Canon triangulorum. See Vossius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 66.

(16) Taken from Scultetus, ubi supra, p. 32, 33.

(1) Scultetus, in Narrat. Apologetica de curriculum vite, pag. 23.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) That work contains four parts, which came out one after another.

(4) Scultetus, ubi supra.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 28.

(6) Id. ib. p. 16.

(7) Id. ib. p. 28.

(8) Id. ib. p. 52.

(9) Id. ibid. pag. 67. It was in the decree of the 10th of May 1613.

(17) Paul. Freher. in Theatr. pag. 425, but according to Witte in his Diarium, it was in 1624.

Heidelberg did not enjoy it very long, for he died on the twenty-fourth of October 1625 (i). He was married three times, and left but one daughter behind him [C]. No man was ever more cruelly slandered by his enemies [D]. I have said in another place (k), that he did not approve that the Protestants should write one against another. What

(k) In the note PITISCUS remark [B].

(17) Id. ibid. pag. 33.

'me argumento in speciem quidem sed re ipsa minime jocofo, quo docui Huberum non esse Ecclesiae veræ filium (17). - - At last I got off clear by an argument which seemed to be, but in truth was not, a joke, by which I proved that Huberus was not a son of the true Church.' I will prove to you, said he to Huberus, that you do not belong to the true Church: it is certainly either among the Reform- ed, or among the Lutherans, or among the Ro- man Catholics. But you have left the communion of the Reformed, you have been expelled from that of the Lutherans, and you write against the Roman; therefore, &c. The dispute went on quietly, for the two chief qualities of a good disputant met in Huberus; he patiently heard his antagonists, tho' never so prolix, and meekly bore their hard words. Atta & peracta sunt omnia tranquilla: Neque enim dissimulanda sunt omnia tranquilla: Disputatores primæ sunt, dam est: quæ duæ virtutes in Disputatore primæ sunt, eas ambas in Hubero deprehendisse, patientiam adver- sarium prolixæ suæ explicantem audiendi, & lenitatem etiam asperæ dictæ perferendi (18). He maintained that all men are elected, and perplexed Hunnius, who de- nied the election of some persons (19). Primum laudo Huberi ratiocinationem qua Aegidium Hunnius Witem- bergæ confinxerat, qui nec Huberi generalem, nec Re- formatorum specialem electionem agnoscere voluit (20).

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) See the re- mark [E] in the article HUN- NIUS.

(20) Scultet, ubi supra, p. 33.

(21) Id. ib. p. 29.

(22) Id. ib. p. 44.

(23) In viduitate sedecim menses vixi, quibus corpusculum meum cum non uno morbo attentaretur, valetudinis curatricem quaesivi. Id. ibid.

(24) Id. ib. p. 45.

(25) Id. ib. p. 47.

(26) Id. ib. p. 23, 45.

(27) Id. ibid. pag. 76, 77.

[C] He was married three times, and left but one daughter behind him.] His first wife was Catherine Bergia, whom he married at Heidelberg in Novem- ber 1594 (21). He lost her the twenty-fifth of March 1605, and continued sixteen months a melancholy widower (22), so sickly, that he thought his health requir- ed he should have some body to take care of it (23). He therefore married Catherine Lorichia, the widow of Dr Rhodinus, and having lost her the twentieth of October 1607, he married another widow the eigh- teenth of July 1608 (24), by whom he had a daugh- ter, the first of December 1609 (25), who, together with her mother, were the companions of his exile at Embden, in the year 1624 (26). [D] No man was ever more cruelly slandered by his enemies.] He expresses himself thus in the Epistle Dedicatory of his 'Narratio Apologetica. Dentatis scriptis, infamibus Theſibus, contumeliosis anagrammatismis, picturis, cantilenis, in nomen, in famam, in doctrinam meam involarunt, perindeque omnis generis convitiis in me debacchati sunt, ac si ego unus essem qui omnem Israelæ turbarim & solem, quod dicitur, ex univer- so mundo sustulerim. - - They attacked my reputa- tion and doctrine with satirical writings, infamous theſes, contumelious anagrams, pictures, ballads; and they railed at me in such a furious manner, as if I had been the only man that had troubled Israel, or who, as the saying is, had taken the sun out of the world.' I cannot tell whether there was any good ground for those slanders, but I believe the free access he had to princes, made him odious to several people; and that the uneasiness of some, and the joy of others, after the misfortune of the Elector Palatine in Bohemia, brought to light the ill effects of envy. The court preacher was attacked when thought to be under dis- grace, and the ice being once broken, every body fell upon him; the first satires made way for others; it was like a snow-ball that went always increasing. He was accused (27) of having advised the Elector Pala- tine to accept of the crown of Bohemia: He was made answerable for all the calamities which followed that enterprise; it was objected to him, that instead of discharging the duties of his professorship at Heidel- berg, he had acted the part of an intriguing man, and an Iconoclast in Bohemia; and that he shewed him- self an Atheist, by approving the union of the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia: he was blamed for having persecuted the Roman Catholics, the Lutherans and the Unitarians; and it was given out that he had lost his master's favour, and all his employments, after the battle of Prague. This was dispersed by word of mouth, and in writing in the courts of princes, and in the universities and towns. He was four years without justifying himself; but at last he took up the pen in his own defence, in imitation of St Basil. Hæc dicta, scripta, decantata per Regum, per Prin- cipum aulas, per Academias, per urbes & oppida: Quæ nisi reprimere, famæ meæ prodigum jure me- rito haberer. Quod si quis quaerat: Cur in quar- tum annum responsum, ad tam atroces calumnias distulerim? is hoc à me audiat: imitatum me fuisse Basilium illum Magnum, qui cum undique appeteret, adeo perturbatus fuit, ut non veritus sit scri- bere Epistolâ septuagesimâ nonâ, parum aliquando abſuisse, quin de omnium hominum fide & sinceritate dubitaret: indixit autem sibi ipsi silentium in ter- tium usque annum ne quid præcipitatur effunderet: postea varias apologias texuit (28). - - If I should give no check to these speeches and writings, that are so much talked of in the courts of kings, in the univer- sities, towns, and cities, I might justly be considered as a man prodigal of his reputation. But if any one ask me why I have delayed making a proper reply to such bitter calumnies for the space of four years, I answer that in this I have imitated the great St Basil, who, when he was attacked from all quarters, in his con- fusion, did not scruple to say, that he was sometimes ready to call the truth and sincerity of all men into question: he therefore prescribed silence to himself for three years, lest he should utter any thing rashly: after- ward he composed several vindications. Observe, by the by, that those words of St Basil are wonderful. Men are so easily prepossessed by ill reports, or so blindly adapt their behaviour to the service of calumny, that there is sometimes ground to believe that equity and uprightness are wholly banished from this world. Scultetus answers (29), 1. That he had no hand in the deliberation, whether the Elector Palatine should accept of the crown of Bohemia; but he confesses, that he preached a sermon, wherein he congratulated him for having accepted of this present of the Bohemians; and encouraged him by the words of the Lord, to behave himself valiantly in that enterprise (30). 2. That Frederic Balduinus, professor of Divinity at Wit- temberg, who blamied him for leaving his church and his professor's chair (31), had a colleague who went to preach in the country of Brandenburg, contrary to the prince's edicts. This is approving at home what one condemns abroad, though the domestic action be much more inexcusable than that of the foreigner; for, adds Scultetus, I followed my elector's orders with the con- sent of the university. Magnum crimen profecto, ac in- dubitè, Balduino iudice, majus longè eo, cui D. Meisne- rus Balduini collega obnoxius: cui è Saxoniâ in Mar- chiam ire, contra Sereniss. Electoris Brandenburgici edi- ctum, in Gynæceum Electorale irripere, ibidem concionari nulla religio fuit. Hæc, quæ nullo colore defendi pos- sunt, probat domi Balduinus: foris in concionatorio ad- buc vivebam, volentem, jubentem, consentiente Academia, in Boimiam sequutus sum (32). 3. That (33) the new King of Bohemia promised to all his subjects a free exercise of their religion, and kept his word to them; that he took only for his own use, the church of the citadel of Prague, out of which he removed all the idols. Scultetus owns that he advised him to it, and that he gave himself no rest till he had obtained it. He maintains, that he acted in that respect like a good Christian. He says, that as soon as the sermon he had preached upon that subject came to be published, the Lutherans and the Papists raised a dreadful noise every where, which was suppressed by a learned an- swer of Theophilus Mosanus. 4. That when he said (34), in his sermon upon the alliance renewed between Bohemia and Hungary, on the fifteenth of April 1620, that this confederacy was acceptable to God, since all those who entered into it professed the same faith; he only meant the Reformed and the Lutherans, and not the Papists, Anabaptists, and Arians. He com- plains (35), that Luke Olander (36) having read this sermon, openly maintained in a public disputation, that Scultetus was an Atheist (37), since he made no difference between Lutheranism, Calvinism, and Po- pery. 5. He protests that he never excited the king,

(29) Pro concione Majestati ipsius gratulatus, illam- que verba Domini è Joſua petitis ad id, quod suscepit, forti- ter agendum, or- hortatus sum. Id. ibid. p. 76.

(31) In libello quodam Germa- nico, quem de idolis scriptis, reſponſum est, quædam, qui Ecclesie & Academiae Præ- latus obligatus, in Boimiam cum Rege meo pro- fecutus sum. Id. ibid.

(32) Id. ibid. pag. 78.

(33) Id. ibid.

(34) Id. ibid. pag. 81.

(35) Id. ibid. pag. 83.

(36) Professor Divinitatis at Ti- bingen, and chancellor of the university.

(37) Quibus- dam- que factis Olander publi- theſi è me THEUM pro- mat. Id. ibid.

What he observes in answer to a man, who accused him of having raised a sacramental war in the Palatinate [E], is a remarkable thing. I should make no difficulty to believe that his master, to persecute the Papists and the Lutherans, and that it was false to say they had been persecuted. Circumferuntur varii libelli de Reformatione Boëmica, partim Latinâ, partim Germanicâ linguâ scripti: quibus si fides habenda; in Boëmiâ, me instigatore, Pontificii duriter afflicti: Lutherani magno numero gressi: ipsi proceres Regni de libertate religionis suæ sunt periclitati (38). He refers the reader (39) to a German book, wherein it was plainly made out, That this persecution was a chimerical thing; and takes advantage (40) of the contradictions of those, who had mentioned that revolution of Bohemia in their writings. He speaks (41) of a letter handed about under the supposititious name of a man of Antwerp, wherein he was desired to recommend the doctrine of Ubiquity to the king his master. He does not deny (42) that being consulted about the reformation of the Churches immediately subject to the king, he answered, That the king's religion might be established in them, since the people desired it, and the priests were not qualified to explain the Scripture. 6. Lastly, He shews, that after the battle of Prague, he did not lose his master's favour, as his enemies had given out. In order to colour that lie, they invented several reasons of his disgrace, and they went even so far as to accuse him of a heinous crime. Unde haud difficulter colligere est cujus spiritus filii fuerint: qui, me Uratislaviâ vix digresso, disseminare hoc in orbem Germania non dubitavit: me omni gratiâ Regis excidisse; officio motum esse. Et ut res colorem haberet: pro sua quisquam libidine causas finxit: alius, consilia mea de suscipiendo regno Boëmico: alius, demolitionem statuarum & idolorum Pragensem: alius (quod Deus æternum averruncasset) atrox aliquod crimen (43).

(38) Id. ibid.
pag. 86.

(39) Id. ibid.

(40) Id. ibid.
pag. 87.

(41) Id. ibid.
pag. 89.

(42) Id. ib.

(43) Id. ibid.
pag. 93.

(44) Id. ibid.
pag. 99.

The libellers persecuted him in his very exile. He was informed from good hands (44), in the year 1624, that the secretary of a certain prince had affirmed in the Lower Saxony, and even at the court of the King of Sweden, that Scultetus had departed this life towards the latter end of the year 1623, three days after having published a book full of absurd and heterodox opinions, which had obliged the magistrates of Embden to suppress it. Some body writ into the country of Brandenburg, that he had foreseen it long ago: and yet there never was any such book. A Dutch piece was published the year following, which contained a description of the devastations made in East-Friesland by Mansfeld's troops. The author having employed his slander against the States-General, and some illustrious persons, attacked Scultetus particularly, and accused him of having thanked God in the pulpit, for the irruption of those troops. And yet it was a notorious thing, that he had only thanked him for the retreat of those furious soldiers; which was attested in a book written to confute that libel.

I shall make no excuse for the length of this remark, being persuaded, that all men of sense will grant, that there are no collections of greater use than those which can any ways serve to resist two such terrible plagues, as the impudence of libellers, and the credulity of those who read their books. It is of great concern for the publick good, to make it appear by many plain instances, that there are no lies which passionate men are not capable of divulging against their neighbour's honour, and which the people is not capable of believing. It signifies nothing to confute those satirical writers by the absurdity of their stories, and by their contradictions, they persist in their boldness, and new calumniators are no ways daunted thereby. It signifies nothing to make those blush, who have been rash and simple enough to swallow down a thousand fabulous stories, maliciously and grossly invented. The very next day, they as readily give ear to others. To this kind of writings we may justly apply these lines,

Mais ils trouvent pourtant, quoi qu'on en puisse dire, Un marchand pour les vendre, & des fots pour les lire (45).

(45) Boileau,
Satire II, ver.
81.

- - - In spite of all that one can say,
Yet still they find a Bookseller to vend them,
And fools besides to read and to commend them,

nay, what is worse, to believe them. One should not therefore be weary of collecting stories that resemble the facts which I have just now compiled.

Take notice that I do not pretend to justify Scultetus in all respects. I make no doubt, that he was guilty of the fault, which a court divine does seldom avoid. I fancy, he concerned himself too much with political affairs, and brought temporal interests too often into his sermons. He was somewhat hasty in advising the destruction of images, and did not consider, that his master was not sufficiently settled upon his throne, to undertake such an innovation. But how can it be helped? Men are blinded by the first favours of fortune; they fancy, that since the kingdom of God is concerned in the case, one good success will follow another, as in the time of Joshua, and that there is nothing like making haste.

[E] A man having raised a sacramental war in the Palatinate. Here follow some further slanders against Scultetus, which he rejects as horrid lies. A certain apostate, scilicet be (46), has given out, that I excited a sacramental war in the Palatinate, in the year 1603. Scult. ibid. pag. 39.

No body ever heard of such a war, but only of a little dispute about eucharistical phrases, between the professors of the university, and the ministers of the church. It is well known, continues be, that the doctrine of the sacraments was purified from the Romish idolatry, and from scholastical phrases by Zuinglius and Oecolampadius; and that the loss which the canton of Zurich sustained in the fight, wherein Zuinglius was killed, broke the league lately concluded between some cantons of Switzerland, the city of Strasbourg, and the Landgrave of Hesse. Whereupon Martin Bucer being too timorous, was afraid that the whole party would sink, unless he strengthened, with a new alliance, the towns of the Upper Germany, and particularly Strasbourg, where he taught. He cast his eye upon the potent Duke of Saxony, and the better to gain him, he endeavoured to make every body believe that Luther's and Zuinglius's opinions concerning the Lord's-supper, were the same in the main, and that a mere dispute about words had prevented their agreement. He further said, that it was better to use Luther's than Zuinglius's expressions, because the latter spoke too meanly of the eucharist, and the other in a sublime manner. He inspired the same thoughts into John Calvin, who had fled from France to Strasbourg (47). This intrigue of Bucer introduced the Lutheran expressions into the towns of the Upper Germany especially after the fatal concordate of Wittenberg. The Divines, who taught in Saxony, under the Elector Christian, used themselves to those phrases of Consubstantiation, Phrasibus illis mystificis assueverant; so that being expelled after that prince's death, and retiring into the Palatinate, they took the ministers, who used Zuinglius's expressions in that country, to be heterodox: which occasioned a dissension; but it was so happily, and so quickly suppressed, that from that time forward there was visibly a better understanding between the Divines of the university and the rest. The apostate had given out, That the Elector Palatine caused a book, written upon that quarrel, to be burnt. Scultetus maintains that it is a lie (48). One may very well presume, that he speaks truth; for tho' it be a great piece of boldness, to affirm that a prince has caused such or such a book to be condemned to the fire, when it is false; it is still a greater piece of impudence to deny it, when it is true.

A man well acquainted with the secret history of the Church, might inform us that journeys and conferences about religion, are generally set a foot by some temporal motive. Bucer's conduct affords an instance of it: I have elsewhere mentioned (49) another like it taken from the same Scultetus. We are told that Bucer repented of having mediated the formulary of concord (50). Bucer dixit se penitus dare quod causam publicam homo privatus voluisset componere, & tam multa prava dogmata conciliare (51). Peter Martyr, who heard him say so in England, told Bullinger of it; Daniel Tossanus had it from Bullinger, and Pezelius from Daniel Tossanus, in the presence of Scultetus, who inserted it in the history of his life.

[F] It

(47) Hence it was, probably, that Calvin in his Catechism and elsewhere, made use of phrases, which seem to imply the substantial presence of the body of our Lord.

(48) Esse autem vel à me, vel ab aliis Ministris Palatinis, vel ab omnibus conjunctim scriptum aliquod super hac re publicum, quod Serenissimi Electoris iussu Vulcano fuerit consecratum; tam ego constanter nego, quam id desperatus Apostata petulanter affirmat. Id. ibid. p. 40, 41.

(49) Remark [M] of the article B E Z A.

(50) That is to say, that of Wittenberg in 1536.

(51) Scultet. ubi supra, p. 25.

SCULTETUS. SEBONDE.

that he would have cleared himself better from the charge of his having induced the Elector, his master, to accept of the crown of Bohemia, if that enterprise had proved successful. In that case there would have been no necessity for him to deny the fact [F], he would have been loaded with benedictions, and admired for his prudence: men do very seldom judge of things any otherwise than by the event.

[F] In that case there would have been no necessity for him to deny the fact. Certain Critics severe, and sometimes too peevish, take delight in exclaiming against preachers, who encourage princes to make war, without considering that they are the ministers of the Prince of peace. A preacher will patiently bear this censure when the war, which he exhorted to, proves very successful: but since the enterprise of the Elector Palatine, Frederic V, was attended with great misfortunes; it could not but be an unpleasant thing for a church-man to be told, in a reproachful manner, that he had engaged him in it. If a Divine, preaching before him, had exhorted him to undertake that war, alledging the most proper texts of the Scripture, and particularly these words of the Psalmist, Accingere gladio tuo super femur tuum potentissime, &c (52). Which may be translated thus:

Gird on thy sword, most mighty prince,
And clad in rich array,
With glorious ornaments of pow'r,
Majestic pomp display.
Ride on in state, and still protect
The weak, the just, and true;
Whilst thy right hand, with swift revenge
Does all thy foes pursue.

(a) See the end of the remark [A].

SEBONDE (a) (RAYMUNDUS) professor of Physic, Philosophy, and Divinity [A] at Toulouse in the XVth century, was a native of Barcelona. He was esteemed for his parts and learning, and wrote some books, whereof the most considerable is that which is intitled, Theologia naturalis, five Liber Creaturarum. That book must certainly not be in favour of the notions of a vulgar author, nor of one that creeps upon the surface of prejudices, since Montagne set a singular value upon it [B]. He translated it into French [C], and made an apology for it [D], which is the longest chapter of his essays.

[A] Professor of Physic, &c. I follow Mr de Mauflac, who gives him all those titles in his Prolegomena upon Raymond Martini. 'Sciendum est, says he, Raymundum Sebonde nec Dominicanum, nec in Hebraicis aliisque linguis Orientalibus valde versatum fuisse, quamvis eum ex Judæo Christianum nobis representet Michael à Monte toto capite Apologia. . . . Sed tantum Hispanum & Barcinonensem atque in Academia Tolosana Medicinæ Professore, Philosophiæ, sacraque scientiæ, eoque gradu illic insignitum. . . . We must know, says he, that Raymond Sebonde was neither a Dominican, nor well skilled in the Hebrew and Oriental tongues, although Montagne, through the whole chapter of his Apology, represents him as one who, of a Jew, had turned Christian. . . . but only a Spaniard of Barcelona, &c.' I find in the abridgment of Geisner's Bibliothèque the title of a book (1), which is a dialogue, inter Raymundum Sebondum Artium Medicinæ ac Theologiæ Professore & Dominicum Seminiverbium. I have just now run over that Apology for Sebonde, on purpose to know whether the author represents him as a Jew converted to Christianity, and I have not been so lucky as to discover the least hint of it; but because I have not read every line of it, I do not pretend to deny in all respects what Mr de Mauflac affirms. I shall only affirm that Montagne says little of Sebonde in all that long Apology, except in the beginning. Note, that Geisner calls him Sebeyde, and says, in the margin, he is also called Sabunde (2). The title prefixed to the prologue of the Liber Creaturarum in the Strasbourg edition, 1496, favours this last name: Compositus à venerabili viro magistro Raimundo de Sabunde in artibus & medicina doctore, & in sacra pagina egregio Professore.

(1) The same with Viola Arminæ.

(2) Geisner, in Bibliotheca.

[B] Montagne set a singular value upon it. See the following remark, and the remark [D].

[C] He translated it into French. I shall give an account of this translation: it may help to make

Such a preacher, I say, would have made a merit of it, if the new king well settled upon the throne of Bohemia, had secured the peace of Germany, and the liberty of conscience from the ill designs of the court of Vienna. But that enterprise proved unfortunate, and then no body was willing to confess he had advised it: so much men are afraid of the wrong custom of judging of things by the event. I call it wrong; for on many thousand occasions, there is more prudence in those who do not succeed, than in those who do. How many ill-concerted enterprises have proved successful? And how many well laid designs have proved fatal? Nay, it frequently falls out, that a great design carried on according to the best rules of policy, succeeds by unforeseen means, and such as no body depended upon. Be that as it will, the posture of affairs was such in Germany, when endeavours were used to bestow a crown upon the Elector Palatine, that prudence required the venturing a great deal. By running no hazard, there was ground to fear a slavery, which includes all sorts of misery under the Popish domination; but if the revolution of Bohemia could have been supported, it would have put the Protestants in a condition to give law. It was therefore chiefly on account of his profession that Abraham Scultetus ought to have been ashamed of the advices which he had given.

Sebonde known. Let us hear what the translator says (3); 'Peter Brunel (4), a man accounted very learned in his time, having been for some time at Montagne in my father's company, with some other persons of his character, presented him, at his departure, with a book, intitled, Theologia naturalis, five Liber creaturarum Raymundi de Sebonde. And because the Italian and Spanish languages were very familiar to my father, and that book is written in a kind of Spanish jargon, dressed out with Latin terminations, he hoped my father might make use of it with a very little help, and recommended it to him as a book very useful, and suited to the time when he gave it him, which was when the new doctrine of Luther began to be in vogue. . . .

(5) My father, some days before he died, having by chance found that book, under a heap of useless papers, ordered me to translate it into French. (5) Montagne, ubi supra, pag. 185.

It is an easy task to translate such authors as him, where there is little to do but to represent the matter; but when a book is written with great politeness and elegance, the translation of it is a difficult undertaking, especially into a language that has not the same force. It was a very strange and new employment for me; but being then, as it happened, at leisure, and being unwilling to disobey the least command of the best father that ever was, I did it as well as I could; which pleased him wonderfully, and he ordered the translation to be printed, which was executed after his death. La Croix du Maine places that impression in the year 1569. Those dialogues concerning the nature of man (so he intitles the book of Raymond Sebonde, translated by Montagne) have been printed at Paris for Gabriel Buon, in 1569, and for Giles Gourbin, in the same year (6). Du Verdier (7) does not mention the same title, nor so ancient an edition. These are his words: Le livre des creatures. Raymond Sebon est l'auteur de it: that book contains three hundred and thirty chapters, and was printed

(3) Montagne, Essays, book ii, ch. xii, pag. m. 134.

(4) It should be Brunel.

(5) Montagne, ubi supra, pag. 185.

(6) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Française, pag. 329.

(7) Bibl. p. 375, at the word Michael de Montagne.

effays. Few people have known exactly in what time Sebonde lived, or what he was. Montagne wonders how such an author could remain in so great an obscurity: all that we know of him, says he (b), is that he was a Spaniard, who made profession of Physic at Toulouse about two hundred years ago. Scaliger says in a letter written in the year 1606 (c), that Sebonde lived at Toulouse two hundred and thirty years before, or thereabouts. This does not very well agree with the Abbot Trithemius (d), who places the death of that Physician in the year 1432. I have observed in another place (e), the other mistakes of Scaliger concerning that man. He took him to be a Dominican Monk, and ascribed to him a book against the Jews, intituled, Pugio fidei - - the dagger of faith, of which Raymund Martini is the author. Our Sebonde was not very well known to Gabriel Naudæus, a man of a prodigious memory, and who had a vast knowledge of books and manuscripts; for speaking of what Scaliger says concerning Galatinus and Sebonde, he does not observe any fault in it (f). What concerns the other writings of our Sebonde will be seen in a remark [E].

(b) Essays, lib. ii, ch. xii, p. 186, of Tom. ii, Paris 1659; in 12mo.

(c) It is the 241st.

(d) See Mauffac's Prolegomena prefixed to the Pugio fidei.

(e) In the remark [C] of the article MARTINI.

(f) Naudæus, in Bibliogr. Polit.

printed at Paris in 8vo, for Giles Gourbin, in 1581. I have seen, continues he, another translation of the same book in very old French. These last words shew he does not mean John Martin's translation published in the year 1551 (8). There is another reason for it, viz. That John Martin and Montagne did not translate the same book. The book translated by John Martin contains seven dialogues. But the book translated by Montagne is not written by way of dialogue: it is divided into three hundred and thirty chapters, as du Verdier observes; and it is certain there is but one man, who speaks in the book of Sebonde, which contains three hundred and thirty chapters. From whence we may infer that La Croix du Maine does not well quote the title of Montagne's translation, and that the dialogues of Sebonde are only a cold dish heated again; for it appears from the very title of the translation that it contains the same things as the book of the Creatures. The title runs thus: La Theologie naturelle de Raymond Sebond comprise en sept dialogues intitulez autrement, de la nature de l'homme (9). See hereafter the titles of the books of that doctor.

(8) Ibid. p. 720.

(9) Ibid. p. 720.

(10) Montagne, ubi supra, pag. 186.

(11) Ib. p. 187.

(12) Ib. p. 202.

(13) Pag. 187.

(14) Pag. 202.

[D] He made an apology for it. He himself tells us what moved him to it (10). I thought the notions of that author were very fine, the contexture of his discourse very close, and his design very pious. And because many people read that book, and particularly the ladies, to whom we ought to be more servicable, I have often had occasion to help them, by answering two main objections raised against that author. His design is noble and bold, for he undertakes to establish and prove against the Atheists all the articles of the Christian religion, by natural and human arguments. This occasioned the two objections which Montagne proposed to answer. Some said (11) that the Christians hurt themselves by pretending to build their belief upon human arguments, since it is the work of faith, and of a particular inspiration of the divine grace. Others said (12), that Sebonde's arguments were weak and unfit to prove what he intends, and undertook to confute them easily. Montagne thought himself obliged to answer (13) the former gently and respectfully, because it seemed to him that there was something of a pious zeal in their objection: but, says he (14), the others ought to be handled more roughly, for they are more dangerous and malicious than the first. The method he took, was to wrest out of their hands the weak arms of their reason, by shewing them the emptiness and ignorance of men, and the divine Majesty, to which alone belongs knowledge. Those, who know Montagne's character, may easily guess that he gave himself a large scope. The judgment he makes of the arguments alledged by his author, is too edifying not to be inserted in this place. To speak the truth, says (15), I find him so resolute and successful in establishing the articles of the Christian religion by natural proofs, that I think no body can go farther than he upon that subject, and that none did ever equal him. . . . I asked formerly Hadrian Turnebus, a very knowing man, what that book might be: he answered, that he thought it was a quintessence drawn out of Thomas Aquinas; and indeed that vast genius, full of an unbounded learning, and of an admirable subtilty, was the only man capable of such notions. . . . I know, Montagne goes on (16), a man of note, bred up a scholar, who confessed to me, that he had been reclaimed from his unbelief, by Sebonde's arguments. Every body has not so good an opinion of that book as Montagne. Father Theophilus Raynaud (17) speaks of it with contempt; and a Lutheran professor (18) laughed heartily at Comenius, for saying (19) that Sebonde has so demonstratively proved whatever concerns the knowledge and glory of God, and the knowledge and salvation of man, that nothing can be alledged against it. That professor maintains, that in many things, which are not very obscure, that Spaniard argues pitifully, and he alleges, as an instance of it, the explication of the causes which produce discord among men.

(15) Pag. 186.

(16) Pag. 201.

(17) Prolegomena Theolog. Nat. num. 86.

(18) Jacob. Thomastus, Praefat. LXXVII, Lips. 1681.

(19) Comenius, de uno necessario, cap. vi, p. 49.

[E] The other writings of our Sebonde. His other books are Quæstiones disputatæ. Viola animæ per modum dialogi de hominis natura tractans ad cognoscendum se, Deum & hominem, & omne debitum quod Deo obligatur & proximo. Colonia apud Henricum Quentel 1501, in 4to (20). The dialogues of Natura hominis, printed at Lyons in 1568, are probably the same book with Viola Animæ; the latter differs from the Theologia Naturalis, only as to the method. This plainly appears from the bare consideration of the following title: Theologia naturalis, sive liber Creaturarum, specialiter de homine & de natura ejus in quantum homo, & de his quæ sunt ei necessaria ad cognoscendum se ipsum & Deum, & omne debitum ad quod homo tenetur & obligatur tam Deo quam proximo. The author was one of those men, who, when they have published a book which pleases them, or for which they are esteemed, produce it from time to time under different attires, like those Cooks, who serve the same meat dressed in different ways. I never saw any body that did not allow, that the first edition of the Theologia Naturalis is that of Paris, 1509: nevertheless, I have one of Strasbourg, in folio, printed in a Gothic letter, in the year 1496.

(20) See the Epitome of Gellner's Bibliothecæ.

SEDULIUS (CAIUS CÆLIUS, or CÆCILIUS) flourished in the Vth century [A]. He was a priest (a), and wrote a Poem, intituled, Paschale Carmen, and a book in prose upon the same subject, intituled, Paschale Opus. These two pieces have been

(a) See the remark [C] towards the end.

(1) See Father Labbe, Differt. de Script. Eccles. Tom. ii, p. 329.

(2) Ila confona exhibit Uffierius ex Thorneyana Bibliotheca. Id. ibid.

(3) Ibid. pag. 333, 334.

[A] He flourished in the Vth century. Some think he wrote his Poem under the reign of Theodosius the younger, and Valentinian III. This is observed in the manuscript of Petrus Pithæus (1), and in another ancient manuscript mentioned by Archbishop Usher (2). According to this way of reckoning he must have flourished about the year 430. Father Sirmond found in the best manuscripts of Gennadius, that Sedulius died in the reign of the emperors above-mentioned (3). Nevertheless Archbishop Usher places him after the year 470. The reason alledged by him, viz. That Sedulius's book was found scattered among his papers, and put into a good order, and published by the consul Turcius Rufus Asterius (4), is not a convincing one; for that Asterius may very well be the same that was consul with Protogenes in the year 449. And though it were granted to Archbishop Usher, that it is he who was consul with Præsidius, in the year 494; yet there will be no necessity to grant him what he says, since there might have been some years between the death of Sedulius, and the time when his book was put into order, and imparted to the public (5). There is in

(4) See Father Labbe, ibid. pag. 325.

(5) See Labbe, ibid. pag. 334.

VOL. V.

D d

been preserved [B]. He is said to have written a commentary upon St Paul's Epistles, but it ought rather to be ascribed to one SEDULIUS a Scotchman, of a much later standing [C]. We are told that the fault of a transcriber, who put the word Hæreticus instead of Heroicus, was the cause why the Poet Sedulius was hated; and that this hatred did extend to all the Poets [D]. It is allowed that he was a man of parts, and that there the old editions of the Carmen Paschale, an epistle dedicatory in verse, from which it should be inferred, that this work was dedicated to the Emperor Theodosius I; but it is very likely that this epistle belonged to a more ancient Poem, and that it was prefixed to this by a mistake, on account of the conformity of the subjects. This is Archbishop Usher's, and Father Labbe's opinion (6). However it be, it is not doubted but that Sigebert is mistaken, who says, that Sedulius flourished in the reign of Constant and Constantius; that is, between the year 340, and the year 350. It is also thought that Albertus Stadenus is in the wrong, to place him about the year 378 (7). What is certain is, that this Poem of Sedulius came out before Pope Gelasius made his decree, and consequently before the year 496, in which that Bishop of Rome died: That, I say, is very certain; for this piece of Sedulius is mentioned in that decree (8).

[B] These two pieces have been preserved. The Paschale Carmen, id est, de Christi miraculis libri quinti (9), has been often printed with the epistle dedicatory to the priest Macedonius and without it. The Paschale Opus, which is also divided into five books, and dedicated to the same Macedonius, was published at Paris by Franciscus Juretus in 1585, from Pithæus's manuscript. It is the first edition. Note that the priest Macedonius exhorted the author to put the Paschale Carmen into prose: and therefore Sigebert is mistaken, who says that the prose was published before the verses. Sedulius Episcopus ad Macedonium Prefbyterum scriptis libros de miraculis Veteris & Novi Testamenti, quos postea sub metrica lege redactos prætitulavit Paschale carmen (10). We have also some other Poems of Sedulius: the first edition of his poetical works is that of Aldus Manutius 1502. The best is that of Paris 1624, in the eighth volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum. See Father Labbe (11) and Dr

(6) See the same, ibid. pag. 333.
(7) See the same, ibid. pag. 332.
(8) Gratian. Can. Sancta Romana, Diffl. XV. apud Labbe, ibid. pag. 325.
(9) Mr du Pin, Bibl. Tom. iii. Part. ii, p. 75, of the Dutch Edition mentions only four books.
(10) Sigebertus, cap. vi. Catalogi, apud Labbe, ubi supra, pag. 328, 329.
(11) Labbe, ibid. Cave (12). pag. 335.

[C] To one SEDULIUS a Scotchman, of a much later standing. Mention is made of one Sedulius Episcopus Britanniae, who, together with Fergusus a Scotch bishop, assisted at a council held at Rome in the year 721. Bale, Simler, and some others, call that Sedulius bishop of the Southern Scotch, and say he wrote the canons of a council held at Rome. The subscriptions in the printed books run thus, Sedulius Episcopus Britanniae de genere Scotorum, & Fergusus Episcopus Scotiae Pictus huic constituto à nobis promulgato subscripsimus (13). Heptadannus (14) a Monk of St Gall mentions one Sedulius a Scotchman, under the year 818. Sedulius Scotus clarus habetur. It is to him that Father Labbe (15) ascribes the Collectaneum seu explanatio in omnes epistolas S. Pauli, printed first at Basil in 1528, and then inserted in the Bibliotheca Patrum. It is nothing else but a rhapsody made up of several extracts from Origen, Eusebius, St Jerom, &c. Aubertin (16) ascribes it to Bishop Sedulius, who, together with Fergusus, assisted at a council of Rome under Gregory II, or Gregory III. Here follow the reasons alleged by Father Labbe. That manner of commenting upon the scripture, does very much favour of the IXth century (17), and it seems that the author of that Collectaneum in Paulum, wrote likewise the Collectaneum in Mattheum, which is to be found in the library of the Jesuits of Paris, written upon very fine parchment, and with a very fair hand, above seven or eight hundred years old. Were it true that the Collectaneum in Mattheum, and the Collectaneum in Paulum were written by one and the same author, it would afford us a convincing proof against the learned Usher, Archbishop of Armagh, who pretended that the Collectaneum in Paulum was the work of the same Sedulius, who wrote the Carmen Paschale in the Vth century; for the author of the Collectaneum in Mattheum, quotes not only the Poet Sedulius, but also Pope Gregory I, St Isidorus, Arculfus, and the venerable Bede, who flourished in the VIIIth century (18). If what Mr Du Pin affirms (19), were true, viz. That the author of the Collectaneum in Paulum quotes Pope St Gregory and the venerable Bede; Father Labbe would be very much to (12) Cave, Hist. Liter. pag. 337.

(13) Taken from Father Labbe, ubi supra, pag. 328.
(14) He composed some short Annales inserted by du Chesne, in the third volume of his Collection of the Historians of France.
(15) Labbe, ubi supra, p. 338.
(16) See Labbe, ibid.
(17) Id. ib. pag. 335.
(18) See Labbe, ibid.
(19) Du Pin, ubi supra, pag. 375.

blame for not alledging that reason against Archbishop Usher, and I should very much wonder at Usher's positively saying, that the Poet Sedulius wrote the commentary upon St Paul's epistles. I do not wonder that he said so, though doubtless he was not ignorant that the Jesuit Justiniani (20) observes, that the author of that Collectaneum in Paulum transcribed some words from the twenty-first chapter of the nineteenth book of St Gregory's Moralia upon Job; for as he knew that this Jesuit declares, that those words were transcribed without naming St Gregory, cujus verba transcripsit tacito ejus nomine, he might have thought that Sedulius did not transcribe from St Gregory, but that this Pope transcribed from Sedulius. He was not obliged to be of Justiniani's opinion, who does not think it likely that St Gregory should have borrowed any thing from Sedulius: 'Nec verisimile videatur Gregorium ea à Sedulio mutuatum esse, cum plane Gregoriani styli simplicitatem redolant qui more suo hæc Apostoli verba non tam ad scribentis mentem, quam apte ad mores informandos explicat' (21). --- (21) Ibid., quod eundem, p. 338. 'Nor does it seem probable that Gregory borrowed these things from Sedulius, since they plainly savour of the simplicity of Gregory's style, who, according to his custom, in explaining these words of the Apostle, does not so much consider the express meaning of the author, as how they may be fitly applied to form the manners.' All this serves to shew that Mr du Pin is mistaken. It would not be sufficient to know that Sedulius, the author of that commentary upon St Paul, is a different man from Sedulius the Poet; it is further necessary to know whether the latter was a Scotchman. Many affirm it, but I do not find they alledge good reasons for it. The inscription of an excellent manuscript in the abbey of Fulde, Sedulii Scoti Hiberniensis in omnes Epistolas Pauli collectaneum, which Archbishop Usher alledges as a very good argument, can be of no force, so long as one may believe with great probability, that the author of that Collectaneum is not the Poet Sedulius. Trithemius may repeat as often as he pleases, that these words Sedulius Scotigena, are prefixed to a book of letters, he will never prove the affirmative of this question. It should be proved first of all that Sedulius the Poet is the author of those letters. In a word, since the ancient authors never said that our Sedulius was a Scotchman, we are not at all to mind what the following ages can suggest to us upon that head. One might lay some stress upon it, if there had been no Sedulius, that was a Scotchman; but since it is certain that there has been one or two, it is no difficult thing to apprehend that the Poet has been confounded with one of them. See Father Labbe (22). (22) Labbe, ubi supra, p. 338. It were to be wished that he had made as many discussions upon each ecclesiastical writer, as upon the Poet Sedulius. I observe, by the by, that he has very well confuted those, who pretend that this Poet was a Bishop. He alledges the silence of the antients; he shews that Gennadius's testimony is insignificant: Gennadius, says he, Salvian, Prosper Aquitanus, and some others, have been improperly stiled bishops by several authors. The title of Antistes bestowed upon Sedulius was bestowed upon priests. Dexter's Chronicle, wherein mention is made of Sedulius, Episcopus Oretanus in the year 428, is a supposititious book. Isidorus Hispalensis would not have stiled Sedulius barely a priest, if he could have honoured the Spanish nation with such a bishop (23). (23) Ex eodem, pag. 331, 332.

[D] The fault of a transcriber . . . was the cause that the Poet Sedulius was hated, and that this hatred did extend to all the Poets. It is said that Paul II, conceived a great hatred against the Poets, by reason of that fault of the transcribers, and that many Professors of the Canon Law, for the same reason, looked upon all sorts of Poems as heretical works. What a ridiculous thing would this be! Let us quote Mr de Boissieu. 'Veteres librorum indiligenter scripti, vel ex Tullii, Strabonis, Hieronymi, & aliorum querelis patet. Unde multi gravissimorum virorum errores emanarunt: quod hoc duntaxat exemplo probasse mihi sufficiat. Cum in prima parte Decreti, (20) Benedicti Justiniani in I ad Corinth. cap. vi, vers. 5, apud Labbe, ibid. pag. 337.

(21) Ibid., quod eundem, p. 338.

(22) Labbe, ubi supra, p. 338.

(23) Ex eodem, pag. 331, 332.

there is something great and noble in the turn of his Poem, that his thoughts are Poetical, and his verses tolerable (b) [E]. What Moreri says of him wants to be new moulded from the beginning to the end.

(b) Du Pin, Bibl. Tom. iv, pag. m. 75.

* Decreti, distinct. 15. c. 3. hæc Gelasii Pontificis verba, Item venerabilis viri Sedulii Paschale opus, quod heroicis versibus descriptis, insigni laude præferimus, depravata essent, & pro heroicis, librorum incuria, legeretur, hæreticis, mendum hoc, Paulum secundum, Pontificem maximum ad Poetarum capitale odium perduxit, & plurimis aliis, Legum Professoribus, imposuit, ut omnia poemata, quamvis sacra, hæretica esse duxerint; ut Pierius Valerianus, in oratione pro Sacerdotum barbis scriptum reliquit. O rem ridiculam, Cato, & jocosam (24). -- The complaints of Tully, Strabo, Jerom, and others make it very plain that the old transcribers wrote incorrectly; from whence proceeded the errors of many great men. It will be sufficient for me to prove this by one example. Whereas in the first part of the decree, these words of Pope Gelasius, We likewise honour and praise very much the Paschal performance of the venerable Sedulius, which he wrote in heroic verse, were corrupted, and through the carelessness of the transcribers the word Heretic was written instead of Heroic, this error induced Paul II, &c. . . . as Pierius Valerianus has written in his Oration, &c. A merry story indeed! Others apply this to Pope Hadrian VI. Read the following passage, and compare it exactly with Boissieu's words. Unum adhuc addam, unde pateat, quædam plerumque depravati Codices afferant. In Canonibus à Gratiano digestis, dist. 15. Ubi recitatur insigniter salutare Decretum Gelasii, hæc sententia est: Venerabilis viri Sedulii Paschale opus, quod heroicis descriptis versibus, insigni laude proferendum. Ibi vulgata ante hac exemplaria pro heroicis, hæreticis habuere. Quod bonis quibusdam Canonistis suspicionem movit, Poemata omnia esse hæretica, Poëtaque inter pios, esse sacra trahent, neutiquam annumerari. Id quod Hadriano illi Batavo, qui Caroli V. Præceptor fuerat, adeo persuasum fuit, ut nullum hominum genus majori prosequeretur odio, quam Poetas. Et adhuc aliqui, ut Pierius clarissimus affirmat, non mali aliqui præfules, depravata illius loci lectione inducti, neminem sacerdotio dignum arbitrantur, qui unquam in Parnasso somnians (25). By comparing those two passages one with another, there is ground to suspect that one of those two authors quoted Pierius Valerianus without reading him; for if what concerns Paul II (26), is to be found in that writing, how comes it that Philippus Carolus says nothing of it? Why does he only mention Hadrian VI? Take notice that what he says of this last Pope does not prove that the word hæreticis instead of heroicis made him hate the Poets. He only says occasionally that Hadrian VI, being fully persuaded that they were unworthy to be numbered among pious men, hated them to the highest degree. And therefore I do not pretend to prove by the testimony of that author, that what Boissieu says of Paul II, is applied to Hadrian VI. The proof I bring for it is a passage probably occasioned by a careless and hasty reading of Philippus Carolus's words. Ajunt eum (Hadrianum) nullum hominum genus majore prosequeretur odio quam poetas, eo quod in antiquis exemplaribus Canonum à Gratiano digestorum legitur decretum Gelasii in hæc verba: Venerabilis viri

* Sedulii Paschale opus, quod hæreticis descriptis versibus, &c. cum ibi heroicis legi debere jam pridem monuerint viri eruditi (27). -- They say that he (meaning Hadrian) hated no sort of men more than the Poets, because in the old copies of the Canons, digested by Gratian, the decree of Gelasius was thus worded: Venerabilis viri, &c.

I suspect the truth of this account, and am apt to take it for a story forged by the Italian Humanists, on purpose to ridicule the enemies of good literature. Nevertheless I do not deny that the fault of a transcriber may have frequently produced disorders both in the heart and understanding. But I know that Paul II, and Hadrian VI, had some other reasons for hating the Poets; and I cannot apprehend that ignorance should be able to make one and the same person act so contrary to good sense as to hate the Poets for the reason alledged here, and yet to reverence Pope Gelasius: for it ought to be observed that the decree into which the word hæreticis had crept instead of heroicis contains an encomium upon Sedulius's Poem. It is also to be observed that we are not told that this mistake did lessen in the least the veneration that Pontif was in.

[E] It is allowed that he was a man of great parts, and that there is something noble in the turn of his Poem, &c.] I shall add to this testimony of Mr du Pin Borrichius's own words, whereof Mr Baillet gives us the sense (28). 'Diction Sedulii facili, ingeniosa, numerosa, perspicua, sic satis munda (si excipias profodica quædam delicta) (29). -- Sedulius's style is easy, harmonious, elegant, perspicuous, and correct enough, (if you only except a few errors in the profody). Venantius Fortunatus bestows pretty large encomiums upon our Poet.

Quod tonat Ambrosius, Hieronymus atque cornicat, Sive Augustinus fonte fluente rigat,
Sedulius dulcis, quod Orosius edit acutus,
Regula Cæsarii linea nata sibi est (30).

In thunder Ambrose does his mind declare,
Jerom in words that swift as light'ning are;
Sedulius is sweet, Orosius source,
And Austin waters like a summer show'r:
The rule of great Cæsarius is a line
Made for himself, and perfectly divine.

And in another place:

Majestatis opus metri canit arte Juvenus,
Hinc quoque conspicui radiavit lingua Seduli (31).

The learn'd Juvenus in heroic verse
Does the great work of majesty rehearse.
Hence too Sedulius chose his radiant theme,
And grew conspicuous in the book of fame.

See some other encomiums in Pather Labbe (32).

(27) Autor anonymus Notar. ad Sannazarii Poëmata, Epig. IV, lib. iii, pag. 237, Edit. Amstel. 1689.

(28) Baillet, Jugem. for les Poëtes, num. 1192.

(29) Borrich. Dilect. de Poëtis, pag. 76.

(30) Venant. Fortunatus, Epig. I, lib. viii, apud Phil. Labbe, de Script. Ecclesiast. Tom. II, pag. 326.

(31) Id. initio, lib. I, de Vita Sancti Martini, apud eund. ibid.

(32) Labbe, ibid. pag. 327.

SEGLA (WILLIAM DE, SIEUR DE CAIRAS) was counsellor in the parliament of Toulouse towards the beginning of the XVIIth century. It was he, who made a report of a criminal process, which has been placed among the Tragical Histories of that time [A], and for the clearing up of which Mr de Verdun, first president in the parliament

[A] Among the tragical Histories of that time.] There is an account of it in the Mercurius Francicus (1). Violante de Bats, a native of Spain, and a very leud woman, consented to the assassination of her husband, being angry with him, because he would not allow her the liberty she desired of receiving her lovers, the chief of whom was an Augustin Monk, Professor of Divinity in the university of Toulouse. His name was Peter Arias Burdeus, and he was born at Granada in Spain. He, and a counsellor in the Seneschal's court were the chief contrivers of the assassination. That woman's husband was killed with seventeen wounds, in the month of July 1608. Burdeus being convicted of adultery and murder was condemned to be beheaded and quartered, which was executed in the month of February 1609. Violante was likewise put to death with some others of her ruffians. Burdeus's adultery was proved against him by a sufficient number of witnesses, viz. by a woman who maintained in the presence of him and Violante, that she had seen them in the very fact in the wood of the farm of Laura; quiet, belonging to a convent of Nuns; and by another, who affirmed that she had seen them going into the said wood by themselves. There were also some (24) Dionys. Salvagnus Boetius, Not. ad Poëm. Ovidii in Ibin, pag. m. 127.

(25) Philippus Carolus, in Dilectat. de Criticis, pag. 17, 18. It is prefixed to his notes upon August. Gellius, printed at Nuremberg, in 1663.

(26) I have consulted the dissertation of Pierius Valerianus, pro Sacerdotum barbis, and I have found in pag. 24, of the Paris edition 1531, apud Christ. Wechel, the sense of the whole quotation of Philippus Carolus, but nothing concerning Paul II.

(1) Tom. I, fol. 325 verso, & seq. ad ann. 1609.

(a) In 1611, Mr de Verdon was then first president in the parliament of Paris.

parliament of Toulouse, took all possible pains. The parties accused were at last convicted, and punished according to their deserts: and because William de Segla was thoroughly acquainted with that cause, the first president (a) exhorted him to publish it. The Latin letter he received from him was prefixed to the book which he put out, wherein you find, besides an account of the proceedings, a hundred and thirty one observations full of learning [B]. The family of Segla is still in being at Toulouse, where they hold places in the parliament.

some other particular witnesses, one of which had seen them kiss one another in a lascivious manner, while they were sitting at table in his garden in one of the suburbs of the town. The other had seen them twice in a chamber for the space of two hours. . . . That crime was also called a sacrilege, there being some ground to suspect that he had lain with Violante in a confessional in St James's church; for two witnesses deposed that he had been two full hours in the said confessional with a pretty tall gentlewoman, such as Violante was. Besides, there was a spiritual incest and adultery in the case, because Violante was his daughter by confession, whom he owned to have confessed two or three times in our Lady's chapel in the cloyster of the convent of the Augustins. As for what concerns the murder, the common report, &c (2).

[B] Observations full of learning. They are intermixed with the most curious passages of the ancient authors, according to the fashion of that time. Those, which concern the disorders occasioned by love, and the artifices of courtizans, have not been forgotten. That book was printed at Paris in the year 1613, in 8vo, Corras, a counsellor in the parliament of Toulouse, who made a report of the process of the man, who through an imposture, pretended to be Martin Guerre, had before published a like commentary upon a process and a sentence.

(2) Segla, Hist. tragique, p. 14, & seq.

SEYMOUR (ANNE, MARGARET, and JOAN) three sisters illustrious for their learning in England in the XVIth century. They composed a hundred and four Latin distichs upon the death of Margaret de Valois Queen of Navarre, and sister to Francis I, which were soon after translated into Greek, French, and Italian, and printed at Paris in the year 1551, with this title, Tombeau de Marguerite de Valois Royne de Navarre. Nicolas Denifot (a), who had been tutor to these three learned English ladies [A], made a collection containing the translations of their distichs, and some other verses both in their praise, and upon the death of the Queen of Navarre, and dedicated it to Margaret de Valois Duchefs of Berry, sister to Henry II [B]. The little

(a) He styled himself d'Albinois, Alcinous Comes in Latine, as Chancellor de l'Hôpital calls him.

[A] Denifot . . . had been tutor to these three learned English ladies.] Ronfard deserves to be heard upon this head, tho' his phrases favour of the barbarousness, that was still in the French language when he wrote.

alterations in it afterwards. I make use of the last editions.

[B . . . He dedicated the whole to Margaret . . . sister to Henry II.] The Chancellor de l'Hôpital did not forget that circumstance in the following verses, which he made on that learned princess.

Denizot se vante heuré
D'avoir oublié sa terre,
Et passager, demeuré
Trois ans en vostre Angleterre,
Et d'avoir cogneu vos yeux,
Où les Amours gracieux
Doucement leurs fleches dardent
Contre ceux qui vous regardent :
Voir & d'avoir quelquefois
Tant levé sa petiteffe,
Que sous l'outil de sa vois
Rabota vostre jeunesse,
Vous ouvrant les beaux secrets
Des vieux Latins & des Grecs,
Don't l'honneur se renouvelle
Par vostre Mufe nouvelle (1).

(1) Ronfard, ubi infra, pag. 618.

Denizot wants that he was blest
For having left his native shore,
And lived in England as a guest Full six and thirty months; - - - or more.
'Twas there he knew your eyes so well,
Where all the graceful cupids dwell,
And softly let their arrows fly
At every gazing slander-by.
For this he likewise did rejoice,
Accounting it his highest praise,
That you allow'd his humble voice
Your tender sentiments to raise,
While it disclosed unto your view,
All that the Greeks or Romans knew,
Whose honour is reviv'd again
By your sweet Muse's rival strain.

The ode, that contains these verses, was printed in the collection of the distichs; but Ronfard made many

Et tibi judicium, tibi doctas Delius aures
Præbuit ac regale referit pectus honestis
Artibus: eximiam raramque in Principe laudem.
Tantum nulla decus tulit unquam regia virgo.
Innumeros hæc causa viros, ut condere carmen
Utque suos vellent tibi consecrare labores
Impulit: hæc fuit iis scribendi causa poetis, Virginibusque tribus vestigia pressa terendi.
Atque hic longinquis sua cœpit prima Britannis
Aureus incrementa liber sermone Latino.
Inde per Eurypus & formidabile nautis
Invadens spatium Belgas devenit & urbem
Parisiam, novus hospes iit perque ora manusque.
Res placuit nostris argumentumque poetis:
Continuoque alii maternâ vertere linguâ.
Græcâ alii, atque Itala, mox & nova jungere versûs Collibuit, justique voluminis addere formam.

Phœbus your judgment and your ear refin'd,
With noble arts replenishing your mind:
High praise indeed! But such a praise as we Most seldom due to your high station see.
No royal virgin ever did possess
True fame to such a glorious excess.
Hence is it that so many authors do Inscribe and consecrate their works to you:
From hence inspir'd the cheerful poets sing,
And the three virgins to their chorus bring.
Far off in British land this golden book
In Latin verse it's first beginning took.
It was transported into Belgium next,
Passing the formidable space betwixt.
To Paris last the welcome stranger came,
Was read by all and prais'd. The noble Theme little exactness of those, who have mentioned this collection [C], occasioned my affirming in the preface of this Dictionary, that the distichs were a different work from the epitaphs on the Queen of Navarre. I mend that fault now, and I do ingenuously confess that I have discovered the fallacy of my conjectures by reading the epitaph of that queen. Which should teach us, that a man ought to be very cautious in making conjectures about matters of fact. It is much better for him to suspend his judgment till he has seen all the writings concerning it. I retract what I have said against Mr Joli, and Moreri (b); and I do particularly acknowledge that they are excusable, for calling those three sisters PRINCESSSES, for they may possibly have seen that title prefixed to the collection published at Paris by Denisor; but I maintain still that they were not princesses. They have been praised by divers authors, particularly by Ronfard [D], and Nicolas de Herberai Sieur des Effars [E], so well known by his French translation of Amadis de Gaule. It is somewhat strange that they should be so little known at this day [F].

(b) All these faults have been acknowledged in the extract of a Letter dated the 23d of March 1693, inserted in the Courier Galant for April 1693.

*In all our Poets rous'd the like desire,
Some quickly clab'd it in a French attire.
By some it was translated into Greek;
And others made it in Italian speak.
Many did furnish it with new supplies,
To make the volume of a proper size.*

[C] The little exactness of those who had mentioned this collection.] Ronfard calls the distichs of those three sisters a Christian song. Richelet, who commented upon him, observes, that they were Christian distichs. Neither of them says any thing, whereby it may appear that those distichs concerned the deceased Queen of Navarre. Neither does Chancellor de l'Hospital intimate any such thing. Who therefore would have thought that they were epitaphs upon a queen? What do poets commonly put into such pieces but extravagant flatteries? Can any thing be more remote from Pibrac's Quatrains, or Michael Verin's distichs, than the tears of Poets upon the graves of great persons? I thought therefore (2), that those distichs stiled Christian were moral sentences, and not funeral elegies, and lavished incense. It would have deceived better judges than I am. But since I have seen that work, I must acknowledge that there are more christian and moral reflections than poetical phrases, in some verses of those illustrious sisters.

(2) See the project of this Dictionary, pag. 364, 365.

[D] They have been praised particularly by Ronfard.] His ode on those three English ladies (3), contains this praise among others, that if Orpheus heard them, he would be their scholar.

(3) It is the third of the fifth book.

*Mais si ce harpeur fameux Oyoit le chant des Serenes,
Qui sonne aux bords escumeux
Des Albionnes arenes
Son Luth Payen il fendoit,
Et disciple se rendroit
Deffous leur chanson Chrestienne,
Dont la voix passe la sienne.
La science auparavant
Si long tems Orientale
Peu à peu marchant avant, S'apparoist occidentale;
Et sans jamais se borner
N'a point cessé de tourner,
Tant qu'elle soit parvenue
A l'autre rive inconnue.
Là de son grave sourcy
Vint affoler le courage
De ces trois Vierges icy,
Les trois seules de notre âge.
Et si bien les sceut tenter,
Qu'ores on les oit chanter
Maint vers jumeau, qui surmontent
Les noires, rouges de honte (4).*

(4) Ronfard, not w., of his Odes, pag. m. 617.

*If that harper so renown'd,
Could these charming Syrens hear
From the shores of Albion sound,
Wonder would perplex his ear,
He would break his pagan lyre,
And their scholar turn'd desire*

Their sweetest Christian song to know Which his own surpasses so.

*Learning, for so many years
To the East confin'd before
In the West at length appears,
Still advancing more and more.
No waters did she make a strand
Till she reach'd that unknown land
Of the noble virgins three,
These three wonders of our age,
Whose extreme affection she Came on purpose to engage.
Them she has instructed well,
As their many distichs tell.
Ours, as far as they have gone,
Blush to see themselves outdone.*

I shall occasionally observe that Richelet, who made a Commentary upon Ronfard's odes, did not understand the last verse but one of the quotation. It is plain, that maint vers jumeau, --- many twin-verses, signifies the hundred distichs of those three ladies, or those verses which they coupled two and two together, in imitation of Cato and Michael Verin: And yet the Commentator found himself here very much in the dark. He thinks that jumeau, (twins) signifies like one another; because, says he, they are sisters; or, it is an allusion to the tops of mount Parnassus, which are double, whither the Poets go to learn how to make well a verse, which he calls jumeau, as if one should say Parnassian. You may judge whether the Commentators upon the antients Poets do not frequently deceive us, since those who undertake to explain the Poets of their own time, and of their own country, are liable to such mistakes. I could easily shew, that Muret, who commented upon some poems of Ronfard, did not always rightly understand his French words.

[E] . . . and by Nicolas de Herberai Sieur des Effars.] The praises he bestows upon the three English sisters are contained in a letter he writ to them, which was prefixed to the collection of epitaphs upon Queen Margaret.

[F] It is strange that they should be so little known at this day.] I asked some Englishmen very learned and well versed in the knowledge of books and authors, what those three famous English ladies were, telling them at the same time the little I knew of the matter: They answered me, that they were absolutely unknown to them. I had the same answer from Paris, tho' I consulted some persons, who are hardly equalled by any body else in the knowledge of such things. These three illustrious English ladies must needs have fallen into oblivion, since Mr Juncker says nothing of them in the catalogue of learned women, lately published by him (5). He quotes Pitfeus sometimes; and therefore since he does not speak of the three sisters Seymour, it is a sign Pitfeus does not speak of them neither. A friend of mine had assured me before, that neither Bale nor Pitfeus, who have so fully treated of the writings of that learned nation, say any thing of these three sisters.

(5) It is an Appendix to the book de EpheMERIDIBUS sive DIARIIS ERUDITIONUM, published by him at Leipzig in 1693 in 12mo.

VOL. V.

E c

SELEMNUS,

SELEMNUS.

SELEMNUS, a river of Achaia, had been a very handsome young shepherd. The nymph Argyra fell so passionately in love with him, that she used to come out of the bottom of the sea to go and lie with him. But when the prime of Selemnus's beauty vanished away by age, the nymph left off going to him. The young man died of grief for it, and was metamorphosed into a river by the goddess Venus. That change did not cure him of his passion: Venus was obliged to interpose; she granted him the favour of forgetting that nymph. It is said that from that time the river Selemnus had an admirable virtue; which was that the persons of both sexes who bathed themselves in it, no longer remembered the object of their love (a). Pausanias is in the right to say, that if the water of that river had such a virtue, it would be more valuable than great fums of money [A].

(a) Ex Pausania, lib. vii, p. 229.

[A] If it's water had such a virtue, it would be more valuable than great fums of money. We must not believe all that the Poets and writers of romances make amorous people say; the descriptions of their sufferings are hyperbolic: however, it must be granted, that love is an inexhaustible source of miseries and disorders. It is a very necessary passion upon earth for the preservation of animals: It is the soul of the world with respect to them; nay, it is certain, that the Divine Providence has annexed a thousand charms and pleasures to so necessary a passion; but, on the other hand, it is attended with a thousand troubles. How many people can neither eat, nor drink, nor sleep, and lose their health and wits upon that account? The number of those who die of it is greater than it is thought: Those who hang themselves for it, are indeed few; nevertheless, there are some. This concerns those whose love is not answered. As for those who are as much beloved as they love others, they pay dear for their pleasures; for not to say, that their reason is disordered, and that their passion is frequently contrary to their true interest, whereby they are exposed to a vast number of troubles; does not bare jealousy, which commonly attends their passion, make them sufficiently unhappy? Can there be a more lamentable, melancholy, and dreadful condition than that of jealous people? Let their jealousy be well or ill-grounded, it is all one; their torment is equally great; they are not the less persecuted by the chimeras and phantoms of their imagination; the fire wherewith they are wasted and consumed, is not more tolerable for it: and therefore it may be said, that if there was a river in the world which could cure lovers, it would be more valuable than gold. Εἰ δὲ μέγιστον ἀλυσίας τῆ λόγου τιμώτερον χρημάτων πολλῶν εἶναι ἀνθρώποις τὸ ὕδωρ τῆ Σελέμνου. Quid nisi commentitium esset, quantavis pecunia videri posset ea

(1) To understand this, one must read these verses of Pindar, O. I. Olymp. Ἀριεὺν μὲν ὕδωρ δὲ θεῶν ἀλυσίας ἀνθρώπων πῦρ ἔστι διαπρίπτου νοῦν τὴν μαγάνορος ἔχοντα παλιν. Optima quidem est aqua: & aurum, velut ignis nocet ardens, consumat eximie inter superbificas divitias.

(2) Pausanias, lib. vii, p. 229.

Che, mentre con la fiamma il gelo mesco,
Tutto il Regno d' Amor turba, e contrista.

Siama altera e sdegnosa la mia Dellia, purché non rivolga cortese, e pia lo sguarda soave altrove: mi fia scarfa de suoi favori: avara delle sue gratie, che tuttavia,

--- Un più gentile

Stato del mio non è sotto la Luna,
Si dolce è del mio amaro la radice.

Ma non posso già soffrire, che i begli occhi fereni,
i quali accifero nel mio petto fiamma inestinguibile
d' Amore habbiano a rischiare il fosco d'Horatio co'i raggi della lor luce,

Si nieghi a me, purché a ciascun si nieghi;
Che, purché altrui non splenda il mio bel Sole,
Ne le tenebre ancor vivrò beato (3).

(3) Lodovico Zuccolo, Accademico Filopono di Faenza, Dialogo della Gelosia, p. 129, 130.

I have not a heart of such impenetrable stuff as can resist the black poison of jealousy,

Which, intermixing ice with flames, confounds,
And shakes love's empire to it's utmost bounds.

Let my Delia be baughty and disdainful to me, provided that she do not, in the height of her courtesy and compassion, bestow her sweet glances elsewhere: let her be sparing of her favours to me; niggardly of her graces, yet still,

A more delightful state than what I feel,
Not the broadfield of fancy does contain,
So sweet the root is of my bitter pain.

But I cannot bear that those bright and beautiful eyes, which have kindled in my breast an unquenchable fire of love, should illuminate the darkness of Horatio with their beams of light.

If that fair sun do not to others shine;
Although he never bear these eyes of mine,
Yet shall I live in darkness happy still.

But because he cannot even promise to himself this melancholy comfort, he gives himself up to despair, and eases his grief only by curling jealousy as a monster come out of hell. 'Ma, se il mio male rimane affatto senza rimedio, non mi si tolga alme- no, ch'io sfoghi in qualche modo il mio cordoglio co' lamenti, e co' pianti.

O forella di morte, onde veniste,
D'invidia figlia, fiero, horribil mostro,
Che fai miei giorni lagrimosi, e tristi;
Tornati a l'infernale, oscuro chioffro,
Che troppo co' tuoi morsi il sen m'apristi,
Onde il velen, la piaga, e'l dolor mostro (4).

(4) Id. Ibid. p. 137.

But if there be no remedy left for my misfortune, at least let me not be hindered from discharging some part of my bitter anguish in lamentations and complaints.

Sister of death, whence art thou come? -- Away
Thou child of envy, and thou beast of prey,
By whom in sorrow all my days I tell;
Return black monster to thy native hell.
Too deep thy tusks are in my bosom found,
For see, the poison sisters in the wound.

I have read in a certain book which was printed with the satire upon the hermaphrodites (5), that a lady having sung with a melancholy tune (6), and made it appear by her looks (7) that her heart was sorrowful; some body asked her what made her so melancholy; and that instead of giving any answer to the question, she spoke the words of Ludovico,

(5) See the remark [C] in the article SALMACIS, at the end.

(6) Discours de Iacophile à Lionne, pag. 96.

(7) Ibid.

Che dolce piu, che piu giocondo stato,
Saria, di quel, d'un amoroso core:
Che viver piu felice, & piu beato,
Che ritrovarsi in servitu d'amore,
Se non fosse ciascuno stimolato,
Da quel sospetto rio, da quel timore,
Da quel martir, da quella frenesia,
Da quella rabia detta gelozia.

What joys so pure could any mortal find
As those which harbour in a love-sick mind.

What

*What life could to our faintest experience prove
More happy than the servitude of love;
But that there is a sting in every breast.
Of cur'd suspicion, enemy to rest,
A spark of frenzy which possesses all,
And which the rage of jealousy we call.*

(8) It is to be found in page 548, of Chenier's Oeuvres Mémoires.

Doublets; it was the torments of jealousy which obliged a Poet of the same country to make a sonnet (8), wherein he tells his confessor, If you design to punish me for the faults which love has made me commit, enjoin me to fall in love again, for there is no greater torment than that.

*Se pur brami punir l'anima errante,
Fa ch'io torni ad amar, che fra mortali
Non v'è pena maggior ch' esser amante.*

*If you would punish me for errors past,
Then bid me love again. What can be worse?
To be a lover is the greatest curse.*

SELVE (JOHN DE) first president in the parliament of Paris, in the reign of Francis I. See his article in Moreri's Dictionary. I shall only add to it three or four particulars, imparted to me by Mr Baluze, whereby it may be rectified and improved. It is not true that this president was originally from the Milanese: he was born in the Limousin; and it is very likely that he and his ancestors were natives of the city of Tulle [A]. They father upon him a book which he did not write [B], and it is without any good reason that an Historian charges him with having corrupted the memoirs of Philip de Comines [C]. His true name was John de SALVA [D]. Those, who made the eulogies of the first presidents of Paris place his death in August 1529. But John Bertaud, who made and printed his epitaph in that same year, informs us, that he was buried at St Nicolas du Chardonnet the eleventh of December. That epitaph is not upon his tomb, but another very modern (a).

(a) Memoir communicated by Baluzius.

[A] He was born in the Limousin, and it is very likely that he and his ancestors were natives of the city of Tulle. My reasons for it are these. I shall use the very words of the learned man, who has done me the honour to furnish me with some memoirs for this article. (1) John de Selve was a native of Limousin: 'There is no difficulty in it. Clear proof of it may be seen at the beginning of the treatise de Beneficio; besides, the same is confirmed by Gabriel Lurbaeus; in his book concerning the illustrious men of Aquitaine. But it is not known from what town or place of the Limousin he came. There is reason to believe he was born at Tulle; the chief town of the Lower Limousin. What makes me think so is, that I find in an old record of the year 1431; John de Salva, named among the chief inhabitants of that town; and his posterity continues still there; but they go by the name of la Selve. It is very likely then, the reputation of John de Selve, first president of the parliament of Paris, made the authors in that family who live still at Tulle, change their name into that of Selve become famous by that first president. Besides this conjecture, which is very probable, I find in the inquest of nobility of Christopher de Lestange, Bishop of Carcassonne, and commander of the king's order, made in the year 1617, that the first president was the son of John de Selve, which perfectly agrees with John de Salva, mentioned in the year 1431, since there are a hundred full years from that year to 1529, when the first president died. Besides the same inquest informs us, that Margaret de Selve his sister, was married to Peter de Juyé an inhabitant of Tulle.'

From whence it is easy to infer, that the genealogy of the family of Selve, printed in the eulogies of the first presidents of Paris, is not exact, particularly in saying, that the grandfather of the president, was a gentleman of the Milanese.

[B] A book of which he is not the author, is fathered upon him. He is commonly said to be the author of the treatise de Beneficio. But John Bertaud (2) informs us, that it is not he, but his brother, who is the author of it. Adde se. recor. Do. Joannem de Salva senatus Parrisiensis principem: cujus frater Joannes de Salva inter reliquos quum primis honoris, sicuti probitatis sue facile dedit documentum quam de beneficio insignem tractatum edidit (3).

[C] It is without any good reason that an Historian charges him with having corrupted the memoirs of Philip de Comines. What Belcarius bishop of Metz, advances in his history book vii. chap. x. is not likely, viz. That the first president de Selve, who, says he, was ignorant of the transactions in the reign of Lewis XI, and Charles VIII his son, corrupted and curtailed in several places, the memoirs of Philip de Comines. For the first edition of those memoirs came out in 1524. But the first president was hardly at leisure then to print books, and particularly other peoples works. Besides, the editions agree with several ancient manuscripts, as it has been observed by M. Godefroy in his preface to those memoirs (4).

[D] His true name was John de SALVA. So he is called in the epistle dedicatory to John Raulin's epistles printed at Paris in the year 1521. Robertus Raulin Joanni de Salva Parisiensis senatus primo praefidi. And in the epistle, alluding to his name, he says among other things, te natum Salvum fecit, ut alios absque improperio Salvos faceres. And in the epigram printed next to the epistle dedicatory:

Astruit ante obitum nullum censura Solonis Salvum. Te talem primus ortus habet.

In the relation of the conference held at Madrid in the year 1525, in order to get Francis I. released; he is called John de Salva, in a copy made at that time which I have by me. It is true, that the word Salva has been dashed out since, and the word Selve has been put into the margin.

In the treaty of marriage between Hercules d'Este, the son of Alphonse Duke of Ferrara, with Renata of France, made at St Germain en Laye, on the nineteenth of February 1527, that president, who was Renata's attorney, is called Johannes de Salva, in an old copy of that time, which I have likewise by me.

John Bertaud a native of Perigord, published in the year 1529, three books, de cognatione sacerdotum Joannes Baptista; wherein making an enumeration of the famous Canonists and Civilians, particularly of those of Aquitaine, he says, Adde se. recor. Do. Joannem de Salva senatus Parrisiensis principem. And in the epistle to Francis de Marillac, first president in the parliament of Rouen, who had married a daughter of the first president de Salva, he says: fidelissima uxor tua Magdalena à Salva. The same made an epitaph upon the first president de Salva, wherein making an abridgment of his life, he begins with these verses:

Salva domus dedit hanc, qui Salvos fecit utique Oppressos misera condicione reos (5).

(5) Ibid.

(1) A Memoir communicated by Baluzius.

(4) The same Memoir.

(2) In the book mentioned at the beginning of the last paragraph of the remark [D].

(3) The same Memoir.

SENGBERE (POLYCARP) a Civilian in the XVIIth century, was a native of Brunfwic. He wrote a book against Salmafius [A]. 'He disputed with one Macquin for a professorship of the Civil-Law in the university of Angers (a). Menage, who had been his disciple, did not forget to serve him on that occasion; but Macquin was preferred to him, because he was more learned. Nevertheless, by reason of his merit, and because he was a man of parts, the magistrates of Angers bestowed upon him a yearly pension of an hundred crowns to keep him in their town; and Mr de Boilefue, jointly with some others, gave him as much, so that he had six hundred livres a year. He was accused of having bribed his judges; but Mr Menage made his defence. Those, who have published some memoirs for Menage's life (b), say that he pleaded several causes in the parliament of Paris, one, among others, for M. Sengbere, who had a mind to divorce his wife on account of adultery (c). It is very strange that he should say nothing of it speaking of that process [B]; for the occasion seemed necessarily to require, that he should not forget to

(a) Menagiana, pag. 94, of the first Dutch edition.

(b) They are prefixed to the continuation of the Menagiana.

(c) See remark [C] of the article MENAGE.

[A] He wrote a book against Salmafius. Here follows a piece of Menage's conversations. 'Sengbere, my master in the Civil-Law, wrote against Salmafius's book de Mutuo: The sheets were sent to Salmafius as they were printing, and he wrote to me, that Sengbere gave him no hard words, but that his raileries were as sharp as injurious words. He acquainted me, at the same time, that he would answer that book. But Sengbere cleared the matter better than he, and he made no answer (1).'

[B] It is very strange that he should say nothing of it, speaking of that process. He speaks of that process with great ingenuity, and without any design of concealing the weak side of his master. 'Sengbere, doctor of the Civil-Law at Angers, having accused and convicted of adultery his wife, who was a very handsome woman, got her confined to a convent, and took a concubine in her place. A jester happening to be in a company where they were discoursing of his case, said in a pleasant manner: 'since he wanted a whore, he might as well have kept his wife (2). If Menage pleaded for the husband upon that occasion, one can hardly apprehend why he did not say so, when he related that Sengbere carried the cause. He did not forget to say that he had been his defender upon a less important subject (3), viz. when Sengbere was charged with having bribed the judges of the dispute about a professorship. This is not very intelligible, for he had been cast. Is it customary for those, who carry the cause, to accuse the person who loses it, of having bribed the judges? Would not such an accusation reflect upon the judges, rather than the person accused of having bribed them? Is not a judge, who suffers himself to be bribed, more guilty than the briber? That passage of the Menagiana ought therefore to be rectified; and instead of these words, he was accused of having bribed the judges, it should be, that he was accused of having endeavoured to bribe them. The judges would not have been interested in that cause; they would not have been forced to side with Sengbere: and it may very well happen that a man, who cast his adversary, is willing to carry his triumph further, and load him with a new confusion, by proving that he intended to have recourse to fraud and bribery.

(4) Remark [C] I have said in another place (4), that some wished this pleading of Menage had been printed. He was an advocate very well qualified to succeed in such a cause. He might have said many things fitly applied and handsomely turned: and since the wife was convicted, and her beauty, though ever so great, could not save her; it is to be presumed, that the proofs of the husband were as strong as his advocate could have wished. But it was a great advantage for his advocate, and a circumstance the more favourable, because it afforded a character of superiority very proper to confound the common topics, alledged by the wife's advocate. When a cause about adultery is doubtful, the advocate who pleads against the husband, speaks in an insulting manner, and ridicules him unmercifully; at which the advocate, who pleads against the wife, is not a little embarrassed. But why do I say, when such a cause is doubtful? I should have said even when it is not at all doubtful (5). I shall quote Mr Chevreau for it, who gives us the following account of an ancient gentleman, who had married a young woman. 'Ever since she found herself mistress of the best part of his estate by virtue of that donative, she minded nothing but fine clothes and good cheer, and expressed a great contempt or indifference for all the caresses of her old husband.

'Hinc dolor, hinc lachrymæ,

'Hence grief, hence tears.

But there is something more afflicting for the good old man, and if you desire to know it in a few words, it is that for men of his age

'Est indeclinabile cornu.

'Horns are unavoidable.

In reality, he had as undeniable proofs, as any geometrical demonstrations can be, that she made him a cuckold, and that his wife, whom he used to call his treasure, was only a treasure of iniquity. What ever reasons his relations could alledge to induce him, for their own credit, not to make the cause of his vexation public, he only consulted his anger, being resolved to get her confined to a nunnery, by the same sentence that should make the donative void. He has powerfully carried on the prosecution, and produced many writings against her, and even mortgaged a fine estate in land in order to execute his project. The lady pitched upon an advocate, who expressed himself with a wonderful easiness; and is not covetous in the least, being as rich as he is voluptuous; and it is said, he never pleads a great cause for a handsome lady, but he has an enjoyment for it. He mightily exaggerated the noble birth, and the personal merit of that lady; her virtue, which appeared in her very looks; the intolerable jealousy of her husband grounded upon dreams; and the loathsomeness and ridiculousness of old age. It was also said, this pleading was that of an advocate, who was to be paid by enjoyment and love, and that his fair client rewarded him accordingly. The cause had been twice heard, and was put off till the month of September after the festival of St Martin. The two parties are gone, the gentleman to his village, and the lady to the house she is possessed of by the contract of her marriage. In the mean time, a nephew of the old gentleman gave him a visit to know the particulars of his law-suit, of which he had been informed only by imperfect and partial accounts, although he had been told that the young lady's advocate had abused him in a most insulting manner (6). The nephew advised him to put an end to that suit by a good reconciliation, and even told him, that it had been better if he had not begun it. He alledged himself for an example, and did not forget his brother's conduct. 'My brother, and I, said he (7), do not much care to dive into things, that would vex us, if we should find them out; nor does it appear to us that the greatest happiness of a husband consists in being a shrewd diviner. We only aim at a quiet life; and it is our opinion, that a man who continually watches his wife, must needs take an ill course. The remonstrances of a jealous husband are suspected; his prohibitions frequently enrage a wanton woman, prepossessed with this opinion, that stolen waters are the sweetest: And we could never apprehend, that a tutoring husband proved more acceptable than a tyrannical one. Violent means betray a brutish temper; and whoever has recourse to the law, must expect to be laughed at by the judges, who

(6) Chevreau Oeuvres mêlées, pag. 52, & 54.

(7) Ibid. p. 57.

to mention the service he had done to his master.

- (8) Ibid. p. 58.
- (9) Compare what you will find citat. (14) of the article SAINT-CYRE.
- (10) Chev. ibid. pag. 60.
- (11) Juven. Sat. II, ver. 37.
- (12) The Lex Julia de Adulteriis is ascribed by several learned men to Augustus and not Julius Cæsar.
- (13) Barnabas Brillonius ad legem Julianam de Adulteriis, pag. 150.

mus Constantinus capitis poena adulterii crimen vindicandum constituit †, . . . Capitalet autem poenam Justinianus in masculis probat, mulierem verò verberibus cæsam in monasterium detrudi præcipit, data potestate marito intra biennium, si hoc exiffimaverit, eam inde revocandi, quo transacto, aut viro præmortuo, eam raso capite, monastico habitu acciri, & illic omni vitæ tempore manere † jubet. † Nou. ut nulli.

— Constantine was the first who decreed a capital punishment for the crime of adultery . . . Justinian approved that men should suffer death, but that women should be whipped, and then shut up in a monastery, giving power to their husbands to take them thence within two years; which if not done, he ordered her to be shaved, clothed in the monastic habit, and there to remain during life. That severity was abated by degrees, and in some provinces (14) an adulteress was allowed one half of the estate purchased by her husband. Pope Honorius III, reformed that scandalous custom. Apud Rupellanos . . . jam olim invaluerat nonnullæ consuetudines, quarum duo capita à jure, & honestate publica abhorrentia damnavit Honorius III. P. in Epistola decretali ad Majorem & Burgenfies de Rupella. Primum fuit . . . Alterum fuit, ut mulier ob adulterium non amitteret lucrum mediæ partis omnium bonorum per virum quæstorum constante matrimonio: consuetudinem emendavit Pontifex, quoad proderat mulieribus adulteris (15). — With the Rochellers . . . some customs had long prevailed, of which two that were inconsistent with justice and common decency, were condemned by Pope Honorius III, in a decretal epistle to the magistrates and inhabitants of Rochelle. The first was . . . The other was, that a woman for adultery should not lose her privilege of enjoying half her husband's estate, which was acquired during the marriage. These were abolished by the Pope, as to the privilege of adulterous women.

It is to be observed that the jest, mentioned by Menage (16), is faulty, as most witty sayings are: if it be strictly examined, it will be found to imply a falsity; for, in mens opinion, the unfaithfulness of a wife is the disgrace of the husband. The keeping of a concubine is not liable to such a construction, and does not require that a man should have the same regard for her as for a wife; and therefore Sengbere's choice was not attended with like inconveniences, as the jester supposed.

† L. quamvis 2. C. de adulter.

† Nou. ut nulli.

(14) Rochelle for instance.

(15) Alteferra Rerum Aquitanic. lib. III, cap. xxviii, pag. 227.

(16) I think he repeated it upon another occasion; for methinks he says in another place of the Menagiana (I cannot find the page again) that a gentleman having parted with his wife, and taken a concubine, his man said, Ah fir, since you could not be without a . . . why did not you keep your lady?

SENERTUS (DANIEL) an eminent Physician, was born the twenty-fifth of November 1572 at Breslaw, where his father was a Shoe-maker. He was sent to the university of Wittemberg in the year 1593, and there made a great progress in Philosophy and Physic (a). He visited the universities of Leipzig, Jena, and Francfort upon the Oder, and then went to Berlin in the year 1601, to practise Physic; he staid not long there but quickly returned to Wittemberg, where he took his degree of Doctor of Physic the tenth of September in the same year, and at a year's end he was made professor of the same faculty: He was the first, who introduced the study of Chymistry into that university; and he acquired a great reputation by his works [A], and by his practice [B]. He had three wives, and had no children by the two last; but he had seven by the first. He died of the plague at Wittemberg the twenty-first of July 1637 (b). He got some adversaries by the liberty he took to contradict the antients; but none of his opinions was less approved than what he advanced concerning the origin of souls.

[A] He acquired a great reputation by his works. They are many, and have been often printed in France and Italy. The last edition, if I am not mistaken, is that of Lyons, 1676, it is divided into six volumes in folio. The foregoing editions were only divided into three volumes (1).

[B] . . . and by his practice. Sick people had recourse to him from all parts, and he denied no body his assistance. He took what they gave him for his fees, and exacted nothing; nay, he restored to the poor what they gave him (2). The plague raged at Wittemberg above seven times whilst he was a professor in that town; but he never went away, and never refused to assist sick people. The Elector of Saxony, whom he cured of a great sickness in the year 1628, made him one of his Physicians in ordinary, and yet allowed him the liberty of living at Wittemberg. Several dukes, princes, counts, and gentlemen, used, with success, his advice and prescriptions in their sicknesses. Nicolas Sapienza, great standard-bearer of Lithuania, not knowing what to do to recover his health, applied himself to the Physicians of Padua. They advised him to put himself into Sennertus's hands (3). Accordingly he took a journey to Wittemberg, and went home again perfectly recovered. Polonus . . . non vidit tantum atque coram admiratus SENERTUM esse; sed maus ingenti beneficio etiam, cum vidisset, discessit. Ut intelligeret, nil supra verum narrasse famam: & pauciora propemodum retulisse: expertus novissime opulatore felicitissimum; quem Medicæ eruditionis principem salutaverat ante (4). — The Polishman . . . not only saw and admired Sennertus; but after having received wonderful benefit by him, departed, well satisfied that same had not said more, but rather less of him than what he deserved, having found in him a most happy assistance, whom before he had called the prince of Physicians.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Augustus Buchnerus, in Orat. funebri Sennerti, apud Witte, Memor. Medicor. p. 97.

[C] He

(1) See Mercklinus in Lindenio renovato.

(2) Pauperibus honoraria affertibus ea restituit. Vita Sennerti, in limine Operum.

VOL. V.

F f

He believed that the seed of all living creatures is animated [C], and that the soul of that

[C] He believed that the seed of all living creatures was animated.] The difficulties he found in other opinions made him embrace this. The common doctrine of the school-men seemed to him absurd (5), viz. That substantial forms are not produced; for they say, the attribute of being produced belongs to a natural compound, and not to its parts. He was not satisfied with the opinion of Avicenna, that there is a celestial intelligence appointed for the formation of souls, which makes use of seeds only as of an instrument.

(5) Toletus, Commentariorum in Aristotelis Metaphysicam, lib. i, cap. 123, Tom. i, Edit. Lugd. 1676.

(6) Sennert. ibid. cap. ii.

(7) Fernelius, lib. i, de abditis causis pluribus in locis, acrius defendit omnem animam à celo proficisci, & à celo animam omnem in materiam preparatam & ideam immitti, Id. ibid. pag. 124.

(8) Vide Jacobum Schegkium, lib. i, de plast. feminis facultate, apud Sennert. Ibid. cap. v, pag. 127.

(9) Ibid. p. 130.

(10) Galen. lib. iii, de Usu Part. cap. x.

(11) Franc. Titelmanus, lib. viii, Phys. cap. xi.

(12) Titelmanus, ibid. apud Sennertum, de Generat. vivent. cap. i, pag. 130, Tom. i.

(13) Sennert. ibid.

but such difficulty, have perceived, that these operations proceed from the soul, which lies concealed in the seed. I had rather say, as Galen does, that we are altogether in the dark about it, than ascribe to a soul, hid in a small egg, the ability that is requisite to form the body of an ant, the body of a chicken, &c. Sennertus does very well confute the hypotheses different from his; but he admits of certain things, which cannot be understood. He says (14), that human souls have no quantity, and that they are indivisible, and yet that each of them can produce its kind; that is, that the soul of a dog can produce many other souls of dogs. This would be a true creation, and a more difficult work than the conversion of the seed into an organized body. Had he known the hypothesis, which has been invented since he died, I believe he would have heartily embraced it; it is the hypothesis mentioned by me before (15), which has afforded many fine hints to the illustrious Mr Leibniz: It is that of modern Natural Philosophers, who having discovered, with the help of microscopes, that there are animals in the seed, think that living bodies are organized before they are born, and probably from the beginning of all things. Which leads them to this thought, That ever since the first original of things, the souls have been united to the same organized bodies; and that generation or birth is only the extension or growth of the individual, which is the primitive and continual subject of the soul; that this subject is not destroyed by death; that it loses only the particles of matter wherewith it was enlarged; that it recovers new ones in another birth, &c. This hypothesis removes the great difficulties that occur in assigning the cause of organization. To have recourse to God as to the immediate cause, is not to philosophize. To have recourse to the general laws of the communication of motion is but a poor solution; for since it is agreed by all sects, that those laws cannot produce, I will not say a mill, or a clock, but the coarsest tool that is in a Smith's shop, how shall they be able to produce the body of a dog, or even a rose and a pomegranate? To have recourse to the celestial bodies, or to substantial forms, is a pitiful shift. We want, in this case, a cause which has an idea of its work, and knows how to form it: those two things are requisite in those who make a watch, and build a ship; much more are they necessary in the cause of the organization of living bodies. It is certain the celestial bodies have no idea of a human body, and that they know not how it ought to be formed. The Peripatetics own that the substantial forms of plants and beasts know not how matter ought to be modified, to give it the organs that are in a tree or in a chicken; and therefore they are not the cause of that organization. Those who say they are the cause of it, tho' they know not the contrivance of that work, are a thousand times more absurd than those, who should say that a man can make a clock without thinking of it, without having even had any idea of it, and without knowing what he does, or what he designs. This objection shews the falsity of Sennertus's opinion; for he would not have said that the souls he admitted in the seed of plants and animals, had an idea of all the organs of plants and animals, and knew how to frame and place them in their proper places. And therefore it had been a great help to him, if he had been told that there are organized individuals in the seed; for it is more easy to conceive that a soul united to such individuals may be the cause of their growth, than it is to apprehend that it can organize a drop of liquor, and change it into the body of a dog. I know some understanding men, who pretend to comprehend that the general laws of the communication of motion, tho' never so simple and so few, are sufficient to make a farus grow, provided it be already organized. But I confess my own weakness: I cannot well apprehend it. It seems to me, that a small organized atom cannot become a chicken, a dog, a calf, &c. unless an intelligent cause directs the motion of the matter that makes it grow; a cause, I say, which has an idea of that little machine, and knows how to extend and increase it according to its due proportions. I think it will be granted me, that it is not more easy to conceive that the laws of motion may be the only cause of the building of a little house; than (14) Sennert. ibid. pag. 132, fol. 1, 2.

(15) In the article RORARIUS remark [H].

WHETHER the general laws of motion are sufficient for the organization of bodies.

that feed produces organization. He was accused of blasphemy and impiety on pretence that he taught that the souls of beasts are not material [D]; which was supposed to be the same thing as if he had taught that they are no less immortal than those of men. He

(16) Note, that I own there is this difference between the enlarging of a house and the growth of a seius, that the organs of a seius are moulds, thro' which a new matter may be filtrated and distributed. A little house has no such thing.

(17) Alphonsus Caranza, a Spanish Civilian, in the first chapter of his tract De parva natur. & legitime, having rejected all the causes that are alleged of the formation of our bodies, ascribes it to God. Sennertus, ubi supra, cap. xii, p. 144 confutes him.

(18) See remark [M], of the article MORIN (J. BAPT.)

(19) Henr. More, de Anima lib. ii, cap. iv.

(20) See above citation (6).

(21) Sennert, ubi supra, cap. ix, pag. 137.

(22) Abse qua divina voluntate & peculiari erga homines gratia si fuisset, formæ humanæ non essent quam brutum. Ibid. cap. xiv, p. 147.

than it is to conceive, that they can change it into a large palace, in which each room, each door, each window, &c. keep the same proportions observed by the builder of the little house (16). If those two things are equally difficult, why should we believe that the laws of motion, which cannot organize a small particle of matter, will be able, if it be organized, to change it into an animal a thousand times bigger, all the proportions being duly observed in an almost infinite number of organs of different nature; some of which are soft, others fluid, others hard, &c. I should therefore think it probable that the growth of a seius, tho' organized ever since the beginning of the world, is directed by a particular cause, which has an idea of that work, and knows how to enlarge it; as an Architect has an idea of a building, and knows how to enlarge it, when he executes a plan ready made, which he lays upon his table. A great many people will grant me that animals have their parts unfolded in the womb; that they are there nourished; and receive their growth by the direction of a providence; but they will say that God directs all those things (17). I declare to them that they go from the question; for we do not enquire here into the first cause, the general author of all things; we enquire into the second cause, and the particular reason of each effect. To assign no other cause than God in this enquiry, does not become a Philosopher. Tell me, I pray, suppose there were rational inhabitants in the planets, and they should come down into one of our houses, and discover the use of rooms, of windows, of bolts, &c. and at last they should be contented to admire the providence of God, who has raised such a convenient building for men, would they not be rightly accounted ignorant? They would not know that this house was built by men, and that a human Architect directed the situation of the stones, boards, &c. according to the uses he designed them for. It is true, man receives that knowledge from God; but God is not the next, natural, and immediate cause of that building. The same ought to be said of the machine of trees and animals, they depend upon the particular direction of some second cause, which has received from God the knowledge and industry that are requisite for such a work. The difficulty lies in assigning that second cause. Some will have it that the substantial form of each mixed body is a spirit, on which God has bestowed the knowledge that is necessary to produce the temper, and effects, of that mixed body (18). Dr Henry More, who believed the pre-existence of souls (19), was of opinion, that being united to matter, they themselves frame an organized body to reside in it. That hypothesis may be confuted by our ignorance of what ought to be done, in order to put together nerves, veins, bones, &c. It might be answered, that the soul forgets all those ideas, as soon as her lodging is finished, because the coarseness of the organs of a human body breaks the communication she had before with very subtle occasional causes. But I had rather suppose that the soul itself does not direct the motions necessary for the growth of its own seius; I had rather ascribe that direction to another spirit. If any one had a mind to rectify the suppositions of Avicenna (20), he might say that there is a created intelligence, which presides over the organization of animals, and makes, as it were, a kind of a general manufacture of them; that it has an infinite number of workers under its direction, some for the bodies of birds, others for the bodies of fishes, &c. just as in our towns we see great variety of tradesmen; some make watches, others make cloaths, &c. [D] He was accused. . . of impiety, because he taught that the souls of beasts are not material. He rejects (21) the opinion of those, who maintain that they are not of a more noble nature than the elements; and he says, that they are by their nature as immortal as the souls of men; so that if the latter do not perish with their bodies, as the others do, it is through a special favour of the Creator (22). He could not deny that he ascribed an incorporeal nature to the souls of beasts; for he acknowledged that they are not produced from matter, and he laughed at the school-mens education; but he would not say that they are immortal. Freitag (23), who writ against him with great fury, did not fail to object to him that his doctrine was impious and blasphemous: which was the reason why a book was published (24) in his vindication with this title. De origine & natura animarum in brutis sententia clariff. Theologorum in aliquot Germaniae Academiis, quibus simul Daniel Sennertus à crimine blasphemiae & hæreses à Joh. Freitagio ipsi intentato abfoluitur. Freitag giving the alarm, applied himself to all the universities in Christendom; and to all the lovers of orthodoxy, earnestly exhorting them not to suffer those pernicious innovations. He asked the Divines, whether they would bear that impious opinion, which ascribed immortality to the souls of beasts, which revived the doctrine of the Transmigration of souls, &c. Admittent ne Theologi impiam illam de actu formarum entitativo, quo animis brutorum talis assignatur essentia & substantia, quæ extrâ propriam quam informant materiam, alibi subsistere & existerè possint, opinionem? quæ Metempsychosis reducitur, Palingenesia adstruitur, & pecudum animabus immortalitas comparatur. Perentine commentum de generatione formarum corruptibilium ex nihilo, è diametro sacræ scripturæ aduersum & inimicum (25) Will Divines agree to that impious opinion concerning the essential act of forms, whereby such an essence and substance is ascribed to the souls of beasts, that they can subsist and exist separate from their proper matter whereby they inform? whereby the transmigration of souls is revived, their regeneration established, and immortality attributed to the souls of brutes. Can they bear the fiction concerning the production of corruptible forms from nothing, diametrically opposite and contrary to the sacred Scriptures? He supposes that the greatest part of the professors of Wittemberg were willing to fling those monsters, but that the great interest of their colleague prevented their rising up against him. Non ignoro Reverendos & celeberrimos Theologie in Academia Witteburgica Professores, caterisque Clarissimos Professores & Philosophos, paucis sæcè Sennertiana, qui ab ipsius auspiciis dependent, & sputa Sennerti lingunt, quod ejus promotione gaudeant, exceptis, non tantum dissentire, sed & omni conatu id velle, ut erroris bi in ipsâ herbâ supprimantur, verum ita cobideri quod aduersus ipsum Vajorem Sennertum magnatum quorundam favore sustulit subnixumque vix nutrire & hifcere audent (26). Sennertus complained that Freitag imputed to him such consequences as he did not acknowledge. 'Malitia verò est, says he (27), quod passim opiniones mihi assignit, quæ mihi nunquam in mentem venerunt. Inter quas non postrema est, quod scribit, me statuere bestialium animarum immortalitatem. Pro bono Viro Freitagium non habeo, donec monstraverit locum, in quo statuerim, animam canis, equi, bovis, leonis, asneris, anatis, corvi, & similibus brutorum esse immortales, & post mortem supervenire. Consequentia verò, quibus id è meis opinionibus extorquere vult, nullæ sunt. Etsi enim insectorum, & sponte naturæ formæ corpore organico ad sensum dissoluta in materia instar feminis sese habente aliquandiu consistere possint: tamen immortales non sunt, sed suo tempore abolerentur. Neque ideò animæ brutorum sunt immortales, quia ex nihilo à Deo creatæ sunt. Neque enim immobilis, ut putat regula est, quod aliquid quod semel fuit, in nihilum redigi nequeat. Longe rectius J. C. Scaliger, exerc. 307. sect. 20. scribit, &c. . . But it is from malice, that he every where imputes to me opinions which never came into my mind. Among which it is not the least, that I maintain the immortality of the souls of brutes, I shall not take Freitagius for a good man until he point out the place, in which I have affirmed, that the soul of a dog, horse, ox, lion, goose, duck, raven, and the like brutes, are immortal, and remain after death. And there are no consequences whereby that can be extorted from my opinions. For altho' the forms of insects, and things beginning naturally, the organical body, as to sense, being dissolved, may, for some time, remain in a matter resembling feed: yet they are not immortal, but perish in their usual time. Neither are the souls of brutes therefore immortal, be-

(23) A Physician and professor of Philosophy at Groningen.

(24) At Francfort 1638, in 8vo, See Lindennius renovatus, pag. 237.

(25) Joh. Freitagius, in Apolog. ad Orbis Christiani Academiis, p. 18. It is prefixed to the book intitled, Novæ Sæcæ Sennerto Paracelsi recens in Philosophiam & Medicinam introductæ, quæ antiquæ veritatis oracula, & Aristotelicæ ac Galenicæ doctrinæ fundamenta convellere & stirpiti eradicare moliantur novatores. Detectio & solida Refutatio, printed at Amsterdam 1637, in 8vo.

(26) Joh. Freitag. in Apolog. ad Orbis Christiani Academiis, pag. 18.

(27) Sennertus, Epist. ad Joh. Sperlingem, in Lib. 2, p. 131. Defensio Tractatus de origine formarum pro D. Daniele Sennerto, contra D. Johannem Freitag. Auctore M. Johanne Sperlingem, Phyl. Prof. P. at Wittemberg. 1638, in 8vo.

He rejected that consequence; he durst not say, as others do, that the souls of brutes subsist after the death of the subjects which they had animated [E]. His opinion about the 'cause they are created of nothing by G O D. For it is not, as he thinks, an unchangeable rule, that any thing which once existed, cannot be reduced to nothing. Much better does J. C. Scaliger write, &c. It is not impossible but that Sennertus, tho' a man of great parts, might not perceive that the consequences ascribed to him, did naturally result from his principle; but it is still more likely that he perceived them, but durst not own them, propter metum Judaeorum, for fear of his enemies. And therefore he rather chose, by disowning these consequences, to be accounted a man, who did not argue well, and proposed a confused system, than to expose himself to all the consequences of the doctrine of the immortality of beasts. However it be, any Philosopher, who pretends to argue consequentially, will always chuse rather to say, that he knows not what the souls of beasts are, than to maintain, on the one side, that they are produced out of nothing, independently upon matter, and on the other, that they are not created beings, and that they are annihilated as soon as the brute ceases to live. Such was the confused opinion of Sennertus.

His apologist (28) positively declares, that the souls of beasts are made out of nothing, and yet that they are not produced by creation. He quotes Dannhæw- (29) rus (29), who alleged the species intellectuales, to shew whatever is made out of nothing, is not a created being. He quotes Thummus (30), who alleged the habits of the soul to prove the same thing. Thus the Peripatetics elude every thing with arguments ad hominem. Freitag does continually object to Sennertus, that he believes the immortality of the souls of beasts; he falls into a Poetical enthusiasm to exhort all manner of beasts to shout with joy and triumph; he pretends that our Physician revives the idle fancies of Paracelsus, who taught, that all souls returned again into the world from time to time. 'Plaudite ait, oves & boves, lupi & scarabæi, & vespæ & quicquid usquam crabronum est.

Vita equidem vestris animis à funere restat,
Restat & in corpus posse redire novum.
Fœlices animæ quod ubivis esse potestis,
Dum triplicis mundi flamma resolvat opus.
Dicite quæ vobis statio & fortuna superest,
Cum ruat in priscum machina trina Chaos?

Subjicit. Hi scilicet sunt fructus floresque novæ doctrine à Paracelso profectæ, quam Christiani etiam (proh pudor!) ferè amplecti non erubescunt, quæ statuitur formas rerum præter humanam corruptibilitatem, officio informationis functas, essentiam & existentiam suam servare, ubi Paracelsus addit eas ire ad Orcum & Iliadum suum, & quotannis aut certis temporibus redire in mundi theatrum, & assumpto fabricatoque corpore personam suam pro avo sibi destinato sustinere, eaque depositâ vicissim ad suos ibi avos & proavos immortali quiete beatos redire (31). - - - Rejoice, says he, ye sheep and oxen, ye flies and beetles, wasps and all hornets. Your souls live after death, and may return into a new body. Happy souls! that may be where you will, whilst flames consume the triple world. Say what place and fortune you can have, when the threefold machine shall tumble into it's antient chaos. He adds. Those, forsooth, are the fruits and flowers of the new doctrine of Paracelsus, which even Christians, alas! are not ashamed to embrace, which teaches, that besides the human soul, the forms of things perishable do preserve their essence and existence, where Paracelsus adds, that they go into their place of reception, and yearly, or at certain times, return upon the stage of the world, and having assumed and framed a body, all their part for the time appointed, and quitting it again, return to their grandfathers and ancestors happy in an immortal rest. Sperlingen answers in few words, That it is neither his nor Sennertus's doctrine (32): He therefore tacitly confesses, that they know not how to draw from a principle the consequences arising from it, and that they ascribe a very strange conduct to G o d, viz. That he has ordered an almost infinite number of incorporeal substances to be created, which he is to abolish and annihilate in a short time after. Heat produces every year an infinite number of little animals, which live no longer than the heat lasts. What disorder is it in nature, that so many spiritual souls should be annihilated, because there happens some alteration in the organs of animals? It is to be observed that the school Philosophers have used against the Cartesians the same cunning which Dannhæw- (29) erus and Thummus did use. They brought in some instances to shew, that some things are produced out of nothing, and yet are not properly created. The accidents of matter afforded them those instances; but the Cartesians answered, that those accidents are not beings distinct from the subject which they modify: and therefore the arguments made use of to prove that substantial forms would be created beings, cannot be retorted. The Cartesians reduce all the alterations of matter to local motion, and maintain that the motion of a body is the body itself, as it receives existence with new relations. They must therefore acknowledge that matter, considered as being in motion, is created, and that G o d alone can produce motion; for none but G o d can create. This might pass, if the schoolmen had not recourse to other examples; but they ask whether the free acts of a man's soul are distinct from the soul. If they are distinct from it, they are beings produced out of nothing, and yet not created; nothing then hinders but it may be said that substantial forms are not created. If they are not distinct from it, a man's soul, considered as willing a sin, is created: and therefore it is not the soul that forms that act of her will; for since it is not distinct from the substance of the soul, and the cannot be the cause of her own existence, it plainly follows, that she cannot be the cause of any of her thoughts. She is not therefore answerable for willing ill things hic & nunc, no more than for existing hic & nunc. The Cartesians know not how to answer that objection: the perplexity they are in brings in again the doctrine of substantial forms, and all the chimeras of the schools, because the arguments alledged by them prove too much. Such is the fate of disputes: they spring again out of their own ashes; the party ready to lay down their arms find at last some retortition, whereby they recover their strength, and the ground they had lost, and dispute it as before.

[E] He durst not say, as others do, that the souls of brutes subsist after the death of the subjects which they had animated. Joannes Scotus Erigena maintained not only that they are not material, but also that they continue to live after the death of the brutes. John Lippius, professor of Divinity at Strasbourg taught the same thing (33). Dr Henry More, a Cambridge Divine, asserts, that they subsist out of the body, and thinks it probable enough that they continue to live in that state, but dares not affirm it; only he alleges the reasons for and con (34). I have verified what a professor of Leipzig ascribes to him (35). Morus & superstites (animas brutorum) & in corpora alia remeare tradit, cap. 5. (36). That professor tells us a curious thing, viz. That a certain man had taught, a few years before, that if man had not sinned, brutes had never died, and that they shall be raised with men, to be transported into Heaven: which is the opinion of the Turks. Abfurdisime omnium M. B. Semigentilis & semi Christianus ante paucos annos cum monstrosi opinionibus aliis etiam hanc protulit, bruta nisi peccavisset homo, moritura non fuisset, atque eadem tamen licet nunc moriantur, cum hominibus olim resuscitanda, & ab hoc centro mundi ad liberiora cæli spatia transferenda; quod somnium olim Muhammedis à Turcis hodie credi, testis est Joh. Andreas in libro de Confusione Sectæ Muhammeticæ (37). He observes, that according to Taurellus, the souls of beasts are spiritual, and yet die with their bodies (38). Perhaps Taurellus argued inconsistently for fear of exposing himself; he rather chose to prejudice his reason than his fortune. Or perhaps he and Sennertus came to believe, out of a principle of religion, that G o d destroys the souls of beasts, that none might subsist forever but those of men. Perhaps this was the opinion of the most eminent Rabbi that hath flourished in the XVIIth century; for endeavouring to prove that the

(33) Substantiam incorpoream docuerunt Joannes Scotus Erigena, lib. iii, de divisione nature, n. 41. . . . Jo. Lippius . . . in Metaphysica magna lib. ii, cap. i, pag. 386. . . . ille, adversus Basilium & Gregorium Nyssenum disputans, vitam separata à corpore non amittere; sic, quæque sejunctas in ære existere atque modo aliquo operari opinatur, forte cum universo olim in nihilum redigendas. Joan. Cyprianus, Hist. Animal. Continuat. pag. 24.

(34) Henr. Morus, de Anima lib. ii, cap. vi, num. 105, pag. m. 106.

(35) Joan. Cyprianus, ubi supra, lib. ii, cap. vi, pag. 24.

(36) He is told have added lib. ii, pag. 90.

(37) Cyprian. Hist. Animal. Continuat. pag. 24.

(38) Substantiam incorpoream docuerunt . . . Nicolaus Taurellus . . . in libello de vita & morte quæst. altera, præf. 1v. . . . brutorum animas à morte superesse negat. fous 1d. ibid.

(28) Sperlingen, pag. 182, of the book, the title of which I have just now set down.

(29) Dannhæw- rus, in Collegio Psych. Disput. VI.

(30) Thummus, in Disputat. de traduce.

calls on brutes to rejoice

his put

(31) Sperlingen, Defensio Tractatus, &c, p. 206, 207.

(32) Mendacium est, brutum animas nobis immortales & post mortem superstitis esse. Mendacium est, nobis animas illas ubique esse, & absque omni in mundo vagari materia. Mendacium est, nobis ortum ac interitum hominum & brutorum unum eundemque esse. Mendacium est, nobis bruta & homines formæ similes & materiæ pares esse. Ibid. pag. 210.

the cause of metals and minerals was somewhat singular; he believed they were formed by intelligent and spiritual Beings [F].

fouls of brutes do not subsist after this life, as mens fouls do, he does not alledge any reason taken from the internal constitution, or from the essence of those fouls. He merrily thus argues: We often dream, says he, that we see people that are deceased; but we never see in a dream any animal after it's death, tho' it has been familiarly bred in our houses. Spizelius has reason to reject this Logic, he should likewise have denied the fact. A great many people may disprove the Rabbi; they dream a thousand times of their dead dogs and horses. Satis ineptè Menasse Ben Israel lib. I. de Refurr. Mort. cap. IX. contendit, Animam hominum, non brutorum esse superitatem ex eo, quod saepe de illis somniamus qui jam diu è vita excessere, nunquam tamen somniamus de ulla bestia, quæ mortua sit, etiam si nobis familiaris ac domestica fuerit (39). Observe, that the pretended blasphemies charged upon Sennertus, by a Physician and professor of Philosophy at Groningen, were not looked upon as an ill doctrine by the German Divines. 'Non negandum est, post Franzii librum hunc (40) aliquoties editum Theologos Lipsienfes, Rostochienfes, Basileenses, Regiomontanos quinquaginta abhinc annis de animæ beatiarum interrogatos, inclinasse magis in Danielis Sennerti opinionem, cui asserenti animas brutorum olim ex nihilo creatas, & hodie etiam alterius quam elementaris naturæ esse, blasphemiam & hæresim Johanne Freitagius Professor Medicus Groningæ intenterat. Enim verò & eisdem nominatos Theologos legimus in Responsis suis candide disceptationem de naturâ elementari ejus animæ à se ad Philosophos devolvisse, eorumque libertati permittisse (41). - It is not to be denied, that after some editions of this book of Franzius, the Divines of Leipzig, Rostock, Basil, Königsberg, and others, being about fifty years since consulted about the soul of beasts, inclined more to the opinion of Daniel Sennertus, whom John Freitag, Professor of Medicine at Groningen, had charged with blasphemy and heresy, for asserting that the souls of beasts were at first created of nothing, and even at this day are not of an elementary nature. For we read that these same Divines did fairly refer to the Philosophers the controversy concerning the elementary nature of these souls, leaving them to their freedom of thought therein.'

(39) Spizelius, in Scrutinio Atheismi, pag. 125.

(40) That is, Historia Animarum, satura, written by Wolfgang Franzius Doctor of Divinity, where these words are to be found, cap. ii. pag. m. 14. Sciendum est animam bruti non esse spiritum incorporeum, qualis est nostra mens inviolabilis & immortalis, alias quæque bruta essent immortalia.

(41) Joh. Cyprinus, ubi supra, pag. 27.

I shall make a reflexion before I conclude this remark. Tho' Sennertus was pleased to say, that the fouls of brutes do not subsist after this life, as human fouls do, he laid down a doctrine, whereby it plainly appears, that the fouls of beasts are of the same species with those of men. The difference of their fate, as to duration, does not proceed from the difference of their perfections, but from the free will of the supreme master, who is a cause wholly external. Medals and money, which princes order to be stamped, are an image of the conduct which that Physician ascribes to God. Medals are stamped to last for ever; money is coined to last till a new order to the contrary; for after a certain time it is cried down, and melted, and converted into other forms: and medals and money are made of the same metal. According to Sennertus, a human soul is like medals, and the soul of a brute is like money. This is a dangerous opinion; it would follow from thence, that we cannot be sure of the immortality of our fouls but by revelation. Honoratus Fabri, the Jesuit, who uses Sennertus with the utmost contempt, and taxes him with grounding his doctrine upon frivolous objections and answers, maintains that this opinion is somewhat impious (42). Ad rationes n. 2. & 3. adductas nonnulla reponit, (Sennertus, Hypomen. 4. c. 10.) quæ nemo sapiens relere dignetur: v. g. vult, animam rationalem ex natura & indole sua immortalem non esse, sed tantum ex voluntate ac decreto Dei; sed contrarium demonstravi, & hoc nonnihil impietatis sapit: præterea vult semen decimum divina benedictione carere, ac proinde animam, quæ ipsi inerat, interire; si hæc nugæ non sint, nusquam invenies. . . . Denique quod adducit ex scriptura crescite & multiplicamini. . . . (43) plisquam inane est. . . . sed hæc mittamus, finamque hominem, ut egregium medicum, ita vix mediocre Philosophum, & prorsus Catholicum (44). - To the reasons mentioned n. 2. and 3. Sennertus gives some answers, which no wise man would vouchsafe to refuse; for instance, be

(42) Honoratus Fabri, de Generat. Hominis, lib. vii. Proposit. L. pag. 535. Edit. Norimbergæ, 1677.

(43) He says in another place, Bonus Sennertus frustra se torquet & recurrit ad sumum Crescite & multiplicamini; frustra alios ignorantia accusat, verum istarum Philosophicarum satis imperitus. Idem, lib. 7. de Gener. Animal. Proposit. lxxvi, pag. 178.

(44) I think it should be Academicum.

says, the rational soul is not, of it's proper nature and disposition, immortal, but only by the will and decree of GOD; but I have demonstrated the contrary, and it favours somewhat of impiety: moreover, he will have the separated seed to be without the divine benediction, and therefore the soul which was in it dies; if this is not trifling, nothing is. . . . Finally, what he brings from Scripture, be fruitful and multiply. . . . is most insignificant. . . . but we will let these things pass, and let the man alone, who though an excellent Physician, was scarcely an indifferent Philosopher, and altogether uncatolic. But notwithstanding his great contempt for the Philosophy of that Physician, he takes his objections against the common opinion of the school-men, concerning the fouls of brutes, to be unanswerable. He forsakes these men, and all the hypotheses opposed by Sennertus; and all that he says comes to this, that the fouls of beasts are not produced anew, that they are not absolute beings, but a refultance of a certain mixture of the four elements (45). This is an absurd opinion, which would lead us to say the same thing of human fouls.

[F] He believed that metals are formed by intelligent and spiritual Beings. He did not say what his antagonists imputed to him, that a stone produced another stone, and a piece of gold another piece of the same metal; but he said that some spirits, whose abode was unknown to him, and who keep only in certain places, insinuate themselves into mines and quarries, and there produce the several sorts of fossiles that are to be found in them. Let us see how he expresses himself: he invented not this opinion; many learned men have had the same thought. Malitiosè & illud mihi affingit; quasi statuam in lib. de consens. & dissens. cap. 9. quod lapis lapidem, gemma gemmam, metallum metallum generet. Neque enim tam stultus sum, ut credam, hunc adamantem, hanc crystallum, hoc aurum generare alium adamantem, aliam crystallum, aliud aurum, sicut planta una aliam, aut bos bovem (hæc enim generatio solum viventium est) generat. Hæc verò mea, Anselmi Boëtii, & aliorum doctorum Virorum mens est, omnia metalla, lapides, gemmas, quæ hæcenus è terra eruta sunt, & adhuc eruuntur, omnia in prima creatione secundum individua creata non esse, sed fodinas gemmarum & metallorum quod alleg. loc. pluribus historiis probavi, iterum repleri: & esse quosdam spiritus formam architectonicam metallorum & gemmarum in se continentes, qui in terra, quique secundum suam speciem, producant metalla, lapides, gemmas, illic figuram, colorem, & alia propria accidentia tribuant, & hos spiritus in fodinas & matrices gemmarum & metallorum sese diffundere, atque ista metalla & gemmas producere. Idque esse formas metallorum multiplicari, dixi. E quibus autem sedibus & locis spiritus illi proveniant, nobis ignotum est, utpote ignorantibus quænam globi terreni in terra constitutio sit. Hoc certum est, spiritus istos non ubivis terrarum reperiri, sed in quibusdam saltem locis (46). - He maliciously also and falsely represents me; as if I had said, that a stone generates a stone, a metal a metal. For I am not so foolish as to believe, that this diamond, this crystal, this gold, begets another diamond, another crystal, another gold, as one plant produces another plant, or one bull another; for this manner of production is only of things that have life. But this is not my opinion only, but is also that of Anselm, Boëtius, and of other learned men, that all metals, stones, gems, which hitherto have been, and still are, dug out of the earth, were not every individual formed at the first creation, but that the mines of gems and metals, are again replenished, as I have proved in the places above-mentioned by many Histories: and that there are certain spirits that have in them the architectonic forming of metals, and gems, which produce in the earth, every one according to it's species, metals, stones, gems, and give them figure, colour, and other proper accidents; and that these spirits diffuse themselves into the mines and veins of gems and metals, which there they produce. And this, I said, was to multiply forms of metals: but from what seats or places these spirits come, is to us unknown, being ignorant of the internal constitution of the terrestrial globe. This is certain, that these spirits are not to be found every where, but only

(45) See his first book, de Generatione Animalium, Proposit. lvi, & seq. pag. 164, & seq.

metals

(46) Daniel Sennertus, Epistola ad Joh. Sperlingum: It is in Sperling's tractatus de origine formarum.

G g

VOL. V.

'only in certain places.' This seems to be absurd; but if it be considered, 1. That a good Philosopher must assign another cause of the phenomena than God's will. 2. That neither the earth, nor the elementary qualities of fossils, nor their substantial forms, seem capable of any effect, that requires a certain disposition of parts, a choice, a knowledge of what is proper: I say, if this be considered, and besides that one cannot apprehend that the laws of motion should be able to place the particles of matter exactly as they ought to be in order to make gold, a diamond, an emerald, &c. or to chuse those that are fit for it, that opinion of Sennertus seems to have some probability in it (47). Can the virtues of bodies, and the general laws of motion, make any thing in our shops and laboratories without our direction? Could they make a shoe, a glove, a needle, if men did not meddle with them? How then can one believe that they produce, without any direction, a vast number of things, a thousand times more difficult than our clocks?

(47) Compare what is said in mark [M] of the article MO. RINUS, (J. BAPT.)

(a) Witte, Diat. Biograph. Tom. II, pag. 172.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Conradus Samuel Schurz-leichius, Orat. funeb. Andree Sennerti, pag. 91, Edit. Witt. 1697.

(d) Id. ibid.

(1) Pag. 172, 173.

SENNERTUS (ANDREW) professor of the oriental languages in the university of Wittemberg his birth-place, published a great many books [A], which shew, that he learnedly and worthily discharged the duties of his professorship. He exercised it fifty one years (a), and died the twenty-second of December 1689 (b), being eighty-four years of age. He learned the Arabic tongue of Golius at Leyden, and found out a very good method to teach it (c). Dr Pocock, who understood it admirably well, gave him that encomium (d). He was commended for several other things in his funeral oration, and particularly for this, that the purity of his morals, and the temperance always visible in his conduct, procured him the advantage of attaining to a great old age, with the vigor of body and mind, that is necessary to bear the fatigues of study, and the cares of a professor (e).

(e) Id. ibid. pag. 95.

[A] He published a great many books. You will find a catalogue of them in the second volume (1), of Witte's Diarum Biographicum, out of which I shall only transcribe the following lines. Athenae & inscriptiones Wittenbergenfes. Differtatio de quatuor linguae Ebraicae et etatibus. Scrutinium religionum, de religionum varietate, & una sola Christiana & vera. De principio religionis in genere, & Christianae in specie. De punctorum vocalium Ebr. neque cum literis, neque cum verbo Dei coarvitate; de Urim & Tumim.

(a) Gio-Petro de Crescenzi nel suo Amfiteatro Romano, apud Prioratum, Scena d'Humini illustri.

(b) Priorato, Scena d'Hum. illustri; and observe that his book was printed in 1659.

SERBELLONE, an Italian family, which has afforded several men of note, as will appear hereafter. According to fabulous genealogies, it derives its original from Cerdubellius, the head of the Spaniards in the time of Scipio Africanus (a). We are told, that some ages ago, it was divided into three branches, because three brothers left Burgundy, where their family flourished, and one of them went to the kingdom of Valencia, the other to Naples, and the eldest to Milan. The Spanish branch removed long after into Sardinia, where it continues to this day. That of Naples is extinct, or has been re-united to that of Milan, which made a greater figure than the rest, and is still considerable (b). The persons I am going to speak of descended from it.

SERBELLONE (JOHN PETER) was the father and uncle of several illustrious persons. He married in the year 1506, Elizabeth Rainoldi, a woman of a noble and ancient family in Milan, and aunt of John Baptist Rainoldi, president of the senate of that town. He had by that marriage five sons and two daughters: one of the two daughters was a nun; the other was married to the Count de Macagno. GABRIEL his eldest son, was a very great captain. I shall bestow an article upon him. The second, whose name was JOHN BAPTIST, took orders, attached himself to the court of Rome, was made Bishop of Cassano in Calabria, where he did not reside, because he was employed in several important intrigues at Rome, and was appointed by Pope Pius IV, governor of the castle of St Angelo during his whole pontificate. The third son of Peter Serbellone was called FABRICIUS: I shall also bestow an article upon him. The fourth son was called JOHN ANTONY, who was Bishop of Foligno, and then of Novara, and the first cardinal whom Pope Pius IV made in the year 1560. He was governor of several towns in the Ecclesiastical state, legate of Perugia and Romagna, Bishop of Ostia and Velletri, and died Dean of the sacred college in the year 1591. He was a cunning Politician, who had a hand in the most secret negotiations of the court of Rome, under the Popes Pius IV, Pius V, Gregory XIII, and Sixtus V. Being cousin to Pius IV, he easily obtained some very considerable privileges for the college of Doctors at Milan. He found it more difficult to get them confirmed by Sixtus V, who had resolved to suppress them; but at last he carried his point, and even got those privileges enlarged. The last son concerned himself only with his domestic affairs. Our Serbellone had a sister called CECILIA, who was married in the year 1485, to Bernard de Medicis [A]. From this marriage came six sons and seven daughters (a) [B].

(a) Taken from Count Gualdo Priorato, Scena d'Humini illustri.

[A] Cecilia . . . was married to Bernard de Medicis. Priorato seems to approve those, who say that this Bernard was of the family of Medicis, which has obtained the supreme power at Florence (1); but many other writers call the family of Pius IV, by the name of Medequin, and not by that of Medicis. [B] . . . From this marriage came six sons and seven daughters. John James the eldest son, was the famous Marquis de Marignan, one of the greatest captains of his age. The second, who was made cardinal by Paul III, was elected Pope in 1559, and took the name of Pius IV. Two other sons of Cecilia Serbellone, were successively Marquises of Marignan, after the death of their eldest brother. Their brother Gabriel served in the armies of Charles V with great courage: The youngest brother died a child. Of the seven daughters, none but two, viz. Margaret and Clara, remained in the world; the other five were made Nuns.

Nans. Margaret was married to the Count Gilbert Borromeo, and was the mother of St Charles Borromeo. Clara was the wife of Count Mark d'Altempe (2). I have mentioned in another place (3) a cardinal who proceeded from this marriage.

(2) Taken from Count Guido ALTAEPS.

(3) In the article

SERBELLONE (GABRIEL) eldest son of the foregoing, was a warrior of great repute in the XVth century. He was knight of Malta, and grand prior of Hungary. He gave proofs of his valour when he defended Strigonia against the Ottoman forces, and signalized himself (a) at the famous passage of the Elbe, and at the battle that was fought soon after, in which Charles V. obtained a victory over the Duke of Saxony. He was Lieutenant-general of the imperial army. He had the same post in Italy in the army of the Marquis de Marignan his cousin, during the war of Siena, and it was to him that this place surrendered at last. He had before subdued (b) Saluzzes in Piedmont for the Emperor Charles V. After the taking of Siena, he took several other towns in Tuscany, which refused to acknowledge the house of Medicis; and being made general of the holy Church, both by sea and land, under the pontificate of Pius IV, he recovered Ascoli, he built several fortresses in the Ecclesiastical State fortified the castle of St Angelo, re-built Civita Vecchia, and performed several other things of that nature; for he was a very good engineer, which was the reason why, after the death of Pius IV, the King of Spain sent him into the kingdom of Naples, and into Sicily, to take a view of all the places, and order what he should think fit. Being gone occasionally into the isle of Malta, he there drew the plan, and laid the foundations of the new town (c). The Duke of Alva took him with him in the famous expedition of the Netherlands (d). Serbellone was general of the artillery, and went constantly before to make the ways ready; so that he had a great share in the glory of that famous march, one of the most remarkable operations that ever was seen in that kind. Though the engineer Paciotti, whom the Duke of Alva obtained of the Duke of Savoy, directed the construction of the citadel of Antwerp; yet it is certain, that Serbellone was the chief supervisor of that work (e). He returned some time after into Italy, and was at the battle of Lepanto, where he acquired great glory. He was there Captain-general of the artillery (f), and commander of a squadron of Spanish galleys. He was so much for giving battle, that he made Don Juan of Austria resolve upon it. The year following he commanded in Sicily, and was made viceroy of Tunis. The Turks having taken Gouletta, besieged him with so many troops in Tunis (g), where the citadel he was building was not yet finished, that after they had been repulsed in fourteen several assaults, at last they took the place sword in hand. He was made prisoner, and carried to Constantinople. He was exchanged for thirty-six Turkish officers taken at the battle of Lepanto [A]. When he arrived at Milan, his birth-place, in 1575, that city publicly expressed their joy for his arrival. He was Lieutenant-general to the Marquis d'Aimonte, governor of the Milanese, the two following years, that is, he governed that country alone; for the governor durst not stay in it by reason of the Plague. Afterwards Serbellone received orders to repair to the Netherlands, to command there immediately under Don Juan (h). He brought thither two thousand men raised in the Milanese. That prince had a great esteem for him, and gave him the title of father. He entrusted him with the care of hastening, as much as he could, the construction of the citadel of Namur (i); but they fell sick both of them [B], which put a stop to the work. Don Juan, who was only in the thirty-third year of his age died of his sickness: Serbellone, though above seventy years old, recovered of his (k). He had a great share in the taking of Maastricht [C]; and returned into Italy towards the latter end of the year 1579. He had been chosen to command the army which Philip II, intended to send into

(a) In 1547.

(b) In 1554.

(c) Ex Priorato; Scena d'Humini illustri.

(d) In 1567.

(e) Ex Strada, de Bello Belg. l. Dec. lib. vii, viii.

(f) In 1571.

(g) In 1574. See Thuanus; lib. lxxii.

(h) Ex Priorato; ubi supra.

(i) In 1578.

(k) Ex Strada, ubi supra, Dec. l. lib. x.

[A] He was exchanged for thirty six Turkish officers, taken at the battle of Lepanto.] Gregory XIII made that exchange. 'Nec multo ante redierat Gabriel Serbellonius ex Tunetana captivitate in libertatem affertus a Gregorio XIII, commutatione captivorum qui navalis victorie reliqui Adriana mole attinebant, charum in primis Austriaco ac partibus caput, exactæque non magis ætatis quam disciplinæ militaris exemplum (1). . . . Not long before this Gabriel Serbellone returned from his captivity at Tunis, being set at liberty by Pope Gregory XIII, in exchange for the prisoners, who remaining after the naval victory, were kept at Castle-Angelo, a man exceeding dear to Don Juan of Austria, and both an example of honourable old age, and a pattern for military discipline.'

(1) Strada, lib. x. Dec. l.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Hippolitus Pennoni.

youth and quality of Don Juan, whom he gave over; but since the Duke of Parma was to succeed Don Juan, Pennoni's freedom is not much to be wondered at.

[C] He had a great share in the taking of Maastricht.] Priorato says, it was Serbellone that took that town, and was the first that got into it. I durst not say so much, the thing being not likely, considering the age of that great captain. It should have been the action of an adventurer; for we must remember that Maastricht was taken by storm. Priorato is guilty of a surprising omission; for he says nothing of Serbellone's first journey into the Netherlands; and tho' he ascribes to him the construction of the citadel of Antwerp, which was built in his first journey, it plainly appears that he did not know that the Duke of Alva brought with him Gabriel Serbellone; he mentions the citadel of Antwerp only, after having mentioned Serbellone's journey in 1577, and the taking of Maastricht.

Thuanus mentions one Count Cernellone (§2), knight of Malta, and Prior of Hungary, who is the same with our Gabriel Serbellone, and yet he distinguishes them; for having said, that the Duke of Alva caused the citadel of Antwerp to be built, being advised to it by Chapin Vitelli and Count Cernellone, who had taken into Portugal, to seize on that kingdom as soon as Cardinal Henry should die; but he had not time to crown his glorious life with that great exploit. He died in January 1580, being ready to go into Spain (1). One of his sons was killed at the siege of Tunis (m).

[(§2) An error of the press corrected, letter C, of the Index of Thuanus, R. 32, C. 17.]

(1) Ex Priorato, ubi supra.

(m) Thuan. lib. lxxiii, pag. 76.

taken a view of that place, he observes that the first who commanded in the citadel was Gabriel Serbellone. Cum arcis custodia primo cum idoneo praesidio attributa esset Gabrieli Serbellonio Mediolanensi spectatae virtutis Duci, cujus aliquoties à nobis supra facta mentio est (4). . . . When the defence of the castle had been committed to Gabriel Serbellone the Milanese, a general of approved valour, whom we have mentioned before. It is certain he means two persons, and that he, who the Duke of Alva consulted, and sent to see the place, was Gabriel Serbellone: 'Antuerpiæ arcem fundabat, Paciotti Machinatoris ingenio, Serbellonii judicio (5). . . . He built the citadel of Antwerp, by the contrivance of the engineer Paciotti, and the advice of Serbellone.'

(4) Thuan. lib. xli, pag. 830.

(5) Strada, lib. vii.

SERBELLONE (FABRICIUS) brother to the foregoing, was general of the Pope's troops in the country of Avignon, during the Civil wars in the reign of Charles IX. He was at first captain of an independent company, and governor of Pavia for the Emperor Charles V. Afterwards he exercised the office of Commissary-general of the army in Piedmont, and in the year 1560 he was appointed governor of the state of Avignon, by Pope Pius IV, and general of his armies (a). He violently sided with the Catholics against the Protestants, and was horribly hated and dreaded by the latter, by reason of the cruelties he exercised in Orange [A], wherein he was furiously seconded by the commanders of the French troops [B]. Pius V continued him in the same posts his predecessor had bestowed upon him in that country; but Serbellone did not long enjoy them: he went home in 1566, and being gone to Rome towards the latter end of the same year, to take upon him the chief command of the Pope's troops, he died in the house of the cardinal his brother. He had married Frances Malefina sister to the Marquis de Malgrado (b).

(a) Priorato, Scena, d'Huom. illustri.

(b) Ibid.

(1) Remark [C] of the article BEAUMONT.

(2) Varillas, Hist. de Charl. IX, Tom. i, pag. 202, 203.

(3) The sixth of June 1562.

[A] The cruelties he exercised in Orange. Having promised in another place (1) to speak of those cruelties in this article, the best thing I can do is to set down the words of an author who is accounted a good Catholic (2). He informs us that Fabricius Serbellone, a gentleman of Milan, of an ancient family, and of great experience, who gave himself over to most vices that prevail among his countrymen, as he was endowed with their virtues, joined with the Catholics of Provence, whom the Counts de Sommerive, de Suze, de Carces, &c. had gathered together, and persuaded them (3) to make an attempt upon Orange. He invested that town when the whole garrison was gone out, and taking advantage of that favourable juncture, he gave an assault as soon as his battery had made a sufficient breach. During the assault the Catholics, that were left in Orange, opened one gate to him. He went in thro' it, and his men were contented at first to kill every body they met in arms; but afterwards, they renewed the examples of the most refined cruelty invented formerly by tyrants. They employed their ingenuity in contriving how to make those, who had been so unhappy as to escape their first fury, feel themselves die, and killed them gradually. Some were thrown headlong upon stakes, halberds, pikes, and pikes. Some were hung in the chimnies, and burnt with a slow fire. They took delight in cutting the privy parts; and their fury spared neither children, nor old and sick people, nor the reapers, tho' the latter had no other arms than their sickles. Women and maids did not come off with the loss of their honour, and with being prostituted to the rabble; for they were set for a mark to be shot at, and after hung upon the windows. The boys were kept to compleat the abomination; and to add derision to their outrage, the ladies, who rather chose to die than to satisfy the lewdness of the victors, were exposed stark naked for a publick mockery, with horns thrust into those parts, which modesty does not permit to name. Some of both sexes were larded with slips of paper cut out of the Geneva Bibles. The very Catholics, who opened the gate, were not spared: For after a place had been appointed for them, and they had been told that they would be safe in it with their wives and children, they were all cut to pieces. There were only a hundred and nine soldiers in the castle, who not being sufficient to defend it, desired to capitulate. All they proposed was granted them; but as soon as they came out, they were surrounded; and those who were not thought worthy of being killed by the soldiers, were thrown headlong from the top of a rock. After the plunder had been secured, the victors employed themselves in demolishing the walls of Orange; and Serbellone thinking that it would be a piece of madness to leave so near the country of Avignon a considerable town, the sovereign whereof was a Calvinist, set fire to it, which quickly consumed the bishop's palace, and three hundred houses with those, who had concealed themselves in them. The burning had gone on, had it not been for an extraordinary rain, which put it out in a moment, and disappointed those who stirred the fire.

D'Aubigne had said long before, that the Catholic historians had related what he says of the cruelties exercised at Orange (4). Doubtless he meant Thuanus, who relates (5) the whole matter as fully as related in the passage taken from Varillas, and as fully as Theodore Beza had related it (6). He meant, I say, Thuanus; but he had some reasons not to name him. It will be granted me that the historian, whose words I have transcribed, is a writer of greater authority, ad hominem, considering the time he wrote in.

(4) D'Aubigne, Tom. i, p. 204.

(5) Thuan. lib. lxxii, pag. m.

(6) Beza, Hist. Eccles. lib. xii, pag. 262.

[B] He was furiously seconded by the commanders of the French troops. It is observed in the relation of the sacking of Orange (7), that the castle, the bishop's palace, and several other places, were set on fire, and part of the walls pulled down at the solicitation of the Count de Suze. He satisfied his avarice as well as his cruelty; for he took part of the best booty, and furnished his house with it. These are the men, on whom we poor private people bestow so many panegyrics, upon account of their pretended zeal for religion and the glory of God: The Monluc, the Tavannes, the Suzes, and the Guises will be praised for ever among the votaries of the Church of Rome; but what did they do for their religion but get wealth, plunder, and domineer? Was this a service done to God, for which they deserved to be rewarded? O curas hominum, o quantum est in rebus inane (8)! . . . O empty toils! O vanity of things.

(8) Perissus, Sat. i, initia.

SERBELLONE (JOHN) the sixth son of John Baptist Serbellone, Count de Castillon, and Lord of Romagnano, was a great commander in the service of the King of Spain in the XVIIth century. He was a native of Milan. He performed his first military exploits in the year 1616. Being informed at Rome of the preparations that were making in the Milanese against the Duke of Savoy, he immediately repaired to Count John Peter his brother, colonel of horse, and general of the artillery, and governor of Gattinara. He applied himself so diligently to the service, that he made it appear he was born for the war, and would raise himself in time. His brother having been killed at Verceil, as he was taking a view of that place, he had his regiment given him. He increased in that post the esteem he was in. He was wounded with a musket shot at the siege of Verceil, and lost his regiment some time after (a); but the same Duke of Fera, who had disbanded that regiment, gave him another of three thousand foot in 1620, during the troubles of the Valteline. The Protestants and the Catholics being come to blows in that country, our Count Serbellone was ordered to go and support the Catholics; and it is likely he did not use the Protestants too gently, since the governor of Milan was well pleased with his zeal and conduct, and gave a good character of him to the court: this implies it sufficiently. Notwithstanding which, his regiment was disbanded, when the Valteline was deposited into the hands of Gregory XV; but the troubles beginning soon again in that country, Serbellone was sent thither a second time, having the same post (b), and fuller commissions; and gave great satisfaction by his manner of opposing the French troops [A]; as it appeared by the offices bestowed upon him: he was made counsellor in the supreme council of Spain in the year 1625, commissary-general in the Milanese in 1627, general of the artillery and governor of Montferrat in 1628. He served under the Marquis of Spinola at the famous siege of Casal; and some years after (c) he went into Germany to serve in the quality of Captain-general of the artillery under the Duke of Fera. From the death of that Duke till the arrival of the Cardinal Infant, he had the chief command of the army in Alsace. He performed wonders at the battle of Nortlingen [B], which the Swedes lost the sixth of September 1634; and having followed the Cardinal Infant into Flanders, he settled winter quarters in the bishopric of Liege, and the next spring (d) obtained leave to go home. He did great services to the King of Spain against the Duke of Rohan in the Valteline [C], whilst they were raising in Germany the army he was designed to command. It was thought more proper to send him into Catalonia, where he commanded the horse [D] in the year 1637. He formed a very noble design, which was to besiege Leucate, the taking

(a) In 1618.

(b) In 1624.

(c) In 1633.

(d) In 1635.

[A] His manner of opposing the French troops. I do not follow my author in every thing, to avoid advancing falsities. Priorato will have it, that the following things happened in 1624, and 1625. 1. Serbellone's regiment was set on foot again. 2. He so diligently guarded the posts he had been trusted with in the Valteline, that the Marquis de Cœuvres, who commanded the French troops, could never get an inch of ground on that side. 3. Serbellone being sent against the Duke of Savoy, besieged and took Nice de la Paglia. 4. He returned to his former posts in the Valteline, where Colonel Papenheim (1) had commanded in his absence. 5. The Duke of Rohan succeeded the Marquis de Cœuvres, and could make no progress any more than he by reason of Serbellone's vigilance. 6. Serbellone being recalled to Milan upon more urgent business, left the command to Gualco colonel of horse. 7. The Duke of Rohan being informed of that change, advanced as far as Gravedone. 8. Serbellone was immediately sent back to stop him, and obliged him upon the news of his return to set fire to the palace of the Duke d'Alviti, and to retire for fear of engaging so brave a captain. The historian, having mentioned all these things, adds, that for an acknowledgment of all those services, Serbellone was made counsellor in the supreme council of Spain in July 1625. It is certain, that there are some falsities in this account. The Duke of Rohan did not command in the Valteline at that time. The Marquis de Cœuvres was there ever since France employed her forces there in 1624, till the execution of the treaty of peace in 1627. The Duke of Rohan was then busy enough in France, being engaged in the wars of religion. As for what concerns Serbellone's resistance, which was so great, according to Priorato, that the Marquis de Cœuvres could never get an inch of ground; I will not alledge against it, the histories which mention that Marquis's progress; for I might be answered, that Priorato does not mean the whole Valteline, but only a certain part of it, into which possibly, the French troops could not penetrate. But to speak the truth, this would be but a poor shift, and not much warranted by the author's expressions (2). I can convict him by his own words, of having confounded the time: And indeed, when he relates in another work (3) what happened in the Valteline, he places the Duke of Rohan's excursion to Gravedone in the year 1635. He is in the right as to that.

[B] He performed wonders at the battle of Nortlingen. He was posted upon a rising ground, which the council of war, held the day before the battle, VOL. V.

took to be of the greatest importance for the success of that great day. The Swedes had the same opinion of it, since they used their utmost endeavours to possess themselves of that post; but they were always vigorously repulsed by Serbellone. Therefore he had the satisfaction to hear the Cardinal Infant speak these words to him, in the presence of the King of Hungary; Conde, por Dios y vos tenemos la victoria (4). - - - God and you have given us the victory.

[C] He did great services . . . against the Duke of Rohan, in the Valteline. This belongs to the year 1635, and 1636. The author is in the right, with respect to that time, to say that the Duke of Rohan and Count Serbellone acted in the Valteline; But I doubt whether he gives a faithful account of what they did; for he supposes that there being three bodies of troops for France, the Duke of Rohan, who commanded one of those bodies, always endeavoured to join the two others, which might have proved very prejudicial to the Spaniards; but that the count prevented that junction. This is still false, if we depend upon the history of the Duke of Rohan (5). Therein we are told, that he had all his troops by him; but that he was so posted, that he had the Germans on one side, and the Spaniards on the other. Fernemont (6) commanded the Germans; Serbellone commanded the Spaniards. The Duke beat the Germans three times one after another; and then attacked Serbellone, who was advantageously intrenched at Morbeigne, and beat him. Of this Priorato says nothing at all. But it can hardly be doubted, considering that this history of the Duke of Rohan, especially what concerns the exploits in the Valteline, is all grounded upon memoirs, which seem to be very good. But what need we have recourse to memoirs. Does not Priorato in another book (7) mention the defeat of the Germans? And does not he say, that Serbellone was soundly beaten at Morbeigne? His own testimony is sufficient to confute whatever he says in his encomium upon Serbellone with respect to the Duke of Rohan. I must not forget what he says concerning Fernemont, viz. that he fell out with Serbellone, because he did not give him his due titles in a letter (8).

[D] He commanded the horse. Not that he commanded that army in chief; for it is certain he was under the Duke of Cardonna. It is true, the presence of that duke did not lessen his authority, as general of horse, during the siege of Leucate, for he was not there in person; and there was a French account, wherein to confute those who had given out that he had been killed in the field of battle, it was positively said, he had not been in the

(4) Priorato, ubi supra.

(5) Printed at Paris in 1666, and in Holland in 1667, in 12mo.

(6) Others call him Fernemont.

(7) Histor. delle Guerre di Ferdinando, &c.

(8) Ibid. lib. x., pag. m. 337.

(1) He who was killed at the battle of Lutzen.

(2) Governava il Conte Serbellone con tanta prudenza, e vigilanza tutti i Forti di QUELLE PARTI, che non quanti tentativi faceffe il Marchese di Cour Generali allhora di Francia IN QUELLE PARTI, non pote mai avanzar ne pure un palmo, tanto erano ben custoditi i detti posti.

(3) Histor. delle Guerre di Ferdinando, &c. lib. xii.

SERRONI. SERVILIA.

taking whereof would have made France very uneasy; but he was forced to raise the siege. He received many wounds as he was discharging the duties of a good general; and he was hardly recovered from his wounds, when he fell sick without any hopes of recovery. He died at Perpignan the twenty-first of February 1638. He had married Donna Luisa, daughter of the Marquis John Jerome Marin, descended from Thomas Marin Duke of Terranova. He had several children by her: the eldest was made Marquis de Romagnano by his Catholic Majesty (e).

(c) Ex Gualdo Priorato, Scena d'huomini illustri.

(g) Merc. Franco, Tom. xxi, pag. 503.

the battle, and that in imitation of the Catholic Kings, he was contented to be the spiritual and invisible head of that army, reserving to himself the title of General, but leaving the functions of that office to Serbellone (g).

Priorato does not express himself clearly enough: Any body would infer from his expressions (10), that the count had none above him but the court of Spain.

(10) Fu chiamato dal Re in Spagna, e fatto Maestro di Campo Generale dell'esercito di Catalogna. Nel passar d'Italia in quelle parti hebbe il commando sopra tutti i Generali e capi da guerra di quell'esercito. . . . benché prima del commando avesse fatta istanza per altri sei mila huomini, o almeno quattro, fu dal Conte Duca Privato del Re mantenuto con lettere affettuose in speranza grandi, ma non mai fuorcoro d'un solo fantacino. Scena d'huom. illustri.

SERRONI (HYACINTHUS) first Archbishop of Alby, lived in the XVIIth century. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (a), but correct two faults in it [A]. See also Moreri's Dictionary.

(a) For January 1687, p. 113.

[A] Correct two faults in it.] You will find in that book that this Prelate was born the third of August: it should be the thirtieth. You will find also there that the Bishop of Pamiers was his nephew; which is not true. The author should have said the Abbot de Camps, instead of that bishop. That abbot is a person of great learning, and merit, who has made a very fine collection of the most curious medals that can be found. This appears by the book, intitled, Seleciora Numismata in ere maximi moduli à Museo Illustriissimi D. D. Francisci de Campi, Abbatis S. Marcelli, & B. Mariae de Siniaco, concisus interpretationibus per D. Vaillant D. M. & Cenomanensium Ducis Antiquarium illustrata. It was printed at Paris in the year 1693, in 4to. Mr Vaillant, who is so famous for his great skill in medals, speaks of that abbot in the following manner at the beginning of that book. 'Nummos veteres ex omni materia, omnique modulo summa curâ multique sumptibus collegit undique multis ab hinc annis Illustriissimus ABBAS DE CAMPS, tam prospero successu, ut rei nummarie studiosis omnibus, Principibus etiam non paucis opulentior in eâ re tandem evaserit: hi siquidem nummos habent permultos, ille verò numismata maximi moduli mole, calaturâ, raritate, eximia, in quibus Imperatorum seriem, si paucos excipias, cernere licet, ut & res ab eis præclarè gestas, & quidquid in historiâ Romana legitur augustius. Ab amicis sæpe invitatus, ut quæ privatè studens, tùm utilitati, tùm voluptati sibi comparaverat, in publicum commodum transferret, annuit comiter votis amicorum, ipse tamen diversis negotiorum generibus implicatus ea in ære prius, prout extant in ipsis exemplaribus, accuratè incisa, explicanda mihi postmodum tradidit. . . . The most illustrious ABBOT DE CAMPS, with the greatest care, and at the greatest charge, many years ago, made a collection of ancient coins, of every matter and size, from all parts, so successfully, that at length he became more rich in this respect than all that were curious in coins, yea even than many princes: these, it is true, may have much money, but he has medals of greatest rarity for their size, engraving, and rarity, wherein it is to be seen the series of the emperors, their most noble achievements, and whatever else worthy of admiration is read in the Roman history. Being often desired by his friends to communicate to the public what he had purchased for his own particular use and pleasure, he consented, and being himself taken up with variety of business, after he had caused them to be engraved in brass, delivered them to me to be explained.' If you consult the Abbot de la Roque (1) in the extract of a dissertation of the Abbot de Camps upon a Greek medal (2) of Antoninus Caracalla, you will find the following words in it: 'The curious of Rome and France have taken great pains to explain it, and have been divided in their opinions about the truth and singularity of the games represented upon it. The Abbot de Camps, who has a greater skill in medals than one would think, considering his age, and his great occupations, is of opinion that it is a shew of Funambuli, or Rope-dancers: whereupon he proposes his conjectures full of wit, and of a profound learning (3). . . . Having thus explained, with great wit and learning, the true sense of the reverse of that medal, he examines why they are Funambuli on the reverse of a medal of Caracalla, and what reason moved the Cypziceniens to present them to him (4).' We are told elsewhere, that he had searched, with great care, the rarest manuscripts, we are told this, I say, on occasion of a Canon Burgalesis ex M. S. Codice vetustissimus, which is in his hands (5). 'This council was never before published by any. We are obliged for it to the Abbot de Camps, who making a diligent search into every thing that may illustrate the history of the suffragancy of Alby, which he is writing, has inserted it at length in that history. He took it out of a manuscript of councils and tracts of ancient Fathers, whose antiquities, &c (6).' It is not to be doubted that he undertook to write the history of the suffragancy of Alby on account of our Hyacinthus Serroni, with whom he was in great favour, but not his relation. In the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres I went upon a hearsay, which I believed to be true the more readily, because I had read (7) that the abbot had the honour to be related to that archbishop, which was the reason why I was mistaken in this particular. Whilst I mend that fault, I am glad it appears that notwithstanding my mistake, I ascribed nothing to the Abbot de Camps, but what the archbishop, his patron, thought him worthy of. This is the ground of my commentary upon this article.

(1) In the Journal des Savans, of the 29th of November 1677, pag. 309, Dutch Edition.

(2) Which represents on the reverse some spectacles and public games, very singular, and hitherto little understood. Id. ibid.

(3) Journal des Savans, of November 29, 1677, pag. 310.

(4) Ibid. p. 311.

(5) Journal des Savans, of the 20th of November 1679, pag. 317, Dutch Edition.

(6) We find in the Mercure Galant, for the month of May, 1678, pag. 105, Holland edition, an Elogium of the Abbot de Camps.

(7) In the Mercure Galant, ibid. pag. 106.

(a) Plat. in Catoe minore, init. p. 759.

(b) Id. ibid. pag. 760. See also Cicero in Bruto, pag. m. 354.

SERVILIA, sister by the mother's side to Cato Uticensis (a), was married, first to Marcus Junius Brutus, by whom she had Brutus, who murdered Julius Cæsar; and after to Decimus Julius Silanus (b), who was consul in the year of Rome 691. She did not behave her self like a virtuous woman; for she was not only Julius Cæsar's mistress, and improved that opportunity to enrich herself with the spoils of unhappy people; but besides, she prostituted one of her daughters to her lover [A]. Her brother Cato

[A] She was Julius Cæsar's mistress, and improved . . . to enrich herself. . . . but besides, she prostituted one of her daughters to her lover.] See the remark [A] in the article PORCIA, and the article CASSIUS (1), to which add these words of (1) Citation (1) Suetonius: 'Ante alias dilexit (Cæsar) M. Bruti matrem. Serviliam:

SERVILIA. SEVERUS.

123

Cato was very much surprised when they made him read a letter written by her [B]. She pretended to be descended from Servilius Ahala (c), who had killed Spurius Melius who had raised some factions at Rome in the year 316.

(c) Plut. in Brut. to, ibid. pag. 984.

(2) Sueton. in Cæsare, cap. 1.

• Serviliam : cui & proximo suo consulatu sexagies
• H. S. margaritam mercatus est : & bello civili super
• alias donationes, amplissima prædia ex auctionibus
• hæstæ minimo addidit. Cum quidem plerisque vili-
• tatem mirantibus, facetissime Cicero, Quo melius,
• inquit, emptum sciatis, Tertia deducta est : existima-
• batur enim Servilia, etiam filiam suam Tertiam Cæ-
• sari conciliare (2). - - - Above others Cæsar loved • Servilia, the mother of M. Brutus : for whom, in
• his next consulship he purchased a pearl for sixty sister-
• ces : and in the civil war he gave her large manors,
• which he purchased at an easy rate. When most people
• were admiring their cheapness, Cicero very wittily re• plied, Quo melius emptum sciatis, Tertia deducta est ;
• playing upon the ambiguity of the words, which may
• either signify, That you may the better understand
• how cheap they are, a third was abated, or she gave
• her own daughter (whose name was Tertia) to Cæ• sar's embraces.

(3) See the article BRUTUS (MARC JUVENIUS), in the text over against citation (f).

[B] Cato was very much surprised when they made him read a letter written by her. Plutarch having said that Julius Cæsar gave orders to prevent Brutus's being killed in the battle of Pharsalia (3), adds the following words : ' And this he is believed to have done out of a tenderness to Servilia, the mother of Brutus ;

for Cæsar had, it seems, in his youth, been very intimate with Servilia, and she passionately in love with him : and so far as Brutus was born about that time, in which their loves were at the highest, Cæsar believed that he was begot by him. There goes a report too, that when some great and weighty matters, concerning the conspiracy of Catiline, which had like to have been the destruction of the common-wealth, were debated in the senate ; Cato and Cæsar, tho' differing in their opinions, were placed near to one another. In the middle of the debate, a paper was brought to Cæsar, which he took and read to himself. Upon this Cato cried out aloud, and blamed Cæsar for holding correspondence, and receiving letters from the enemies of the common-wealth. Upon which several of the senate murmured. Wherefore Cæsar delivered the note, as he had received it, to Cato, who reading it, found it to be a leud love-letter from his own sister Servilia ; wherefore he threw it back again to Cæsar, with these words, Keep it to yourself, you fool. Which being done, he resumed his discourse, and went on to tell his opinion, as before ; so public and notorious was Servilia's love to Cæsar (4).

(4) Plut. in Brut. to, pag. 986. See also the same author in Cicerone minore, p. 770.

SERVILIA, sister to the foregoing, and wife of Lucullus, was yet more leud than she. See the remark [A] of the article of PORCIA. Lucullus, who had divorced Clodia, a woman dissolute to the last degree, and infamous for her incest with her brothers, was not much better for marrying Servilia ; for, except the incest, she was not in the least inferior to leud Clodia [A]. Her husband bore it as well as he could, out of respect to his brother-in-law (a) ; but at last he could bear his wife no longer, and divorced her.

(a) Cato Uticensis.

[A] Except the incest, she was not the least inferior to leud Clodia. Plutarch uses the most severe expressions that can be employed to signify a dissolute life. Τῆς δὲ Κλωδίας, ἀποπληγμένης ὡς ἀσελγούς καὶ πορνῆς, Σερβιλίαν ἐγήμεν, ἀδελφὴν Κάτωνος, ἡ δὲ τὸν εὐτυχῆ γάμον ἐν γὰρ ἡ προσὴν αὐτῇ τῶν Κλωδίας κακῶν μόνον, ἢ τῶν ἀδελφῶν διαβολῇ. τὰλλα δὲ βδελυγνὰ ὁμοίως ἔσαν καὶ ἀκόλαστον ἡναγκάζειν εἰρεῖν ἀδελφύμενον Κάτωνα. τίλθῃ δὲ ἀπέπειν. Repudiata autem Clodia, lasciva & improba muliere, Serviliam duxit Catonis sororem : quæ item nuptiæ parum faustæ fuere. Una enim carebat sola Clodii macularum infamia ex fratribus : cætera pariter flagitiosam & impudicam ut ferret Catonis reverentiâ vim intulit sibi. Postremò tolerare eam non valuit (1). - - - But having divorced Clodia, who was a most lascivious and wicked woman, he married Servilia the sister of Cato ; nor was this a happy marriage : for only one thing was wanting in her of the wickedness of Clodia, the criminal converse with her brothers. But otherwise being equally incontinent and flagitious, he bore with her out of regard to Cato. But at last put her away.

(1) Plutarch. in Lucullo, p. 517.

SEVERUS (CORNELIUS) a Latin Poet in Augustus's reign. I mention him only that I may correct some mistakes of la Popeliniere, Andreas Schottus, &c [A].

See

[A] Some mistakes of la Popeliniere, Andreas Schottus, &c.] La Popeliniere confounds that Poet with the Orator Caius Severus, for which he was censured by Vossius (1) ; but Vossius should not have quoted him in his Historia : he should have said in his Historia Historiarum, to prevent the ambiguity ; for the thing in question is to be found in the Histoire des Histoires (2), - - - history of histories, and not in the history of the civil wars : tho' one might easily suspect that la Popeliniere committed that mistake in this last book, since the modern Historians make sometimes digressions, or reflexions, which give them occasion to say what they know of antiquity. La Popeliniere is not exact in what he says of Cornelius Severus : he tells us that he had three different professions, that of an Historian, of a great Orator, and of an Epic Poet. The ancient writers represent him as a Poet, but they say nothing of his being an Historian or an Orator. It is true, some of his verses are to be found among the fragments taken from several pieces of Oratory (3) ; but he who collected all those fragments, says nothing whereby it appears, that Cornelius Severus made profession of Rhetoric, or the art of Oratory. Nevertheless this very thing, if I am not mistaken, led Crinitus into that error, and then la Popeliniere, who had it from him. Crinitus (4) gives it as a certain thing, that Cornelius Severus spent several years in making declamations, whilst Aulus Pollio, Pompeius Silo,

(1) Vossius de Histor. Latinis, pag. 109.

(2) Pag. 304.

(3) In Seneca the father, Suafior. ii, & vii.

(4) De Poët. Lat. cap. lvi.

Afelleius Fuscus, Sextilius Hena, Cæstius Pius, Porcius Latro, and Aufidius Bassus exercised the same profession. They are part of those mentioned by Seneca, who has collected their rhetorical flourishes. La Popeliniere names four of those declaimers with Cornelius Severus, going upon the same ground, viz. That Seneca has inserted some verses of that Cornelius in his Cento's.

Andreas Schottus, the Jesuit, is partly guilty of the same mistake, for in his tract De claris apud Senecam Rhetoribus, he mentions Cornelius Severus as one of them. Nay, he has committed a fault in the very beginning of his account of Severus, for he applies to him what ought only to be understood of Sextilius Hena, a Spanish Poet in Seneca. That Spanish Poet had made a poem, which began with this verse, Defendens Cicero est, Latineque silentia lingue.

Cornelius Severus gave a better turn to that thought by saying,

Abstulit una dies ævi decus, idæque lætæ Conticuit Latine tristis sacundia lingue.

Whereupon Seneca says he will not commend his countryman for having made a very good verse upon Cicero's death, since there was a much finer one, viz. that that of Cornelius Severus. On the contrary, Father Schottus makes him say, that he will not commend his country-man Cornelius-Severus, for having made, &c. since it had produced a much finer one, viz. that of Cornelius Severus: which would be odd, and is not the author's meaning. Besides, it is not true that Cornelius Severus was a Spaniard; nor has that Jesuit placed him in the catalogue of the ancient writers of his nation (5).

(c) At the word Severus. See Moreri's Dictionary (a), I shall also observe some of his mistakes [B].

(5) Bibliotheca Hispanica, Tom. ii.

(6) Vossius de Poëtis Latinis, pag. 33.

(7) That Scholiast quotes this verse, ad Sat. I. ver. 95.

(8) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. pag. 109.

Vossius, in one of his books (6) says, that the old scholiast upon Persius (7) quotes this verse of our Severus, Pinea frondosum murmurat Apennini; but in another book (8) he ascribes it to the ancient scholiast upon Horace, which is a mistake.

[B] See Moreri's Dictionary, I shall also observe some mistakes. I. Quintilian ought never to be quoted in French by the name of Fabius: It is an ambiguous and barbarous way of quoting him. II. The two Seneca's should not have been confounded. He, who wrote the Controversie is the father of the author of the letters to Lucilius; and yet Moreri quotes them as being one and the same person. III. Moreri should have quoted the lxxixth letter of Seneca, and not the lxxixth. IV. He should have quoted the Suaforia, and not the controversy of Seneca. V. He should have said Severus and not Severo, in the verse of Ovid quoted by him. VI. This quotation of Seneca, in Contr. sua 6. is faulty in three respects. He should have put a full stop after sua, and have quoted the viith Suaforia, and not the viith (9), and Contr. should have been left out. But this is requiring too many things of Moreri; he took little care to enquire whether there is any difference between Seneca's Controversie and Suaforia. But however that be, the reader, who shall believe him, will not doubt that one of Seneca's books is intitled, Controversie Suaforia; a mistake which may be easily known, by the bare looking into good editions.

(9) Vossius, de Poëtis Lat. pag. 33, quotes the viith.

S E V E R U S (SULPICIOUS) flourished towards the beginning of the Vth century.

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) He says that Phetadius, Bishop of Agen, was his bishop: which does not prove that he was born in that diocese.

(c) Possévin, Bibl. Select. Tom. i, pag. m. 202.

He was illustrious for his birth, and eloquence, and more still for his virtue [A]. After he had appeared with great lustre at the bar, he married very advantageously (a), and soon after lost his wife, whereupon he quitted the world and became a Priest [B]. It is certain he was a native of the province of Aquitain [C]; but it may be doubted whether he was born in the diocese of Agen (b). The first edition of his works is little known [D]. An account of his life may be seen in Moreri's Dictionary, and in Mr du Pin's Bibliothéque; and therefore I shall not dwell upon it.

He has been censured for some things by Possévin (c), but much less than Sigonius who commented upon him. Guibert, Abbot of Gemblours, is very much mistaken in saying, that after St Martin's death, our Sulpicius Severus was promoted to the bishopric of [A] He was illustrious for his birth . . . and more still for his virtue. Read these words of Gennadius, 'Vir genere & litteris nobilis, & paupertatis atque humilitatis amore conspicuus (1). . . A man illustrious by his birth and learning, and eminent for his love of poverty and humility.' But particularly read these verses of Paulinus, Bishop of Nola;

(1) Gennadius, de Scriptor. Eccl. cap. xix.

*Tessis adept docto mirabilis ore Severus,
Et tota Christum cordis virtute secutus
Insignis mundi titulus, sed clarior illa
Qua mundum tempesti sanctae virtute fidei,
Nobilitate potens, sed multo extensius idem Nobilior Christi cultu, quam sanguinis ortu (2).*

(2) Paulin. lib. v. de Vita Sancti Martini.

[B] And soon after lost his wife . . . whereupon he became a priest. This appears by a letter Paulinus writ to him. 'Tu frater dilectissime, ad Dominum miraculo majore conversus es, quia etate florentior, laudibus abundantior, oneribus patrimonii levior, substantia facultatum non egentior, & in ipso adhuc mundi theatro, id est fori celebritate diversans, & facundi nominis palmam tenens, repentino impetu discussisti fervile peccati jugum, & lethalia carnis & sanguinis vincula rupisti. Neque te divitiarum trimonio familiae consularis adgescit, neque post conjugium peccandi licentia, & coelebs juvenus ab angusto salutis introitu, & arduo itinere virtutis, in mollem illam & spaciosam multorum viam revocare potuerunt (3). . . But you, my dear brother, were more wonderfully converted to the Lord, inasmuch as amidst all the secular advantages of blooming youth and wealth, and eloquence, in pleading before the courts of justice, you suddenly threw off the slavish yoke of sin, and broke the deadly bonds of flesh and blood. Neither could youth, nor increase of riches, by marrying with a noble family, turn you from the strait and arduous path of virtue and salvation to the spacious and easy way of the multitude.'

(3) Idem, Epist. vii.

(4) Severus Prefbyter cognomento Sulpicius Aquitanice Provinciae Gennadius, ubi supra.

(5) Sulpit. Severus, de Vita S. Martini, lib. iii.

[C] It is certain he was a native of the province of Aquitain. Gennadius says so (4); but the thing is still more certain from these words of Sulpicius Severus: 'Sed dum cogito me hominem Gallum inter Aquitanos verba facturum, vereor ne offendat vestras nimium urbanas aures sermo rusticior (5). . . But when I consider that I a Gaul am to speak before the Aquitanians, I am afraid lest my unpolite language should offend

'your nicer ears.' This passage is taken from a dialogue, the interlocutors whereof are Posthumianus, Sulpicius Severus, and Gallus. Take notice of the compliment of this last; he tells the two other interlocutors, that he is afraid, being a Gaul, that his language will appear harsh and barbarous to the nice ears of the Aquitanians. He looks upon himself as a goose among swans (6). That modesty, that humility, was suited to the state of that time: the Aquitanians were then the flower, the ornament, and the glory, of all the Gauls, in matter of wit and eloquence. The best Poets, the best Rhetoricians, and the most excellent Orators of the Roman empire were to be found in Aquitain. I except the Greeks, and I speak only of those, who wrote in Latin. See the catalogue of illustrious Aquitanians, collected by Althea (7).

(6) Argutus inter strepere aures olores. Virgil. Eclog. IX, ver. 36.

[D] The first edition . . . is little known. The abbreviators of Gesner, Father Labbe, Dr Cave, Mr du Pin, &c. who mention so many editions of that author, say nothing of the first. It was published by Matthias Flacius Illyricus, who put to it only the first letters of his name; which was the reason why a Catholic writer bestowed those praises upon him, of which he afterwards repented, when he came to know that he was a Lutheran. This I find in a satirical piece of Father Vavasseur against Bishop Godeau. 'Isto ferme pacto, says he (8), quamvis minus turpiter, utpote unus ac privatus, atque in causa leviori, clarissimus se scriptor deceptum sensit, & doluit. Cum enim mirificis laudibus extulisset eum, qui prius perelegantes Sulpitii Severi libros edidisset in lucem, neque thesaurum hunc, quem teneret solus, invidisset diutius literatis ac doctis; eumque cum propter tantum beneficium, tum maxime modestie nomine suspiceret, quod celasset nomen, literas modo, M. & F. adscripisset: intellectum est posterius, Matthiam Flaccium esse ejusmodi, hominem non solum non modestum, qui hoc modestiae causa non fecisset, sed etiam impurum & nequam haereticum, qui in centurias Magdeburgenses multa de suo, non tacito nomine, contulisset. Ut dictum nollet posterius laudator, & eum bonae, sed falsae de altero opinionis, & ridiculae credulitatis suae poeniteret. . . Much after the same manner, though less shamefully, as being only a single and private person, and in a smaller matter, a very famous writer found himself mistaken, and was vexed at his mistake. For having

(7) Ant. Dabnus Althea, Rerum Aquitanicarum Libri quinque.

(8) Paulus Romanus Candido Helychio, Antonius Godelius Episcopus Grassensis, an Elogii Aureliani Scriptor idoneus, p. 33.

of Beziers, notwithstanding his reluctance to it. It is certain he rose no higher than to the degree of priesthood. There has indeed been one Sulpicius among the bishops of Beziers; but that bishop was raised to that see one hundred and ninety years after St Martin's death (d).

(d) Ex Altierris, Rerum Aquitanic. lib. v, cap. viii, pag. 336.

' mightily extolled the man who had first published the ' most elegant works of Sulpicius Severus, and had no ' longer detained from the studios and learned, this ' treasure which he had alone possessed, and having great' ly esteemed him, both for so great a benefit, but chiefly ' on account of his modesty in concealing his name, and ' putting only two letters M and F; he afterwards un' derstood that Matthias Flaccius was the person, a man
' not only immodest, but likewise a foul mouthed and

' wicked heretic, who had put into the Centurie Mag-
' deburges many things of his own, without suppressing
' his name. So that he wished his preposterous praises
' had not been given, and repented of his good but false
' opinion, and of his ridiculous credulity.'

The largest Commentary we have upon our Severus's Historia sacra, is that of Christian Schotanus, printed in folio at Franeker, 1664.

S F O R Z A, an illustrious family, derives its original from a peasant of Cotignola (a), who became one of the chiefest and most valiant captains of his age: his name was Giacomuzzo [A]; but according to the custom of the peasants of those parts, the two first syllables of his name were left out, and he was only called Muzzo. He left the plough and lifted himself, and quickly got the reputation of a resolute soldier. He spoke of nothing but of devastations and ransackings, and would get by force whatever he had a mind to. Which was the reason why he was surnamed Sforza (b), which became afterwards the proper name of the family descended from him (c). I must not forget that he was also surnamed Attendolo (d). See the first remark of this article. The famous Braccio was his fellow-soldier, under the General Alberic de Barbiano. At first they loved one another, as if they had been brothers; but their emulation or jealousy, which arose insensibly in their familiar conversation, turned at last into enmity. From that time they always embraced contrary parties, so that when one of them was made general of the troops of any prince or any republic, the other had the like employment in the state that

(c) Collenuccio, Hist. Neap. lib. v, pag. m. 409, says that Queen Joan ordered it so. Voluit ut in illius memoriam omnibus deinde qui illo genere nascerentur, Sfortie cognomen inderetur.

[A] A peasant of Cotignola . . . his name was Giacomuzzo. That name is made up of two christian names, James Muzzo contracted into one: His surname was Attendolo. It is not agreed on all hands that he was a peasant's son: Sanovino says he was the grandson of a gentleman called John Attendolo, father of Michelin, a captain in the service of the Republic of Venice. He adds, that Michelin the father of our Sforza, married Polyxena de Sanseverino, and that he had two sisters, one of which was the wife of Ugolin Count de Centona, and the other was married to Martin Caraccioli Count de Santangelo, brother to the great Marshal of Naples (1). We read in Paulus Jovius, that Sforza was a man of a good family, bonesta familia (2). But Leandro Alberti going upon the testimony of a writer, a native of Cotignola (3), says that Giacomuzzo was a peasant, and actually digging the ground, when he began to consider whether he should list himself, as some of his companions advised him. He flung his spade upon a tree, and said he would be a soldier if it lodged there. It staid on the tree, and he lifted himself. Muzzo lavorando la terra con la zappa indotto da alcuni compagni, la gittò sopra un albero, promettendogli, che se la rimaneva sopra quello, d'andar con loro alla guerra, la qual vi rimase, & così andò con loro, come dinota Pietro M. Caranto con molti altri scrittori (4). The same author observes (5), that some writers, to ingratiate themselves with the Sforzas, pretended that neither Giacomuzzo nor Muzzo was the true name of that man; but that he was called Mutio, and was descended from Mutius Scævola; and they deny the whole story of the spade. These were flatterers, who had a mind to gain the favour of Giacomuzzo's posterity. This is what Leandro Alberti says. Aurunga che alcuni cercando di acquistar gratia, scrivono altrimenti (6). I do not know whether I am mistaken, but I imagine that some flatterers, even in the life-time of our Sforza, extolled his birth, and denied what was the common report; for tho' it be infinitely more glorious to be raised to a great fortune by noble exploits, notwithstanding the meanness of extraction, than to attain by the same means to the highest dignities with the help of a noble birth; yet most people are unwilling to be upbraided with the obscurity of their original. Most of those, who raise themselves from the lowest to the highest degree, are at last more willing not to be accounted ignoble, than to be looked upon as men, who have overcome by their personal merit the obstacles of a mean extraction (7). They are very glad when they are said to be descended from very illustrious ancestors, and when care is taken to make every body forget the mean condition they were born in. They are seldom of Agathocles's mind, who being made king, would be served at a table not only in plate, but also in earthen-ware, to let every body know that he was a porter's son (8).

VOL. V.

*Fama est filiislibus cernasse Agathoclea regem, Atque abacum Samio sepe ontrasse luto,
Fercula gemmatis quam poneret borrida vasis,
Et miseret opes pauperumque simul.
Quarenti causam, respondit: Rex ego qui sum Sicanie, fignlo sam genitore satus* (9).

He pretended with good reason to heighten his glory, by shewing that he was the artificer of his own fortune. There are some Panegyrist in our days, who acknowledging on one hand, that their hero was a man of a most noble extraction; observe, on the other, that this lustre of his family did not contribute to his high preferments. So true it is, that the recommendation of relations is thought to weaken the proofs of the merit of those who are raised by that means. Here follows a passage of the funeral oration of Francis de Harlay Archbishop of Paris (10). 'Such noble talents could not be buried in obscurity, and there was no occasion to ask, how came he that was born so great to arrive at greatness. He was not beholden to favour for his elevation. His family, though never so noble, and so much respected, was not then in the happy circumstances of those houses, wherein the star of living fathers sends down favourable influences upon children; wherein children, born with merit, have the advantage of discovering it sooner than others, and of being more worthily rewarded for it; and wherein those, who are less favoured by nature than fortune, need only have a good conduct to receive the favours, which the credit of their families cannot fail to procure to them. But the successive preferments of the person we speak of, were not owing to such fortunate anticipations. Being more animated by the example of his relations to deserve dignities, than helped by their interest to attain to them; he must himself have been the author of his fortune.' However it be, I fancy Giacomuzzo was not much inclined to imitate Agathocles, and

(7) Compare this with what is said in the remark [A] of the article A. M I O T.

(8) Plut. in Agathoclem. pag. 176.

(9) Ausonius, Epigr. VIII, pag. m. 9.

(10) Delivered in the Metropolitan church of Paris, by Father Gailard a Jesuit, the 23d of November 1695. See pag. 16, 17, of the Dutch edition.

(a) A small town of Romagna between Imola and Faenza.

(b) Some say that Alberic de Barbiano gave it him, after he had seen him boldly revenge an injury that was done him.

(d) Taken from Leandro Alberti, Descrizione di tutta Italia, fol. 317, verso & 318, Venice edition 1561, in 4to.

(1) Taken from Francesco Sanovino dell' origine delle Caste illustri d'Italia, fol. m. 10, verso & 11.

(2) Jovius, Elog. viror. bellica virtute illustrium, lib. ii, pag. m. 192.

(3) Pietro M. Caranto.

(4) Leandro Alberti, Descrizione di tutta Italia, fol. m. 318.

(5) Id. ibid. fol. 317, verso.

(6) Id. ibid. fol. 318.

(c) Taken from Paul Jovius in Elogiis Virorum
bellica virtute illustrium, lib. ii,
pag. m. 152, &
seq.

(f) Taken from Leandro Alberti,
ubi supra.

(g) See the remark [E].

(11) See the remark [A] in the article TOUCHE.

(12) Paulus Jo-
vius, ubi supra,
pag. 192, 193.

(13) Compare what is said in remark [B] of the article CESAR, between citat. (13) and (14), and the remark of the article GON-TAUT (AR-MAND DE).

(14) Pandulphus Collenucius Histor. Neapolit.
lib. v, pag. 408.
Edit. Latinae Dordrac, 1618,
in 8vo.

(15) It is in the Mercurius Galenus, for November 1678, page 164, of the Dutch edition.

(16) Taken from Sanlovinio, ubi
supra.

(17) See the Mercurius Galant for November 1678, pag. 164, in the genealogical table.

(18) Ibid. pag.
165.

(19) Not his lawful but his natural son, as Leandro Alberti observes, Descrit. d'Italia, folio 318, verso.

(20) Taken from Sanfouino, ubi
supra.

chief heir of his valour (b) and fortune. He had him by a woman of pleasure, who followed the army (i); her name was Lucia Terzana (k).

- (b) This must not be understood, as if none of the rest had been warriors. Varillas, who says, ubi infra, that none of them had a martial inclination, is mistaken. (i) Varillas, Hist. de Louis XI. liv. ii, pag. 134. Dutch edition.
 (k) See the Genealogical table of the house of Sforza, p. 164, of the Mercur Galant for November 1678, Dutch edition.

(21) Paulus Jovius, ubi supra, pag. 192.

frugi disciplina, convictu subitario & planè militari, contemptuque prorsus omnis luxuriæ lætabatur; utpote qui valida potius quam decora arma, proceros & peracres generosæ sobolis equos, vir equitandi peritissimus, vera imperatoris dignitatis instrumenta esse putaret, nec quicquam ad inanem speciem exquisiti ornatus ostentare consueisset (21). - - - In Braccio, the lively force of a crafty and prevailing wit was conspicuous; but in Sfortia simplicity of nature, without craft, without learning, a constant and undaunted vigour, of an open mind, especially being joined to a robust body fitted for the fatigues of war. Braccio, being of a more delicate habit of body, took great pleasure in living splendidly, and in sumptuous provisions of all sorts, being profuse and covetous, even to injustice, of what was the property of others. On the contrary, Sfortia, being unacquainted with nice living, and frugal, was pleased with easily provided military fare, utterly despising all luxury, for he judged strong rather than beautiful armour, tall and bigg mettled horses of a generous breed, to be the proper furniture of martial dignity; nor had he ever used exquisite ornament for an empty show. Perhaps, some will think that Sforza's plain way, and his aversion for luxury, may be alledged to shew the falsity of the slanderous reports that have been spread of his and the Queen of Naples amours; but this would be an ill-grounded imagination, since it is otherwise certain he loved women, and was of signal strength of body, which was no small bait for that prince's (22). She loaded him with favours. 'Cossui . . . fondò la grandezza della sua famiglia, non solamente col nome, chiamandola Sforza, mai col Stato; perciocché fatto Generale de gli esserciti di Giovanna 2. Regina di Napoli, con laquale si dice, che hebbe da fare, hebbe in dono da lei, Benevento, Manfredonia, Baroli, & Trani con più di 20, castella (23). - - - Being made general of the army of Joan II, Queen of Naples, with whom he is said to have had an amorous correspondence, he was presented by her with Benevento, Manfredonia, Baroli, and Trani, and more than twenty castles. See the Margin (24).

(22) See the remark [I] of the article NAPLES (JOAN II, QUEEN OF.)

(23) Sanfivino, ubi supra.

(24) We read in pag. 38, of the Ritratti & Elogii, di Capitani illustri, edition of Rome, 1646, that after he had overcome near Aquila, the troops of Antognaccio and of James Caldora, and then made Caldora and the Count de Monte Riso prisoners, and forced several barons to take an oath to Queen Joan, she made him High Constable of the kingdom.

S F O R Z A (FRANCIS) natural son of Giacomuzzo Attendolo, who is the subject of the foregoing article, made still a more splendid fortune than his father. He was created Count of Tricarico at thirteen years of age, by Ladislaus King of Naples (a), and was early accounted a great warrior. He defeated the troops commanded by Braccio, which disputed the passage of the Pescara (b): but that advantage proved of no use to him; for his father having been drowned in that river, the design of raising the siege of Aquila was laid aside. Francis Sforza was then but twenty-three years of age (c). He was confirmed by Queen Joan in all the dignities, and in the possession of all the lands she had bestowed upon Giacomuzzo, and he received orders from that prince to make himself ready for the siege of Naples. He very much contributed to the reduction of that town (d), and then to the victory obtained near Aquila over the troops of Braccio, the second of June 1425 (e). Pope Martin V sent him against Nicolas Trincio, Lord of Foligno, and he forced him to accept of a peace upon the conditions he proposed to him. Afterwards he served the Duke of Milan both against the Florentines and the Venetians, and signalized himself on several occasions (f). He did also many services to Queen Joan; and when she died, which happened in 1435, he applied himself, to Renatus d'Anjou, whom she had made her heir. That prince was unhappy, and obliged to yield to his ill fortune. But Sforza, who had no less industry than courage, never wanted means to support himself. He made himself master of several places in the March of Ancona, and even usurped some states belonging to the Church. Whereupon he was excommunicated by Pope Eugenius IV (g) [A], who, not satisfied to have struck him with the spiritual thunder-bolt, had recourse to temporal arms and confederacies, whereby Francis Sforza lost the March of Ancona in 1444 (h). He quickly recovered himself by gaining a battle, in which the son of Picenini and Cardinal de Fermo, the Pope's legate, were taken prisoners (i). I should be too long, if I was to give a particular account of all the wars wherein he was engaged; and therefore I shall only say, that by the treaty of peace concluded the twenty-second of November 1441, it was agreed that he should marry the natural daughter of the Duke of Milan (k). Accordingly he married her, which made way for a great fortune; for he became Duke of Milan after the death of his father-in-law [B]. That succession did belong to a prince of the house of France (l), and yet it fell to Francis Sforza, who was favoured therein by Lewis XI (m). He possessed this state till he died, and governed it with great moderation, and was accounted one of the greatest princes of Italy. It has been said of him

(a) Collenucius, Hist. Neapol. lib. v, pag. m. 409, Mr Varillas, Histoire de Louis XI, liv. ii, p. 134, says he was only 20.

(d) It was subdued for the queen in January 1425.

(e) Ex eodem Collenuc. ibid. pag. 409, 410.

(f) See the book intitled Ritratti & Elogii di Capitani illustri, pag. 131, edition of Rome 1646.

(g) Spondanus, ad ann. 1442, num. 11.

(h) Vianoli, Historia Veneta, Tom. i, pag. 598.

(i) Id. ibid. pag. 599.

(k) Id. ibid. pag. 590.

(l) See Varillas, Hist. de Louis XI, book ii.

(m) Id. ibid.

bim

[A] Whereupon he was excommunicated by Pope Eugenius IV. This was a great alteration; for the same Pope had given him formerly the keeping of the March of Ancona, the dignity of Gonfaloniere of the Church, and a commission to make war against Nicolas Fortebraccio, who had seized upon several places in the Ecclesiastical State. Sforza did very well discharge that commission, and defeated the troops of Fortebraccio at Tivoli. Note, that afterwards this Pope, the Venetians, and the Florentines, gave him the command of their troops, when they declared war against the Duke of Milan (1).

[B] He became Duke of Milan after the death of his father-in-law. Philip Maria Visconti, who possessed that duchy, died in the month of August 1447, leaving no other child behind him, but a natural daughter married to Francis Sforza. Many laid a claim to that succession. The Emperor Frederic III maintained that this duchy was devolved to the empire, since the last duke had left no lawful issue. Alfonso, King of Naples,

(1) Taken from the Ritratti & Elogii di Capitani illustri, pag. 131, 132, edition of Rome 1646.

(*) Varillas, ibid.
pag. 140.

him that no usurper was ever a better sovereign (8). He was certainly endowed with several good qualities, and though he had never studied, yet he promoted learning, and spoke with as much eloquence as an Orator [C], and argued about political affairs with a wonderful strength of wit and judgment. The animosity wherewith he went about to destroy the whole faction of Braccio, was thought to be excessive [D]. He died the eighth

(2) See Spondanus's Annals.
ad ann. 1447.
num. 7.

(3) Leand. Albertus, Descript.
Italicae, pag. 678,
Edit. Latinae
1657, in folio.

(4) Vianoli, Histor.
Veneta,
Tom. i. p. 604.

(5) Ben convenendosi la spada che quella mano
che vuole scettro.
Vianoli, ubi supra.

(6) Id. ibid. pag.
605, 606.

(7) Id. ibid. pag.
606.

(8) Id. ibid. pag.
607.

(9) Vianoli, says
1449.

(10) Id. ibid.
pag. 613, 614.

Naples, alleged the last will of that duke, who had made him his heir. The Duke of Orleans alleged his being related to him, for he was the son of Valentin, sister to that duke. Francis Sforza grounded his pretension upon the duke's adoption, to which he added the right of his wife (2). During those contentions, the Milanese thought they had a favourable opportunity to erect themselves into a Republic. Wherefore they elected twelve magistrates, whom they called the conservators of liberty (3), and tore the last will of the late duke, and gave the command of the troops to Francis Sforza, to continue the war with the Venetians (4). This last point of their conduct was very impolitic, and inconsistent with their design of establishing a republican government. They were not sensible that there is nothing more favourable to those, who have a mind to sway a scepter, than to put the sword into their hands (5). That captain-general of the Milanese gained great advantages over the Republic of Venice. His reputation was more and more increased by it; and doubtless it was the reason why the Milanese deprived him of new occasions of signaling himself: they divided his army, and lessened his entourage. He understood the meaning of it, and found it expedient which did very much favour his ambition. He made a proposal of peace to the Republic of Venice. 'Doppo questi avvenimenti mostrò inclinazione lo Sforza a reconciliarsi coi Veneti; mosso a ciò principalmente dai trattamenti che riceveva dai Milanesi troppo aspri; e come di gelosi della di lui potenza ingrati, e spiacevoli, mentre con la divisione delle sue genti, e con lo scemamento dell' esercito gli andavano tarpando l'ali per impedirgli il volo alla Ducale altezza; onde fu spedito da esso a Venetia Clemente Tealdino Secretario, che si trovava prigioniero con Almorò Donato nella Rocca di Cremona a proporre la trattazione della pace (6). . . . After these events, Sforza appeared inclined to make his peace with the Venetians, being chiefly induced to it by the harsh usage he met with from the Milanese, who being jealous of his power, and afterwards ungrateful to him and dissatisfied with him, endeavoured, by dividing his troops and reducing his army, to stop him in his progress to the ducal honour. Whereupon he dispatched to Venice the secretary Clemente Tealdino, who was then prisoner in the castle of Cremona with Almorò Donato, to propose a treaty of peace.' His proposals were approved of, and a treaty was concluded, whereby the Republic engaged to assist him with men and money, in order to make himself master of the town and duchy of Milan; and it was agreed upon, that all the conquests, as far as the river Adda, should belong to the Republic of Venice (7). As soon as the Duke of Savoy heard of that confederacy, he resolved to assist the Milanese, but the troops he sent them were cut to pieces by Francis Sforza before they joined those of Milan; and then he made it his business to strengthen that great city (8). The Venetians being apprehensive that he would subdue it, broke with him, and confederated with the Milanese. Nevertheless he pursued his point; he made an agreement with the Duke of Savoy, and confirmed the alliance between him and the Florentines. He hindered the Venetians from succouring Milan: a famine, and the divisions of the Milanese, and their spite against the Venetians, brought that great affair to an end; they submitted to him, and received him into their town the twenty-sixth of February, 1450 (9), and acknowledged him for their duke (10). Thus the measures that city and several other neighbouring towns had taken to set themselves at liberty, after the death of Philip Maria Visconti, vanished into smoke. Spondanus rightly observes, that many towns in Italy fell at that time into slavery, because they were too fond of avoiding it; for several factions starting up, they were sometimes for one form of government, and sometimes for another; and when one of the factions was uppermost, they cruelly treated the contrary party. Was not this making way for slavery? Mediolanenses servandæ per se libertatis impotentes erant; & ut in his fieri mos erat civitatum Italianarum, illam tueri quærentes, mutuis dissensionibus, ac diversis regiminis mutationibus, crudelitibusque facili-(11) Spondanus, ad ann. 1449, num. 7, p. m. 9.

diversis regiminis mutationibus, crudelitibusque facili-tatem servituti viam sternerant (11). That annalist observes, that the populace of Milan killed the Venetian ambassador, having mutinied, because the succours promised by the Republic had not entered the town; and he adds, that the Venetians did cunningly put off the relief of it, in hopes to oblige the Milanese to submit to their domination (12).

(12) Id. ibid.
[C] He was endowed with many good qualities, and tho' he had never studied, yet he promoted learning, and spoke with as much eloquence as an Orator.] He expressed, upon several occasions, his great grief for his want of learning: his liberality towards learned men proceeded from his great desire that they should write his actions, and immortalize his name. He took care to procure that honour to his father, by the pen of a famous writer; but his own Historian was more famous still, and went about that work with an extreme diligence. I mean John Simoneta, who wrote the history of Francis Sforza in thirty-one books, and declares he advances nothing but what he had seen, or was very sure of. His work was printed at Milan in 1479, and reaches from the year 1424, to 1466 (13). Here follows a passage of Paul Jovius, which proves the text of this remark. 'In hunc hominem præter invictum corporis atque animi robur, summa etiam dona, quæ tribui poterant, natura contulerat personæ scilicet dignitatem eximiam; os probum, & in omni conspectu aspectum sine superbia suis pariter atque hostibus venerabilem, sic, ut cuncti in eo sæpius concionante facundiam absoluto oratore parem admirarentur, eoque plenius, quod nullas attigisset literas; & nihilo fecius in omni civili militarique negotio, efficacia prudentiæ, diviniq; iudicii vim expediam; & incredibilem afferret. Sed literarum decus, quum sese ejus expertem ingenuo pudore sæpe dolens fatetur, liberalissimè tuebatur. Justæ siquidem & veræ laudis, quæ viventi ornameto esset, & transiret ad posterum, erat avidissimus. A Joanne Simoneta namque insigni historico, & à Philopho poeta percelebri res suas bello paceque gestas perscribi celebrariq; jubebat, sicuti etiam patris vitam Leodori Cribellus ejus jussu antea perscripserat (14). . . . Upon this man, besides an invincible strength of body and mind, nature had bestowed all manner of gifts; namely, a singular dignity of personage; an excellent feature, and, on all occasions, an aspect without pride, respected by friends as well as enemies, so that all admired the eloquence of his frequent speeches equal to that of a complete Orator, and so much the more, as being unlearned; yet nevertheless in all civil and military affairs, he exerted a ready and wonderful strength of a prevailing prudence and a sublime judgment. But he would often acknowledge, ingenuously and with regret, his want of learning, of which he was a very liberal encourager. He was most desirous of a justly deserved praise, which might be his ornament whilst alive, and after pass to his posterity. He ordered his transactions in war and peace to be recorded, and published by John Simoneta, an eminent Historian, and by Philiphus, a very famous Poet, in like manner as Cribellus, by his command also, had written the life of his father.' He had been saying that Francis Sforza governed the Milanese for the space of sixteen years, with so much wisdom, justice, and mildness, and kept himself so free from all manner of vice (15), that he was accounted the best prince of that time. But Naucerius says, that the love of women made him commit some injustices in his old age (16).

[D] The animosity, wherewith he went about to destroy the whole faction of Braccio was thought to be excessive.] He had subdued it, but being afraid that the son of Piccinus might revive it again, he resolved to destroy him; and the better to succeed in it, he pretended to love him, and married him to one of his daughters. Afterwards he delivered him to Ferdinand, King of Naples, who, contrary to his word given, and all the rights of hospitality, caused him to be beheaded in prison.

eight of March 1466, aged sixty-five years (v). He left fifteen children behind him, some lawfully begotten, and others not; but his posterity was wholly extinct in 1535 [E]. The condition, which he required in treating of the marriage of his son with the daughter of the Marquis of Mantua, has something singular in it [F]: I shall make a remark prison. This was an horrid crime: Paul Jovius condemns it in very strong words. Fuere qui ei (Francisco Sfortia) inexorabilis odii notam inurerent, quod persequende Bracciae factionis nunquam oblitus, Jacobum Piccinini filium summæ spei ducem, sub quo Bracciana arma reflorescere posse viderentur, nequaquam syn-cera fide in generum asseruerit; scilicet ut eo vinculo pignore deceptum, ad terribilissimam necem Ferdinando Neapolitano regi praderet. Ab eo enim rege contra fidem refricata veterum offensarum memoria, vir impiger in carcere per Ebtisepum servum averfa securi mactatus est, singulari quidem cum infamia tantorum principum, qui vindictæ libidinem sacrosanctæ fidei & hospitalis mensæ reli-gione prætulissent (17).

(v) Spondanus, ad ann. 1466, numb. 6, pag. m. 109.

(17) Jovius, in Elog. Virorum bellica virtute illustrium, lib. iii, pag. 222, 223.

(18) Sanfivino, dell' orig. delle Case illustri d'Italia, folio ii, verso.

(19) Id. ibid.

(20) In the article LAMPO-NIANO.

(21) In the article ARAGON.
(Isabella of)

(22) Leand. Albertus, in Descript. Italie, pag. 680.

(23) Taken from Leander Albertus, ubi supra,

(24) Above, remark [C] of the article ARETIN (Francis).

[E] He left fifteen children (18) behind him, some lawfully begotten, and others not; but his posterity was . . . extinct in 1535.] His first wife was Polyxena Ruffa, whose dowry made him lord of three towns and above twenty castles. His second wife, as has been said above, was the only daughter of the Duke of Milan. The son who succeeded him was called JOHN GALEAZZO MARIA SFORZA (19). I have laid in another place (20) how he was killed. His son JOHN GALEAZZO SFORZA, who succeeded him, was then but four years of age, and LUDOVIC SFORZA his uncle, son of Francis, took care of his education. You may see in another place (21), how he perished in the year 1494. His son was excluded from the succession by the intrigues of Ludovic Sforza, who got himself declared Duke of Milan, and thereby obtained the imperial investiture, which his predecessors could never obtain: that investiture extended to natural children, in case the lawful issue should fail. Is postquam à Maximiliano Imperatore novi principatus auctoritatem obtinisset, magna cum solemnitate totiusque civitatis gratulatione Ducatus insignia cepit, die qui D. Theodoro martyri festus habetur, anno à C. N. mccccxcv. Primus ex Sfortia gente Mediolanensis Ducatus titulum ac dignitatem jure nactus est, quoniam anteriores auctoritatem principatus ab Sacro Imperio Romano battenus imperare non potuerant. Fuit autem in formula Ludovici non solum de filiis iustis ut invicem sibi succedendi jus haberent, comprehendendum, sed etiam de nobis, uti ego vidi, si iustos non extare contingeret (22). He was deprived of his states in the year 1499, by Lewis XII King of France, grandson to Valentina Visconti, daughter of John Galeazzo, Duke of Milan. He raised some troops in Switzerland, and the year following returned into the Milanese, and recovered most places of that duchy; but the Swiss delivered him to the French, and from that day till his death, which happened in the year 1508, he was kept in prison. Lewis XII possessed the Milanese for some years following; but lost it in 1512, and MAXIMILIAN SFORZA Ludovic's son, recovered it. He could not keep it after the victory which Francis I. obtained over the Swiss in the year 1515, at the battle of Marignan, and was forced to surrender himself. He was sent into France, where he died. FRANCIS SFORZA, his brother, was established in 1522, Duke of Milan, by the power of a league, which had overcome the French. He did not enjoy that state quietly, nor without interruption, being sometimes expelled by the French, and then restored by Charles V, and sometimes also ill used by that emperor, who at last admitted him into his favour in the year 1530. From that time he peaceably enjoyed his states till the year 1535, in which he died. He was the last of all those who descended from Francis Sforza, first of that name (23). Charles V then possessed himself of the Milanese, and he invested his son, Philip II, with it the twelfth of December 1549. The terms of the investiture take in Philip II and all his posterity, both males and females for ever, according to the order observed in the hereditary successions of states, that may fall to women.

[F] The condition which he required in treating of the marriage of his son to the daughter of the Marquis of Mantua, has something singular in it. I have laid in another place (24), that according to the agreement between him and Lewis Gonzaga, Marquis of Mantua, his son Galeazzo was to marry Dorothy, that

Marquis's daughter, provided it should appear that she had no crooked back, nor any other imperfection in her body, at fourteen years of age. By virtue of that agreement, he sent some Physicians to inspect the naked body of Dorothy; but the Marquis would not suffer it. A very learned Civilian being consulted about that question, maintained, that Francis Sforza was in the right. Many people were surprized at the answer of that advocate. Read the following passage of Camerarius in his historical meditations. 'Many wonder how Franciscus Aretinus, a famous Civilian, undertook to prove that Francis Sforza Duke of Milan, was in the right to require that Dorothy daughter of Ludovic Marquis of Mantua, contracted to Galeazzo the son of that duke, should be viewed naked by some Physicians he had sent for that purpose, to know whether there was any deformity in her body: That on the contrary, the Marquis was in the wrong to refuse such an inspection, offering only to shew them his daughter dressed in the petticoat, which Galeazzo had sent her (25).' Camerarius has read this particular in a book of Tiraquellus, whom he quotes. I shall set down Tiraquellus's own words, whereby it will appear that Philip Decius, a famous Civilian, approved the opinion of the Advocate Aretinus. 'Proinde non recte fortassis plerisque videbitur consuluisset vir aliquo doctissimus autorque gravissimus Fran. Are. conf. 142. ex facto proponitur quod illustri in tertio, & iterum in quarto dubio ejusdem conf. cum omnibus nervis contendit probare Franciscum Sfortiam Ducem Mediolani jure petiisse, ut Dorothea filia Ludovici Marchionis Mantuæ Galeatio ipsius Ducis filio desponsata, nuda à quibuscumque Medicis à se missis conspiceretur, ut hinc detegeretur, si qua puellæ esset deformitas: contra Ludovicum hoc ipsum injuria recusasse, sed tantum filiam obtulisse videndam, Cotta (sic enim appellat) quam ad eam Galeatius ipse miserat, cooperatam. Cujus tamen consilium probat Philip. Dec. in d. ca. proposuisti in 2. notab. An tamen bene uterque senserit, aliorum sit judicium (26). - - - Wherefore it will possibly be thought, that a right advice was not given by the Counsellor Francis Aretin, otherwise a most learned person and grave author, in maintaining that Francis Sforza, Duke of Milan, was in the right to demand, that Dorothea daughter of Lewis Marquis of Mantua, betrothed to Galeazzo the Duke's son, should be viewed naked by some Physicians sent on purpose, to see if there was any defect in her. On the other hand, that Lewis was in the wrong to refuse it, and only to offer his daughter to be seen in a petticoat, which Galeazzo himself had sent. Whose advice was notwithstanding approved by Philippus Decius. But whether they both were in the right, or not, let others judge.' You see that Tiraquellus durst not decide whether those two Civilians were in the right; and yet he comments in that very place upon a law, which he reduced to these terms, Let the betrothed couple discover their deformities one to another; however, let them not strip themselves stark naked, and particularly let the woman forbear doing it. Suam quisque deformitatem futuro marito, aut uxori detegito. Ne tamen se propterea, præsertim scemina, nudato (27). He had been saying, that if women have any bodily imperfection, that is not known, they ought to acquaint with it those whom they are to marry, verbally only, but not by shewing it. (28) Illud sceminas ipsas monemus, ut si qua in eis sit occulta deformitas, ei certe cui habere velint, non re quidem, id est corporis nudatione, sed verbis adaperiant, propter eam maxime rationem (29) quæ à nobis dicta est cum de viris in bujus capitis initio loqueremur. It seems therefore, that to avoid contradicting himself, he should have altogether condemned the opinion of the Civilian Franciscus Aretinus. It may be answered in his vindication, that there are some particular cases, or special agreements which dispense with the law, and that therefore he would not interpose his judgment about the conduct of Francis Sforza, and the Marquis of Mantua. He might have thought that there were some circum-

(25) Camerarius, Mediat. Historiques, Tom. i, book ii, ch. xv, pag. m. 168.

(26) Tiraquellus in Legem IV, connubial. num. 28, pag. m. 85.

(27) Id. ibid. pag. 87.

(28) Id. ibid.

(29) See that reason towards the latter end of this remark.

K k

VOL. V. No. CXXI.

remark on it.

circumstances in the case, which made the thing problematical. It is very likely Francis Sforza meant by the words of his agreement with Dorothy's father, that the should be searched, but that it was not in express words said, she should be seen stark naked. Had this clause been expressed, the Marquis of Mantua would have broke his word by refusing what the Duke required; and if it was not expressed, he might say he never meant that his daughter should be inspected after the manner the Duke would have it. Wherefore the reasons pro and con might have been specious, and hindered Tiraquellus from attempting to decide the matter. He was not ignorant that it was more necessary for sovereign princes than for private persons, to know whether there are any concealed imperfections, that may make one fear a woman's barrenness. Francis Sforza designed to marry his son to the daughter of Lewis Gonzaga; and therefore it highly concerned him that she should want nothing: And it is well known, that there are many customs contrary to the common practice in favour of princes. See what I have said before (30) concerning the custom of the Muscovites. It affords another reason for the doubting of Tiraquellus, and shewing that he does not contradict himself.

(30) Citation (64), of the article FULVIA.

(31) Sed & legimus olim in templum Fortune virilia ventitare mulieres solitas que nuptui dabantur: & corpore nudato, num quo vitio aut labe essent affectas explorari solere. Tiraquell. ubi supra, num. xi, pag. 82.

(32) Du Boulay, Thesor des Antiquités Romaines, pag. 516.

Rite Deam Latæ colitis matresque nurusque;
Et vos, quis vitæ longaque vestis abest.
Aurea marmoreo redimicula solvite collo:
Demite divitias: tota lavanda Dea est.
Aurea ficcato redimicula reddite collo:
Nunc alii flores, nunc nova danda rosa est.
Vos quoque sub viridi myrto jubet illa lavari:
Causaque, cur jubeat, (discite) certa subest.
Litore siccatat rorantes nuda capillos.
Viderunt Satyri turba proterva Deam.
Sensit, & apposita textit sua corpora myrto.
Tuta fuit facta: vosque referre jubet.
Discite nunc, quare Fortunæ ibura Virili
Detis eo, calida qui locus humet aqua,
Accipit ille locus posteo velamine cunctas;
Et vitium nudi corporis omne videt.
Ut tegat hoc, cælestes viros, Fortuna Virilis Præstat: & hoc parvo thure rogata facit (33).

(33) Ovidius, Fastor. lib. iv, ver. 233.

That custom of the Roman virgins, so ill related by Tiraquellus, was a trick and a fraud, wholly contrary to the sincerity he recommends to women, in the preliminaries of marriage. They applied themselves to Fortuna Virilis, as others made their address to the goddess Laverna, and begged of her that she would render invisible the faults they were guilty of.

Pulcra Laverna

Da mihi fallere, da iustum sanctumque videri, Noctem peccatis & fraudibus obijce nubem (34):

(34) Horat. Epist. xvi, lib. i, ver. 60.

Good, good Laverna, grant me aid
For such a cheat, let all believe me good;
Let me seem just and honest to the crowd,
And o'er my cheats and forgeries cast a cloud.

CREECH.

In a word, that practice of the Roman ladies was a very bad one, tho' it was not so abominable as that of the Egyptian women, who shewed their nakedness to the ox Apis, for the space of forty days. That ox was the chief deity of the Egyptians. Εν δὲ ταῖς ἀποσιρμύταις τετραπάρων ἡμέραις μὲν ὁρῶσιν αὐτὸν αἱ γυναῖκες, κατὰ ἀρίστων ἰσχυμέναι, καὶ δεκνύουσιν ἀναστρέφουσαι τὰ ταύτων γυναικῶν μύρια. Per XL. illos dies faciem duntaxat ipsum (Apis) vident, ante faciem ejus constitutæ, elevatisque peplo inguina ostentant (35). What an abominable notion had they of the gods, whom they made the spectators of such things! This was not only a sin offending against modesty, but also an impious thing; and I make no doubt, that all the Romans, who knew the rules of a modest education, condemned the ceremonies practised on the first day of April. One may, without reading St Jerom, approve what he says, to shew that we ought to be ashamed of our own nakedness. 'Scio præcepisse quoddam, ne virgo Christi cum eunuchis lavet, nec cum maritatis for-

(35) Diodorus Siculus, lib. i, pag. m. 54, cap. lxxxv. See the Hexameron Rustique, pag. m. 91.

minis: quia alii non deponant animos virorum: alia tumentibus uteris præferant foeditatem. Mihi omnino in adulta virgine lavacra displicent, quæ se ipsam debat erubescere, & nudam videre non posse (36). - - - I know some have taught, that a Christian virgin ought never to go into a bath with an eunuch or married women, because those have not laid aside their masculine inclinations; and the others, by their big-bellies may shew what is unseemly. As for myself, I am of opinion, that a virgin that is marriageable, should not go into a bath, who should even blush, and be averse to behold herself naked. It is not enough to condemn the impudent practices authorized by the laws of Lycurgus (37), we ought also to condemn the anniversary customs mentioned by Ovid: and if the difference between the Duke of Milan, and the Marquis of Mantua was to be decided, it were much better to praise the conduct of the Marquis than that of the Duke. The complaints of Cicero d'Hadria ought only to be looked upon as witticisms. He exclaims against the vast difference between all other purchases and marriage. If a man buys a house, he will see every nook and corner of it from the cellar to the garret; and yet he does not confine himself to it for his life: He may sell it again, or let it, if he does not like it. It is the same with all other merchandise. The only thing, says Cicero d'Hadria, a man cannot part with, when he has purchased it, is that about which he strikes a bargain without examining it. 'Tutte le cose si considerano prima che si comprino. Le cose si mirano, gli stromenti si odono, le povere si annasano, il vino si gusta, il panno si tocca, le fusa si maneggiano, le caraffe si palpano d'ogni parte se son intiere, i leuti s'abbracciano, le stringhe si stendono, i legni si misurano, le scarpe si calzano, i cavalli si cavalcano, le vacche si scegliono, e in somma tutte le cose si provano con quei sensi, con cui le habbiamo a goder prima, che si conchiudano il mercato. Le mogli sole, che non si possono mai più rifiutare in vita, con cui bisogna star sempre fino alla morte, si prendono a chiudi occhi, a gatt'orba, e come si dice, gatta in sacco. Ne pur si provano, perche non riuscirebbono al paragone. Ne pur si mostrano, perche se si vedessero si sprezzerebbono prima, che si pigliassero (38). - - - We examine every thing, before we purchase it. We view a boufe, try a musical instrument, smell a melon, taste wine, feel a piece of cloth, turn a spindle, view every side of a flask, to know if it is whole. We found a lute, wind up strings, measure wood, try on shoes, ride horses, chuse out cows; and in short we prove every thing in the manner we are to use it, before we make the bargain. Women alone, whom we can never re* turn as long as we live, and whom we must keep till we die, are taken blindly, like a pig in a poke. They are not tried, because they would not answer the test. neither do they suffer themselves to be viewed, because if they were seen, they would be slighted before they went off.' How comically they talk. He would introduce into our contracts of marriage, either the custom of the Taxites, an antient nation among the Indians (39), or that of the old Romans when they bought slaves; a custom which the Emperor Augustus made subservient to his unlawful love, as has been seen before in the article of Fulvia, citation

(36) Hieronymus, Epistola ad Letam de instituta filia, Epist. lib. ii, pag. m. 264.

(37) See before the remarks [C], [D], and the following, of the article LYCURGUS. See also the article QUELLE-NEC, citation (41). Note that Montaigne in book iii of his Essays, ch. vi, pag. m. 129, & seq. seems willing to excuse Lycurgus.

(38) Lettere famigliari del Cicero d'Hadria, pag. m. 35. See above the remark [C].

LYCURGUS,

(39) Strabo, lib. xv, pag. m. 491, says, that among them, when a man could give no portion to his daughter, he carried her to the market-place, and gathered the people together by sound of trumpet. If any body offered to marry her, she stripped herself first backwards to the shoulders and then forwards.

(40) Above, citation (39).

(41) Tiraquellus, ubi supra, num. i, pag. 79.

(42) See above remark [D] of the article DULLIUS.

I have promised above (40) to mention the reason alleged by Tiraquellus, why a man and a woman, who design to marry, should discover their bodily imperfections to each other. A husband, says he, who does not declare them in due time, runs the hazard of being hated by his wife when she comes to know them: It is in vain for him to hope that she will not perceive them; people that lie together in the same bed must needs find them out. Contempt, hatred, and horror, will be the consequence of such a discovery; and then the wife will think of other men. Si vir quispiam qui se matrimonio velit addicere, quicquam latentis vitii aut deformitatis in corpore habeat, id in primis uxori quam duciturus est, debeat, ne si jam consummato matrimonio resciscat (neque enim illam quam cum dies noctisque versaris diu latere potest . . .) te contemnat, detestetur, abhorreat: proindeque alios petulantius fectetur (41). Let no man fancy (Tiraquellus goes on) that he will have a wife like that, who being married to one that had a sinking nose, did not complain of it, because she thought all men had the same defect (42). There are but two such instances mentioned by antient authors; and none but a madman will expect such a thing now a-days. Et sane futurum adeo ne- minem infanum reor qui nostris praesertim temporibus, spem concipiat uxorem se his similem inventuram, eaque spe ductus suum illi vitium non patefaciat (43). This is what he says to persuade a man to conceal none of his imperfections, and to imitate the good example of the Philosopher Crates (44), and of the father (45) of the Emperor Galba. He uses the same arguments as to women, which he confirms by this, that marriage is a kind of purchase, and that justice requires the buyer should be informed of the latent faults of what he buys (46). He proves all this by several authorities.

I do not know what was the issue of the difference between the Duke of Milan and the Marquis of Mantua about Dorothy's marriage. I cannot tell whether any expedient was found out to satisfy the father of the betrothed; but I find in Sanfivino (47), that John Galeazzo Maria, the son of our Francis Sforza, had two wives: One of them was Sufanna de Gonzaga, and the other Bonna of Savoy. The Abbot de Marolles affirms that Sufanna de Gonzaga, the daughter of Lewis Marquis of Mantua, was married to Galeazzo Maria Sforza Duke of Milan (48). The same Sanfivino says in another place (49), that Dorothy Gonzaga, daughter of Lewis Gonzaga, Marquis of Mantua, was married to Galeazzo Maria Sforza Duke of Milan. It is very likely, that thro' a mistake he is frequently liable to, he calls the same person Sufanna in one place, and Dorothy in another. From whence it ought to be inferred that, according to him, the son of Francis Sforza was married to a daughter of the Marquis of Mantua; which would prove that the difference, concerning which Francis Aretin was consulted, was made up, and the marriage accomplished. But then it might be said, that Sanfivino, who is no exact writer, speaks of a marriage in general, tho' the thing went no farther than a betrothing.

(43) Tiraquellus in Legem IV, connubial. num. i, pag. 80.

(44) See the remark [A] in the article HIP-PARCHIA.

(45) He pulled off his gown, to show a rich and handsome lady, who courted him, that he had a crooked back. See Suetonius in Galba, cap. iii.

(46) See citation (f) of the article ABDAS.

(47) Sanfivino, ubi supra, fol. 11, verso.

(48) Marolles, Memoires, pag. 428.

(49) Fol. 359, verso.

S F O R Z A (CATHERINE) grand-daughter of the foregoing, was a lady of great courage; but she did an action which favoured much more of a man's boldness, than of a woman's modesty. Her subjects having made themselves masters of the castle of Rimini, she gave them her children as hostages to recover it; and then she threatened with death those, who had occasioned the insurrection; they answered her, that they would kill her children; thereupon she turned up her shift, and said, here is where-withal to get others [A]: barbarously, destroy the innocent hostages that are in your hands; I consent to it, provided my justice inflict upon you such a punishment as your wickedness deserves (a). She was the natural daughter of Galeazzo Maria Sforza, and

(a) Taken from Balthazar Bonifacius Historiae Ludicae, lib. v, cap. iv, pag. 127. He quotes the eighth book of Michael, Brutus's History of Florence.

was

(1) Compare this with the answer of the Egyptians, in the remark [D] of the article PSAMMITICHUS.

[A] Here is where-withal to get others (1). There could not be a more modest translation of the following words. 'Illa magno & virili animo sublata veste nudatoque ventre, En inquit, quo possim liberos iterum procreare. - - - She with a great and manly courage, taking up her garment, and uncovering her belly, Behold, says she, that whereby I can have more children.' The author, from whom I have this, and whom I have quoted in the margin of this article, had been relating the action of a Lacedaemonian woman, who seeing her sons run away from a fight, shewed them her nakedness, and asked them whether they would get in again into the same belly out of which they came when they were born, or whether they expected she should put them under her gown, that the enemies who pursued them, might not see them. She added to this question such a smart reprimand for their want of courage, that they returned to the fight and got the victory. He quotes the Apophthegms of the Lacedaemonian women, collected by Plutarch; but all these circumstances are not to be found in that author: He only says, that a woman of Lacedaemon shewed her belly to her sons when they ran away, and asked them whether they had a mind to get into it again (2). The other particulars are a fabulous addition of Balthazar Bonifacius. I call it fabulous, tho' it is to be found in Justin, with respect to other women, viz. the Persian women, when Cyrus engaged in a decisive battle against Artaxerxes king of the Medes. 'Pulsa itaque cum Persarum acies paulatim cederet; matres & uxores eorum obviam occurrunt: orant in praelium revertantur: cunctantibus, sublata veste, obscena corporis ostendunt, rogantes num in utero matrum vel uxorum velint refugere. Hac repressi castigatione, in praelium redeunt: & facta impressione, quos fugiebant, fugere compellunt

(4) Plot. in Apophthegm. Lacedaemonarum, pag. m. 241.

(3). - - - The Persian army being worsted, began gradually to give ground, they were met by their mothers and wives: they pray them to return to the fight: but delaying, they lift up their garments, shew their secret parts, asking if they would again take shelter in the wombs of their mothers or wives. Being checked by this reproof, they return to the battle, and charging afresh, put to flight those from whom they were flying. A commentator (4) observes, that Tacitus mentions a thing like this concerning the women of Germany; which is not true: The difference between that fact, and that of the Persian women, is great enough to make it a different thing. The women mentioned by Tacitus used only intreaties, and shewed nothing but their breasts. 'Memoriae proditur, quaedam acies inclinatam jam, & labantes a feminis restitutas, constantia precum & objectu pectorum, & monstrata cominus captivitate, quam longe impatientius seminarum suarum nomine timent: adeo ut efficacius obligentur animi civitatum quibus inter obsequia puellarum quoque nobiles imperantur (5). - - - It is recorded, that armies giving ground and ready to fly, have been restored by women, incessantly intreating, shewing their breasts, and telling them what slavery they were to undergo; which they dreaded so much the more upon account of their women. - - - that those cities are most effectually kept in subjection, by which amongst the hostages noble virgins are delivered up.' It were an unjust thing to say that I am a rambling commentator, and that I make digressions to fill up my page; for I only take notice of such mistakes as I meet in my way, after having censured Balthazar Bonifacius for advancing a falsity. His book, and those of innumerable other authors, are full of such liberty: therein you will find a thousand things, which the authors quoted by them say nothing of. If I had a

(4) Justin, lib. i, cap. vi, p. m. 20. See also Plutarch, de Virtutibus Mulierum, pag. 246.

(5) Tacit. de Germ. cap. viii.

- (b) Thomas Porcacchi, in his notes upon Guicciardin, lib. i, fol. 20, verso.
- (c) Guicciardin, lib. i, fol. 20, verso.
- (d) Id. ibid.
- (e) Id. ibid. fol. 126. See also Thomas's Life of Cæsar Borgia, pag. 270.
- (f) Guicciardin, ibid.
- (g) Idem, lib. iv, fol. 104, verso.
- (h) Id. ibid.
- (i) Varillas, Hist. de Louis XII, book i, pag. 55, 56.
- (j) Volaterranus, lib. iv, pag. 2.
- (k) He is mistaken; she had more than one son. See Guicciardin, book iv, fol. 126.
- (l) Varillas, Hist. de Louis XII, book i, pag. 55, 56.
- (m) Volaterranus, lib. iv, pag. 2.
- (n) That is, Catherine de Medicis, who has been Queen of France.
- (o) In tanto non si spaventò punto, che anzi alzatosi le vesti, e loro mostrando le parti vergognose disse, che de suoi figliuoli fu cesserò a voglia loro, che a lei rimaneva la stampa di tirare de gli altri. Boccacini, Raggioni di Parnasso, Cent. I, cap. lxxv, pag. m. 102.
- (p) ibid.

mind to swell my compilation by bringing in things by head and shoulders, should I forget to censure the same Bonifacius, for mentioning the action of Catherine Sforza, in a chapter wherein his business was only to bring some proofs of the physical virtues of the muliebre pudendum (6). Is that action well connected with the other accounts heaped up by him, and which concern I know not what faculty of driving away hail, laying storms, and frightening lions? I suspect he is guilty of a much greater blunder; I think he falsifies the main parts of the narrative of the historian quoted by him: it is quite different in the Supplement to Moreri's dictionary (7).

(6) It's title is de vi muliebris pudendi.

(7) In the article SFORZA (CATHERINE).

(8) Leand. Albert. in Descript. Ital. pag. 493.

(9) Porcacchi, notes upon Guicciardin, lib. iv, fol. 126.

(10) Hilarion de Cofte, Eloges des Dames, Tom. i, pag. 224.

[B] She was married to Jerom Riario. She brought him the Lordship of Imola for her portion; Galeazzo Sforza her father, had made himself master of it, by taking advantage of the quarrels, which arose in 1472, between Tadeo Manfredi Lord of Imola and his son. Jerom Riario, nephew to Sixtus the fourth, did very much embellish that town (8).

[C] It was upon this occasion, if we may believe, some writers . . . but they are mistaken. Thomas Porcacchi confutes those authors in his marginal notes upon Guicciardin's history: he shews, that the lady did that action when her husband was killed. These are his words: 'Hanno scritto alcuni, che Madama Caterina trovandosi assediata nella Rocca di Forlì dal Valentino, & havendo egli, per indurla ad arrendersi, minacciato d'a mazzarle i figliuoli, se non si arrendeva; ella con animo costante alzatasi i panni dinanzi; gli mostrò le parti vergognose, dicendo d'haver le forme da stamparne de gli altri: il che però si vede discordar da questo autore, che dice come la Rocca fu presa incontinente, che dentro ella vi fu ritirata: & è chiaro, che non hora, ma quando fu da Lodovico Panfecco amazzato il Sig. Girolamo Riario marito di lei, ella fece questo atto (9). . . . Some have written, that when Valentine besieged Catherine Sforza in the castle of Forlì, and, in order to force her to surrender, threatened, that if she did not she would immediately put her children to death; Catherine, with a resolute mind, pulled up her coats, and shewed him her privy parts, telling him that she had the mould for casting more. This however seems to disagree with what that author says, viz. that the castle was taken as soon as she entered it: It is plain, that she did this action, not at that time, but when her husband Girolamo Riario was murdered by Ludovico Panfecco.' The good Father Hilarion de Cofte durst not relate the thing, as it happened: He leaves out all the impudence of that action, to the end, questioning, that he might not let slip the opportunity of increasing the number of his heroins. But he is mistaken as to the circumstance of time, if Porcacchi is in the right. That Minime expresses himself thus (10): 'Catherine Sforza, the wife of John de Me-dicis, the most courageous and valiant lady that ever was seen in Italy, gave her (11) the name of Catherine, when she was christened. That magnanimous hero, the worthy god-mother of Queen Catherine, gave a proof of her valour and courage, when she was besieged by Cæsar Borgia Duke of Valentinois in the fortrefs of Forlì; for being threatened by that cruel tyrant and monster of nature, with the loss and destruction of her children, if she refused to surrender, she boldly appeared upon the walls, and laughed at the rodomontades of that captain, laying her hand upon her gown, and telling him that she was young enough to get others.'

[D] She was privately married to John de Medicis. That marriage was known in time. Catherine Sforza had by that second husband John de Medicis, who was the Father of Cosmo de Medicis, the first great Duke of Tuscany. Boccacini has a witty conceit about it. He feigns that Catherine Sforza having declared, that she had the courage to shew the mould wherein she took upon herself to form other children (12), desired, that since she had been very much commended by all historians for that action, Apollo would be pleased to assign her a proper place upon Parnassus. The judges were divided in their opinions; some of them looked upon it as a brutish piece of leudness. Ad alcuni atto di sfacciatezza, e di bruta impudicitia parve quello, che così nobil signora haveva raccontato (13). Apollo judged that a regular observation of modesty did belong to private women; but that princesses were obliged upon some occasions to shew their virility. A counsellor gave his opinion in this manner: The place, out of which John de Medicis, father of the great Cosmo, came, did certainly deserve to be exposed to the public view. Ben degno di esser veduto da ogn' uno era quel luogo, donde era uscito il famoso Campione Giovan de Medici padre di quel gran Cosmo, &c (14).

[E] The scruples, which hindered the continuator of Moreri's Dictionary, to mention the immodest action of that lady. He hath coloured over the matter with an affected preciseness, which infinitely surpasseth that of the Monk; for he says, that lady was contented to answer that she might make up the loss of her children, and that it would bring an unavoidable calamity upon the rebels. Do what you can, and set it in what view you will, you will never be able to shew that he has discharged the duty of an historian, and that he has not neglected it in such a manner as is inexcusable; for we can discover in his words no shadow or footstep of what was done by Catherine Sforza; and yet it was an action so singular and so extraordinary, that it ought not to be passed over in silence. Perhaps, it will be said, that the thing was so impudent, that chaste ears would have been offended at it; and that instead of representing her as a most illustrious woman, she would have been exposed to the contempt of every reader.

Lewis Guicciardin [F].

reader. I answer, that those two excuses are insignificant: that if the first was a good one, a vast number of words should be suppressed in our language; we should never be allowed either to speak or to write naked, nakedness, adultery, fornication, and a thousand more which excite unavoidably obscene ideas. At this rate the Bible should be corrected, and the writers inspired by God, would be liable to censure; for they mention the nakedness of Noah (15), and of the Apostles (16), and did not scruple to express themselves naturally, and without circumlocution, upon such occasions, wherein one should have a regard to chaste ears, according to the principles I confute. Those, who understand the Hebrew tongue, are not ignorant that Moses made use of a very vulgar word (17), to denote the mortal blow the Midianitish woman had received. Tu fortassis, ut sunt serè hypocritæ, verbis tetricis, rebus obscenæ, ne ipsum quidem Mosén istâ noxiâ immunem abs te dimiseris; cum alibi sæpius, tum etiam ubi Phineæ basia, quâ parte mulierem transfixeris, squa fides Hebræis, aperte narrat (18). The second excuse

(15) Genes. ix.

(16) John xxi. 7.

(17) Num. xxv.

(18) Miltonus, in Defensione pro se contra Alexandrum Morum, pag. m. 75.

(19) See the remark [A], in the article DOMITIA.

(20) Plin. lib. ii, cap. ix, pag. m. 152.

is worse still, and would be of no use but to a writer of Romances. I confess that if such an author pitched upon Catherine Sforza to be his heroine, and the subject of an history, like so many sorry pieces that come out every day, which contain a thousand fables and chimeras, grafted upon real fact; I say, such an author might pass over in silence the faults of that lady? But an historian ought not to do it, he is obliged to represent the ill qualities of people: justice requires that what is blameable should be actually blamed, and whoever conceals the faults of persons, or extenuates them, imposes upon the world in several respects (19). Are we not thereby deprived of a knowledge that belongs to us, and induced to misapply our approbation. If our Catherine committed a fault, is it not reasonable she should suffer for it in some measure, by the judgment which the readers will pass upon it? And if all historians imitated the writer I speak of, would not men be exempted from the fear of being condemned by posterity, which is a mighty curb to keep them to their duty, and one of the greatest advantages that can be reaped from history? Will you say, that there was a necessity to pass over in silence such a piece of impudence, lest it should be imitated by others? But for the same reason all the lewd and disorderly actions of mankind should be omitted by historians: and they would not be allowed to write but in the stile of panegyrics. The profession of an historian should be ranked amongst the arts prohibited, and all nations obliged to use it as the Jews did painting. All historians should be ordered to confine themselves to the enquiry of natural things, and not to meddle with human life. Pliny would not have been much against such an order; for the care that was taken to write annals in order to make a discovery of crimes, whilst the works of nature remain unknown, was looked upon by him as a very pernicious thing. Mira humani ingenii peste, sanguinem, & cædes condere annalibus juvat, ut scelera hominum noscantur mundi ipsius ignavis (20). Perhaps, it will be said, that the author of the Supplement thought he was to express himself, as if he had told a story in the presence of the most virtuous women in the world. I answer, this is a wrong notion: Those, who maintain that every word, which cannot be spoken before a virtuous woman, ought to be banished from a book, are mistaken. It is a maxim of over-nice and precise women; which you will easily grant, if you consider never so little the difference between a conversation and a book. An honest woman will be justly offended, if any one tells her an obscene story; but she will not blame an historian for relating it, provided he abstain from filthy words: An historian speaks to the public, and not to such or such a woman in particular; and therefore what he says is not offensive, as it would be, if it was said in a conversation or in a letter. In these two last cases he would have no very favourable notion of the modesty of those to whom he speaks or writes; and that is it that gives offence. They would apply the consequence personally to themselves; but none applies to himself in such a manner what concerns only the public. We are obliged to hear what we are told, or to read the letters that are written to us; but every body may read or lay aside a printed book. In fine, I observe that of all writers, those of dictionaries ought least to be over scrupulous, since such works are designed to give a clear and precise explication of things.

[F] I shall observe an error of the translator of a book of Lewis Guicciardin. I do not know that translator's name; but I know that he has translated several Italian books into French. He himself says so in his preface to the translation of L'Hore di recreatione di M. Lodovico Guicciardini, Patrio Fiorentino. These hours of recreation of Lewis Guicciardin are a collection of stories, sentences, and witty sayings. He did not there forget the action of our Catherine Sforza. Guicciardin says she did what I have related above in the citadel of Forli, when her husband had been killed. 'Ma la contessa animosa non mutando faccia, alzatasi tostante i panni davanti con fiero sguardo disse loro: Et non vi pare egli stolti ch'io habbia le forme di farne dell' altri?' The translator renders those Italian words thus: 'But the courageous countess, without altering her countenance, suddenly turning up her coat, told them with a proud look, Do not you think, you fools, that I have still beauty enough to get others (21)?' Nothing can be more absurd than to make her say upon such an occasion I have still beauty enough. If it was said in the foregoing words, that she unmasked herself to shew her face, there would be some coherency and justness in her discourse; but there is none at all if it be compared with what she had been doing. The author cannot be excused upon account of preciseness or modesty; for had he acted on such a principle, he would have omitted or wrapped up that action, instead of relating it as plainly as he does. His mistake proceeds from not knowing that the word forme in that place signifies moulds. This ignorance has occasioned a strange disorder in the sequel of the discourse.

(21) L'Hore di recreatione di Lodovico Guicciardini, folio 290, verso, edition of Paris, 1624, in 12mo.

S F O R Z A (ISABELLA) may be placed among learned women. She lived in the XVIth century. Some of her letters may be seen in the collection published at Venice by Hortensio Lando in the year 1549 [A]. And among others a letter of consolation,

[A] The collection published at Venice by Hortensio Lando, in the year 1549. Christofano Bronzini has recourse to that collection, being obliged to confute one of the interlocutors of his dialogues, who says, that few women were capable of writing two words. His answer is (1), 'Sono state tante, che passano le centinaia; e tanto degne di lode, che se voi vedeste le lettere loro (che con tanto sudore, con tanta diligenza, e spesa furono raccolte dal Sign. Hortensio Lando; & à persuasione, e preghiere di Ottaviano Raveria, eletto poi Vescovo di Terracina) date in luce, e stampate da Gabriel Giolito, l'anno 1549, vi chiarireste, con quanta eloquenza, con quanto artificio, con quanta osservanza, & bella maniera di dire, elle sapessero porre in carta altro, che quattro parole. - - - There have been so many, that we may reckon more than a hundred, and so worthy of praise, that if you saw their letters (which were collected with great labour and diligence, and at great expence by Hortensio Lando; at the persuasion and intreaty of Ottaviano Raveria, afterwards made Bishop of Terracina) published and printed by Gabriel Giolito in the year 1549, you would know with how great eloquence, art, propriety, and beautiful elocution, they were able to write more than four words. He is not contented in general to refer to that collection, he also took some letters out of it, and inserted them in his work; particularly with respect to our Isabella Sforza. You will find there the letter she writ to Bobbia. For the rest, such a work as that of Hortensio, consolation, which she wrote to Bonna Sforza, widow of the King of Poland, who was lately dead and that which she writ to Margaret Bobbia in vindication of Poetry.

(1) Christofano Bronzini, della dignità e Nobiltà delle Donne, Giornata quarta, pag. 40.

L I

tensio Lando, did very well deserve I should mention | most severe critics will excuse me for taking the liber-
some circumstances of it; and therefore I hope the | ty to set down Bronzini's words somewhat at large.

SICYON, a town of Peloponnesus, and the most ancient kingdom that ever was in Greece. Ægialeus is said to have been the first King of Sicyon, and we are told that he began to reign seventy-four years before the birth of Abraham (a). Zeuxippus was the last king: he was the twenty-sixth, and reigned thirty-two years. The form of the government was changed after his death: the priests exercised the supreme authority. That kingdom lasted nine hundred and sixty-two years [A]: it ended when Eli was High-priest and judge of the Jews (b). The worship which the Sicyonians paid to Bacchus, was not one of the least ridiculous parts of the Pagan religion [B].

(a) Eusebius, in Chron. pag. 11. supposes that Abraham was born the 22d year of the reign of Eue-rops, second king of Sicyon, who succeeded Ægialeus, whose reign had lasted 52 years.

(b) August. de Civit. Dei. lib. xviii, cap. xix.

[A] That kingdom lasted nine hundred and sixty-two years. It lasted three years less, if we believe St Augustin (1). A commentator upon that Father (2) has committed two faults in few words. He says, that according to Eusebius, that kingdom lasted eight hundred and sixty-two years; and he adds, that if the years be cast up, they will amount to nine hundred and seventy-two. It is certain Eusebius (3) mentions a duration of nine hundred and sixty-two years, and that the addition of the years of each king of Sicyon makes but nine hundred and sixty-two years. Eusebius reckons from Abraham's birth, and supposes that Patriarch was born in the twenty-second year of Eue-rops, the second king of Sicyon, who succeeded Ægialeus, and reigned fifty-two years; and that the Kings of Sicyon failed in 889 (4). Add the numbers, and you will find the second fault I have censured.

[B] The worship which the Sicyonians paid to Bacchus was not one of the least ridiculous parts of the Pagan religion. They worshipped Bacchus under such an obscene name, that none but very impudent people can pronounce it in a free conversation. It is the name that such impudent people at this day give to midwives. Clemens Alexandrinus does justly blame the Heathens for such a turpitude. Διόνυσον δὲ ἡδὴ σιωπῶ τὸν χειρὶ-λάλην. Σικυνῶνιοι τῶτον περὶ σκυ-νῶσιν ἐπὶ τῶν γυναικείων τὰς ἀνὰ τὸν Διόνυσον μορῆαν ἔχουσιν αἰσχρὸς καὶ τῆς ὕβρεως σέβας ὄντις ἀρχηγόν. Bacchum enim jam taceo pudendi contreflatorem. Eum adorant Sicyonii, qui Bacchum membris præficiunt muliebribus tanquam turpitudinis ac fordiditatis inspectorem, & quasi libidinis colant præ-dictum (5). . . . The Sicyonians, says he, worship Bacchus as the inspector of the secret parts of women: they have allotted to him these parts as his demesne, his jurisdiction, and his province. Mr Costar writing in prose, took a more than poetical liberty, when he made use of those words of Clemens Alexandrinus to explain some verses of Horace. Such a liberty did not go unpunished; Mr de Girac did severely banter him for it under the following irony (6). 'I will not imitate him in his ill humour; on the contrary, I find he has been very successful in his explication of these verses of the same Poet (7).

Bacchum in remotis carmina rupibus
Vidi docentem, credite Posteri,
Nymphæque difcentes, & aures
Capripedium Satyrorum acutas.

Born out by an unusual rage,
I saw (believe it future age)

(1) Augustin. de Civitate Dei, lib. xviii, cap. xix.

(2) Leonardus Coqueus in hunc locum Augustini, pag. 605, Editionis Francos. 1661.

(3) Euseb. in Chron. ad ann. 889, pag. m. 96.

(4) That is, reckoning from Abraham's birth.

(5) Clem. Alex. and. Admonit. ad Gentes, pag. 25.

(6) Girac, Replique à Costar, §. iii, pag. 26.

(7) Horat. lib. ii, Od. XIX.

Bacchum in remotis carmina rupibus
Vidi docentem, credite Posteri,
Nymphæque difcentes, & aures
Capripedium Satyrorum acutas.

Born out by an unusual rage,
I saw (believe it future age)

SILANION, a famous Sculptor, flourished in the time of Alexander the Great, about the CXIVth Olympiad (a). He was an Athenian (b), and got a great skill in his art without being taught by any body (c). The statue of Sappho (d), that of one Satyrus, who had often carried the prize at the Grecian games (e), that of another champion called Demaratus (f), and that of Apollodorus a Sculptor, who could not be pleased with his own works [A], were accounted his chief pieces. He wrote a tract, wherein

(a) Plinius, lib. xxxiv, cap. viii, pag. m. 110.

(b) Pausan. lib. vi, cap. iv, pag. 461.

(c) Plinius. ubi supra.

(d) See the end of the text of the article SAPPHO.

[A] That of Apollodorus, a Sculptor, who could not be pleased with his own works. What Pliny says upon this is very remarkable, and shews Silanion's great skill in his art. Silanion Apollodorum fudit, fictorem ipsum,

Where Bacchus taught the nymphs a song,
In distant vales; from ev'ry wood
With prick'd up ears the satyrs flood,
And smiling fauns compos'd a list'ning throng.

CREECH.

I did not think fit, says Mr Costar (8), to write to you a pleasant thing concerning Bacchus's scholars, fearing my letter might fall into other hands than your's. But here I will be bolder, because I fancy this paper will be more secret. I have read in Clemens Alexandrinus, that Bacchus was worshipped among the Sicyonians under the name of χοῖες-λάλην, which signifies If it be so, do not ask me what he was doing in remotis with those beautiful nymphs. Certainly, none of them could come off. He felt them all one after another; and this was the fine lesson he gave them. I think, Sir, they wanted no pocket-book to write it down. Pray, let me know by the first opportunity what you think of it, &c. I am sorry I was not there, for I fancy this Bacchus was a jolly doctor, and that it was worth one's while to see him act such a part. He had an honest fellow for his tutor, a man of good example, who sets forth very fine moral reflections in Euripides's Cyclops. I do not ask Mr Costar what he would have done with those nymphs; but if he had lived at that time, we should not have known such fine things. However, I hope he will excuse me for leaving out two or three words, which none can be so impudent as to write or utter, excepting Bacchus's master, or his disciple, I mean, Silenus, and Mr Costar. Mr Menage knowing that the Latin word Porcus, and the Greek word χοῖς, signified that part of a woman, which modesty does not permit to name, made use of that erudition to give us the etymology of the epithet, under which Bacchus was worshipped at Sicyon (9).

Isaac Vossius advances an etymological conjecture grounded upon the obcenities over which Bacchus presided. Non ab hoc Orithagora (10), says he (11), nomen Orithagoræ est arcessendum, sed vero à numine salacissimo, ut existimo. Nullus dubito quin Bacchus ipse aliquando dictus sit Orithagoras. Antequam enim ille hortorum custos Lampasce nasceretur, notum est Bacchum comitesque ejus curam locorum muliebrium habuisse. Hinc fit ut non tantum ἰδύφαλλον ipsum vocarint, verum etiam idem significantibus vocabulis, ὀρθον, ὀρθανην, ἔσ' ὀρθάγορον. Sane apud Aristophanem ἐκκλησια-ζούσας, cum juvencula hortatur anum prurientem, ut vocet Orithagoram, id non nisi de hoc demone peculiatore videtur intelligendum, uti ad illum locum fufius ostendimus.

(8) Note, that this is not to be found in the printed books of that author. He wrote it to Balzac: his letter came into Girc's hands, who inserted in this part of his reply, so much of it as he thought fit.

(9) Mr Costar is mistaken; it should be χοῖες-λάλην.

(10) An Historian mentioned by Strabo, Ælian, and Philostratus.

(11) Isaacus Vossius, in Pomponium Melam, lib. ii, cap. ii, pag. m. 133.

(12) Pausanias, ubi supra.

(13) Pausanias, ubi supra, pag. 487.

wherein he explained the rules of Symmetry if we may believe Vitruvius (g).

(g) Vitruvius, Præf. lib. vii.

ipsum, sed inter cunctos diligentissimum artis, & inimicum sui iudicem, crebro peracta signa frangentem, dum satiare cupiditate artis non quit, & ideo insanum cognominatum. Hoc in eo expressit, nec hominem ex ære fecit, sed iracundiam (1).

(1) Plinius, lib. xxxiv, cap. viii. pag. m. 126.

These words have been well enough understood by du Pinet; but he is strangely mistaken in the sequel of this passage. His translation runs thus: 'Silanion made the statue of Apollodorus, who was also a Sculptor, and very much esteemed. But he was so intent upon improving himself in his art, that he never liked his own work; so that very often, he broke very noble pieces out of anger, after he had made an end of them, thinking he could never do a thing well enough: which was the reason why many called him a madman. Silanion intending to shew it, made a statue of Anger, in a woman's cloaths, instead of Apollodorus.' I think there is a mistake in these words of the translator, in a woman's cloaths instead of Apollodorus. I do not believe this is Pliny's meaning; but only that Apollodorus's statue appeared so pationate and cholerick, that one would have taken it to be the very figure of Anger. See the epigrams of the Anthologia, quoted by Father Hardouin (2), upon a thought like that of Pliny. This mistake of du Pinet is inconsiderable, if compared with those that follow. Read first the Latin words of Pliny (3). Et Achillem nobilem. Item Epistaten exercitum atletas: Strongylon Amazonem, quam ab excellentia crurum Eucnemem appellant, ob id in comitatu Neronis Principis circumlatam. Item fecit puerum, quem amando Brutus Philippiensis cognomine suo illustravit (4). Du Pinet renders them thus: 'He made also an Achilles very much esteemed, and Epistates, who exercised the wrestlers. He also made Strongylon an Amazon, which he firnamed Eucnemus, that is, fine-legged; which the emperor Nero esteemed so much, that he had it commonly carried along with him. He also made a statue of a young boy, so beautiful, that Brutus of Philippopolis in Romania, was so much in love with it, that he called it by his own name.' You see he ascribes to Silanion all the works mentioned in the passage from Pliny, whereas he should only have ascribed to him the two first. The two others belonged to a famous statuary, whose name was Strongylon. He is mentioned in the first and ninth books of Pausanias (5): the translator took Strongylon for the name of an

(2) Hardouin in Plin. Tom. v, pag. 126.

(3) Plinius, ubi supra.

(4) Martial, Epigram. lxxvii, lib. ii, & Epig. ii, lib. ix, & Epig. cxi, lib. xiv. mentions that statue of a boy which Brutus loved.

(5) Pausan. lib. i, pag. 97, & lib. ix, pag. 767, Edit. 1696.

Amazon, whose statue had been made by Silanion. Besides, he was in the wrong to think that that statue was firnamed Fine-legged, by the Sculptor that made it; this is not what Pliny means. Lastly, if he had a mind to be understood, he should not have mentioned one Brutus of Philippopolis in Romania, but Brutus, who perished at the battle of Philippi, the same who murdered Julius Cæsar.

That the remark contained in this article, may serve as a supplement to the collections I have made in another place (6), concerning those who are never pleased with their productions, and spoil them by much revising them; I shall add to what Pliny says of Apollodorus, the words of the same author, wherein he does so well express the same fault of the Sculptor Callimachus. 'Ex omnibus autem maxime cognomine insignis est Callimachus, semper calumniator sui, nec finem habens diligentiae, ob id Cacizotechnos appellatus, memorabili exemplo adhibendi curæ modum. Hujus sunt saltantes Lacenæ; emendatum opus sed in quo gratiam omnem diligentia absterit (7). - - But of all, Callimachus was the most noted because of his surname, always blaming himself; nor ever setting any bounds to his care, for which he was called, Cacizotechnos, Spoil-work, a memorable example for prescribing bounds to our diligence. The Lacedemonian dancers are his work, a finished piece, but deprived of all it's graces by his too great care.'

Protagenes, amongst the Painters, was affected with the same disease, as Callimachus and Apollodorus among the Sculptors. We have seen (8), in another place, what judgment Apelles made of him; and we may add here, that this judgment was approved by Cicero. I shall set down his own words, because they may serve as an instruction to the writers, who are never weary of mending their composures: they know not that every thing ought to be kept within certain bounds. 'In omnibus rebus videndum est quatenus. Et si enim suus cuique modus est, tamen magis offendit nimium, quam parum. In quo Apelles pictores quoque eos peccare dicebat, qui non sentirent, quid esset satis (9). - - In all things it is to be considered what is enough. For seeing every thing has it's measure, too much is no less displeasing than too little. Whereupon Apelles said, that those Painters were to be blamed, who never perceived what was sufficient.'

(6) In the article LINACER remark [F], (where you will find in citation (17) the words of Pliny, concerning Protagenes) and remark [G] of the article MALHERBE.

(7) Plin. ubi supra, pag. 326.

(8) Above citation (17) of the article LINACER.

(9) Cicero de Oratore, cap. xxii.

SYLVIUS (FRANCIS) professor of Eloquence, and principal of Tournay-college at Paris, towards the beginning of the XVIth century, was a native of Amiens, where his father Nicolas du Bois was a Camblet-weaver (a). This Nicolas had fifteen children, eleven sons, and four daughters. Francis was the third; and being bred up a scholar, he became a learned man and settled at Paris. He Latinized his family name according to the custom of those times. He sent for two of his brothers, and instructed them very well in Classial learning: one of them called JOHN was made canon of Amiens, and curate of Monceaux; the other, whose name was JAMES, became a very learned Physician, as we shall see in the following article. Francis Sylvius found great barbarisms in the colleges; but he made it his business to restore the use of good Latin, and was one of the greatest promoters of polite learning in France. He directed the scholars to the best Latin authors; and so earnestly recommended to them the reading of Cicero, that it was not his fault if that Roman Orator was not made the only model of a good style (b) [A]. It is true, that before he gave such advices, he himself had been taught bad Latin (c), as it appears from some of his composures. He published several books [B]. I must not forget one thing that is very glorious to him: he

(a) Cilicij panis & undulati bisso. Renatus Moreau, in Vita Jacobi Sylvi.

(b) Ex eod. Ibid.

(c) See the remark [C].

[A] It was not his fault, if that Roman Orator was not made the only model of a good style. Renatus Moreau expresses this in very fine words, in the life of James Sylvius. I shall not set them down, but as to the epigram made upon Sylvius, by Gilbert Ducheri, I shall transcribe it entire, as I find it in the same life.

FRANCIS SYLVII RHETORIS TUMULUS.

*Quod nunquam potuit multorum exercitus olim Barbarum Francis finibus exigere;
Illud militibus ter centum Sylvius egit,
Quo duce habet regnum lingua Latina suum.*

*Rem vero aggressus majorem, ut clarior esset Romani princeps Tullius eloquii.
O mortem properam, Lachesisque brevissima pensa!
Re prope confecta Sylvius appetiit.*

[B] He published several books. Progymnasmatum in artem Oratoriam Centuriae tres. A Commentary upon twenty-one Orations of Cicero; upon his tract de Senectute, and his Paradoxes; and upon the Letters of Politian, and some other illustrious men (1). This last work has been reprinted several times. The third edition is of the year 1526. He dedicated it to Eustachius,

(1) Gésner. in Biblioth.

he procured an edition of Martial cleared from many obscenities in that Poet [C], that the youth might improve themselves by the reading of him, without endangering their morals.

stadius de Croy, Bishop of Arras, whom he had taught for the space of four years at Louvain; from whence it may be inferred, that he had some school in that university.

[C] He procured an edition of Martial, cleared from many obscenities.] Father Vavasseur would not deprive our Sylvius of the glory of being the first, who curtailed Martial, tho' the same thing was objected to the Jesuits, and he might have turned it to their advantage. These are his words: 'Quod utinam fecit. These are his words: 'femus primi rem tantam, tam utilem omnibus, tam necessariam juventuti, eaque nobis solida & integra laus & propria maneret, cœpisse vel sic de virtutis ac morum disciplina bene mereri. Sed est qui hanc nobis lauream præripuerit, antequam etiam nati, ut sic dicam, essemus. Anno enim superioris sæculi decimo quarto Franciscus quidam Sylvius, Ambianus, in Academia Parisiensis qui tum degeret ac literas publice profiteretur, quasi Augiæ stibulum purgaturus, hunc se laborem Herculeum suscepisse declarat, horrida quidem & insolenter ac barbarè scripta epistola, facile ut appareat potiore ei curam fuisse morum quam Latini sermonis; sed ex qua tamen intelligitur, &c. (2.) - - - I wish we had been the first who did a thing so great, so profitable to all, so necessary to youth; and that the whole praise of having so well deserved, for instruction in virtue and good manners had belonged to us. But there is one who carried off the prize, even before we were born. For in the fourteenth year of the last century, one Francis Sylvius of Amiens, who then taught in the university of Paris, declared he had undertaken that Herculean task, in an unpolished and barbarous epistle; so that it plainly appeared, he regarded more the purity of manners, than of his Latin style; whereby nevertheless may be known, &c.' Afterwards he gives us the title of that edition. M. Valerii Martialis Epigrammatum lectoris castimonia dignorum liber: ubi omnia Veneris illius desuendæ quasi irritamenta, quibus passim fordidatus leporum naves corrugabat, accurata Francisci Sylvi Ambianensis diligentia deletili spongia deterfa sunt & eluta. He also gives us the title of the Epistle Dedicatory. Reverendum in Christo Patrem D. Nicolaum Constantinum; & D. Hadrianum Henoncurium, Horesæ amicitia ferrumine conferruminatos Franciscus Sylvius Ambianus salute plurima impetratur. He tells us that this Epistle Dedicatory is written in a very barbarous style, and very different from that which the author acquired some time after. Respondet inscriptioni sæda & ridicula etiam informis quæ sequitur epistola, quem sermonem tamen suum Sylvius, quod vix credat, Montausieri (3), aliquot post annis ita emendavit, ut à se totus diversus & alius planè scriptor esse videatur. The conclusion of that epistle runs thus: Sylvio vestro qui literarum hæc bonas segetes ab illis officium lingue turpitudine multa sperantibus discriminavit, plausibiliter adplaudite. Lastly, he says that Martial was not sufficiently purged, and that he has seen some very obscene words in that edition. Vidi ego hunc ipsum librum à Jacobo Keruero, Christi anno 1535 publicatum, hac inscriptione quam modo posui, hac epistola quæ castissima & sanctissima omnia promitteret, nudis tamen & prætextatis aliquot vocibus spurcum atque infamem.

(2) Vavasseur, de Epigrammate, pag. 255, & seq.

(3) Father Vavasseur speaks to the Duke of Montausier tho' the whole book.

SYLVIUS (JAMES) brother to the foregoing, was one of the most famous Physicians of the XVIth century. He was born at Amiens in the year 1478, and went through his school learning at Paris under Francis Sylvius his brother. He learned in that school, and taught in Tournay-college the Latin tongue with much greater purity, than it had been taught for a long time; which was the reason why his writings were so much taken notice of because of the elegance of the style. Having an inclination to the study of Physic, he was contented to learn some Hebrew under the famous Vatablus, and resolved to learn Greek and Latin perfectly, in order to qualify himself for that study. It is true, he applied himself very diligently likewise to the Mathematics, and made so great a progress in that science, that he invented some machines, which he presented to the Provost of Merchants, and to the Echevins of Paris. When it was time for him to apply himself wholly to Physic; he studied it in the original authors, and so far engaged in the reading of Hippocrates and Galen, that he spent all his time in examining and translating those two authors. This made him sensible of the usefulness of Anatomy; and he applied himself to it so earnestly, that his skill in it was as great as the age he lived in could permit. He studied Pharmacy with no less application, and made several journeys to see the remedies produced by different countries in the places which produced them. Being returned to Paris, he betook himself to read lectures, whereby he got a great deal of money, of which he was too greedy [A]. He explained in two years time, a whole course of Physic taken from Hippocrates and Galen; and his reputation was so great, that people resorted to him from all parts of Europe. But before he was so well known,

he

[A] Of which he was too greedy.] A prodigious avarice obscured the splendor of many bright and fine qualities of our James Sylvius. He had so many scholars, that he should not have narrowly minded whether each of them paid him; and yet he was so rigid about it, that he made a horrid noise, when they did not pay him exactly five pence (1) per month a-piece, which was his pay. He fell once into so great a passion, because one or two of his scholars had not brought him his monthly money, that he swore he would leave off reading lectures, if the other scholars did not turn them out, or force them to pay him (2). He lived a most sordid life; he gave nothing but bare bread to his servants, and had no fire all the winter. Two things he used as a remedy against cold; he played at foot-ball, and carried a great log upon his shoulders from the lowest part of the house to the garret; and he said, the heat he got by such an exercise was more advantageous for health

(1) Henry Stephens, Apologie d'Herodote, pag. m. 168. Says it was a reason.

(2) Henry Stephens, ibid. Says he was present at that action.

than a fire. It is no wonder if he got a great deal of money, living such a sordid life, and if he hid his gold under ground. He had a house in St Marceau's suburb, where, it was said, he had hid five hundred Ducats: Some maintained they had seen them in a red purse; which was confirmed by a magician, who desired to have one half of that treasure for his pains of directing to it: But tho' they searched and dug the ground, they did not find a penny. When the house in which Sylvius had lived, in St James's street, was pulled down (3), in order to be re-built, the Mafons found some pittoles in it, and it was thought many more had been hid in it (4). Buchanan made a distich by way of epitaph, when Sylvius was so angry, that he was for turning out the two poor scholars who had not paid him (5). We are told (6), that on the funeral day, that distich was posted up to the church-door (7) by some of his hearers. It runs thus:

(3) In 1616.

(4) Ex Renato Moreau, in gens Vita.

(5) Henry Stephens, Apologie d'Herodote, pag. 168.

(6) Scæv. Sammarthani, in Elogiis, pag. n. 27.

(7) Moret says, on the door of his house, he did not mind the words in epitaphi of Sammarthani, which he quoteth.

Sylvius

he was very much thwarted by the Paris Physicians, who took it very ill, that a man who had taken no where his doctor's degree, should undertake to teach Physic in the Metropolis of the kingdom. Whereupon he went to Montpellier in 1530, to take his degree. He was there for some time, and then left the place in order to return to Paris, without being admitted doctor. His avarice allowed him not to be at the necessary charges [B]. Going by Lyons, he published there, at the request of two Physicians (a), a Disputation de vini exhibitione in Febribus. It is the first book he printed. Being come to Paris, he endeavored to reconcile himself with the Physicians, that he might have leave to teach; and he published a French Grammar, a work which cost him a great deal of pains, and was to be followed by another, which never came out, wherein he treated of the origin of the French tongue. He was admitted Bachelor of Physic in June 1531 [C], and it appears by the records of the Faculty, that in the year 1535, he taught in Tricquet-College, whilst Fernelius taught in Cornwall-College; but the latter had few auditors, whereas Sylvius had a great many [D]. The reason of which was because he made dissections, and taught Botany, and the preparation of remedies, which Fernelius did not do. Vidus Vidius, professor of Physic in the Royal College, being invited into Italy in the year 1548, none was thought better qualified than Sylvius to fill his place. He was unrefolved for the space of two years, whether he should accept of that employment; but at last he accepted it in 1550, and continued in it until his death, which happened the thirteenth of January 1555. It was the seventy-seventh year of his life (b) [E]. He was buried in the burying-place of poor scholars [F]. He never was married, and even had an aversion to women. He took more care to clear his style from the barbarisms that prevailed in the schools, than to leave off his rough and wild way [G]. He was so addicted to Galen's opinions, that he obstinately maintained his errors. Judicial Astrology was the only thing wherein he departed

(a) Symphorinus Champier, & Jerome Du-Mont.

(b) Taken from his Life prefixed to his works, and written by Renatus Moreau.

Sylvius hic fitus est, gratis qui nil dedit unquam, Mortuus & gratis quod legis ista, dolet.

Henry Stephens translated it into French verse, thus (8).

(8) Apolog.
d'Herodote, pag.
168.

Ici git Sylvius auquel onq en sa vie
De donner rien gratis ne prit aucun' envie,
Et ores qu'il est mort, & tout rongé de vers,
Encores ha depit qu'on lit gratis ces vers.

*Here lies Sylvius in his grave,
Who when alive naught gratis gave,
And even grumbles now he's dead
That you these verses gratis read.*

Another satirical piece was published against him, wherein he was taxed with avarice in a pleasant manner: Moreau ascribes it to Henry Stephens. That libel was a dialogue, intitled Sylvius ocreatus, and the author of it took the name of Ludovicus Arribavenus Mantuanus. It is matter of fact, that Sylvius called for his boots a little before he died, and put them on, to sit by the fire side, and expired booted. Whereupon the author of the satire feigned that Sylvius had put on his boots to cross the Acheron without a boat, and without paying any thing for the ferryage. He was also bantered in that book, for loving to talk, in a Shoemaker's shop; which was somewhat strange for a man so learned, and so little sociable. One of his scholars, called John Melet, wrote an answer to that satire, under the fictitious name of Claudius Burgensis (9).

(9) E. Renatus Moreau, in Vita Jacobi Sylvi.

[B] His avarice allowed him not to be at the necessary charges.] Renatus Moreau heard an old Physician of Montpellier say, that Sylvius promised the professors of that university to bring a vast number of students from all parts of the kingdom, if they would admit him into their society gratis; and that his proposal not being accepted, he resolved to return to Paris, to desire the Faculty to give him leave to teach.

(10) In Catalogo Doctor. Montpel.

[C] He was admitted Bachelor of Physic in June 1531.] The records of the Faculty, which prove this fact, irrefragably confute those, who would maintain, after Ranchin (10), that Sylvius was a Physician at Montpellier; for since he was made bachelor of Physic after his journey to Montpellier, it is undeniable, that he was not admitted doctor at Montpellier, before he returned to Paris: Besides, it is certain he did not leave Paris after he took his bachelor's degree in that university (11).

(11) Moreau, in Vita Jacobi Sylvi.

[D] Sylvius had a great many.] He published for the use of his scholars, the practice of Mark Gatt-

VOL. V.

naria: it is said that nine hundred copies were sold off in one or two days, and that the Bookfeller was obliged to make a second edition (12). A Poet (13) who made his epitaph, says, that a thousand eyes were fixed upon him, when he read his lectures:

*Quem certa metodo medicis de rebus agentem,
Assidue in ludo totius principe terræ,
Mille acri assidue spectabant lumina visa.*

(12) Ibid.
(13) J. V. Virgatus, apud Moreau, ibid.

Moreau understands it of five hundred auditors, and quotes Sylvius himself, who says, he had but four hundred, auditoribus circiter quadringentis (14). If it be so, Moreau should not have said that Sylvius's school might be compared with that of Theophrastus (15), who had two thousand scholars. Henry Stephens (16) says only that Sylvius had two or three hundred scholars.

[E] He died the thirteenth of January 1555. It was in the seventy-seventh year of his life.] Renatus Moreau quotes five authors for it, viz. Mizaldus, Pächalis Gallus, Arribavenus (17), Claudius Burgensis, and la Croix du Maine. But he observes, at the same time, that Sammarthanus (18), and Gesner (19) say, that he lived only sixty-three years; that Du Breul (20) places his death on the first day of February 1554; and that according to Nancelius and Rouville, he flourished in 1557, and 1560. My edition of Du Breul of the year 1639 in quarto, places Sylvius's death in the sixty-third year of his life, and on the tenth of January 1554. Moreri, Merklinus (21), and Freherus (22) have committed the same mistake with Sammarthanus.

[F] He was buried in the burying-place of poor scholars.] He ordered it so by his will. That burying-place is before Montaigu-college. The funeral was performed with great pomp; all the university were present at it, and the Physicians put on their scarlet gowns, the name of that burying-place puts me in mind of a tract written by Sylvius in favour of poor scholars: It is intitled, De vitiis ratione facili ac salubri pauperum Scholasticorum. He prescribes them a diet, which, said he, God had put into his heart to publish; and he enters upon such a detail as would make the men of our age laugh, who are less tractable than those of Sylvius's time. He advises the scholars, who awake in the night, to cough and spit stoutly, and gives them several little expedients for keeping themselves from being cold in bed. 'Ut citius incalcescas pedes etiam in nates raduces, in lectum inspira. . . . To be the sooner warm, draw up your feet into your breech, and breathe in your bed. It is likely, he knew the benefit of them by his own experience.

[G] His rough and wild way.] He seldom jested, and seldom departed from his gravity; and when he had a mind to appear more sociable, by some witty conceit,

(14) Prefat. Libri de Olibus.

(15) Diog. Laërt. in ejus Vita.

(16) Apologie d'Herodote, pag. 168.

(17) See, above, the remark [A].

(18) In Elogiis, pag. m. 27.

(19) In II Catal. Libr. Galeni.

(20) In Antiquit. Parisienf.

(21) In Lindenio renovato.

(22) In Theatro Virorum Eruditione clarorum.

departed from him [H]. I shall say something of his writings [I]. He was very much at variance with Vefalius [K].

conceit, he did it somewhat uncouthly. Here is the only merry thought that is told of him: He said one day, That he had parted with three beasts; his cat, his mule, and his maid.

[H] Judicial astrology was the only thing. It had never been so much in vogue both at court and in the town, as in Sylvius's time; and yet (23) he opposed it stoutly, whenever there was occasion for it. One day after he had railed bitterly at the Astrologers, he told his good friend Turnebus, that he had often been at the trouble to run over the whole almanack, in the beginning of the year, and set down fair weather where there was rainy weather; wind instead of calm; cloudy weather instead of clear weather; and having observed the event, he had found at the year's end, that he had been a much better Astrologer than they (24).

(23) Note, that instead of and yet, one might say, and therefore. This sort of things have two faces.

(24) Turnebus, Epist. ad. Cardinal. Lotharingum, præfixa Opusc. Plotarchi de Orac. defectu.

(25) See the remark [K].

(26) Mine is that of Geneva 1665. The Epistle Dedicatory is dated the first of September 1629.

(27) De Illustratione Medicis Parisiensibus, by Renatus Moreau.

ny encomiums upon Sylvius, collected out of divers authors, whereby it appears that he was a man in great esteem.

[K] He was very much at variance with Vefalius. The latter gave Sylvius the greatest trouble that ever he had. Sylvius's excellency lay in Anatomy, and he was preparing a work upon that subject, which he looked upon as his master-piece. In the mean time, Vefalius publishes in 1541, his Opus Anatomicum, so well done, and with so many fine cuts, that every body admires it. Vefalius had been Sylvius's scholar for the space of three years, which was another cause of his vexation; the disciple supplants the master. Besides, he writes against Galen, and not only charges him with several faults, tho' perhaps without reason, but plainly shews some of his real errors. How could Sylvius bear this, being looked upon as the restorer and first interpreter of Galen? Sylvius kept no measures, he maintained that Galen had writ nothing but what was true, and indulged his anger to such a degree, that he continually inveighed against his antagonist. Sylvius ita exarsit in iras tantoque odio commotus est in Vefalium, primo ut nihil à Galeno scriptum prolaturumque esse contenderet quod veritati non esset consentaneum; secundo ut nulla habita ratione ætatis et gravitatis sue, impetu quodam mentis fervore elatis animum declamandi in Vefalium (quem Vefanum appellabat) singulis diebus arripere, et contumeliosius exciperet, quam vel ipse propter prudentiam longa rerum experientia comparatam, vel Vefalius ob laudabile suum institutum ad utilitatem publicam destinatum mereretur (28). The emperor's Physician, and even some courtiers, who hated Vefalius, because of his presumption and merit, threw oil into the fire. That quarrel produced many books, and the progress of it may be known by reading Sylvius's book in Vefanum, Vefalius's letter de China radice, a piece of Francis Puteus in Vefalium, another of Renatus Henerus in Sylvium, Fallopius's Anatomical Observations, and Cuneus's Apology against Puteus.

SIMON or SIMONIS (THEODORUS) was born at Berchtede in the country of Holstein (a). See the remark [I] of the article of JANSENIUS, to which you may add what follows. Fromondus maintains (b); that this man being set at liberty, abjured his Heresies at Louvain, and that Janfenius gave him wherewithal to pay his charges in the tavern, and to make his journey. He further says, that he had forsaken his order at Magdeburg before he came to Louvain. I shall speak of the answer that was made to this account [A]. Some persons may think that a certain very impious book concerns our Simonis [B]; and therefore I here give notice that it is false. He changed his name into that of Philippus Cosmius (c).

(a) Mollerus, Usage ad Historiam Cheronensis Cimbricæ, Part. iii, pag. 108.

(b) Lib. Fromondus Crisi Desperata Cause Papatus, cap. xlv, pag. 284.

(c) Bibl. Antiquit. pag. 143.

[A] I shall speak of the answer that was made to this account. I shall not repeat what concerns Simonis's journey to Louvain, and his conferences with Janfenius (1). I shall only say, that after he had left that town, he writ a piece, De falsis principis fidei Pontificis ejusque Idolatria, which he sent to Janfenius in 1631. It contained the motives of his conversion, and he hoped that Janfenius would answer him; but he was mistaken: his silence made him proceed, and write a letter (2) to him, wherein he earnestly desired to have an answer from him, and published it. That letter contains the history of his imprisonment: it was inserted in a book of Voëtius (3), in 1635. Whereupon Fromondus thought himself obliged to speak of Simonis, in answer to that book of Voëtius. He gave a very unfaithful account of the matter, if we may depend upon the answer that was made him. See the Apologetical Letter which Simonis inscribed to him: it is prefixed to his treatise De statu & Religione propria Papatus adversus Cornelium Janfenium Episcopum Spremensem, printed at Leyden in 1638. He maintains that Fromondus falsified and suppressed several circumstances of the fact; he denies that he had abjured the Catholic religion at Louvain; he owns that he was for some time in the order of the Premonstratenses, but that he left it before he made any vow (4).

(1) See the article JANSENIUS, remark [I].

(2) Dated from Emmeric, the 12th of February 1632.

(3) Intituled Desperata Cause Papatus, See pag. 762, & seq.

(4) A voti monastici & Ordinis religionis liber in hunc usque diem perstitit.

[B] Some . . . may think that a certain very impious book concerns our Simonis. To know in general that Simonis's name is in the title of such a book, and that Theodorus Simonis was successively a Lutheran, a Papist, a Lutheran, and a Socinian; and was rector of a Socinian college in Poland, and that the book in question was printed in Poland, are things which may make people judge that this book was written by that Socinian; for the time is not always minded. This is the subject of this remark. Those who desire to know something of that impious book, need only read the following passage of Spizelius: 'De Atheismo in Polonia, ex Attheo libello, Cracovia anno 1588 tit: Simonis Religio, auctore incerto edito, judicium fieri poterit in quo præter portentia innumera hæc quoque verba reperiuntur; Credo in tria, Cælum, Terram, & Cæli formam, in Cælum patrem, atque creatorem omnium. In Terram omnium matrem, atque nutricem, & in Cæli formam omnia sentientem, & intelligentem. Ede itaque, bibe, lude, jam Deus signum est (5). - - One may form a judgment of the Atheism in Poland, by an impious book published at Cracow, in the year 1588, intituled, Simonis Religio, auctore incerto edito; wherein besides innumerable monstrous things these words are also found; I believe in three, the Heaven, the Earth, and the form of Heaven; in Heaven, the Father, and Creator of all things. In the Earth, the mother and nurse of all things; and in the form of Heaven, perceiving all things, and understanding them at steli credo

(5) Spizelius, in Serutinio Atheismi, pag. 43, 44. See also the same Spizelius, in infel. Literato, pag. 355, where he speaks more at large of that impious book. See also the remark [D] of the article SIMONIS.

SIMONETTA

SIMONETTA (HYACINTHUS) a Gentleman of Milan, was much esteemed for his bravery, and experience in war. He was made prisoner by a Gentleman of Bretagne, called James de Rommelin, Lieutenant of a company of the Seneschal d'Armagnac. This Briton, who amongst the Military men was called the little Captain la Lande, because he was a younger brother of the house of la Lande, carried his prisoner to the city of Asti, and set him at liberty, after he had received his ransom. Simonetta complained that la Lande had treated him unworthily, and wrote something to him concerning it, and having received an answer, he sent him a challenge to fight, which he accepted, inasmuch that the conditions thereof being settled by John James Trivulso, who commanded in the Astefan for the King of France, Charles VIII, and by Lucio Malvecio, Lieutenant of the Duke of Milan, the two champions entered the lists in the year 1496. The victory fell to the Gentleman of Bretagne (a), of which Trivulso gave a certificate, that may be seen at length in Bertrand d'Argentré (b), who corrects some mistakes concerning that famous duel [A].

(a) Taken from Bertrand d'Argentré Histoire de Bretagne, lib. xii, cap. lxi.

(b) Ibid.

[A] D'Argentré corrects some mistakes concerning that famous duel. He censures (1) Arnoldus Ferron (2) for having said that la Lande was a native of Bourdeaux, descended of a citizen family, and that the duel was fought in the presence of Charles VIII. Here are three things that are false; for la Lande was a gentleman of Brittany, and did not fight till 1496; and the king returned into France in the beginning of the year 1495. La Lande's antagonist was not called Christopher Zerbulo, and was not of Genoa, as Arnold Ferron affirms: he was called Hyacinthus Simonetta, and was a native of Milan. They did not fight on foot with swords, nor did la Lande run his sword into the belly of his enemy, as Ferron pretends. They fought on horseback, and their first attack was with their lances running in a full career one against the other, and afterwards with battle-axes. Simonetta was wounded in the face (3), as Trivulso, who was a spectator of the combat, hath declared in his attesta-

(1) Ferron in Hist. Caroli VIII. folio m. 37, verso.

(2) D'Argentré, ubi supra, pag. 703.

tion. Note, that Symphorianus Champier (4) in his life of Charles VIII, is displeased with Sabellicus, who, out of hatred to the French, hath made no mention of this duel, notwithstanding it was so memorable that a trophy was erected in the place where it was fought. D'Argentré adds (5), that Alciatus, who was then a professor of the Civil Law at Milan, spoke of that adventure in a book which he wrote de Duello: but that he is mistaken in saying (6) that Simonetta fought with Baiard; for the duel of Baiard was with Dom Alfonso de Sotomajore, in the year 1503. This criticism is right; but it is not true that Alciatus at that time taught Civil Law at Milan. He never was professor of that science: and he was not above four or five years old when la Lande and Simonetta fought. He dedicated his treatise de singulari Certamine to Francis I. the first day of March, 1529; he was then at Avignon.

(4) Ferron, ubi supra, fol. 38.

(5) D'Argentré, pag. 704.

(6) Alciat. de singulari certamine, cap. xxviii, pag. 67, Edit. Lugd. 1543 in 8vo.

SIMONIDES, an Iambic Poet, was born at Minoa (a) a town of the Isle of Amorgos one of the Sporades (b). If we will believe Suidas, he flourished 406 years after the taking of Troy; but it is very likely he is not so ancient. He is quoted by Athenæus, Julius Pollux, Ælian, and some other authors. He made a very ridiculous satire against women [A].

(a) Stephanus Byzantinus, Prologus.

(b) Strabo, lib. x, sub fin.

[A] He made a very ridiculous satire against women. He supposed that their souls had a different original, according to the diversity of their humours; that the souls of some women came from horses, foxes, or apes, &c. and that the souls of others proceeded from the sea, or the earth, &c. Ælian quotes what he said concerning women, who loved to paint and trick up themselves: he derived their souls from horses. Καὶ ὁ Σιμωνίδης δὲ, ἐκ παντοδαπῶν θηρίων λήγων τὰς γυναῖκας γενέσθαι τε, καὶ διαπλάσσειναι, ὅσων ἐνταῖς ἐκ τῶν ἰππῶν τὸ τε φιλόκομον καὶ φιλόμυρον συνίσχθηται κατ' ἐκείνης φύσεως: Quin et Simonides fabulans ex diversis bestiarum naturis conformatas esse mulieres, nonnullis earum ornatus et sequentiorum studium ex eorum natura innatum esse scribit (1). I omit the Greek verses that follow in Æ-

(1) Ælian, de Animal. lib. xvi, cap. xxiv, pag. m. 941.

lian, and I shall only set down the conclusion of that passage in Latin. Talis quidem uxor præbet se spectaculum aliis jucundum, sed viro nocet suo: Nisi ille fuerit aut rex, aut vir præpotens. Hujusmodi uxor oblectare quem queat. The meaning of which is, that such a woman is a pleasant sight to other men, but very prejudicial to her husband, unless he be a king or a great lord. You will find in Stobæus not only the same verses mentioned by Ælian, but also many more out of the same work of Simonides (2). That Poet was very near as unjust as the Italian author, who maintained that women have no souls (3). For the rest, if I ascribe to this Simonides, and not to that mentioned in the following article, the verses quoted by Ælian, I do but follow Leo Allatius's opinion (4).

(2) Stobæus, Sermone LXXI, de Vituperio Mulierum, fol. m. 252, verso.

(3) See Vigneul Marville's Melanges, Tom. I, pag. 16, 17.

(4) Allatius, de Simonem Scriptis, pag. 206, 207.

SIMONIDES, one of the best ancient Poets, was a native of Ceos, an island of the Ægean Sea. He flourished still in the time of Xerxes's expedition, that is, about the LXXVth Olympiad. He exercised his talent in composing several sorts of Poems; but he succeeded chiefly in elegies [A]. It is said that he was preserved twice from the

[A] He succeeded chiefly in elegies. This we learn of Quintilian. 'Simonides tenuis (1), alioqui sermone proprio & jucunditate quadam commendari potest: præcipua tamen ejus in commovenda miseratione virtus, ut quidam in hac eum parte omnibus ejusdem operis autoribus præferant (2). - - - Simonides's style was plain, but fitted to the subject with a certain sweetness; but his principal excellency lay in raising commiseration, and he was by some preferred to all authors on that account.' Dionysius Halicarnassensis acknowledges, among other virtues, that Simonides had the talent of moving to pity, and places him in that respect much above Pindar. Σιμωνίδης δὲ παρὰ ἡμῶν τὴν ἐκλογὴν τῶν ὀνομάτων, τῆς συντάξεως τὴν ἀρίστην, πρὸς τοῖς κατὰ ὁ βελτίων εὐρίσκειται καὶ Πινδάρου τὸ εὐκρίσεις καὶ μὴ μεγαλοπρεπείας.

(1) Concerning the simplicity of Simonides. See Mr le Fevre, Abregé de la Vie des Poètes Grecs, pag. m. 38.

(2) Quintil. Institut. Orat. lib. x, cap. i, pag. m. 468.

ἀλλ' ὡς ἐκείνου παθητικῶς. Simonides vero observat nomen delictum compositionis accuratam rationem; ad hoc, in quo etiam multo melior est ipso Pindaro, miserationem commovet, non ut ille magnifice, sed suo ipso more pathetice (3). When Horace has a mind to denote lamenting Muses, he uses an expression which represents our Poet.

Sed ne reliquis, Musa proci, jocos
Cæcæ retrahes munera nœmæ (4).

Catullus may be also quoted for the same thing (5). One of the most famous works of Simonides was intitled Lamentations (6). I have said, in another place (7), that he carried the prize of the elegy from Æschylus.

(3) Dionys. Halic. de veter. Script. Cens.

(4) Horat. Ode i, lib. ii.

(5) Paulus quid jubet adlocutionis mollioris lacrymis Simonidis. Catullus, Epig. XXXIX.

(6) See Mr le Fevre, ubi supra, pag. 39.

(7) In the article ÆSCHYLUS, remark [C].

[B] It

(a) Plutarchus an seni sit gerenda Respubl. pag.
765, A.

the danger of imminent death, and that this was a reward of his virtue [B]. The invention of local memory is ascribed to him [C]. He is one of those Poets, whose vein and memory lasted a long time; for at eighty years of age he disputed the prize of Poetry, and carried it (d), and boasted of having the best memory of any man in the world

(8) That is, Castor and Pollux.

(9) Cicero de Oratore, lib. ii,
fol. 87. D. See also Phædrus, lib.
iv, fol. xxiv.

(10) Val. Maxi-mus, lib. i, cap.
viii, num. vii,
in Ext.

(11) Solin. cap.
i, pag. m. 11.

(12) Salmast. Exercit. Plin.
Tom. i, pag. 53.

(13) Quæquam militum de Tyndaridis fabulosum videtur, neque omnino
huius rei meminit usquam poë-ta ipse, profecto non taciturnus de tanta sua gloria.
Quintilian, lib.
xii, cap. ii, pag.
m. 517.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) They were in a manner the patrons of wrestlers.

(16) Girac, Re-plique à Cœsar, §. liii, pag. m.
465. He quotes
the words of Callimachus, cited by Suidas: I shall speak of it afterward in remark
[E], citat (26).

[B] It is said that he was preserved twice from the danger of imminent death, and that this was a reward of his virtue. One day he supped at Scopas's house, and who was a considerable man for his noble birth, and great riches. After he had recited the Poem he had made for a set price in that man's honour, wherein he had inserted an encomium upon Castor and Pollux, he was told, that he should receive one half of the price agreed upon, that he might, if he thought fit, ask the other half of the Tyndarides (8), on whom he had bestowed as many praises as upon Scopas. Soon after he was informed that two young men stood at the door, and desired to speak with him. He went out and saw no body. In the mean time the room, where he had left Scopas, and the other guests, fell down, and they were all killed. Cicero relates this in very fine words. *Dicunt quum cœnaret Gramæus in Theſſalia Simonides apud Scopam fortunatum hominem et nobilem, cecidissetque id carmen, quod in eum scripsisset, in quo multa ornandi causa poetarum more in Castorem scripta, et Pollucem fuisset, nimis illum fœdè Simonides dixisset, se dimidium ejus ei quod pœctus esset pro illo carmine, daturum, reliquum à suis Tyndaridibus, quos æque laudasset, peteret, si ei videretur. Paulo post esse ferunt nuntiatus Simonidi, ut prodiret, juvenes stare ad januam duos quosdam, qui eum magnopere evocarent, surrexisse illum ipsum, prodisse, vidisse neminem. Hoc interim spatio conclavæ illud, ubi epularetur Scopas, cecidisse, ea ruina ipsum oppressum cum suis interisse (9). Valerius Maximus relates the same thing (10), but he is guilty of an inexcusable omission; for he does not say why Castor and Pollux did that good service to Simonides. Note, that Solinus ascribes to Pindar what all other writers ascribe to Simonides, with respect to this divine favour (11). Salmastius suspects that Solinus did so to conceal his theft, I mean, to make people believe that he was not a mere transcriber of Pliny (12). Observe also that Quintilian calls this apparition of the Tyndarides a fable (13), because that Poet, who doubtless would not have deprived himself of so great a glory, does not mention it in his works. He observes that authors do very much differ as to the person in whose honour Simonides made that poem: nor did they agree about the town where the entertainment was given. But he informs us of one thing, which Cicero should not have omitted. He tells us that the person, whom Simonides praised, was a victorious wrestler. Cum pugili coronato carmen, quale componi victoribus solet, mercede pacta scripsisset; abnegata ei pecuniæ pars est, quod more poetis frequentissimo digressus, in laudes Castoris et Pollucis exierat (14). The omission of this particular by Cicero is very prejudicial to Simonides; for one would think he had made improper digressions, and that he was so imprudent as to obscure the glory of the man, who had bought his panegyric, by inserting in it an encomium upon the gods. But if we consider that Simonides was to celebrate the victory of a wrestler, the objection vanishes away, and it is plain that Castor and Pollux (15) were to have a share in his praises. Wherefore it is not a blameable digression, but a necessary episode. As for the rest, Mr de Girac makes a wrong criticism upon Quintilian. The learned Rhetorician, says he (16), would not have made use of a negative argument, if he had read in Callimachus that Simonides himself mentions that adventure in words full of gratitude towards his deliverers. It is certain that Quintilian might have said what he says, notwithstanding Callimachus's verses. There is a vast difference between what a Poet relates in his poems, and what others make him say in their writings. Here follows the other miracle. Simonides having landed, found the dead body of an unknown man upon the shore, and buried it. That unknown man warned him in a dream, not to take shipping again the next day: Simonides followed his advice, and he saw the vessel shipwrecked. He made a poem upon that adventure. *Longe indulgentius Dii in poeta Simonides, cujus salutarem inter quietem admonitionem consilii firmitate roboraverunt. Is enim cum ad litus navem appulisset, inhumatumque corpus jacens sepulture mandasset, admonitus ab eo ne proximo die navigaret, in terra remansit: Qui inde solverant, fluctibus & procellis in conspectu ejus obruti sunt. Ipse lætatus est, quod vitam suam somnio, quam navi, credere maluisset. Memor autem beneficii, elegantissimo eum carmine æternitati consecravit, melius illi & diuturnius in animis hominum sepulchrum constituens, quam in desertis arenis struxerat (17). . . . The gods were far more indulgent to the Poet Simonides, and confirmed him in the resolution which he had taken from the wholesome advice he had received in his sleep. For when he was ready to take shipping, and had buried the dead body of a man which lay on the shore, he was warned by the same man not to go to sea the next day, and stay at land. They who had taken shipping perished, in his fight, by a storm, and were swallowed up in the waves. Simonides rejoiced, because he had trusted his life rather to a dream than a ship. Being mindful of the favour, he immortalized that man in a most elegant poem, erected a better and more durable tomb to him, than that which he had formerly built upon the desert sands. He did not think that humanity required any thing from him besides the burying of the dead body; but being so well rewarded for that favour, he went farther, and put this glorious epitaph upon the tomb of that unknown man.

ὄψ' αὖν Κείριο Σιμωνίδῃ ἐστὶ σωτήρ, ὅς καὶ τεθνήσκ' ὤν' ἰ παρ' ἄλλ' ἔχεν.

Hic quidem Cei Simonidis est servator,
Qui & mortuus vivo retulit gratiam (18).

This is the tomb of the man who saved the life of Simonides of Ceos, and who, after his death, was grateful to the living.

[C] The invention of local memory is ascribed to him. It will not be improper to observe upon what occasion he invented it. When Scopas and his guests were crushed by the fall of the room, they were so disfigured that they could not be known one from another. And yet there was a necessity to know them; for those, who designed to bury them, desired to perform that duty, each to his kinsman. Simonides removed the difficulty; he remembered in what place each guest sat down at table, and was thereby enabled to tell each of their relations which of them was to be buried by him. Afterwards considering how necessary order is to preserve the ideas of objects, he invented the method of annexing them to certain places, that is, he was the inventor of local memory. Cicero shall be my voucher (19). Non sum tanto ego, inquit, ingenio, quanto Themistocles fuit, ut oblivionis artem quam memoriam malim, gratiamque habeo Simonidi illi Cbio, quem primum servavit artem memoriam protulisse. Dicunt enim quum cœnaret . . . (20) Quos quum burnare vellent sui, neque possent obtritios interoscere ullo modo, Simonides dicitur ex eo quod meminisset quo eorum loco quique cubuisset, demonstrator uniuscujusque sepeliendi fuisse. Hac tum re admonitus invenisse fertur, ordinem esse maxime, qui memoriam lumen afferret. Itaque iis qui C. hanc partem ingenii exercerent, locos esse capiendos, et ea quæ memoria tenere vellent effingenda animo, atque in his locis collocanda: sic fore, ut ordinem rerum locorum ordo conservaret, res autem ipsas rerum effigies notaret, atque ut locis pro cera, simulacris pro literis uteremur. That author observes, in another place, that Simonides had a very good memory (21). These words of Philostratus give a great idea of it: Apollonius being an hundred years old had still a better memory than Simonides ever had in his greatest vigour; and he used to sing a canticle which that Poet had made in praise of memory, wherein he says, that every thing fades and vanishes away in time, whereas time never grows old, is never corrupted, and always remains the same, with memory that goes along with it (22). Some authors say, that Simonides took some remedies to acquire a good memory, which produced the intended effect (23).

[D] At eighty years of age he disputed the prize of Poetry. This he mentioned in one of his poems.

(17) Valet.
Maximus, lib. i,
cap. vii, num. iii,
in Ext. See also Cicero, de Divinatione, lib. i,
fol. 308, C.

(18) Trete.
Cibitad. i, ffol.
xxiv. He quotes
one Aristides. See Vollius, de Histor. Græcia, lib.
iii, cap. xxx,
pag. 331, where he corrects this passage of Tusanus.

(19) Cicero de Oratore, lib. ii,
fol. 87, D. See also Quintilian,
lib. xi, cap. ii,
pag. 517.

(20) You may see in the foregoing citation (9), the words I omit here.

(21) Cicero,
Tusculan. Quest.
lib. i, fol. 249.

(22) Philostratus, in the life of Apollonius, book i, ch. ix. See the same in Vita Sophistar. lib. ii,
in Proclo.

(23) Scriptorum
varii memorant
Cyrum regem
& Simonidem Lyricum, &
Hippiam Eleum
. . . . ideo valuit
se memoria quod epotis quibdam remediis id impetarant. Anst.
Marcell. lib. xvi,
cap. v, pag. m.

Simonides,

(b) See the Greek Diftich mentioned by Arifides (αἱ) τῷ παραφθίγγματος. Valerius in Amm. Marcell. lib. xvi. cap. vi, pag. m. 176, quotes it. (c) Σιμωνίδης ὁ Κείος ἔτιπ' τὰ ἐνενήκοντα (ἔχον). Simonides Ceus supra nonaginta (vixit). Lucian, in Macrobis, fab. finem, pag. m. 644, Tom. ii. Sudas maket him live eighty-nine years, and not ninety-nine, at Giraldus des. Dialog. lib. xi, Histories Petrar. pag. 567.

(24) Valer.
Maximus, lib.
viii, cap. vii,
num. 13, in Ext.

(25) Διαλύει
τὸν τάφον τῷ Σιμωνίδῃ μάλιστα ἀνηθῶς τε
καὶ ἀνοίκτως.
Simonidis sepul-chrum cum magna contempe-& crudeliter dissolvit. Suidas, in Σιμωνίδης,
pag. π. 741, 742.

(26) Taken from Suidas,
ibid.

(29) Id. ibid.
Part. ii, lib. iii,
cap. i, pag. m.
153.

(30) Suidas says that Simonides lived till the LXXVIIIth Olympiad.

(31) Cicero, de
Natura Deorum,
lib. i, pag. 83,
Edit. Lescaloperrij.

(32) See Ælian
Var. Histor.
lib. iv, cap. xv
& lib. ix, cap. i

is as much as to say, that if Oswald or those had asked mean, the answer he gave to Hiero, tyrant of Syracuse, to whose court he went, notwithstanding asked the most ignorant of the Christians, What is GOD, and which are his attributes, they would immediately have received a direct answer, and so full, that nothing would have been wanting. Tertullian goes too fast, and suffers himself to be carried away by his imagination. He considereth not that the Pagan Philosophers, who acknowledged themselves unable to satisfy the curiosity of those who asked them, what God was, were only at a loss for an answer, because they would not rest contented with the vulgar notions, as an ignorant person would have done. Nothing could have been more easy than for them to have answered, God is an infinite being, and omnipotent, who framed the universe and governs it, who punishes and rewards, who is angry with sinners, and is atoned by our sacrifices. In this manner would our trademen have answered Hiero, adding what we read in the Catechism concerning the persons in the Trinity, and the death and passion of JESUS CHRIST, &c. Once more, if Thales or Simonides had been satisfied with these general notions, they would not have demanded time to prepare their answer, they would have had it in readiness. But as they desired that all the terms of the definition required should be evidently indisputable, and found themselves, that whatever they could propose might be disputed, they demanded one delay after another, and at last were not able to answer. I believe Simonides imagined, that his answer would be proposed to be canvassed by all the fine wits of the court of Syracuse, and that he would be obliged to defend it by resolving all their difficulties.

(34) See, above, the remark [7] of the article EPICURUS, and Dr Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury, in the History of the Works of the Learned, October 1699, pag. 442.

(35) Si mentem istam quasi animal aliquod esse voluit, erit ali-quid interius ex quo illud animal nominetur. Quid autem interius mente? Cingitur igitur corpore externo. Quod quoniam non placet, aperta, simplexque mens nullâ re adjunctâ quæ sentire possit, fugere intelligentiæ nostræ vim & notionem videtur. Cicero, lib. 1, de Natura Deorum, pag. 39. Edit. Lelkalepica.

This is what probably he thought with himself. If I say, that God is a being distinct from all the bodies which compose the universe, I shall be asked if the universe always existed, at least as to the matter of it? Had that matter an efficient cause? And if I answer that it had one, I oblige myself to maintain that it was made of nothing, but this is a doctrine I shall never be able to make either Hiero or the fine wits of his court to comprehend, and which I cannot comprehend myself: wherefore I have reason to be uncertain my self, whether that point is true or not: for so long as it is to me incomprehensible, I cannot be rightly assured of its state and nature. If I say, that the matter of the universe hath no efficient cause, I shall be asked, whence comes God to have the power over it, and why hath it not as much power over God as he hath over it (34)? I must give good reasons, why of two beings independent one of the other as to existence, equally necessary and eternal, one hath all power over the other, without being reciprocally liable to be acted upon by the other. It is not sufficient to say, that God is a being distinct from bodies which compose the universe. They will desire to know, whether he is like them with respect to extension, that is, whether he is extended. If I answer, that he is extended, they will infer that he is corporeal and material: and I do not find myself able to make them understand, that there are two kinds of extension, one corporeal, the other incorporeal; one composed of parts and consequently divisible, the other perfectly simple and of consequence indivisible. If I say that God is not extended, it will be inferred that he is no where, and that he cannot have any union with the world. And how then shall he move the bodies? How can he act where he is not? Besides, our understanding is not capable to conceive a substance unextended, and a spirit entirely separated from matter (35). But supposing it should be granted me, that God is an immaterial and unextended substance, a spirit infinite and omnipotent. How many new questions should I have to resolve? Does this spirit not necessarily exist, either with respect to his substance, or with respect to his qualities? Is not his power an attribute as necessary as his knowledge? Therefore he does not act freely, taking freedom to be the power of acting, or not acting. Whatever he does therefore is necessary and unavoidable; I shall be told that I entirely destroy religion, for religion is necessarily founded upon the supposition that God changeth his behaviour to men, as they change their manner of living; and if they did not appease him by their prayers, he would do a great many things, which, in regard to their devotion, he will abstain from doing. But if to avoid this troublesome inconveniency, I have recourse to the hypothesis of the liberty of indifferency, and of conditional wills, I lay myself under an obligation to extensional plain, both how this sort of liberty can be consistent with a being that is not the cause of its own power (36), and how an infinite train of conditional decrees, is compatible with a cause infinitely wise and independent, which must have followed a plan fixed and immoveable, and which at bottom hath no attribute more essential than immutability; for there is not any excellency more evidently contained in the idea of a being infinitely perfect than this of unchangeableness. These are, if I am not mistaken, a few of the reasons which offered themselves to Simonides, when he sought for the definition demanded of him, and which made him determine not to give any, so afraid was he of affirming what was not true.

I may venture to say, that of most men it becomes Tertullian the least to insult our Thales, and to boast of our trademen, for had he been in the place of Thales or Simonides, he would have but poorly come off. His zeal and hasty temper would have prompted him to give an immediate answer to the question of Croesus, or that of Hiero. But if you desire to know what answer he would have made, read these words of Dailly (37): How strange is his Philosophy, concerning the nature of GOD, whom he seems to make subject to passions like ours, to anger, to hatred, to grief? He ascribes to him a corporeal substance, not believing (as he says) that any one would deny that GOD is a body, which will surprise us less, if he boldly asserts, that there is no substance but what is corporeal. Every one may see, that Tertullian would have defined God to be a corporeal substance subject to passions. If he had explained his definition, he would have said, that our sins exasperate the Deity, that he hates the crime, and feels a real sorrow when his laws are violated: but is easily appeased when his mercy is implored. Would he have been able to maintain this answer before Simonides, and the other sages, whom King Hiero entertained at his court? Would they not have objected to him that every body is divisible, and compounded of parts; and of consequence, that the infinitely perfect being is not a body. Would they not have said, that supreme happiness is essential to the divine nature, which therefore is not subject to passion, nor to any trouble or vexation? Would they not have said, that the divine nature is unchangeable, and consequently cannot alter either from love to hatred, or from hatred to love, nor from compassion to wrath, nor from wrath to compassion? If he had recurred to metaphors, would he not have been told, that Hiero wanted not a rhetorical answer, but an accurate definition, exactly conformable to the laws of Logic, or right reasoning. It will be owned, I assure myself, that Tertullian had done better had he been silent, as he was whom he insults. Let us suppose, that his Christian trademan whom he represents so knowing, were asked by Hiero, and should answer, GOD is a being immaterial, infinite, all-powerful, perfectly good, perfectly happy, and infinitely just, who created all things according to the good pleasure of his own will; can we think, that Simonides examining that answer, would not have said, all this I knew as well as you; but I would not venture to assert it, because it appears to me, that a being infinitely powerful, infinitely good, infinitely holy, and who had created all things with a perfect liberty of indifferency, would not have subjected man to that sinful and miserable state in which he lives. Had he left the soul at liberty to unite it self to the body or not, it would never have entered into the body; for by such a choice, the soul would have appeared too foolish to be the workmanship of a being infinitely perfect. If it is he who joins our souls to bodies, he must be induced to it by some determination natural and irresistible; for acting freely, that is, having power to act or to abstain from acting, to act after one, or after another manner, it cannot be imagined that he would have taken that course, seeing the soul by its union with the body, becomes subjected to a thousand

(36) The nature of God, with all his attributes, doth necessarily exist, wherefore his power and his will are necessary beings, but necessity excludes indifferency.

(37) Dailly of the right use of the Fathers, book ii, ch. iv, pag. 354.

† Tertull. lib. i, adv. Marc. cap. 25, & 1, 2, cap. xvi.

† Id. adv. Orig. cap. vii, & lib. ii, contra Marc. cap. xvi. Quis negabit Deum corpus esse, etsi Deus spiritus est?

† Id. lib. adv. Hermog. cap. 35. Cum ipsa substantia corpus sit cujusque.

withstanding his great age; being prompted to it by his covetousness, for he loved money

a thousand disgraceful and absurd disorders, and to almost a continual misery. 'Quinetiam dicunt, si anima est divina potestque vivere sejuncta à membris mortalibus, ut quid se miseræ carni insinuat? ejus vitio tot perpetitur mala, & admittat tot flagitia? ergo stulta est, si sponte hoc facit: at si invita nefandas corporis ingreditur latebras, quis cogit? an ipse Juppiter? ergo Deus nequaquam hanc diligit: imo carcere quam claudit tam turpi, odisse videtur (38).

(38) Palingenius, in Zodiaco Vitæ, lib. vii, pag. m. 189.

- - - But, moreover they say, If the soul is divine, and can live separated from its mortal members, why does it join itself to a miserable body? by the gravity of which it suffers so much evil, and commits so much wickedness? therefore it is foolish, if it does this of its own accord: but if unwillingly it enters the vile caverns of the body, who compels it? Does Jupiter himself? therefore GOD loves it not; yea, he appears to hate what he hath shut up in so detestable a prison. But we will not leave our Christian tradesman to sustain all the charge: we will call in a Divine, who may explain to Simonides the whole system of Grace, and all the oconomy of the decrees of Predestination: undoubtedly this Poet would answer him, you carry me from one dark region to another still more obscure. I cannot comprehend how under the government of a God who had the attributes you mention, there can ever be occasion for any punishment; for the sovereign power of such a deity, together with an unlimited goodness and holiness, would never permit any punishable crime to be perpetrated in his dominions. Such a being as this seems to me incapable of making his glory to result from the misery of another, or depend on the endless duration of infernal torments: I even apprehend there is a downright inconsistency betwixt these two things, three Persons who are but one God, of which the one punisheth, and the other is punished, and yet it cannot be said, that he who is punished, punisheth, and that he who punisheth is punished, tho' yet both, one and the other are only one and the self same substance, only one and the same God! These three Persons, I say, are to me a direct contradiction. Wherefore I chose rather to give no answer to the Prince of Syracuse, than to have proposed to him such definitions of God.

But, it may be said, Is then Tertullian grossly mistaken, when he prefers Christian tradesmen to the Philosophers? I answer, That what he asserts may very well be rectified. There needs only be said, that the meanest Christian tradesman does steadfastly believe more things concerning the nature of God, than the greatest of heathen Philosophers have been able to attain the knowledge of. He needs only declare that with his bare Catechism, he will give so great a number of particulars, that for one thing they did partly affirm, he will assert forty without hesitation. This is what Tertullian might have said without being mistaken. But these Christians so knowing in comparison of Thales, and any other Philosophers of ancient Greece, would have been as much at a stand what to say, and as silent as Thales, if they had offered nothing but what they did clearly and distinctly comprehend; and they are beholden for their great knowledge, only to their having the happiness of being educated in a Church, where they obtained an historical, and even sometimes a justifying faith of revealed truths. This convinces them of the existence of several things which they do not comprehend. Our greatest divines, if they acted as Simonides did, that is, if they affirmed nothing for certain concerning the nature of GOD, but what by the light of reason appeared to them undeniable, evident, and proof against all objections, would have continually demanded farther delays of all the Hierocles in the world. Add moreover, that though Simonides should have had the opportunity of consulting and examining the scriptures, without the influence either of education or grace, he would not have got out of his labyrinth and silence. Reason would forbid him to deny the facts contained in the scripture, and make him perceive something supernatural in the connection and order of these facts; but this would not have been sufficient to bring him to a determination. The powers of reason, and Philosophical examination, go no farther than to hold us in suspense, and to keep us in fear of erring, whether we affirm, or whether we deny (39). Either the Grace of God, or education must necessarily come in to their assistance. And carefully observe, that there is not any system against which reason affords more objections than that of the gospel. The mystery of the Trinity, the incarnation of the Word, his death for the expiation of our sins, the propagation of Adam's sin, the eternal predestination of a few men to heavenly happiness, the eternal condemnation of almost all men to the torments of hell, which will never have an end; the loss of free-will ever since the fall of Adam, &c. are matters, which would have furnished Simonides with greater doubts, than his imagination did ever suggest to him. Let us mind what St Paul says (40), not only that the gospel was a stumbling-block to the Jews, and foolishness to the Greeks, but also that God saved men by the foolishness of preaching.

Here follows a consideration which, perhaps, ought not to be slighted. Simonides was, in all likelihood, in great difficulty, about the genus of the definition: he durst not say that God was matter, an hundred objections hindered him. He durst not say that God was a spirit; for he could apprehend nothing but under the notion of extension. Until Des Cartes, all our doctors, both Divines, and Philosophers, attributed extension to spirits; infinite extension to God, and finite to angels, and rational souls. It is true, they maintained that this extension was not material, nor compounded of parts, and that spirits are wholly in every part of the space wherein they are, Toti in toto & toti in singulis partibus. Hence proceeded the three species of local presence, ubi circumscriptivum, ubi definitivum, ubi repletivum, the first for bodies, the second for created spirits, the third for God. The Cartesians have rejected all these tenets, they say, that spirits have no kind of extension, nor local presence; but their opinion is rejected as very absurd. Wherefore almost all our Philosophers, and all our Divines, do at this day still teach according to the popular opinion, that the substance of God is diffused through infinite spaces. But certainly, this is pulling down with one hand, what hath been set up by the other; it is, in effect, ascribing to God materiality, which had been denied of him. You say, that he is a spirit, very well, this is ascribing to him a nature different from matter: but at the same time you say, that his substance is diffused every where: you say therefore that he is extended: but we have no idea of two kinds of extension; we clearly conceive that all extension of whatever kind it be, hath distinct parts, impenetrable, and separable from one another: it is monstrous to say that the soul is all in the brain, and all in the heart. It is inconceivable, that the divine extension, and the extension of matter can be in the same place; this would be a real penetration of dimensions, which our reason cannot apprehend. Besides, things which are penetrated by a third, are penetrated by one another (41), and thus the heavens, and the terrestrial globe, are mutually penetrated; for they would be penetrated with the divine substance; which, according to you, has no parts; hence it follows, that the sun is penetrated by the same being as the earth. In one word, if matter is matter only because it is extended, by consequence all extension is matter: you cannot shew any attribute different from extension, by virtue of which matter is matter. The impenetrability of bodies can only result from their extension, we can conceive no other grounds of it, and so you must grant, that if spirits were extended, they would be impenetrable, wherefore they would not be different from bodies by penetrability. After all, according to the common doctrine, the divine extension is neither more nor less impenetrable or penetrable, than that of body. Its parts, call them virtual as much as you please, its parts, I say, cannot be penetrated one by another, but they may be penetrated by the parts of matter. Do not you say the same thing concerning the parts of matter; they cannot penetrate one another, but they can penetrate the virtual parts of the divine extension? If you will but attentively consult common sense, you will perceive, that when two extensions are penetratively in the same place, the one is as penetrable as the other. It cannot therefore be said, that

(39) Observe that the matter in question between Hiero and Simonides, was not the existence of God, but a true definition of what he is.

(40) 1 Cor. i. 23.

(41) Quæ penetrantur cum uno tertio penetrantur inter se. By this axiom, those are refuted who say that a solid body is made up of mathematical points.

extension of spirits money (d), and knew that Hiero was a liberal prince. Some Divines would not have made the extension of matter differs from any other sort of extension by impenetrability: It is therefore certain, that all extension is matter, and consequently you only take from God the name of matter, and attribute to him the thing itself; when you affirm that he is extended. Since therefore it was not possible for you to have done otherwise, you ought not to wonder, that Simonides durst not deny that God was matter; neither durst he affirm it; he chose rather to be silent. We must remember, that the most subtle Cartesian maintain, that we can form no idea of a spiritual substance. We only know by experience that it thinks, but we know not what is the nature of that thinks, whose modifications are thoughts; we know not what is the subject in which these thoughts exist, or the ground that supports them. Simonides perhaps, was hereby obliged not to say that God was a spirit. He could not conceive what a spirit was.

(d) See the remark [N], citation (86).

A Jesuit, who writ a commentary upon Cicero's books De Natura Deorum, does not blame Simonides for being so reserved, and wishes the ancient Poets and Philosophers, and the heretics had imitated him. What he observes, concerning the incomprehensibility of God, deserves to be transcribed here. 'Quæ Tertullianus incititæ, alii modellæ dederunt. Atque utinam veteres philosophi, & poætæ, quique illos secuti sunt Hæretici, hac in parte tam reverendi, quam Thales, aut Simonides, fuissent: nunquam profecto adeo absurda, impia, & blasphema Divinæ Naturæ affinxissent, nunquam impigressent in fœdissimos errores, in quos per summam impudentiam præfidentur homunculos videmus, & dolemus impigressisse. Nimirum tenemur omnes magno quodam sciendi studio, cognoscendi verò numinis, multò majore: ex quo Deum quidem à nobis cognosci velle licet intelligere; sed intra fines præstitutos, & intra columnas, quibus suo ipse quasi digito inscripsit, Ne plus ultra: sunt enim divinis in rebus adyta quædam, in quæ Magnus Deus non vult nos penetrare: quod si quis temeritate, & confidentia sui elatus porro pergit, ac perumpere, hoc sacrarium attentat, quò penitus ingreditur, eo densiores illi tenebræ offunduntur, ut vel sic, & Divinæ Naturæ majestatem impervestigabilem, & humanæ mentis imbecillitatem, si quid sapit, agnoscat, ac confiteri cum Simonide cogatur, Quanto diutius considero, tantò mihi res videtur obscurior. Quemadmodum de specu quodam Coricio narrat Pomponius Mela, qui primùm jucundâ quadam amœnitatē allecat adeuntē ad se, donec altius, atque altius ingressos tandem horror quidam ac Majestas numinis illic inhabitantis pedem referre compellat (42). -- What Tertullian imputes to ignorance, others have ascribed to modesty, and I wish the ancient Philosophers and Poets, and the heretics who came after them, had in this matter been as reserved as Thales or Simonides were: They would never have attributed to the divine nature things so absurd, impious, and blasphemous, or ever have broached such detestable errors, as bold, impudent, and despicable men have done. All men are naturally very desirous of knowledge, but especially of the Deity: whereby we may perceive that GOD would be known by us, but he hath set certain bounds to our knowledge, beyond which we neither ought nor can proceed, and hath as it were erected pillars, engraven, as it were, with his own finger, with a Ne, plus ultra: For in things divine, there are holy recesses into which the great GOD will not permit us to enter; but if any, puffed up with rashness and confidence, will presumptuously attempt it, the further he goes, the more he will be surrounded by darkness, so that he will be obliged to acknowledge the unsearchable majesty of the divine nature, and the imbecility of the human mind, and confess with Simonides, The longer I consider, the matter appears to me the more obscure. As Pomponius Mela relates of a certain cave, that with a delightful pleasure at first allured those that entered, till going still further, a certain horror, and the majesty of the inhabiting Deity forced them to retire. Afterwards, he quotes a remarkable passage of St Augustin (43). A French author looked upon Simonides's modesty as a pious action, and took from thence occasion to inveigh against the boldness of the Eunomians. 'Remember, says he (44), the pious modesty of Simonides, who having asked but one day of King Hiero, to discourse of the divine essence before him, asked him afterwards two days, and then three, protesting that the more he thought upon it, the more he found it difficult to perform his promise. For my part, I make no doubt, but that this humble acknowledgment of his ignorance was more acceptable to the Supreme Being, as much as heathen as Simonides was, than the boldness of an Eunomius, and of that kind of Ariens, who followed him, and boasted of comprehending God as fully as he could comprehend himself.' Du Pleffis Mornai, in the chapter wherein he proves by reasons and authorities that it is impossible to comprehend

God (45), did not forget Simonides's answer. He observes (46), without quoting any body, that this Poet taught very well that GOD is wisdom itself. He says in another place (47), that Aristotle in his Metaphysics mentions and commends the known answer of Simonides to Hiero, importing in short that none but GOD is a Metaphysician, that is, can speak of things that are above nature. In perusing the Metaphysics of Aristotle I could not find that passage. But be that as it will, the thought is very good, and is of the same import.

When I said that I have not in that work of Aristotle, met with that passage which Mr Du Pleffis quotes, it was in respect of the circumstances of that citation, namely, that it is an answer of Simonides to Hiero commended by Aristotle; for otherwise I found the following words in the second chapter of the first book. Διὸ καὶ δίκαιός ἐστιν ἐκ ἀνθρώπων νομοκράτορ αὐτῆς ἡ κτίσις. πολλὰ γὰρ ἡ φύσις δέλη τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἐστίν. ὥς κατὰ Σιμωνίδην. Θεὸς δὲ μὴ ἐπὶ τῷ τοῦ ἔχουσιν γέρας ἀνδρα δ' ἐκ ἀνθρώπων μὴ ζῆλον τὴν κατὰ αὐτὸν ἐπιστήμην. Quæ circa merito, ejus possessio non humana existimari potest. Multis enim in rebus serva natura hominum est. Itaque ut Simonidi placet, solus Deus hunc sibi honorem vindicat. At non decet virum eam scientiam, quæ sibi congruit, non querere (48). Those words amount to this: The knowledge of the first principles is so sublime, that it might be reasonably said, that the possession of it does not belong to man; and therefore, according to Simonides, that possession is the privilege of God only: But it were an unbecoming thing for man not to endeavour to know himself, or to neglect the knowledge that concerns him. I fancy, that if I had lived in Aristotle's time, I should have found his thought clearer than it is: However, I can find nothing in it, whereby it may appear that he commends or approves Simonides's opinion, and I have read some Commentators, who directly affirm that he confutes it. Fonseca making a paraphractical note upon those words of Aristotle puts in the margin Refutatio sententiæ Simonidis. Here is the text which answers to that summary. 'Adeo compertum est hanc scientiam non esse humanam possessionem, ut inde sumperit Simonides poeta sui erroris occasionem. Monebat enim iis tantum scientiis dandam esse hominibus operam, quæ cum mortali vita congruerent; proinde hanc scientiam, quæ de divinis rebus instituitur, relinquendam esse Deo, divinique substantiis, quod sit supra humanum captum. Cui inepto consilio, & virilis animi magnitudine indigno respondet Aristoteles, Non decere virum eam scientiam negligere, quæ maxime intellectui congruat, neque enim est putanda aliena ab humana natura, cujus præcipua pars est mens ipsa (49). -- That this knowledge (viz. of a GOD) is not in man's possession, is a truth so well known, that it occasioned the error of Simonides. For he advised that men should apply only to those sciences, which concerned this mortal life; wherefore that knowledge which concerns things divine, is to be left to GOD and divine beings, because it surpasses human capacity. To which unwise advice, unbecoming the excellency of the human soul, Aristotle hath given this answer, viz. That a man ought not to neglect that knowledge, which suits best to his mind; for that is not to be thought foreign to human nature, since the mind is the chief part of it.' He will have it (50) that Aristotle condemns a like thought of Simonides in another place, and that this Poet is hinted at in the following words: Χρηδὶς ἐκ κατὰ

Theodor. l. hæc. fabul.

(45) It is the 4th chapter of his book concerning the Truth of the Christian Religion.

(46) Ibid. fol. m.

(47) Ibid. ch. xx, fol. 266, verso. There is in the Latin edition of that book of Du Pleffis, pag. m. 446.

Aristoteles tritum illud Simonidis ad Hieronem laudat, de rebus, inquit, quæ præter naturam Deum soli credendum.

(48) Aristotel. Metaphys. lib. i, cap. ii, pag. m. 644, E.

(49) Fonseca in Arist. Metaphys. lib. i, cap. ii, des. For he advised that men should apply only to those sciences, which concerned this mortal life; wherefore that knowledge which concerns things divine, is to be left to GOD and divine beings, because it surpasses human capacity. To which unwise advice, unbecoming the excellency of the human soul, Aristotle hath given this answer, viz. That a man ought not to neglect that knowledge, which suits best to his mind; for that is not to be thought foreign to human nature, since the mind is the chief part of it.' He will have it (50) that Aristotle condemns a like thought of Simonides in another place, and that this Poet is hinted at in the following words: Χρηδὶς ἐκ κατὰ

(50) Id. ibid. Ser. Raynaud, Theol. Natur. pag. 1.

(42) Lescalopierius in Cicero's De Natura Deorum, lib. i, pag. 84, 85.

(43) Certè hoc est Deus, quod & cum dicitur, non potest dici: cum æstimatur, non potest æstimari: cum comparatur, non potest comparari: cum definitur, ipsa definitio crevit. Augustin. Sermone de tempore CIX, apud Lescalopierium, ibid. pag. 85.

(44) La Mothe le Vayer. Lettres cxi, pag. 26, of the 12th vol. Edit. in 12mo.

made the same acknowledgment he did, that he could not give a definition of God [G]. His τὸς παραινύτας, ἀνδράσινα φροσύν, ἀνδρῶν ὄντα, καὶ εἰρητὰ τὸν εἰρητὸν, ἀλλὰ ἐφ' ὅσον ἐνδέχεται ἀπαθανάτισεν, καὶ ἀπαντα ποιεῖν πρὸς τὸ ζῆν κατὰ τὸ κράτιστον τὸν ἐν αὐτῷ. Neque nos oportet humana sapere ac sentire, ut quidam monent, cum finis homines: neque mortalia, cum mortales:

sed nos ipsos, quoad ejus fieri potest, à mortalitate vindicare, atque omnia facere, ut ei nostri partem, quæ in nobis est optima, convenienter vivamus (51). If this be true, this sentence ought to be placed among those of Simonides: viz. since we are but men, our knowledge should be but human; and since we are mortal, we ought to be contented with the knowledge of things mortal. We shall see another mistake of Du Plessis Mornai. The first consists in affirming that the abovementioned saying of Simonides was approved by Aristotle.

(51) Aristot.
Moral. lib. x,
cap. vii, pag. m.
102, H.

(52) Plato, in Protagoras, pag.
235, E.

We find in Plato's Protagoras (52), that that saying was in a poem inscribed to Scopas, son of Creon the Thebanian. It was not therefore an answer to King Hiero: And it is to be observed that the thing spoken of in that place is not science but virtue: and that therefore it might be said, that Aristotle's application is not right; or that our Poet made use of the same thought sometimes with respect to moral, and sometimes in relation to intellectual qualities. Plato is very particular in his discussion of some verses, wherein Simonides had said, that it is a difficult thing to become a perfectly honest man, and that Pittacus was very much mistaken in saying, that it is a difficult thing to continue an honest man. "Ὅτι ἀνδρα ἀγα-θὸν μὴ ἀλαθῶς γενέσθαι χαλεπὸν, χερσὶ τε καὶ ποσὶ καὶ τῷ τετράγωνοι, ἀνεύθρηγε τετυγ-μένον. Difficile esse virum vere bonum fieri, manibus pedibusque & mente ad amissim quadratis (53). Χαλεπὸν ἐσθλὸν ἐμμενεῖν. Difficile est bonum manere (54).
One of Plato's interlocutors maintains that those words of Simonides are contradictory. Another maintains they are not, and understands them in this sense: It is a difficult thing to become an honest man, and impossible to continue so always; and therefore Pittacus is mistaken, for he supposes it is possible for a man to persevere in the practice of virtue: Had he not believed the possibility of it, he would not have said that it is a difficult thing. This explication is proved by a sentence of Simonides, inserted in the same place, which imports, that it is the privilege of God alone to be always good (55). "Ὅτι θεὸς ἀν μὲν ἔχουσι τῷτο γέρας. Quod solus Deus hoc munere frui dignus sit.

(53) Id. ibid.

(54) Id. ibid.
pag. 236, A.

(55) Plato, in Protagoras, pag.
237, D. See also
pag. 239, C.

[G] Some Divines would not have made the same acknowledgement he did, that he could not give a definition of GOD.] A proof of this may be seen in the preceding remark; but here is an author who speaks more plainly to the purpose. It is the famous Peter Charron, a Prebend of Condom. The Deity, says he (56), being so high, far removed from us, and above our capacity, that we know not at all what he is, either afar off or near, it is on one side, the greatest and most outrageous presumption to decide and determine concerning him, as the Atheists do:
who in all their objections speak of him as of a limited Being, circumscribed, and of necessity such and such, saying, if there were a God, he must have been so and so; and being so, he would, should, and might, do this thing, and the other which is not done: Ergo: on the other hand, it is an error to think to find any reason sufficiently demonstrative to prove and establish evidently and necessarily what God is: at which we ought not to be surprised, but might well remain astonished if we should meet with such. For it is not possible that human comprehension, nor the capacity of any created being, should be able to reach so far. . . Deity, is what cannot be known, nay even perceived, between finite and infinite there is no proportion, no transition: infinity is altogether inaccessible, nay imperceptible, God is the one, true, and only infinite.
The most exalted understanding, the highest stretch of imagination, are as far from comprehending him, as the lowest and meanest apprehension. The greatest Philosopher, and the most learned Divine, know not more or less of God, than the meanest tradesman. Where there is no passage, no way, no access, there can be neither far nor near. . . God;
VOL. V.

(56) Pierre Charron, des trois Veritez,
liv. i. ch. v.

God
in comprehhensible

Deity, Eternity, Omnipotence, Infinity, are only words, and nothing more to us: they are not things that can fall under human understanding. . . If all we speak and affirm concerning God were rigou-rously canvassed, it would be found only vanity and ignorance. Wherefore it was the saying of a great and ancient Doctor, that, To speak of GOD even the things that were true, was most dangerous. The reason of which sentence is, because not only such and so sublime truths were debased in passing through our senses, understandings, and mouths, but we even do not know, nor can be certain, that they are true. It is by chance we find them: for we are altogether blind, and know neither what he is, nor what he operates. But to speak of God with doubting and uncertainty, and as it were groping in the dark, and by conjecture, is dangerous, and we know not if God will approve it; unless it be because we have such confidence in his goodness, that he takes well what is said of him with a good intention, and to honour him as much as we can.
But, besides, who knows if this reliance on him is pleasing to him, and that the divine goodness is such as to accept what is done with a good intention, and to do him honour? This indeed is the duty and effect of human goodness, created, and finite: but who knows if that which is divine, un-created, and infinite, be of a like nature? And even it is not universally agreed as to that which is human, what are its rules and offices. . . Therefore the fittest course that can be taken by one that is desirous to think, and to frame an idea of the Deity, is, that the soul, after an universal abstraction from all things, raising itself above all, as in a vacuum, indeterminate, and boundless, with a profound and pure silence, an awful astonishment, an admiration full of a timorous humility, raise in it self an imagination of a luminous abyss, without bottom, without banks, without shores, without high or low, without laying hold upon, or attaching itself to any thing present to the imagination, only to lose itself, to be immersed, and yield itself to be swallowed up in that infinity. To which come very near these ancient sentences of the saints. The true knowledge of God is an entire ignorance of him. To approach God is to know him to be a light unaccessible, and to be swallowed up by it. It is knowing him in some measure to be sensible, that being above all, he cannot be known: eloquently to praise him, is with astonishment and terror to be silent, and in silence to adore him in the soul. But because it is extremely difficult, and next to impossible for the soul, to remain in so uncertain and unconfined an infinity (for she would be bewildered, and at a stand) like one, who confounded by the turning of his head, not any more knowing where he is, lets himself fall down: and although she could, being stupified, incapable of moving, and seized with terror and admiration, she would not be able in any manner to have communion with God, to pray to him, call upon him, acknowledge him, honour him; which are the first and principal points of all religion: for in these performances, it is necessary, that he be conceived with some quality, good, powerful, wise, understanding, accepting our good intentions: It is necessary, and cannot be otherwise in this present state of life, that every one frame and represent to himself an image of the Deity, which he may regard, address, adhere to, and which may be as his God. This the soul does, by raising her imagination above all things, and conceiving with all her might an infinite goodness, power, and perfection. For the utmost and highest degree, any one can rise to by the greatest stretch of apprehension, is his God, and serves him for an image of the deity: an image nevertheless false, that is, deficient and imperfect: For the deity being, as hath been said, unimaginable and infinite, to which the soul cannot be said to approach by any conception, either near or far off, nor can form any true image, more than of a thing it knows not at all; it is sufficient that she make it the least false, least imperfect, the most high, and the most pure she can.
Thousands of readers who shall find these thoughts of a sublime genius in this Dictionary, had never known them

His answer to a King of Lacedæmon produced the same effect as that of Solon to Cræsus [H]. Another answer is ascribed to him very like that of the Philosopher, who boasted that he carried about him his whole estate [I]. What he answered to Hiero's wife, ought not to be taken in a literal sense [K]. It was rather a jest than a serious declaration them had I not recited them. This is the reason I caused them to be inserted in this remark.

It will possibly be said, that Charron is a Divine too much suspected to deserve that his principles should be repeated. We will remove this objection, and say that Arnobius has expressed himself in such a manner, as will highly justify the answer of Simonides. Has he not said that our words can express nothing concerning the nature of God, and that we ought to be silent, if we would form an idea of him; and to the end that our loose conjectures may make some search into this matter, as under a cloud, and in the dark, we ought to shut close our mouth?

O maxime, ô summe rerum invisibilium procreator!
ô ipse invisê, & nullis unquam comprehensibilis!
Prima . . . tu causa es, locus rerum ac spacium, fundamentum cunctorum quæcunque sunt, infinitus, ingenuus, immortalis, perpetuus, solus, quem nulla delineat forma corporalis, nulla determinat circumscriptio, qualitatibus expers, quantitatis sine situ, motu, & habitu, de quo nihil dici & exprimi mortalium potis est significatione verborum: qui, ut intelligaris, tacendum est; atque, ut per umbram te possit errans investigare suspicio, nihil est omnino mutiendum (57). - O immense, O supreme Creator of things invisible! O thou unseen, and uncomprehended by any beings! . . . Thou art the first cause, the place of beings, and the space, the foundation of all things that are, infinite, unbegotten, immortal, everlasting, alone, whom no corporeal form can represent, no limits can bound, without quality, quantity, without situation and motion, of whom nothing can be said or expressed in the language of mortal men: of whom, that thou mayst be known, we must be silent; and that wandering suspicion may search thee out in the dark, nothing is even to be uttered.

(57) Arnob. lib. i, pag. m. 17.

(58) See Elmenhorst upon this passage of Arnobius pag. m. 24.

(59) Minut. Felix, p. m. 143.

(60) Lescalop. in Cicero de Natura Deor. pag. 2.

(61) See Herodotus, lib. i, cap. LXXXVI.

(62) See Cornelius Nepos in the Life of Pausanias.

It would be no small ignorance to tell me, that this passage ought to be reckoned amongst the errors of Arnobius; for all who have read his Commentators may have seen, that the most orthodox Fathers of the Church have agreed with him in his opinion (58). Be pleased to read the Commentators on these words of Minucius Felix: Nobis ad intellectum pectus angustum est: & ideo sic eum (Deum) digne æstimamus, dum inestimabilem dicimus. Eloquar quemadmodum sentio, magnitudinem Dei, qui se putat nosse, minuit; qui non vult minuire, non novit. Nec nomen Deo quæras (59): - Our mind is too narrow to comprehend; and therefore we esteem GOD as we ought when we believe him inestimable: I will plainly declare what I think, whosoever believes that he knows the immensity of GOD does diminish it: he that will not lessen it, owns he knows it not. Neither do thou seek for the name of GOD. You shall find that they refer you to innumerable passages wherein the ancient Fathers agree with Arnobius in this matter. And observe, that the Jesuit Lescalopierus alleges those very words of Minutius Felix, to confirm the remark he had made, that the wisest and most modest Philosophers confess every where, that God is not only invisible and inexpressible, but also unintelligible. Sapientissimi quique ac modestissimi philosophorum Deum æstimator, non intelligibilem, æstimator minimè spectabilem, æstimator et æstimator indicibilem, & si fati, invocabilem, inominabilem, ubique confitemur, at nihil hunc in locum afferri potest illustrius, quam quod habet Minutius Felix (60).

[H] His answer . . . produced the same effect as that of Solon to Cræsus (61).] Pausanias sitting at table with Simonides, ordered him to speak some sentence. Remember, answered he, that you are a man. This saying appeared so insipid to Pausanias, that he did not mind it; but when he happened to be in a place of refuge, where he struggled with an intolerable hunger, and out of which he could not come, without running the hazard of being put to death, a misfortune he brought upon himself by his ambition, he remembered the words of that Poet, and cried out three times, O Simonides! how important was the meaning of the exhortation you gave me (62)!

Τὴν καὶ αὐτὴν ἐμνήσθην τὴν Σιμωνίδου, καὶ ἐξέβησεν εἰς τρις, ὡς ἐνός Κούης, μέγα τι ἀπὸ χρέμα ἦν ὁ

ἀνὴρ αὐτὸν ἐμνήσθην τὴν Σιμωνίδου, καὶ ἐξέβησεν εἰς τρις. Tunc in mentem ei venit Simonidis, & ter magna voce exclamavit: O Cee besper, magnam quiddam in tuo sermone inerat, ego vero inani persuasione eram adductus, ut eum nullius momenti putarem (63). It is certain, that if this sentence were sufficiently considered, and viewed with the eye of a Philosopher, nothing would be more mortifying and instructive, than to think seriously that we are men. This comprehends all the weakness, misery, and inconstancy, that can be thought of.

[I] Another answer is ascribed to him . . . very like that of a Philosopher, who boasted that he carried about him his whole estate. It is said that Simonides, in order to free himself from poverty, went about the great towns of Asia, where he sang for money the praises of conquerors. Being enriched by that means, he took shipping for the isle of Ceos, his native country. The ship was cast away: every body strove to save himself with whatever he could carry. Simonides took nothing, and being asked the reason of it, he answered (64), It is because all that I have is with me. Several of his ship-wrecked companions were drowned, sinking under the weight of what they had endeavoured to save. Those who landed, were plundered by robbers: Every one went to Clazomenæ, a town not far from the place where the ship was cast away. A citizen, who loved learning, and had read Simonides's poems with great admiration, knowing him, afforded him all necessities, whilst the rest were forced to beg in the streets. The Poet meeting them, told them his answer was right (65).

[K] What he answered to Hiero's wife, ought not to be taken in a literal sense. That princeps desired to know whether it was better to acquire learning than riches. Simonides answered her, That riches were better than learning; for, said he, I see every day learned men waiting upon rich people (66). We must not believe that he indeed valued silver and gold more than learning; but he made use of a nice railery to blame the diligence of the generality of men of letters, who court rich people, and endeavour to get some presents from them. He himself was touched by his own jest, since he went to the court of Syracusæ, thro' a motive of interest; and on several other occasions had made it his business to procure the means of life, and to mend his condition by the liberality of others. It might be said also, that he preferred riches to learning, considering the advantage that accrues from them. It is manifest, that riches are more proper than learning to procure temporal advantages, and whatever is most earnestly wished for in human life. In this sense it were true literally, that it is better to be rich than learned. I must not forget the reflexion that was made upon the proof alleged, by Simonides. It has been said, that it is the part of Physicians to visit sick people, and that for the same reason, it is requisite learned men should frequently visit those that are rich. Here are two witty sayings of an ancient Philosopher. Somebody was saying that he always saw the Philosophers resort to rich mens houses; Aristippus answered him, Do not Physicians go to sick people, and yet no body would rather chuse to be sick than to be a Physician (67).

Another time Diogenes asked him, Why do Philosophers visit rich people, and how comes it that rich people do not visit the Philosophers? His answer was (68), It is because the Philosophers know what they want, but rich people do not know it. Erasmus explains that answer in the following manner: The Philosophers are not ignorant that one cannot live without money, and therefore they ask of those that have it; but if rich men knew that they had need of learning, they would be more careful to make their court to the Philosophers. I omit Erasmus's moral reflexion; it may be seen in these Latin words. Philosophi sciunt absque pecunia vivi non posse: itaque petunt eos qui quod opus est dare possunt. Quod si divites aquè intelligerent se egere sapientia, multo magis tenerent philosophorum limina. Miserior enim est egestas animi quam corporis: atque hoc miserius egeni sunt divites (63) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. ix, cap. 26. See also Plutarch in Consolat. ad Apollonium, pag. 105, A.

(64) Metamorphosis, lib. ix, cap. 26. See also Plutarch in Consolat. ad Apollonium, pag. 105, A.

(65) Taken from Phaedrus, fab. xxi, lib. vi.

(66) Aristotle, Rhetoric, lib. ii, cap. xvi, pag. m. 438.

(67) Diogenes Laertius, in Aristippo, lib. ii, num. 70.

(68) Id. ibid. num. 69.

(e) See the remark [F] towards the end.

(f) Ἐμοιγε δ' ἑξαρκεῖ δὲ δὴ
μὴ κακὸς ἦ, μὴ δ' ἀγαν ἀπάλαμνος. Mihi satisfacit & ille quisquis malus non est, nimiumve ignavus.
Plato, in Protag.
pag. 240.

(g) Ex Platone,
ibid.

(b) Παίζων ἐν
τῷ βίῳ καὶ περὶ μνηδὲν ἀ-πλῶς σπουδᾶ-ζουσιν. Ut ludamus in vita, neque
ulli rei studeamus
serio. Theo, Progymn. cap. v,
pag. m. 84.

(i) See the Scholia upon Pindar in Oden II, Olymp. and the remark [C] of the article HIE-RO I.

of

(69) Erasmus in Apophthegm.
lib. iii, in Agri-stipp. num. 10,
pag. m. 186.

(70) I use the words of Mr le Fevre, Journal du Journal, page 19. Here are the words of Simonides, "Ἀμαδίς ποί γὰρ εἰπὼν ἡ ὥς ἔπ' ἐμὴ ἐξέπαυτ' αἰσθαι. Plut. de audiend. Poëtis, circa init. p. 15

(71) Erasmi. in Apophthegm.
lib. vi, pag. m.
499, 500.

(72) Gorgias ille Leontinus . . .
tragediam definiebat, Fallaci- am, qua qui deciperet, iustior eo qui non decipe-ret, qui deciperet, sapientior
eo qui non deciperet quoniam, efficit. Daniel Heinsius, Orat. de utilita-te, quæ ex lectione Tragediarum percipitur, inquit. p. m. 269.
Plutarchi de audiendi Poetis,
pag. 15, quod ibat saying of Gorgias.

(73) Id. Heinsus, ibid.

(74) In the article AGESILAUS II. remark [C].

(75) Above citation (9) of the article P Y R- R H O.

(76) Suidas, in Timonim.

(77) Id. ibid.

(78) Horat. Sat.
IV, lib. i, linit.

* divites quod non intelligant, quam pretiosa quamque
 * necessaria re careant (69). - - - Philosophers know * that it is impossible to live without money, therefore
 * they seek such as can give what is wanted. But if * the rich were sensible of their want of wisdom, they * would be much more assiduous at the bouises of Philo* sophers. For the indigence of the mind is more misera* ble than that of the body; and the more wretchedly in* digent are the rich, because they know not how pre* cious, and how necessary a thing they want.

[L.] He acknowledged himself incapable of deceiving stupid people. Erasmus did not forget, in his collection of Apophthegms, Simonides's answer to those who asked him, why he did not endeavour to engage the Thebælians to give him something, since he was so careful to get what he could in other countries: Those men, said he, are not ingenious enough to be deceived by such as I am (70). I shall fet down the whole passage of Erasmus, because it contains a good reflexion. Idem (Simonides) quum cæteros laudando veneretur, ut aliquod daret, interrogatus cur non & Thebælos captaret, Stupidiores sunt, inquit, quàm ut à me falli possint. Qui querunt qui imponent, ad stupidos eunt. At qui tam erant stupidi, ut non sentirent ingenium poematum illius, nec tangeretur amore nominis in posteros transmittendi, non poterant ab illo falli (71). Erasmus is in the right: those who have a mind to deceive others, look for fools; but those, who are too stupid to be sensible of the beauties of a poem, or to desire a long fame, were not fit to be deceived by Simonides. A thought of Gorgias Leontinus may be applied to this subject. He had defined tragedy a deceit, wherein the deceiver is more just than he, who does not deceive, and he who is deceived is more knowing than he who is not deceived (72). Whereupon Daniel Heinfius makes this observation. A tantis viris posse decipi paucorum est: & illorum fere tantum, qui præstantiam eorum, si non affeque re ipsâ, mente ac intellectu æstimare ac assequi possunt, qui cum aliquo judicio decipiuntur (73). . . . Few are capable of being deceived by so great men, and almost only those who have some confused notions of their excellency, can be deceived with false judgment. I have said elsewhere (74), that a great captain complained that his enemies were so silly, that he could not succeed in his stratagems against them. I have said also (75), that Balzac observed that the maids of his village were too silly to be deceived by a man of wit.

[M] He failed not to make himself dreaded by sharp invectives. Timocreon was his enemy (76). He was one of the Poets of the antient Comedy (77), and consequently he knew how to rail, and did it with an impudent licentiousness.

Eupolis atque Cratinus, Aristophanesque Poëtae, Atque alii, quorum Comœdia prisca virorum est,
Si quis erat dignus describi, quod malus, aut fur,
Quod mœchus foret, aut sicarius, aut aliqui
Famofus; multâ cum libertate notabant (78).

*Cratin and Eupolis, that lash'd the age,
Those old Comedian furies of the stage :*

*If they were to describe a wile, unjust,
And cheating knave, or scourge a lawless lust,
Or other crimes : regardless of his fame
They shew'd the man, and boldly told his name.*

СВЯТЫЙ.

He composed a comedy against Simonides (79); and (79) Suidas, in therefore it may be thought he used him severely: Τίμωνίδην.
nevertheless, some verses are still extant, wherein he confesses that he had been the sufferer, and we have his epitaph made by Simonides. It is very abusive.
(80) Id non impune fecisse (Timocreonem) colligo ex car- (80) Leo Alliaminibus ejusdem Timocreonis nondum editis, qui in tus, de Simonsemetipsum Simonidis dicitatem accusat, & plane vi- eus non Scriptis, desperat metro Trochaico pentametro: ΚΑΤὰ ΜΥΣΤΑ- POX. 213.
ταίης τῆς Αἰδέως, ditionibus scilicet transpositis.

Κηϊα με προσήλθε φλυαρία ἐκ ἐθέλοντα,
Οὐκ ἐθέλοντά με προσήλθε Κηϊα φλυαρία.

Ceia me incesſit importuna loquacitas invitum,
Invitum me incesſit Ceia importuna loquacitas

Extatque hodie num Simonidis Epigramma in Timocreonis sepulchrum, quo injurias sibi illatas ultus pulchre fuisse sibi visus est.

Πολλὰ φαγὼν, καὶ πολλὰ πινὼν, καὶ πολλὰ
κακ' εἰπὼν
Ἄνθρωπος κείμαι Τιμοκρέων Ῥόδιος.

Cum multa comederim & multa biberim, multa mala dixerim

Hominibus, jaceo Timocreon Rhodius (81).

(81) Athenæus,
lib. x, pag. 415.

I find in those poems of Timocreon which have not yet been published, that he did not abuse Simonides without suffering for it. He accuses himself for the prating (harangues) of Simonides, and plainly blames it, saying, I was seized with the troublesome loquacity of Simonides. And there is still extant an epigram of Simonides on the tomb of Timocreon, by which he thought he had handsomely requited the injuries which had been done by him. After I have eaten and drunken plentifully, and spoken a great deal of ill of men, here I lie, Timocreon of Rhodes.

[N] His avarice is not to be excused, nor his mercenary pen. I know what he answered those, who asked him why he was so covetous in his old age; because, said he (82), I had rather leave something to my enemies after my death, than want the assistance of my friends during my life. This answer is not altogether amiss; for there is nothing one ought more carefully to avoid than to be chargeable to any body, or to depend upon the discretion and caprices of others: but Simonides should not have been afraid of it; he might have avoided that misfortune, without being so intent upon getting money. . . . Another answer, less tolerable than the first, is ascribed to him. You may see that Plutarch does not approve of it. 'For not only,

(82) Stobaeus,
Serm. VIII, fol.
m. 55.

(k) Ἀνάγκη οὐδὲ
θεοὶ μάχονται.
Cum necessitate neque Dii pug-nant. Suidas, in Σιμωνίδης, pag.
741.

(l) Gyrard. Dial.
IX de Poetar.
Hiflor. p. 462,
& seq.

Of all the sayings that are ascribed to him, I shall only mention this: he said, that necessity was a thing which the gods themselves would not oppose or resist (k). His father, Leoprepes, hath deserved to be mentioned for a good advice he gave to two young men (l). Though Gyrardus's collections are very good (l), they do not equal those of Allatius concerning our Simonides (m). He gives us the titles of all his Poems, as far as they can be known by the ancient monuments that are extant; but we do not find there Simonides's egg, mentioned by Mr Blondel the Architect (n). Mr Blondel is mistaken in this: he has confounded Simonides with Simmias Rhodius. If

(m) Allatius de Simeonum Scrip-tis, pag. 207,
& seq.

(n) In his Comparaison de Pindare d'Horace, pag. 32, Dutch edition. That fault has been observed in the remarks published in French, by a Dutch Advocate upon that work of Mr Blondel, at Rotterdam 1701.

Venus to old men is averse, . . .

as Euripides has it; but their appetite also to their meat and drink is for the most part dull, and as one would say, toothless; so that they have but little gulf and relish in them. They ought therefore to furnish themselves with pleasures of the mind, not ungenerous or illiberal, as Simonides said to those, who reproached him with covetousness, that being by his years deprived of other pleasures, he recreated his old age with the only delight he took in heap- ing up riches. But the political life, or the manage- ment of the common-wealth, has in it pleasures exceeding great, and no less honourable; being such, as it is probable the very gods do only, or at least chiefly enjoy themselves in; and these are the de- lights which proceed from doing good, or being beneficial to many, and the glory of great and hon- ourable actions (83). Had I curtailed this passage, I should have left out some things, that may be profit- able to the reader; but if he only draws from thence a proof of the avarice of our Poet, I shall be contented with it. His way of living was somewhat

(83) Plut. an fieri sit gerenda Respubl. pag.
786.

(84) He wrote
the Life of Simonides.

(85) Athen. lib.
xiv, pag. 656.

(86) Ælian.
Var. Hiflor.
lib. ix, cap. i.

(87) Ὅπως εἶπεν ἦτα λίμνος μεγαλο-πρέπεια κατὰ Φανὸς δ', καὶ
ἡ μὴ κορμιοτης. Ut perspecta fit inquit, & Hieronis mag-nificencia &
mea temperantia.
Athen. lib. xiv,
pag. 656.

He has been blamed for being the first that let out the Muses for hire: which, I think, ought not to be understood as if the Poets, who lived before him, had refused rewards. I believe they had an eye to the presents and liberalities of those, for whom they sung, and that they made heavy complaints against those un- grateful men, who gave them nothing, or gave them too little. How then shall we understand these re- proachful words of Callimachus?

Οὐ γὰρ ἐργάτιν τρέφω τὴν μουσαν, ὡς ὁ Κεῖω· Ἰλλίχης νέπης.

Non enim mercenariam alio
Musam, ut Ceus ille Hyllichi nepos (88).

(88) Callimach.
in Fragm. p.
337. Edit.
Graevii 1697.

(89) See Tzetzes,
Chil. viii, num.
213.

My Muse, says he, is not mercenary like that of Si- monides. The latter was taxed with the same fault by Anacreon (89), and it is thought Pindar levelled a like stroke at him, when he spoke of a certain time when the Muses were not yet mercenary.

ἡ μουσα γὰρ ὃ φιλοκερδής
πῶ τίτ' ἢν, ἐδ' ἐργάτης, ἐδ' ἐπὶ πρᾶντο γλυκεῖαι μελίθροισι ποτὶ Τερψιχίρας, ἀργυρωθεῖσαι πρὶς ὧπα,
μαλ' ἀκέραιοι αἰοδαί (90).

(90) Pindar. Ol.
II, Isthm. p. m.
675.

These Greek verses are thus paraphrased by Benedi- ctus. 'Nondum enim Musa lucri amans erat, nec quemadmodum operarii operam mercede locabat. Neque à Terpsichore Lyricorum magistra dulces cantilenæ, molli vocis sono pronuntiandæ, suæque suavitate adblandientes, atque argenti in fronte mentionem facientes vendebantur. - - - For the Muses were not yet become lovers of gain; nor, like labourers, bired themselves out for money. Nor did Terpsichore, the mistress of Lyric Poets, set to sale her pleasing songs, to be softly pronounced, flattering with their soft sweetness, and mentioning money in the begin- ning.' If it be so, we must suppose that Simonides introduced an innovation, which consisted in making verses for a set price. He would not sing upon trust, nor rely on the generosity of his heroes: he would have, first of all, his wages agreed upon; and, perhaps, he desired sometimes to be paid before hand, or, at least, took an earnest. However it be, he does not deserve to be reckoned among the inventors of good things; he ought to be placed among those who have depraved or corrupted good customs. He dishonoured the Muses by his mercenary spirit, and disgracefully became a proverb (91). We are told (92), that he used to say, I have two trunks, one for salaries, and the other for favours; I open them from time to time, and I always find the trunk of salaries full, and that of favours empty. He needed not wonder at it; for since he did nothing gratis, he could not pretend to free gifts, but only to be paid according to his agreement he had made with his heroes. Perhaps, he intended only thereby to excuse the precautions he used. How do we know but this might be the thought: I had prepared two trunks, one for what I should receive by way of gift, and the other for what I should receive by way of payment: I never found any thing in the first, and therefore I have set a price to my poems: It has turned to a good account; the trunk for payments is always full. Some will have it, that by the trunk for favours, he meant thanks: if so, his meaning would be, that the trunk of thanks was of no use to him. He thought fit to search for some assistance from it, but never found any (93).

(91) See Erasmus upon the proverb Simon-
idis cantilenæ, Chil. II, Cen-
tur. IX, num.
12.

(92) Plut. de Co-
rrositate, p. 310.

(93) See Rhetor.
Phædrus, pag.
381, Edit. 1695.

(94) Phædr.
Fab. XXI, lib.
iv.

(95) Simonides
... victoria lau-dem cuiusdam Pythæ ut scriberet condidit. Rhetor.
lib. i, c. 10. Id. Fab.
XXIV, lib. iv.

(96) Ex Aristot.
Rhetor. lib. iii,
cap. ii.

We read in Phædrus's Fables, that Simonides went about the towns of Asia to get money by fingering the praises of conquerors. The editions have Mercede accepta laudem victorum canens (94); but several Critics maintain, it should be passa instead of accepta, be- cause he used to make a bargain before hand. Which appears from another passage of the same Phædrus (95). This also appears from a story mentioned in Aristotle's Rhetoric. A man, who got the prize of the race, desired Simonides to make a triumphal song upon that subject: the Poet not being satisfied with the reward offered to him, answered, he could not treat that subject worthily; for that victory had been obtained in a race with mules, and he pretended that a mule did not afford matter for an encomium. But having a better price offered him, and at last such as he thought sufficient, he then made the Poem according to that man's desire (96).

[O] His father, Leoprepes, hath deserved to be mentioned for a good advice he gave to two young men. Two good friends asked him which was their best way to

If I have any thing to say against Moreri in the following Article.

to render their friendship perpetual. You must never | but one of you must shew respect to the anger of the be angry, said he, one with another at the same time ; | other (97). It is a very judicious advice.

(97) Ælianus, Var. Hist. lib. iv, cap. xxxiv.

SIMONIDES, son of the daughter of the foregoing, was a native of the isle of Ceos: some think he was surnamed Melicertes [A]. He flourished before the Peloponnesian war, and writ three books of Genealogies, and three books of inventions (a). I shall take notice of some small faults in Moreri's Dictionary [B]. Though there have been several Simonides's (b), It would be I think a difficult thing to name any of them that lived with Phalaris [C].

(a) Taken from Suidas.

(b) See Vossius,
de Poëtis Græcis,
pag. 14.

[A] Some think that he was surnamed Melicertes. They are mistaken. This is not Suidas's meaning; but Vossius ascribes it to him, when he says that Simonides the grandfather, was surnamed Melicertes (1).

(1) Simonides
Ceus ex filia ne-pos fuit Simonidis Lyrici, cognomento Meli-
certæ qui memo-riæ artem invenisse dicitur.
Vossius, de Hist.
Græcis, lib. iv,
cap. vi, p. 454.

[B] I shall take notice of some small faults in Moreri's Dictionary. I. Moreri, says that he was esteemed in the LXXVth Olympiad, and that he died in the LXXXVIIIth, being eighty-nine years old. This is a wrong calculation. Simonides was at least twenty years of age when he came to be in repute; and therefore, according to Moreri, he should have been born in the LXth Olympiad: from whence it follows, that he would have died at 112 years old, or thereabouts, if he had lived till the LXXXVIIIth Olympiad. If Moreri shews himself a sorry Arithmetician in that respect, he makes it appear also, that he knew not how to transcribe the author quoted by him (2), for that author places the birth of Simonides in the LVth Olympiad, and his death in the LXXXVIIIth Olympiad: which will make up the eighty-nine years of life, that he gives him. II. Moreri mentions one Simonide de Melece (they are his words) more antient than the Lyric Poet, and, in all likelihood, the inventor of four letters of the Greek alphabet. Here is a very childish oversight; for these words Simonide de Melece, are the translation of these, Simonides Melicus, which signify Simonides the Lyric Poet, and which Moreri had read in Vossius. I could wish, for the honour of Vossius, that these two lines were not to be found in the fourteenth page of his book, concerning the Greek Poets. 'Simonides Melicus qui temporibus belli Medici vixit, quatuor vel quinque literas alphabeto finito adjecit, atque ita illud primus absolvit. . . . Simonides, the Lyric Poet, who lived in the time of the Bellum Medicum, added four or five letters to the alphabet, and so was the first who completed it.' He refers thus to the XXXIXth Olympiad: but we know not what he means by his Bellum Medicum at that time. Besides, when in the LVth Olympiad he mentions Simonides, who makes the subject of the foregoing article, he calls him a Lyric Poet, and ascribes to him the invention of four letters (3). Whereby the reader is induced to believe, that he mentions the same Poet twice, and that he makes him flourish from the XXXIXth Olympiad till the LXXVth (4). I confess he observes in the fourteenth page, that Simonides, placed by Eusebius in the XXXIXth Olympiad, cannot be he that was born at Ceos; but why then does he call them both Lyric Poets, and ascribe to them the invention of four letters? But to return to Moreri. III. He says that Simonides the younger was the son of a sister of the other Simonides. He should have said the son of a daughter. He stumbled in a fair way, since he misunderstood these words of Vossius, Simonides junior, Simonidis Lyrici & filia nepos (5). IV. Moreri should not have ascribed some poems to him, since Suidas ascribes none to him, and seeing Vossius does not reckon him among the Poets. Ambigo an & in p. 454. Poëtis ei sit locus (6). V. Why does Moreri ascribe to him a treatise concerning things lately invented? Does Suidas, or any other writer, mention that circumstance? Were it not an absurd thing to say, that Polydore Virgil wrote a book, wherein he treats of those who had lately invented some things?

(3) Vossius, de Poëtis Græcis,
pag. 20.

(4) He says he writ a Poem upon the battle of Salamis. Scripti, says he, navale
prelium ad Salaminem quod commisitum O-lympiade
LXXXV. Ld. ibid.

(5) Id. ibid. pag.
34. See also the same Vossius, de Hist. Græcis, in p. 454.

(6) Idem, de Poëtis Græcis,
pag. 34.

[C] It would be . . . a difficult thing to name one Simonides, that lived with Phalaris. I have read a thing in Vossius's letters, which gives me occasion to make this remark. Vossius being uneasy on account of his friend Puteanus, who was brought into trouble for a political book, wishes his enemies may be contented to tell him what Phalaris did advise Simonides, Mind only the Muses (7). Doubtless there is here a slip of memory: I thought at first, that Vossius had said Phalaris instead of Hiero; from whence I concluded that Simonides concerned himself with some court intrigue, that was like to bring him into trouble: but at last, I found out where the mistake lay. Vossius named Simonides instead of Stephichorus, for it is Stephichorus whom Phalaris exhorted to meddle no more with state-affairs, and to mind only his Muses: Μί-λοισιν δ' ἐσσι μέσων ἐὺκλειῆς πόροι. Cura tibi fuit præclara mufarum studia (8).

(7) *Utinam notis
aliud audire cogitur quam quod
olim in simili fere negotio à Phalaris aiant fuisse dictum Simonidi, μέλαιν οὐ μὲν δὲν οὐκὼς τὴν πόνον
Vossius, Epist.
CXCI, pag.
m. 218. See above citation.*

(8) of the article PUTEA-NUS.

(8) Phalaris, Epist. CXLVII,
pag. 141, Edit.
Oxon. 1695.

SIMONIDES (SIMON) one of the best Latin Poets of the XVIth century, was born at Lemberg in Poland, and after having gone through a course of Philosophy at Cracovia, he went to Italy to compleat his studies; from whence he returned, so well stored with learning that John Zamoski, the greatest hero that was in Poland, chose him for his secretary, and shewed him much affection, and procured him the honour of knighthood. Pope Clement VIII honoured him with the poetic garland. Justus Lipsius gives him very great praises, comparing him to Catullus, and maintaining that his poetry might have raised the jealousy of the Antients (a). Simonides entertained in his house at Lemberg in the year 1597, with a very singular affection, George Douza in his journey to Constantinople, who was the son of Janus Douza, a good Poet, and good Humanist. This procured him an encomium to be seen below, together with the title of his Poems [A].

(a) Taken from Starovolskius in Centum Script.
Polon. pag. 130,
131.

[A] An encomium to be seen below, with the title of his poems. George Douza writing to his father a relation of his journey, speaks thus of his stay at Lemberg: 'Huic urbi (Leopoli) plurimum me debere fa-
' teor quod hic cum Simone Simonide hospitium &
' amicitiam contrahere licuerit: qui Vir quanto orche-
' stræ plausu Parnassi collem inlitterit, & Scriptis ejus
' editis Ælinopæane videlicet, & casto Josepho, tum
' Joëlis illâ Paraphrafi fati superque confitare arbi-
' tror (1). . . . To this city (Lemberg) I confess I am

(1) Georg. Dou-
za, de itinere suo Constant.
pag. 14.

' much indebted, because here I had opportunity to lodge in ' the house of Simon Simonides, and to obtain his friend' ship: with how much applause of the learned this man
' appeared upon Parnassus, is, I think, sufficiently ma' nifest from the works which he published, namely, his ' Ælinopæane, his Josephus, and his paraphrase on Joel.
' His father wrote him a letter from Constantinople,
' wherein he expressed his gratitude for the good of' fices of Simonides, and his esteem he had long enter' tained for the poems of that Polish gentleman. ' Ne
' P p scis, mi fili, quantā cum animi voluptate illam Epistolā tuā particulam legendo ruminaverim, ubi non modo tanti viri (Interpretis Polonici, natione Armenii) faventiam ultrō tibi oblatam gloriari ac praecas: verum etiam incomparabilis Viri Simonis Simonidis benevolentiae fores jam pridem patefactas aditum tibi porrō ad doctissimi illius ac disertissimi Interpretis amicitiam concinnasse. . . . Nunc celsator esse cogor, ac commodiori tempore hoc scribendi officium referre, praesertim ad Simonem Simonidem, quem virum ego jam pridem ex Scriptis editis, Aelinopaeane puta, atque Odis Pindaricis tum Joelis Paraphrasi illā Poeticā multo quaestissimā, procul distitū licet, & veneratus sum & admira-ratus (2). . . . You cannot think, dear son, with what satisfaction I read that part of your letter, wherein you not only mention the friendship which so great a

(2) G. Douza de Joinville suo Constant. pag. 129.

man (the Polish interpreter, by nation an Armenian) offered to you of his own accord; but also that the obliging incomparable Simonides, by having received you kindly into his own house, has given some access to the friendship of that most learned and most eloquent interpreter. . . . but now I am obliged to put off to a more convenient opportunity my thanks, especially to Simon Simonides, a man whom I have long honoured and admired, thro' at a great distance, because of the works he hath published, namely, Aelinopaeane, his Pindaric Odes, and his poetical Paraphrase on Joel, which hath been much sought after.

Besides the poems, whose titles I have already mentioned, Simonides composed Hercules praedictus: Panzila: Flagellum livoris: Ode in victriam, nuptias, atque obitum Samocis, inque victriam Thomae Samocis Joannis filii, &c (3).

(3) See Simon
 Steirovolcius, in Centum Script.
 Polon. pag. 131.

SIMONIUS (SIMON) a Physician and Philosopher, and author of several books [A], lived in the XVIth century. He was of Luca. I think he left his country that he might else where make open profession of the Reformed Religion. He was for some time, professor of Philosophy at Geneva, and afterwards in the university of Heidelberg. After this he was made professor of Physic in the university of Leipzig, whence he withdrew into Silesia and Moravia, and thence into Poland, where there is some ground to believe he became an Anti-Trinitarian about the end of his days (a). Two letters of Theodore Beza greatly confirm this conjecture; for it cannot well be doubted that they were written to Simonius [B], and it appears that he, to whom they were written at Heidelberg in 1568 and in 1569, followed the opinions of Valentinus Gentilis (b). The same letters inform us that Simonius was twice imprisoned at Geneva, and that he was censured by the ministers, and was of a restless spirit and at variance with all the world (c). He had the presumption to say before a full auditory at Heidelberg that he could raise objections to which St Paul himself could not have given an answer [C]. I know not

(a) Baillet, num.
 150, of the Anti.

(b) See the remark [C].

(c) Beza, Epist.
 LIV, pag. m.
 264.

[A] He is the author of several books.] He published at Geneva in 1566 a commentary on Aristotle's book De sensu & sensibili, in folio. You will find in Lindenius renovatus (1), that his Synopsis brevissima novae theoriae de humoralium febrium natura, periodis, signis, & cura-tione, was printed at Leipzig in the year 1577, in 8vo, and at Basil in the year 1580, in 8vo, with his Examen sententiae a Brunone Stedelio laetæ de iis quæ Joubertus ad explicandam febrium humoralium naturam in paradoxis suis disputavit; that his, Vera & indubitata ratio periodorum, nec non continuationis intermissionisque febrium humoralium was printed at Leipzig, in the year 1575, in 4to; that his Methodus artificiosa curandæ pestis was printed in the same city, in the year 1576, in 4to; that the Simonius supplex was printed at Cracow in the year 1585, in 4to; that the Scopæ quibus vertitur Confutatio quam advocati Nicolai Buccella, Ita-li, Chirurgi Anabaptistæ, innumeris mendaciorum, calum-niarum, errorumque purgamentis insertam postremo emise-runt, was printed at Olmutz in the year 1589, in 4to; that his Disputatio de putredine was printed at Cracow in the year 1584 in 4to; and that his Responsum de obitu Stephani Polonorum Regis was printed at Olmutz in the year 1588, in 4to. The catalogue of the Bodleian Library ascribes to him a treatise De vera Nobilitate, printed at Leipzig in the year 1572, in 4to: it was reprinted at Iena, in the year 1616, by the care of Thomas Sagittarius. This book is commended by Naudæus (2). What concerns the writings which Simonius published against James Schegkianus will afterwards be seen.

(2) Naudæus, Bibliogr. Politic.
 pag. m. 544.

[B] It cannot well be doubted that . . . two letters of Theodore Beza were written to Simonius.] One is the LIVth, and the other the LVIth. The latter is dated the 13th of March, 1569, and the former the 26th of May. The year is not set down, but it is undoubtedly the year 1568. What may persuade us that they were writ by Beza to Simonius, is his censuring a bad doctrine, which was seen in a book of Simonius (3). It is thereby that Mr Crenius has proved his conjecture. * Epistolæ LIV & LVI (Beza)
 * D. Simoni Simonio inscribendæ sunt. Nam quæ in hac ultima epistola Beza perfringit, ista omnia docuit Simonius in Lectione, quâ explicavit princi-pium illud Physicum: ex nihilo nihil fit; d. 30.
 * Decemb. 1568. Heidelb. (4). . . . The fifty-fourth * and fifty-sixth letters (of Beza) must be ascribed to * Simon Simonius. For all that Beza censures in this
 * last epistle, was taught by Simonius in the lecture where-
 * in he explained that principle of Natural Philosophy; Of
 * nothing nothing is made; on the 30th day of December,

(3) See the remark [C].

(4) Crenius, A-nimadv. Part. ii,
 pag. 91.

'1568, at Heidelberg.' If these words did not clearly shew that Simonius lived at Heidelberg when Beza wrote him those two letters, I could mention a thing which insinuates it. Simonius had written a letter to Theodore Beza, that being willing to dispute with those who condemned the Geneva discipline, he found himself unable to defend it, and there he particularly mentions Thomas Erasmus (5), who was then professor at Heidelberg.

[C] He had the presumption to say . . . that he could raise objections to which St Paul himself could not have given an answer.] Beza testifies his indignation thereupon as it deserved. 'Sed quo tandem loco, wrote he upon as it deserved. 'to him, postremum istud tuum dictum habebimus,
 'posse te multas rationes afferre, quibus ne Paulus
 'quidem ipse, si viveret, respondere posse? Itane
 'verò te potuisse desipere, ut istud quod vel cogi-
 'tare impium & in Deum ipsum blasphemum est,
 'palam etiam, tot audientibus, ausus sis effutire?
 'Tunc miser homuncio, ausus organo Dei electo,
 'cujus tonitrua ferre universa mundi sapientia non
 'potuit, tunc, inquam Spiritui Christi per os Aposto-
 'lorum loquentis opponere quicquam possis, quod re-
 'fellere Dei sapientia non possit? An ignoras quid
 'Elymæ mago, quid Alexandro fabro ærarior, lese
 'Pauli sapientia opponentibus contigerit (6)? . . .
 'But what can we think of that last assertion of your's,
 'that you could bring many objections which St Paul
 'himself, were he alive, could not answer? Is it pos'sible you could be so void of sense, as publicly, and in
 'the hearing of so many people, to utter what was im-
 'pious and blasphemous even to think? Would you have 'dared, wretched man, to oppose any thing against that 'chosen instrument of G O D, whose thundering elo'quence all the wisdom of the world was unable to 'withstand, could you, I say, have objected any thing
 'against that Spirit of C H R I S T, speaking by the mouth
 'of his Apostles, which the wisdom of G O D could not 'refute? Know you not what beset Elymas the Sorcerer,
 'and Alexander the Copper-smith, who opposed the wis'dom of Paul? Observe that Beza was telling him his opinion of a tract concerning the Divine Essence.
 'Allatum est ad nos scriptum de Dei essentia, quod
 'aiunt vel à te dictatum, vel ex te fuisse exceptum,
 'breve quidem illud, seu ejusmodi ut summopere bo-
 'nos & doctos omnes Theologos fit optimo jure offen'surum (7). . . . A dissertation was brought us, which 'they say was either dictated by or received from you;
 'indeed, it is short, but such as will extremely offend
 'all good and learned Divines, and most justly.' Simonius in that tract maintained, that it may be said that the Son,

(5) It is of him
 Beza speaks, when he says in his LIVth letter,
 pag. 265: Et quod de quorundam hac in re judicium commemoras, nihil me movet. Imò ne de illo quidem ipso cujus theses sunt, aliud mihi persuasi, quam veritati sponte cessurum. . . .
 And what you mention of some in this matter, surprises me not even as to the person, whose theses they are: I never thought otherwise, but that he, of his own accord, would yield to the truth.

(6) Beza, Epist.
 LVI, pag. 267.

(7) Ibid. p. 266.

not whether we might not conjecture that a book of which I have spoken before, and which bore the title of Simonis Religio, was a satire published against him [D]. I shall relate the disputes he had with James Schegkianus [E].

(8) Quum factum dici posse Filium dici, jactis Ariane blasphemiz fundamentum, loqueris contra Scripturam & omnium orthodoxorum morem, objicis omnes nostras Ecclesias calumnias aduersariarum, ut nemo pius hoc audire sine offensione possit, quibusque postea interpretationibus utaris. --- When you say that the Son of God may be said to have been made, you lay the foundation of the Arian blasphemy, speak contrary to the Scripture, and the expression of all Orthodox Divines, you expose all our churches to the reproach of their aduersaries, so as no pious ear can bear it without offence, whatever explanations you may after give. Id. ibid. See also pag. 265.

(9) Id. ibid. pag. 267.

(10) In the remark [B] of the article SIMON (THEODORE).

Son of God was made (8). He added, 1. That the doctrine of the Orthodox concerning the Trinity had no other advantage, but that it was less absurd than that of the Heretics. And, 2. That the Scripture did not afford wherewithal to answer the objections of the Arians, since it affords passages which they wrest to their own advantage. 'Jam vero quis illud ferat quod dicis, nempe eo differre, dogma aduersariarum à nostro, id est mendacium à veritate, tenebras à luce, quod illud quidem plura, nostrum verò pauciora ab- surda consequantur? . . . Quod autem dicere audes testimonium à veris principiis Scripturæ quamvis malè accommodatis niti Antitrinitarios, idèquæ ex verbo Dei ipsis responderi non posse, certè vox est piis omnibus intolerabilis, & quod ad me attinet, si ita sentis, vix alio te loco habuerim, quam hominis profus impij (9) --- But now who can bear what you say, namely, that the opinion of our aduersaries differs only from ours, that is a falsehood from the truth, darkness from light, in this, that theirs is attended with more, ours with fewer absurdities? As to what you presume to say, that the Anti-Trinitarians rely upon testimonies and true principles of Scripture, tho' ill applied, and that therefore they cannot be answered from the word of GOD, this certainly is an assertion intolerable to all pious persons; and as for myself, if this is indeed your persuasion, I cannot think of you otherwise, than as a person altogether impious.

[D] I know not whether we might not conjecture that a book . . . intitled, Simonis Religio, was a satire written against him.] That book was printed at Cracow in the year 1588, as I have said elsewhere (10). Which I believe was the time when our Simonius was in Poland. Possibly some adversary may have designed to defame him by publishing a book which might be taken for a description of the opinions of this Physician. This I give as a conjecture, which may excite some curious person to examine the matter, if he should have the opportunity of a large library.

[E] I shall relate the disputes he had with James Schegkianus.] Here is the account which Mr Baillet hath given of it. 'The dispute began about the year 1569, and it extended to matters of Philosophy, Physics, and Theology. Simonius had advanced something concerning the cause and nature of the fever, which was not at all approved by Schegkianus, and which the latter had occasionally censured. Simonius was no less dissatisfied with this, than with what Schegkianus had objected to him some time before upon some points of Aristotle's Physics, and he refused it in a book, which he called Anti-Schegkianus, or rather Anti-Schegkiana. The work came out at Basil about the end of the year 1570, in 8vo, with the title of Anti-Schegkianorum liber unus in quo ad objecta Schegkii respondetur, vœra nonnulla ejusdem errata incutuntur, novaque quamplurima peiora deteguntur. Schegkianus preparing to answer this work, provisionally published the forerunner of his answer under the title of Prodromus Anti-Simonii contra Simonem Simonium, printed at Tubingen in Suabia in the year 1571, in 4to. When Simonius had seen that essay, he made a short reply, which he published not long after. This last work being come to Schegkianus's hands he examined it throughout, and his confutation was ready to be prefixed to his Anti-Simonius, and was printed in 1572, under the title of Anatome Responsi Simonii ad Prodromum Anti-Simonii. After that he published his large answer to the Anti-Schegkiana of Simonius, printed at Tubingen in the year 1573, under the title of Anti-Simonius, five, Refutatio errorum in Philosophia Simonii in suo libro Anti-Schegkianorum, in quo plures quam trecenti errores ejusdem repelluntur, &c. These two disputants had yet another conflict upon some controversial points in Theology, with respect to a book which Schegkianus had writ concerning the union of the two natures of JESUS CHRIST (11).'

(11) Baillet, num. 110. of the Anti. Note that he thought Simonius was in Saxony, who was then at Heidelberg.

SYNERGISTS. So they called in the XVIth century some German Divines, who thinking that Luther's hypothesis about Free-will was too harsh, taught that men are not converted by the Divine Grace, without the co-operation of human will. This was the fifth schism that arose among the Lutherans (a). Melancthon laid the foundation of it; for Victorinus Strigelius, and some other Divines, who had a great regard for his authority, considered some phrases which they found in his books, whereby it appeared that he ascribed a great power to man's will. Wherefore they maintained that the natural power of Free-will concurred with grace in the conversion of a sinner. George Major, Paul Eberus, Paul Crellius, and Piperinus were the other chief defenders of that opinion (b), and were persecuted by the faction of Illyricus. It is certain that Melancthon could not approve the rigid method of Luther and Calvin about the doctrine of Grace [A]; and it were in vain to alledge, as a proof of his being of the same

(a) Micræus, Syntagm. Hist. Eccles. pag. m. 865.

(b) Ex eodem, ibid.

[A] Melancthon could not approve the rigid method of Luther and Calvin about the doctrine of Grace.] Balduinus has given a good proof of it, when he published an abstract of a letter which Melancthon writ to Calvin, the 11th of May 1543. Calvin had dedicated to him his book de servitute humani arbitrii (1). Here is part of the letter wherein he thanks him for it. 'Malint te illam tuam excellentem eloquentiam in aliis materiis magis propriis Ecclesie consumere quam in questione περί τῆς ἀνάγκης. (I labebam amicū Tubingæ doctum hominem Franciscum Stadianum, qui dicere solebat se utrumque probare, evenire omnia ut divina providentia decrevit, & tamen esse contingentiam: sed se hæc conciliare non posse. Ego cum hypothesin hanc teneam, Deum non esse causam peccati nec velle peccatum; postea contingentiam in hac nostra infirmitate judicii nostri admittere, ut sciant rudes Davidem sua voluntate ultro rueri. Et eundem sentio cum haberet Spiritum sanctum, potuisse eum retinere & in ea lucta aliquam esse voluntatis actionem. Hæc et si subtilius disputari possunt, tamen ad regendas mentes hoc modo proposita, accommodata videntur. Accusamus ipsi nostram voluntatem cum labimur: non querimus in Dei consilio causam. E contra cum nos erigimus scimus Deum & velle opitulari & adesse luctantibus.

(1) Balduin. in Respons. altera ad Jo. Calvinum, pag. m. 139.

Μίρον ὄκτανεν (inquit Basilus) καὶ ὁδὸς παρὰ πᾶν/α. Excitatur ergo cura in nobis & laudatur Dei immensa bonitas, qui & promittit auxilium, & præstat sed petentibus (2). - - They wish you had rather employed your excellent eloquence in other matters more beneficial to the church than in the question concerning Necessity. I had a friend at Tubingen, a learned man, Francis Stadianus, who used to say, that he believed all things happened according to the decrees of divine providence, and that notwithstanding there were things contingent: but he knew not how to reconcile these two things. I hold this principle, that GOD is not the cause of sin, nor willeth it, and at the same time admit of contingency in this weakness of our judgment, that the ignorant may know that David sinned of his own free choice. And, I think, that having the holy Spirit, he might have retained it, and that in this conflict he might have some power over his will. Tho' these things might be argued more subtilly, yet thus proposed they seem sufficiently suited for the direction of our mind. We blame our own will when we fall; and do not seek the cause in the decree of GOD. On the contrary, when we bold out, we know that GOD hath will and does assist us. Be willing only and GOD is all sufficient, saith Basil. Thus our care is excited, and the boundless goodness of GOD is praised, who hath both promised assistance, and grants

(2) Melancthon. Epist. ad Calvin. and Balduinum, ibid.

same opinion with them upon that head, the great praises he bestowed upon their piety ; for

- 'grants it to those who ask it.' Every body knows that Calvin and Castalio were like fire and water with respect to those doctrines. Now Melancthon being at Worms in 1557, writ a very obliging letter to Castalio, which was a kind of a symbol of fraternity, about the doctrine of Predestination. Porro cum ex eo (ut scis) conventu amicissime scripsisset ad Castalionem, & ejus sententiam nescio quam de prædestinatione & libero arbitrio suam esse significaret: scire potuisti, & quam dampnaret tuam in eo viro vexando intemperiam, & quam ne tum quidem probaret omnia tua paradoxa (3). - - - Moreover seeing (as you know) that after the interview he had writ in a most friendly manner to Castalio, and signified his approbation of I know not what opinion of his concerning Predestination and Free-will: you might have understood, both how much he blamed your excessive vexation of that man, and how even then he disapproved all your paradoxes. They are Balduinus's words to Calvin; and it is to be observed, that he declares to him, he knows not where in Castalio's opinion consists. This ignorance proceeded from two causes: one was, that Castalio's book had been suppressed; the other, that Balduinus did not much care to examine the doctrine of Predestination. He confesses he does not understand it (4). 'Equidem arcanam illam $\alpha\pi\epsilon\iota\ \alpha\nu\alpha\gamma\chi\eta\varsigma\ \kappa\alpha\tau\epsilon\sigma\tau\alpha\iota$ quæstionem non excutio, neque Castalionem . . . unquam vidi vel audivi, ac ne per literas quidem unquam sum allocutus . . . neque quod de ea quæstione scripsit (nam & id supprimi pro tuo imperio iussisti) unquam legi: neque quod de fatali necessitate disputas satis intelligo, & in meis ad Minucium annotationibus nuper non dissimulavi mihi non liquere (5). - - - Indeed I do not much search into that abusive question concerning necessity, neither have I ever either seen or spoke with Castalio . . . nor so much as had any correspondence by letters . . . nor did I ever read what he wrote concerning this controversy, for you commanded it to be suppressed: neither do I sufficiently understand what you argue about fatal necessity, nor did I dissemble my ignorance of it in my notes upon Minutius.
- Let us see what Beza answered to that part of Balduinus's book. First, he denied that Melancthon had writ such a letter to Castalio (6): his reason for it was, that all the books of Melancthon, and even the letter produced by Balduinus, shewed that this German Divine differed from Calvin only in his way of expressing himself. In the second place, he alleged a fragment of that letter, to prove that there was a perfect agreement between Melancthon and the Divines of Geneva as to the doctrine. 'In rebus ipsis quam inter illum & nos convenit, unde tandem melius quam ex ipsius testimonio probabitur? Sic ergo scribit in iis literis quarum tu ipse partem castasti: Quum autem & honorifico me testimonio ornaris, & de tota re non solum piè, sed etiam eloquenter differueris, de utraque re, videlicet de mea gratitudine, & de ipsa disputatione coram nos, ut soliti sumus quoties unâ sumus, prolixè colloqui posse optarim. Est enim tantum vel ingenii vel doctrinæ mihi non arrego quantum tribuis, & nos imprimis in Ecclesia agnoscere nostram imbecillitatem decet, tamen benevolentia erga me tua vehementer delector, tibi gratiam habeo quòd in scripto luculento (loquitur autem de Calvini libris de libero arbitrio adversus Pighium scriptis) tanquam in illustris positam loco extare significationem amoris erga me tui voluisti. An hæc verba sunt, Balduine, hominis à Calvino dissentientis (7)? - - - How far we agreed with him as to the things themselves, whereby can it better be proved than by his own testimony? Thus he writes in these letters, a part of which you have quoted: Seeing then you have both given me an honourable testimony, and have reasoned upon the whole matter, not only piously but eloquently, I could have wished we might have discoursed at large of both matters, namely of my gratitude, and of the dispute itself before us, as we were wont when we were together. For although I do not arrogate to myself so much either of wit or learning, as you are pleased to ascribe to me, and it becomes us, especially in the Church, to acknowledge our own weakness, notwithstanding I am exceedingly delighted with your benevolence towards me, and esteem myself much beholden to you, - that you would have the testimony of your love to me to be recorded in your excellent works (he speaks of Calvin's books concerning Free-will against Pighius). Are these, Balduinus, the expressions of a man, who differs from Calvin? Thirdly, he taxed Balduinus with a notorious falsification; and to prove his charge against him, he alleged a period maliciously left out of Melancthon's letter. That period runs thus: 'Hæc non scribo ut tibi tradam quasi dictata homini & eruditissimo & peritissimo exercitiorum pietatis: & quidem SCIO HÆC CUM TUIS CONGRUERE, sed sunt $\alpha\pi\alpha\chi\eta\tau\epsilon\varsigma$, & ad usum accommodata (8). - - - (8) Id. ibid. These things I write not, as if dictating to you, a man most learned and most skillful in all exercises of piety: and indeed I know THESE THINGS AGREE WITH YOUR THOUGHTS, but they are coarse, and fitted for use.' Beza's first observation is not solid; he himself affords us the refutation of it; for in a book, wherein he did not think of Balduinus, and was not aware of saying something that might serve that adversary, he ingenuously confesses that Melancthon had censured the Divines of Geneva, as if they had introduced the fatality of the Stoics. 'Basilæ verò Castellio . . . non obscurè Pelagianismum tuebatur. Quinetiam his de rebus ita scribere cœperat Philippus, ut quamvis antea Calvinus adversus Pighium libro diserte subscripsisset, tamen Genevenses quasi Stoicum Fatum invehentes notare quibudam videre-tur (9). - - - At Basil Castellio . . . did clearly enough mention Pelagianism. And even Melancthon began so to write of these things, that though before he had directly subscribed to Calvin's book against Pighius, he, notwithstanding, seemed to some to charge those of Geneva as introducing the fate of the Stoics.' These words of Beza plainly shew, that neither all the books of Melancthon, nor the very letter he writ to Calvin, (I mean the letter, out of which Balduinus quoted a passage) were proper to refute those who maintained that he had writ a letter of approbation to Castalio. The second part of Beza's answer has no force in it; for the praises Melancthon bestowed upon Calvin, do not prove that he was of his opinion. He had so much equity, moderation, and civility, that he did justice even to those who maintained opinions he did not approve. Tho' he was prepossessed in favour of Free-will, he could discern the great parts, and the piety, and eloquence which Calvin discovered in maintaining the contrary opinion, and could not forbear to congratulate him on account of his being author of such a work. I shall enlarge hereafter upon this thought (10). What Beza says in the third place is his best remark, and yet it is not very solid. He justly exclaims against Balduinus, and treats him as a deceiver: the omission of that period shews Balduinus's unfairness; he would not have left it out, had he not been afraid of doing himself some prejudice by producing it. And therefore he designed to impose upon his readers, and to carry the cause by a trick and dolo malo. But I must observe, that on this occasion Balduinus shewed as little judgment as sincerity; for had he considered well, he might easily have perceived that the period he left out was not prejudicial to him. A man who hath declared that he admits an active and even an antecedent concurrence of the will, and that he wishes no body would write books to maintain the necessity of human actions, shews plainly enough that he is not of Calvin's opinion. Now this is what Melancthon had declared in the words alleged by Balduinus: and therefore if he declares afterwards, that he does not advance those things, as if Calvin wanted to know them, and that he thinks they agree, at the bottom, with Calvin's doctrine, tho' they are not propoed with the subtilty of that Divine, but in a plain, coarse, and more popular manner; I say, if he acts thus, it is plain he does it out of civility, and compliment, to divest himself of the odious appearance of a man, who takes upon himself to advise and censure others. Every body knows there is a civil way of putting people in mind of their duty, which consists in telling them they are not ignorant that such and such things ought to be done, and that they do not want to be told of it. I cannot sufficiently wonder how Beza could undertake to maintain against Balduinus, that Melancthon, and the Divines of Geneva taught the same thing concerning Free-will.

for he was a man who knew very well how to avoid the ill consequences of prepossession. He believed that men might err through a good motive [B]. What I shall say thereupon will

(11) See above citation (9).

(12) Audiveras paulo antequam huc scriberes in Saxonia inter Illyricum & Victorinum magnam fuisse questionem an sit adestus Tu Illyricum qui tecum sentis, forte non potes: Victorinum qui Melancthonem sequitur non oppugnas. Balduinus, in Responsi. altera ad Calvin. pag. 141.

(13) Virgil. Eclog. I, ver. 72.

(14) Responsi. ad Calvinum & Bezan pro Franc. Balduino, fol. 145. verso.

melancthon
& Calvin

This he maintained in the year 1563. He knew what he wrote since in the life of Calvin (11); he was not ignorant of the disputes of the Synergists mentioned by Balduinus (12). But what will a man not do in the heat of dispute? En quo discordia civis (13)?

I fancy the readers will not be displeased to know what Balduinus replied. He was silent as to the omission of the period, finding no other way to hide his shame; but as to the rest, he answered haughtily, and in a few words, 'Nil quicquam impudentius dici aut fingi potest quam quod jam contendis, hac tota in re Philippum idem quod vos, & vos idem quod Philippus sentire. Nam etsi nonnisi postremis ejus libris & sententiis standum esse dicas, tamen quod postremo ad articulos Bavaricos scripsit, an cum doctrina in hoc genere vestra plane consentit (14)? - - - Nothing more impudent can be spoken or imagined than what you affirm, that in all this matter Melancthon is of the same opinion as you, and you as he. For though you say we must stand to his last books and opinions, yet what he last wrote upon the Bavarian articles, does it plainly agree with your doctrine upon this subject?' [B]

Melancthon believed that one might err through a good motive. A haughty and choleric Divine, will be so excessively fond of his opinions, that he thinks none can oppose them without acting against common sense, or the dictates of his conscience. He hardens and devotes himself to his own prejudices the more, as you strongly argue against him. But a moderate, modest, and humble Divine, and of a phlegmatic temper, as Melancthon was, takes a different course. Though he rejects an opinion as being false and dangerous, yet he will do justice to those who maintain it: He acknowledges not only their other excellent qualities, and commends them for them, but also does not scruple to own that they have very specious reasons to maintain it. He will not therefore break with them, nor loosen the bonds of fraternity, whilst the dissension is confined within certain bounds. From whence it appears that neither Melancthon's letters to Calvin, nor the praises he bestowed upon him in printed books, can prove that they agreed in the doctrine of Free-will. All that can be inferred from thence is, that he was so equitable as to distinguish these two things one from another, Calvin's doctrine, as he considered it, and that same doctrine as Calvin himself considered it. He thought that doctrine made God the author of sin; but he very well knew that Calvin did not teach it under that notion, and would have looked upon it as an abominable tenet if so considered. He was not ignorant, under what form it appeared to Calvin, namely, under the appearance of a system, grounded upon several passages of the scripture, and tending to maintain the rights of God's providence, and those of the dispensation of the new law. He was not ignorant that the doctrine of Free-will appeared to Calvin under a monstrous shape, as destructive of providence, and directly contrary to St Paul's Epistles, and to the glory that redounds to God from mens salvation. And therefore, tho' Melancthon did not approve Calvin's opinion, yet he believed that it was grounded upon a motive worthy of a good man, and a zealous servant of God: Notwithstanding their different notions, they agreed in this maxim, That of two opinions, that which is most consonant to the scripture, and to the glory of God, ought to be preferred to the other. Their perfect agreement in this point, occasioned their discord; for, in consequence of this maxim, Calvin embraced the doctrine of Necessity, and Melancthon that of Free-will. One of them believed that the supreme empire of God over all things, and the rights of a providence, worthy of the Infinite Being, required an absolute Predestination. The other believed that the goodness, holiness, and justice of the Supreme Being required there should be some contingency in our actions. Such were the grounds they went upon. Both of them aimed at the same thing, viz. at the greatest glory of God, but they took different ways. Was this a sufficient reason for them not to own one another for brethren, and fellow-labourers in the Lord's vineyard (15)?

VOL. V.

I foresee it will be objected to me, that those different ways should have obliged those two Divines to anathematize one another, since Melancthon should have believed that, under pretence of asserting the rights of the divine authority, Calvin destroyed the goodness, the holiness, and the justice of God, by making him the author of sin and eternal misery; and, on the contrary, Calvin should have maintained, that under colour of preserving those three divine attributes, Melancthon overturned providence and the empire of God, by asserting that man has a Free-will. But here is a very good solution to this difficulty. If Calvin had argued thus: Not being able to preserve all the attributes of God, I give over part of them, that I may preserve the rest, and I rather chuse to sacrifice the moral virtues to the physical ones, than the physical to the moral; I rather chuse to make him a powerful master, than a good master; he would have deserved to be anathematized by all men. But he maintained on all occasions, that, by asserting the supreme authority of God, he did not intend in the least to derogate from the moral Perfections of the infinite being, from his goodness, his holiness, his righteousness. And therefore Melancthon had been very unjust to have cavilled personally with him on that account, I mean to have imputed to him consequences, which at the worst were only drawn from his doctrine, since Calvin disowned them; which he did in these words. 'Ubique in scriptis suis clamat (Calvinus) quoties de peccato agitur, non miscendum esse Dei nomen: quia in Dei naturam non nisi perfecta rectitudo & aequitas competit. Quam putida igitur calumnia est, hominem de Ecclesia Dei bene meritum, crimine hoc involvere, quod Deum faciat autorem peccati? Docet quidem ubique nihil fieri nisi volente Deo. Interea quæ sceleratè sunt ab hominibus Deum arcano judicio ita moderari asserit, ne quid affine habeat hominum vitio. Summa doctrinæ ejus est, Deum mirabiliter, & modis nobis incognitis, in quemcumque vult finem omnia dirigere, ut æterna ejus voluntas prima sit rerum omnium causa. Cur autem velit Deus quod nobis videtur minimè consentaneum, fatetur esse incomprehensibile. Ideoque nimis curiosè & audacter investigandum esse negat: quoniam judicia Dei sint abyssus multa, & mysteria quæ modulum nostrum superant, reverenter adorare conveniat potius, quam excutere. Interea principium illud retinet, Quamvis nos ratio consilii lateat, semper tribuendam esse Deo justitiæ laudem: quia ejus voluntas summa sit equitatis regula (16). - - - Calvin in his writings every where declares, when he treats of the cause of sin, that the name of GOD ought not to be mentioned: because the nature of GOD is perfectly upright and righteous. How rank a calumny therefore is it, to charge a man who bath so well deserved of the Church of GOD, with making GOD the author of sin? He teaches indeed on all occasions, that nothing can be but what GOD wills. He says, that the wicked actions of men are so ruled by the secret judgment of GOD, as that he is no ways accessory to them. The sum of what he teaches is, that GOD wonderfully, and in ways to us unknown, directs all things to whatever end he pleases, so that his eternal will is the first cause of all things. But why GOD wills what seems to us not suitable to his nature, he acknowledges to be incomprehensible. And therefore denieth that it should be over-curiously and boldly searched into: because the judgments of GOD are a vast abyss, and mysteries beyond our reach, which ought with awful reverence to be adored rather than searched into. But still he keeps to this principle, tho' the reason of his counsel be unknown to us, the praise of righteousness is ever to be given to GOD: because his will is the supreme rule of equity.' Warm and passionate men will not be satisfied with such a wife answer; but Melancthon, who was a lover of peace, and whose great equity and modesty enabled him clearly to discover the weak and the strong side of the opinions he approved or rejected; Melancthon, I say, being of such a disposition of mind, was always ready to do justice to Calvin. Every body should imitate that equitable Divine. Tho' you should clearly prove against a Predestinarian, that his system is necessarily equitable

Q9

(16) Calvinus, in brevi Responsione ad diluendas nebulas cujusdam calumnie, pag. m. 290, Tractat. Theologicus. See Dictionary, citation (49), of the explanation on the Manichees.

SYNERGISTS.

154

will give me occasion to examine the answer [C], that was made to a passage in the Philosophical necessarily attended with this consequence. Therefore God is the author of sin, you should be contented with this answer as to his person; I see, as well as with this answer as to his principle with that consequence, and my reason that sees it, does not afford me a sufficient knowledge to make me understand how I am mistaken in seeing it; nevertheless, I am fully persuaded, that God finds in the infinite treasures of his wisdom, a certain way of breaking that connexion; a way, I say, certain and most infallible, tho' it be unknown to me, and surpasses the reach of my knowledge. A Christian ought chiefly to value himself upon his submitting to God's authority.

Not to believe what is seen, ought frequently to be the motto of a Christian, as well as to believe what is not seen. This is, in effect, the sense of Calvin's words, which we have just now seen. Melancthon, and any other Divine, who asserts man's Free-will, would be the more to blame for not being satisfied with this answer, because they are forced to have recourse to such an explanation; for, provided they have any sincerity, they acknowledge that the manner of reconciling God's providence, and his precision with man's Free-will, is incomprehensible to them (17). Thus they are driven into the same precipice into which they drove others; they take refuge in their turn in the incomprehensibility of God's nature, with respect to the weakness of human reason.

It is therefore a great subject of scandal to see the divisions occasioned by the disputes about Grace. Every sect taxes the other with teaching impious things and horrid blasphemies, and carries animosity to the highest degree; and yet, it is about such doctrines that a mutual toleration should most readily take place. The too immoderate zeal of either of the parties might be excused, if they could clearly prove their opinions, and answer all objections clearly, directly, and in a convincing manner; but that men who are obliged to say, that they have no better solution to give, but that these are secrets impenetrable to the human mind, and concealed in the infinite treasures of the incomprehensible divine immensity: for such persons, I say, to practise barbarous cruelty, to thunder out anathemas, banish and hang those who dissent from them, is a thing which appears to me inexcusable. Melancthon was more human. He did not believe that those, who deny Free-will, are unworthy of being looked upon as God's servants; he excused them on account of the obscurity of the matter, and the goodness of their motives.

Nothing would be more useful than to make serious reflections upon what is to be found concerning that controversy in a book of Dr Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury (18).

[C] The answer, that was made to a passage in the Philosophical Commentary upon these words, Compel them to come in. I think one of the reasons why Melancthon expressed so great a moderation about this dispute, was his considering that the method God thought fit to use, was chosen by him among infinite others equally worthy of the most perfect being. Now this consequence arises from that consideration; viz. that a man may be mistaken in explaining Theological doctrines, without ascribing any thing to God that is prejudicial to his perfections: for those are mistaken, who embrace an hypothesis not consonant to what God has actually done; but if it be agreeable to one of the other methods he might have chosen, it ascribes to God a conduct altogether worthy of him. Let us clear the matter by an example. Let us suppose that Solomon, who used to exchange letters with the King of Tyre (19), writ to him a letter in cyphers, wherein he argued about a state affair. Let us suppose that Titius and Mevius being ordered to decypher that letter, did not make use of the same key; one of them took for an A what the other took for an O, and so with the other figures, Titius found out Solomon's intentions, and consequently Mevius missed it; but nevertheless Mevius found out so reasonable and so coherent a sense, that Solomon's wisdom appeared as much by it as by that of Mevius. It might have been objected to Mevius, that he ascribed some things to Solomon inconsistent with the usual course of prudence; but he might have answered, that Solomon being a man of a vast genius, dived so far into political affairs, as to find out things that were above the capacity of other men. And therefore, would he have said, what surprises us in the present case, ought to be looked upon as an effect of his extraordinary wisdom. A like objection might have been raised against Titius, and he would have answered it the same way. The great genius of that King of Jerusalem would have served for a new key to resolve the particular difficulties in the explanation of the cypher. None but he could have determined whether Titius had been either more fortunate or more knowing than Mevius; but perceiving, on one hand, that Mevius ascribed to him a sublime reasoning, and on the other, that if there remained any difficulty in it, it was removed by a supposition very glorious to his wisdom, he might have been as well-pleased with Mevius as with Titius and might have spoken thus to them: One of you makes me think what I have thought, and the other what I might have thought with an equal glory.

It will be readily granted me, that this is an image of the fate of Astronomers, who explain the celestial phenomena by opposite systems. Those phenomena are like an enigmatical letter, delivered by God to be decyphered by Astronomers: Some take the motion of the earth, and others its rest, for their key. The revolution of the earth round its axes, is by some of them used to account for the precession of the equinoxes (20); others chuse rather spiral lines (21), and so of the rest. The three systems, viz. of Ptolemy, Copernicus, and Tycho Brahe, though never so different, each explains the phenomena; and yet there is but one that is true. This was Mr Marion's meaning (22), when he said that Copernicus's system was an opinion true in art, and false in nature. But as all the followers of those systems are agreed in admiring in the work the infinite power and infinite wisdom of the author of it, they are not afraid of offending God if they should be mistaken. They think that if he does not perform those things as they fancy he does, he might so do it without any prejudice to his perfections, and that having an infinite knowledge, he has the ideas of infinite plans of the world, all perfectly beautiful, and worthy of the most wise and most perfect being. I am sure that a Copernician, after much exclaiming against Ptolemy's system, and the perplexities of so many circles and epicycles, and against the insignificance of the prodigious swiftness of the firmament, &c. will confess, if he considers it, that all the faults he observes in that hypothesis might be made up by advantages, not to be found in the simple mechanism of the motion of the earth. Whoever considers the ideas of an infinite knowledge, will see the possibility of such a compensation; he will perceive that man is not the only being, for whom such great objects are designed. He will be sensible that the inconceivable rapidity of the celestial spheres might be of a wonderful use, with respect to some parts of the universe, placed beyond the reach of our sight; in a word, that if Ptolemy's system is false, yet it is still possible, and consequently very worthy of the Creator's wisdom; for if it was unworthy of it, it would not be possible. I do not think that any Astronomer, who is conscious to himself, that he prefers that system to all others, because all things duly considered, he believes it to be more consonant to God's choice, would be afraid of appearing before the judge of the world with such an opinion, tho' it should prove false. I think he would expect that the Copernican and himself should, both of them, receive an answer, much like that which I have supposed Solomon would have made to Titius and Mevius. Few people will deny this; but if the question was about a point of Divinity, an infinite number of Divines would deny it (23). I presume that Melancthon would be none of them, as to the two systems, concerning Predestination, that of Liberty, and that of Necessity. He would suppose that the system is false probable, possible, and not contrary to God's perfections.

Laying aside the doctrinal part of those questions, I shall mention a fact, which the laws of history warrant me to take notice of; and if I add some criticisms to my narrative, I shall do nothing inconsistent with the design of this Dictionary. A minister

(20) See Rohault's Physics, Tom. ii, ch. xii, pag. m. 77, and Regius's Philosophy, Vol. iii, lib. iii, Part ii, ch. vi, pag. m. 128, Edit. in 12mo.

(21) See the best instructed, Unus ou les Tables des Philosophes, Tom. iii, pag. 44.

(22) In one of his pleadings. See Mr Arnault, Difficulté à Souter, Part. i, pag. 101.

(23) If the question was only in foretel eclipses, and other phenomena, to satisfy our curiosity, or for the use of life, one might be free to chuse a system; different hypotheses might be reconciled with the same phenomena; or if one had an ill success, it were but a mistake attended with no ill consequence. Whether we follow Ptolemy's system, or Tycho-Brahe's, or Kepler's, or Copernicus's, it signifies but little, as long as we do not positively affirm a thing of which we have not a mathematical certainty. But it is not so with systems of religion. See, ubi infra, p. 355.

the ans r

in 2x ans

one of many

Joe man

(17) Beza objects to them, that they have no other answer when they are pressed hard. I have quoted his words in the remark [H] of the article CASTALIO, citation (93).

(18) Mr de Beaumont gives an extract of it, in his Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans, Off. 1699, pag. 435, & seq. and also Bernard, in Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for August 1700, pag. 155, & seq.

(19) Joseph. Ant. Jud. lib. viii, cap. ii, fol. m. 215.

Philosophical Commentary upon these words, Compel them to come in.

of Utrecht, in his reflexions upon the Philosophical Commentary, has confuted the following passage as strongly as he could. 'Here is a hint that may serve to remove the phantoms and panic fears, wherewith Divines have been so long troubled upon the subject of error; for it is certain, that the reason why men find so many arguments, which seem to be of an equal solidity to maintain truth and falshood in controversies about religion, is that most falsities that appear in them are as possible as the truths. In effect, we all suppose that revelation depends upon a free decree of God; for he is not necessitated by his nature to make men or any other being. And consequently he might, if he had pleased, have produced nothings, or produced a world different from this; and if he had designed to place therein men, he might have directed them to his ends, by methods quite contrary to those he has pitched upon, and which would have been equally worthy of the most perfect being; for an infinite wisdom has infinite ways of manifesting itself, that are all worthy of it. Which being so, it is no wonder if Divines find as many arguments to maintain Free-will as to impugn it; for we have ideas and principles to apprehend and to prove, that God could have made man a free creature, and not have bestowed upon him a liberty of indifference, as it is called; and the same may be said of an hundred other contradictory propositions, 2 Tom. Suppl. chap. 24. pag. 308, 309, 310 (24).' The reflexions upon this passage, as far as they concern the present subject, may be reduced to this interrogation: Who told him that we have ideas and principles to apprehend and to prove, that GOD could make man a free creature, and forbear bestowing upon him a liberty of indifference (25). I believe Mr Saurin would not have asked such a question, if he had well-considered, that for the space of one hundred and fifty years, a vast number of books have been published all over Europe, for and against liberty, in which each party make unanswerable objections. He would have confessed then that we have ideas and principles to apprehend, &c. Let him peruse some books written by the Arminians or the Calvinists, the Molinists or the Jansenists, and he will see that those ideas and principles are very plentiful in mens minds. He adds (26) that there are contradictory things, repugnant to GOD's nature; and consequently impossible . . . that GOD could not create bodies without extension and three dimensions, nor spirits without being endowed with the faculty of thinking. These words are to no purpose; for the commentator said nothing, whereby he insinuates that there are not some things absolutely impossible: To what purpose then does Mr Saurin observe, that the attributes, which constitute the essence of a creature, cannot be separated from it? Did the Commentator doubt of that truth? If God (Mr Saurin goes on) (27), has not made man endowed with his liberty of indifference, our Philosopher cannot know whether he could have created him with that liberty; and whether that liberty is not as contradictory as a square circle, or an independent creature. I do not understand this well enough to confute it; but I think that Melancthon being to answer such an objection, would have been contented to say, I do not love to use subtilities upon this subject, I follow the notions of the people, I believe God has freely made all his works, and I wonder a minister calls such a truth into question (28). His intimating that the liberty of indifference is as contradictory as a square circle is still more strange to me, since he affirms a little after, that it is impossible GOD should produce an intelligent creature, without giving him some laws (29). The laws God gave to Adam were attended with promises and threatenings: which clearly supposes that it was in Adam's power to obey or disobey. The most rigid Divines, St Augustin and Calvin, expressly teach, that men have lost their free-will only because Adam made an ill use of it in the terrestrial Paradise. I desire no more than this to be certain, that it is possible for God to bestow a liberty of indifference upon men. Had he not bestowed it upon Adam, all our systems of religion would come to nothing: From whence I conclude, that God gave him such a liberty; now every body knows, that from the act to the power, the consequence holds good (30). But I conceive he might have made him determined to good things, in such a manner, as never to waver between good and evil; and therefore the hypothesis of man's liberty, and that of necessity, appear both possible to me. This is what I think Melancthon might have answered. I think also he would have taken it ill, that the author of the reflexions upon the Philosophical Commentary did not declare his opinion, but was contented with an If GOD, &c. an indeterminate phrase, from which one may infer, that the privation of free-will implies a contradiction: For if it should follow from God's creating Adam without a liberty of indifference, that it is a liberty which implies contradiction; others would maintain, that if he had created him with that liberty, it would follow, that the determination to one of the contraries would be as impossible as a square circle. I omit what the author of the reflexion says against the commentator, who advances that the proofs of a false thing are sometimes as good as the proofs of a true one. What Mr Saurin answers to it is full of needless things; for it is needless in a dispute to prove to an adversary what he does not deny. The only thing that does not seem superfluous is his saying, that the reasons which determine us to the choice of a religion, ought to be moral demonstrations (31): But even that is of no use in the controversy about Free-will mentioned by the commentator; for since each party pretends to such demonstrations, it is referring us to equivocal signs.

Here follows another passage of the Commentary.

(32) What do they do then, when the revelation (32) Id. ibid. is doubtful about some point? Why some explain pag. 327.

it by one system, and others by another. Granting that one of those systems is consonant to the method which God has actually pitched upon, it does not follow that the other system is not consonant to what he might have done with the same glory and wisdom he has discovered by doing another thing, since we conceive that God might have done things otherwise than he has done them, a thousand different ways, all worthy of his infinite perfection: otherwise, he would not be a free being, and would not differ from the God of the Stoics, chained down by an unavoidable fate, a doctrine little better than Spinozism. And consequently, no false system can be pernicious; but when a Divine builds it upon notions, which he believes to be contrary to God's word, and unbecoming his majesty. But I think there are no such Divines in the world. 2 Tom. Suppl. chap. 24. pag. 310, 311. Mr Saurin comparing those words with another passage, wherein the commentator says, he will not take advantage of the comparison of a prince, whose vast empire should contain many nations, that have different laws, ways, customs, and languages; thinks

(33), that the commentator thereby justifies, not only all the sects of Christianity, but all those of Paganism. I wonder he did not perceive that his adversary confines himself to the systems grounded on the different senses put upon the scripture (34). Here follows another passage, at which you will be surprised. GOD might have done things otherwise than he has done them, a thousand different ways, all worthy of his infinite perfection. Mr Saurin (35) having quoted again those words of the Philosophical Commentary, confutes them with a distinction between the essential parts of religion, and those that are not essential; and then he says (36): 'The author makes

'no such distinction; he uses an universal proposition; GOD might have done things otherwise than he has done them, an hundred different ways. And what is there remarkable, is that among those different ways he reckons those, that have been imagined by the heathen Poets, and the Chinese Philosophers; for he will justify all the systems of religion, that have been invented by Divines, and received by the people. In order to prove his assertion, he alleges the liberty of God. Otherwise, says he, he would not be a free being, and would not differ from the GOD of the Stoics, chained down by an unavoidable fate, a doctrine little better than Spinozism. Were this consequence right, God would have the most dreadful liberty of indifference that can be imagined. He might lie and perjure himself, when he swears by himself: he might command us to hate him, and forbid

(24) Saurin, Reflex. sur les Droits de la Conscience, pag. 323.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 324.

(26) Id. ibid.

(27) Id. ibid. pag. 325.

(28) The words, if God has not made man endowed with a liberty of indifference imply a doubt.

(29) Saurin, Reflex. sur les Droits de la Conscience, pag. 330.

(30) Ab acta vel potentiam valet consequentia.

(31) Id. ibid. pag. 329.

(34) What do they do then, when the revelation is doubtful about some point? Comment. Philosoph. quoted by Mr Saurin, ubi supra, pag. 327.

(35) Id. ibid. pag. 329.

(36) Id. ibid. pag. 330.

SIRIS.

156

forbid us to love him: he might command us to chery, and perjury, in a word all sorts of crimes: in short, he might turn all virtues into as many vices, and all vices into as many virtues. These few words are sufficient to refute those reflexions: mind this clause, ALL WORTHY OF HIS INFINITE PERFECTION. It shews, with the utmost evidence, that God's liberty does not consist in being able to act right or wrong, wisely or imprudently; but in having the power of choosing among infinite plans, equally beautiful and good, one or another, as he thinks fit. Can this signify that he might have introduced the false worship sung by the heathen Poets? Are they worthy of his infinite perfection?

SIRIS, a river of Italy, at the mouth of which there was a town called SIRIS, went successively by several other names [A]. That town was said to have been built by the Trojans, and to prove it, they shewed there a statue of the Trojan Minerva (a). It was shewn still in Strabo's time, as a miraculous image; for it looked downwards, and the reason given for it is, that the goddess conceived a great horror, when the Ionians took the town, and shewed no respect for that statue. Several inhabitants fled to that Minerva, and there implored the clemency of the conquerors, as in a place of refuge which they thought to be inviolable; but the enemies had no regard to their intreaties, and they were barbarously dragged out of that sanctuary (b). The goddess had not the courage to behold such an irreverence. This was the reason why she cast her eyes downwards. It was not the first time that a dreadful sight made her turn her eyes another way: she had done it before at Troy when Cassandra was ravished (c). The author, from whom I have these particulars, makes a judicious reflexion upon the great number of statues, which the Trojans were said to have consecrated since their dispersion [B]. Mr de Marolles, Abbot of Villeloin, made the same observation [C], upon the frequent multiplication of the same relick. I have observed in another place (d) Florus's mistake about the river Siris.

(a) Strabo, lib. vi, pag. 188.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Id. ibid.

(d) In the second article P Y R - R H U S, remark [C].

[A] Went successively by several other names. Consult Cluverius (1), he will tell you it was called Leuternia, Polium, Heracium. He says that the Tarentines having built Heraclea three miles above the mouth of the river Siris, removed thither the inhabitants of Siris; so that from that time the town of Siris was only the port of the town of Heraclea. According to Stephanus Byzantinus, the town of Siris was called Polium by the Trojans; but according to Tzetzes it was called Polium, before it went by the name of Siris. It may be inferred from Lycophron, Strabo, and the same Tzetzes, that Leuternia was its first name (2).

[B] Strabo makes a judicious reflexion upon the great number of statues. . . which the Trojans had consecrated since their dispersion. It is a piece of impudence, says he, to pretend, not only that a statue did formerly cast its eyes downwards, but even, that such a statue may be seen to this day. It is still a greater impudence to mention a great number of such statues brought from Troy. They boast at Rome, at Lavinium, at Luceria, and at Siris, that they have the Minerva of the Trojans; and what is said of the Trojan women is applied to several other places; and therefore tho' the thing be possible, it does not appear credible. Ἰταμὸν μὲν ἔν καὶ τὸ ἔργον μνησθῆναι ὡς τε μὴ μόνον καλῶνται φαινόμενον, καθάπερ καὶ τὸ ἐν Ἰλίου ἀποσπέντα κατὰ τὸν Κασσάνδρας βιασμένον, ἀλλὰ καὶ καλῶνται δεικνυσθαι. Πολλοὶ δὲ ἰταμώτερον τὸ τοιαῦτα ποιεῖν ἐξ ἰλίου κομισμένην ἔχοντα ὅσα φασὶν οἱ συγγραφεῖς. καὶ γὰρ ἐν Ῥώμῃ, καὶ ἐν Λαβινίῳ, καὶ ἐν Λυκερίᾳ, καὶ ἐν Σιρίτιδι Ἰλίδος Ἀθηνᾶ καλεῖται ὡς ἐκείδεν κομισθείσα. Καὶ τὸ τῶν Τρωάδων δὲ τόλμημα, πεισθίσαι πολλὰ ἄλλ', καὶ ἀπιστοῖ φανταί, καίπερ δύνασθαι οἱ. Enimvero protervum est fingere, simulacrum aliquod non modo visum fuisse conivertit, sicut imaginem Minervae illi servat oculos avertisse cum violaretur Cassandra: sed fabule adicere, simulacrum etiamnum conivertit: confici. At multo etiam protervius est ea ab illo allata fabulari, quae scriptores ponunt. Nam & Romae, & Lavinii, & Luceriae, & Siritiidi Minerva habetur Iliaca, quasi ab illo allata: & facinus mulierum Trojanarum multis adscribitur locis, eoque fides ei derogatur cum fieri tamen potuerit (3). I have set down the Greek for the satisfaction of those, who are never pleased, unless they see the original words, and likewise to exempt my self from a strict translation of that passage. Strabo's reflexion is very judicious; for if the variations of Historians are not a certain character of fallity, they afford at least a just pretence to suspend one's belief: and when several towns pretend to have the same miraculous image, it is a very strong presumption that all of them fallily boast of it, and that the same trick, and the same interest moves them to set up their traditions.

[C] The Abbot of Villeloin made the same observation. Let us see his own words. 'As they were shewing (4) her the head of St John the Baptist, which the people there reverence as one of the most considerable relics in the world; after she had kissed it, she bad me come near, and do the same. I considered the shrine, and what was in it: I kissed it as others did, and was contented to say, as softly as possible, that it was the fifth or sixth head of St John the Baptist, which I had had the honour to kiss: at which her highness was a little surprised, and could not forbear smiling, but it was not perceived: and the sacrificer, or treasurer, who also took notice of what I said, replied, he could not deny that several others were mentioned (for perhaps he had been told that the same head was to be seen in St John's Church at Lyons, at St Jean de Morienne, at St Jean d'Angeli in Saintonge, at Rome, in Spain, in Germany, and in several other places) but that the head he shewed was the true one. And to prove the truth of his assertion, he desired us to observe the hole that was in the scull of that relic above the right eye, that it was the same hole that Herodias made in it with her knife when the head was brought to her in a dish. I think, said I, the Gospel does not mention so remarkable a particular; but perceiving he was resolved to maintain the contrary, I yielded very respectfully: and without entering into a farther examination of the matter, or alledging the authority of St Gregory Nazianzen, who says that all the bones of St John the Baptist were burnt in his time by the Donatists, in the town of Sebastia, and that nothing remained of them but a small part of the head, which was carried to Alexandria, I was contented to tell him that the tradition of so venerable a church as that of Amiens, was sufficient to authorize such a belief, tho' it was not above four hundred years old, and tho' it was not an article of faith. However, people purchased many representations of that holy relic, and the honest priest was very well satisfied (5). The author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (6), speaking of a book written about the holy handkerchief, mentioned this passage of the Abbot of Villeloin, and related these words of Charles Patin, the son (7). I am only sorry to see so often the picture of the Virgin drawn by St Luke; for it is certain people are mistaken about most of them, it being unlikely that St Luke should have drawn so many pictures of the Virgin.

(4) He means the Princess Mary Gonzaga, who was then at Amiens.

(5) Marolles, Memoires, pag. 132, at the year 1641.

(6) For the month of September, 1685, pag. 999. He examines whether it be an important thing to multiply those things.

(7) Relations Historiques, p. 221. Edit. of Lyons 1676.

SIXTUS IV, made Pope in the year 1471, had been General of the Franciscans and his name was Francesco della Rovere. He was born the twenty-second of July 1414 at Cella (a) a town of the Riviera di Genoa, five miles from Savona. One of his Historians (b) ascribes to him all sorts of good qualities, a great learning, an ardent charity for the poor, a great liberality to the princes oppressed by the Turks, an admirable exactness in causing justice to be duly administered, and a great care of repairing the ruins of Rome, and adorning that town. He does not dissemble the faults for which he was blamed. 1. His committing many injustices in favour of his creatures [A]: 2. his stirring up a war in Italy very unseasonably: 3. his excommunicating Laurence de Medicis: 4. and then exercising all manner of hostilities against the Florentines. He does not charge him, as others do (c), with knowing and having contrived the conspiracy of the Pazzi. He says nothing of the dissolute life of the cardinals who were in favour under that reign, one of which, as many believe, is described in some verses of Baptista Mantuanus [B]. Nor does he mention the abominable lewdness, to which some say that Pope lent a helping hand. They will have it that he granted a petition,

(a) Ghilini, Teatro, Parte II, p. 93. Rivot is mistaken in his Remarques sur la Réponse au Mystère d'Iniquité, Part. II, p. 62a, where he makes him a native of Albiscola.

(b) See the Life of Sixtus IV, at the end of Platina, fol. 363, 364. Edit. Lugd. 1512.

(c) See Varillas, Anecdotes de Florentins, p. 70, and the remark [A], citation (8) of that page. Consult also Machiavel, book viii, of the History of Florence.

[A] He was blamed . . . for committing many injustices in favour of his creatures. He was more indulgent to his relations than any other Pope, and he is blamed for having done and granted many things upon their account præter fas jusque, against all human and divine laws (1). The three Cardinals of his first promotion were Peter Riario of Savona, whom he brought up being a little boy, with his brother Jerome, both born in the same town, (not without mystery) and Julian his brother's son, who was afterwards Julius II (2). He bestowed great benefices upon Peter, a man so luxurious and prodigal, that he seemed to be born to throw away money, having spent, during the two years of his cardinalship, two hundred thousand crowns for his ordinary, and when he died, he owed sixty thousand crowns, and left many rich household goods, departing this world all over rotten, by reason of his debaucheries at twenty-eight years of age (3). It is he, whose prodigious prodigality has been described by Baptista Fulgiosius †, which he carried so far as to give his whore Tiresia pattins covered with pearls. Baptista Mantuanus † made also the following verses upon him, wherein he represents him saluted by Jupiter in Hell.

(1) Du Pleffis, Mornai, ex Volaterrano & O-nuphrio, in his Mystère d'Iniquité, p. 555.

(2) Du Pleffis, ibid.

(3) Volaterran. lib. xxii, p. m. 818.

† Baptista Fulgiosius, dictor. & factor. memorabil. lib. ix.

† Baptista Mantuanus, in Alphon. lib. xv.

(4) Du Pleffis, Mornai, Mystère d'Iniquité, p. 555.

(5) Simon Goulart in his Continuation of the Catalogus Testium Veritatis, does likewise apply them to Sixtus, and also what has been said above of the great expenses of Cardinal Peter Riario. Gresser, in Examin. Myst. p. 544, takes advantage of those variations.

(6) It should be Ferli.

(7) Coëffeteau, Réponse au Mystère d'Iniquité, p. 1205.

At tu implume caput cui tanta licentia quondam
Fœmineos fuit in coitus, tua furta putabas
Hic quoque prætextu mitræ impunita relinqui?
Sic meruit tua fœda Venus, &c. (4).

But thou bald-pate who so delighted was
With womens leud embraces, &c.

We shall see hereafter that Mr Jurieu applies those verses to Pope Sixtus (5), tho' he had read in Du Pleffis that they were made upon the cardinal I speak of. Coëffeteau does not deny the dissolute life of that cardinal, and adds that Sixtus was not more lucky in his choice of Jerome, if the Historians are to be credited, excepting that he was not given to sensuality, being only fond of hunting. This Jerome being made Prince of Imola and Friuli (6) by the Pope, married the bastard daughter of the Duke of Milan; and upon account of that marriage, Sixtus gave a cardinal's hat to Asciagne, the duke's son. Sixtus raised also Leonard, his brother's son, and married him to a bastard of King Ferdinand, and made him governor of Rome. When this nephew died, he raised in his room another nephew, brother . . . of Cardinal Julian, and made him Prince of Sorra and Senegaglia. This second nephew married Joan, daughter of Frederic de Montefeltro, Duke of Urbino, by whom he had Francis Maria, who, after the death of his uncle Guy Ubaldino, who died without male issue, succeeded by adoption to the Duchy of Urbino (7). Du Pleffis relates an abominable action in the following words. Sixtus, who designed to raise his dear Jerome, had a mind to make himself master of Florence; but Laurence and Julian de Medicis were an obstacle to it. He practised upon Francis Pazzi, who was the leader of the contrary faction, to attempt upon their lives; and, in order to carry on the thing with greater safety, he sent to Florence Raphael Riario, Cardinal of St George, a young man, and Jerome's nephew, to encourage the conspirators. Accordingly, upon a Sunday, they fell upon the Medicis in the middle of the service in St Reparada's church. Julian was there killed; Laurence was wounded, whom the sextons carried into the vestry, &c. (8).

VOL. V.

[B] One of the Cardinals that were in favour, as many believe, is described in some verses of Baptista Mantuanus. You have seen in the foregoing remark four Latin verses of that Poet, which relate to the Cardinal Peter Riario, if we believe Mr du Pleffis. He is not the only author who applies them to him: others pretend they ought to be understood of Pope Sixtus. But the better to judge of the whole matter, it is necessary to consider the reflexions which an ingenious person has been pleased to send me. Here they are. (9) In order to understand those verses of Mantuanus, in the 4th book of his poem, intituled Alphonus, we must know that in that work, which is only a description of Alphonus's going through hell, the Poet represents the state of several souls, some of which were condemned to eternal torments, and others to those of purgatory. He feigns that Alphonus, son of John II, and grandson of Henry III, Kings of Castile, going with his father and grandfather from purgatory to the terrestrial Paradise, heard a long dialogue between the soul of a Pope in purgatory, and a Devil called Jupiter, who tormented him. The Pope's soul discovers its quality in these verses:

(8) Du Pleffis, Mystère d'Iniquité, p. 556.

(9) A manuscript Memoir of de la Monnoie.

Apud superos ego templa tenebam
Vaticana, dabant Reges his oscula plantis.

When living I posses'd
The Vatican, and sovereigns kiss'd these feet.

The Devil, in one of his replies, speaks to him thus,

At tu implume caput cui tanta licentia quondam,
Fœmineos fuit in coitus, &c.

But thou bald-pate who so delighted was
With womens leud embraces, &c.

from whence it follows that these verses ought to be understood of a Pope. The question is, Whether they are to be applied to Sixtus IV? The Commentator Badius says, he found in the margin of the copy he made use of this annotation S. P. or. Minorum in two places, viz. over-against these verses:

Prima sono vox languenti, miserere dolentum,
Et sine, clamabat, fessos spirare parumper.

The first I heard, with languid mourning voice,
Cries, pity us in pain, and let us breathe a while.

And eighty verses after, over-against this:

At tu implume caput, &c.

But thou bald-pate, &c.

From whence it appears, says he, that Pope Sixtus is meant by them, though he will not warrant the truth petition, wherein he was desired to permit the exercise of Sodomy, during three months in a year. I have traced this fact up to the origin [C], and shall give my thoughts of it in truth of it: Nam Sixtus, they are his words, inter bonos numeratur Pontifices. Verum nullus malus purgatorio inferitur, purique tam pauci decedunt, ut nihil purgandum secum ferant, opera enim illorum sequuntur illos. - - - For Sixtus is reckoned among the good Popes; but wicked men are not sent to purgatory, and so few die so pure, as to want no purgation, for their works follow them. The same Commentator upon the verse: At tu implume caput, adds, that the Poet not having specified the Pope, he dares not specify him neither, notwithstanding the marginal note. And three lines after explaining this verse, At nisi feminea tandem prece motus olympi Rex afferret opem, &c. - - - Had not the Lord of Heaven, moved by a woman's prayer, at last assisted thee, &c. by feminea prece, - - - a woman's prayer, words which the Devil uses out of contempt, he understands Divæ Virginis cui, says he, si de Sixto quarto loquitur, studiosus admodum fuit, ejusque conceptionis diem celebrari indixit. - - - The holy virgin Mary, for whom Sixtus the IVth, if he is here meant, had the greatest regard, and appointed the day of her conception to be kept holy. Badius, for want of chronology, preposterously entangled himself. Properly speaking, those verses cannot be understood of Pope Sixtus, since Alphonfus, who is the hero of the Poem, dying on the fifth of July 1468, remained in purgatory, according to Mantuanus, till the taking of Negropont by Mahomet II, the 12th of July 1470; after which the Poet supposes that Alphonfus goes from purgatory to the terrestrial Paradise, and from thence to Heaven, where he arrived on Easter-day, the year following 1471, and consequently near four months before Sixtus was made Pope, and above thirteen years before he died. It is therefore more reasonable to believe that Mantuanus designed to make in general a description of a proud and voluptuous Pope, who however having obtained before his death the remission of his sins, by the Virgin's intercession, Feminea prece, was condemned in the other world, not to hell torments, as some authors have rashly affirmed, but only to those of purgatory. This is what the Devil himself owns, when the Poet introduces speaking to that Pope in these words:

R r

At nisi feminea tandem prece motus olympi
Rex afferret opem, cum jam suspiria raucus Ultima vix traheres, & mors incumberet ori,
Nostrer eras, ego jam stratum tibi molle parabam
Larga ubi tartareas intrat fentina cloacas,
Par meritis locus ille tuis, Deus iste malorum
Fautor, ut antiquis viduatam civibus aulam
Et nostro mestam exilio repararet, in astra
Colluivum vulgi humani, passimque volentes
Ire levat, &c.
Sic illi placet, & placeat, mihi forsitan olim
Non impune ferēs, & non sine vulnere multo
In loca pervenies quondam mea.

Had not the Lord of Heaven, moved by a woman's prayer, at last assisted thee when thou couldst hardly gasp, and death lay heavy on thee, thou hadst been mine. For thee I had prepared a downy bed, where the wide sink is disembogued into the infernal shore: a place most due to thy deserts. That God, abettor of the wicked, in order to repair his court, abandoned of it's old inhabitants, and sad for our exile, calls up to heaven, the dregs of human race, &c. For this is his good pleasure. So let it be. I may, in time, make thee severely suffer for it, and many lashes shalt thou feel, before thou enter those regions formerly possessed by us.

I do not deny that the Poet, who was naturally somewhat satirical, was pleased with putting into his description some strokes relating to the licentious life of some Popes and Prelates, whose memory was still fresh. Some curious persons have exercised their wit in making their applications. Some have said that the author meant Sixtus IV, and others that he meant Paul II. At least, I find in the edition of Bologna, in folio, of the 11th of June 1502, over-against these verses, Prima sine vox languenti misere dolentum, Et sine, clamabat, &c. this marginal note, Papa P. And lower, over-against the verse, At tu implume caput, there is in the margin of the same edition F. P. or. Minorum, which some read, Frater Petrus ordinis Minorum, viz. Peter Riario a Cordelier, and afterwards a Cardinal, nephew to Pope Sixtus. I confess there is nothing in these last verses but what suits that Cardinal; but because it is certain the Poet brings only two interlocutors into his dialogue, viz. a Pope, whoever he be, and a devil, called Jupiter, it follows that a third cannot be admitted, and consequently that this conjecture, tho' never so probable, vanishes away.

There is another thing, whereby it may be proved, that Baptista Mantuanus did not mean Pope Sixtus, which is, that he commends him very much in the same work, wherein he deplores the corruption of his age. He praises him so far as to say, that if that corruption had not been so great as to be past curing, that Pope might have cured it.

Postquam rerum te Roma potentem
Fecit, & obscuro jubar hoc resplenduit orbi,
Exanimis virtus, scelerum sub mole sepulta
Respirare parum visa est, & tollere frontem:
Et nisi tot vitis hæc secula nostra fuissent
Depravata, boni poterant rectoris habent
Errantes frenare rotas, sed tantus equorum Impetus aurigam superat, frustra que retractans
Lora gubernator sine lege per invia fertur,
Propterea fortem doleo mitissime Patrum
Sixte tuam, fueras annis melioribus aptus
Est tibi quæ tanto satis est in principe virtus (10).

(10) Bapt. Mantuanus, de calamitatibus suorum temporum. lib. iii.

When Rome made thee it's sovereign, a light shone o'er the darkned world; virtue expiring, and groaning under crimes, appeared again to breathe and raise her drooping head. Had not our age been so depraved by crimes, the reins in the hands of a good prince, might have restrained the wandring wheels of government. But the impetuous fury of the steeds overcomes the charioteer, who pulling back the reins in vain, is carried over pathless ground. Therefore, O Sixtus, I lament thy fate, Sixtus, the mildest of fathers, born for better times, endowed with every princely virtue.

[C] I have traced this fact up to the origin.] In the year 1686, Mr Jurieu published his Prejugés légitimes contre le Papiſme, wherein he says, among other things (11), that Sixtus IV was more debauched and vicious than one can imagine, and a Popish writer (12) says of him, that a petition was presented to him, by the family of the Cardinal of Santa Lucia, that they might be permitted to perform the act of sodomy during the three hottest months of the year, June, July, and August (§ a). He wrote under the petition, Let it be done as desired. It is for him that Baptista Mantuanus, who lived at that time made these verses (13):

At tu implume caput cui tanta licentia quondam
Femineos fuit in coitus: tua furta putabas
Hic quoque pretextu mitræ impunita relinqui,
Sic meruit tua fœda Venus: sic prodigia in omnem
Nequitam, ad virtutis opus tua avara libido,
Illa Dioneæ Cythereia munera conchæ,
Illa pudicitiam quibus impugnare solitas,
Et noctes emere & nudæ indulgere palestræ.

(11) Jurieu, Prejug. légitim. Tom. i, p. 246.

(12) See, below, citation (20).

[(§ a)] This petition supposes that the family which presented it, desired of the Pope the expedient proposal, only as a ragout, which might revive the appetite in a season, when it is not very strong for the usual food. REX. C. 117.]

(13) Mr Zuingler, professor of Divinity at Basel, affirms the same thing, p. 135, of his Tractatus de Probis et Improbis, printed in 1685.

But thou bald-pate who was so delighted with women's embraces, fancied thy crimes, protected by the mitre, might also here escape unpunished. This recompence thy wantonness deserves, thy filthy lust, profuse in every wicked act, and covetous in virtue, those lecherous arts so Corporis Christi by which you oft ensnared chastity, and purchased nights fit of pleasure, sporting in naked combats.

The

The Post introduces a devil speaking to Sixtus IV in Hell, and telling him, that his Papal mitre and bald pate will not prevent his being punished for his luxury, and lewdness, and for the venereal sports, upon which he bestowed so many days and nights. He quotes for the petition, Wesselius Groningensis. Tractatu de Tbesauro Ecclesie. Indulg. I have been told that a very honest man, and a very good Protestant, having read that particular, went to Mr Jurieu in his study, and desired him to shew him the author, who relates such a monstrous thing; and that Mr Jurieu ingenuously confessed to him that he had him not, but that it is to be found in several good writers. That honest man went away very well satisfied with that answer. For my part, I confess I should not have been contented with it: the author of the Prejugez should have quoted Du Pleffis Mornai, from whom he had that passage; in a word, he should have added to the quotation, apud Du Pleffis Mornai, Myst. d'Iniquité, pag. 557. But notwithstanding this addition, I would have made further inquiries; for in short we ought to be informed how Du Pleffis came to know that Wesselius of Groningen relates such a thing. It is so strange, and so improbable, that one ought not to believe it without seeing it. I have therefore endeavoured to find out that book of Wesselius, and not being able to get it, I have looked for the answers that were made to Du Pleffis. Coeffeteau's answer seems to me weak; for he only excepts against the witness, because he was a Heretic, and because such a deposition shews his impudence. 'It is sufficient for the reader, says he (14), to know that Wesselius was a Heretic. Besides, it is a piece of impudence to write such a thing, nor can it be imagined that any man should have been so profligate as to think of what he imputes to Pope Sixtus, and to the Cardinals of St Sixtus, and Santa Lucia. I cannot apprehend how a gentleman could write down such filthy things.' This answer of Coeffeteau shews that he owns the thing to be in Wesselius, whereby he grants to Du Pleffis whatever he could desire. The Jesuit Gretser comes off much better; he denies that Wesselius said such a thing, and proves that he has not said so (15). 1. Because his treatise of Indulgences quoted by Du Pleffis, and published by Goldastus, a good Calvinist, contains not a word relating to the petition presented to the Pope. 2. Because Flacius Illyricus, who took out of Wesselius's works whatever he thought favourable to his design, did not mention what concerns that petition. From whence it plainly follows, that neither Flacius Illyricus, nor Goldastus, men thoroughly versed in the knowledge of such books, found in any library a manuscript of Wesselius's works, that contained the fact mentioned by Du Pleffis. The only authority that we have, is therefore that of Bale, who having related that particular (16), quotes for it the book of Papal Indulgences, written by Wesselius of Groningen. Not being willing to stop here, I further looked into the reply to Coeffeteau, made by a very learned minister (17), who had as much reading as any man in his time. He was not ignorant of what Gretser had answered; he replies nothing to it; which shews that Gretser did not tell a lie, in what he affirmed concerning Goldastus's edition, and Illyricus. From whence it ought to be concluded, that it is only upon Bale's credit that Wesselius mentioned the petition in question.

Which being so, I say that none will mention again such a petition, but a wretched rhapsodist, who transcribes and heaps up without any judgment, whatever he finds in the writers of his party; for, in short, if the author of the Prejugez had considered what he did, would he not have foreseen that such a petition would be denied, and would he not have made himself ready to maintain the truth of it; but then would he not have quickly found out that the thing could not be maintained? and if he had been a wise man, he had wholly laid aside that objection. Let us suppose an adversary, who attacks him upon that subject. Prove to me, will he say, that Sixtus IV granted the exercise of sodomy for three months yearly to those who petitioned him for it. Mr Jurieu will answer, that Wesselius of Groningen affirms it in his book concerning indulgences. This is not true, will the adversary reply; here is the book of Wesselius, published by a Protestant, but that fact is not to be found in it. Illyricus, another Protestant, who had so much perused Wesselius, did not find it neither: and therefore you calumniate Wesselius. No, will

Mr Jurieu say; I do not calumniate him, for Bale ascribes to him the thing in question. But the adversary will answer, if you had common sense, could you believe that the authority of a writer, so much cried down, and so much detested by the Church of Rome, will counterbalance Illyricus's silence, and Goldastus's edition? Why not, will Mr Jurieu reply: the Papiists have struck that passage out of Wesselius's book, and therefore Illyricus and Goldastus could not find it; but Bale had a copy that was not interpolated. And I maintain, will the antagonist say, that Bale made use of a copy, into which a man, who was no better than he, foisted that passage, if Bale himself was not the impostor; and after all, you are to shew me a manuscript of Wesselius, which favours you, and which you may oppose to Goldastus's edition, which confounds you. I do not know what Mr Jurieu could reply; and therefore he is like those imprudent accusers whom Cicero laughed at, who are nonplussed when their assertions are denied (18). Every wife man will grant, that the believing of a crime is not sufficient to charge any body with it, and that one must be in a capacity to prove it to those that deny it. Tho' you believe never so much that Sixtus IV. was guilty of such an abomination, and that Wesselius wrote so, you will not affirm it in a book, if you are a man of judgment, and if you have no better proofs than Mr Jurieu. For the rest, I do not pretend that these critical observations concern Mr Du Pleffis Mornai: he wrote in a time when men were not so nice; and Goldastus's edition was unknown to him (19).

I had almost forgot to observe, that none but a very ignorant or insincere man can maintain that Wesselius was a Papiist. If he had been a Papiist, would Luther have bestowed his encomium upon him? 'Prodiit en Wesselius, vir admirabilis ingenii, rari & magni spiritus, quem & ipsum apparet esse vere theodidactum, quales prophetavit fore Christianos' Esaias: neque enim ex hominibus accepisse judicari potest, sicut nec ego. Hic si mihi antea fuisset lectus, poterat hostibus meis videri Lutherus omnia ex Wesselo hausisse, adeo spiritus utriusque conspirat in unum, &c (20). - - Here is Wesselius, a man of admirable parts, of an excellent and great spirit, and who also appeared to be truly taught of G O D, such as Esaias prophesied Christians would be: for he cannot be judged to have learned of men, no more than I. Had I read him before, my enemies might have thought that Luther had taken all from Wesselius, such agreement there is betwixt the genius of both, &c.

Note, That Mr Saldenus, a Dutch minister at the Hague, affirms, that according to Agrippa, the permission I have been speaking of, was granted to a cardinal by Sixtus IV. Idem hic Sixtus, teste Agrippa, Cardinali cuidam masculae Veneris usum certis mensibus secure indulget (21). Agrippa says no such thing (§ 2). See below the remark [E].

[(§ 2)] Observe also that Johannes Lydius was very near falling into the same mistake with respect to Volaterranus. 'Quid dixisset pia Fœmina, says he', si Sixti Quarti audivisset impietatem, qui Cardinali Lucie Sodomiam tribus mensibus calidioribus permisit: teste Volaterrano in Declam. ad Leu. - - - What would the pious woman have said, had she heard of the impiety of Sixtus the fourth, who granted to the Cardinal of Lucia a dispensation for sodomy in the three hottest months: witness Volaterranus, &c. in Declam. ad Leu.' This passage was not unknown to Mr Bayle, who, finding the citation obscure and unintelligible, consulted Mr La Croze. He received from him an explanation of it, which he did not publish, and which I asked of that learned man. Here is the substance of it. A book intitled, Mus exenteratus, printed for the first time at Stutgard, in 1593, after having spoken of the pretended dispensation of Sixtus IV, in favour of sodomy, puts in the margin, Volater. Lib. 22 Antrop. Stella in Sixto IV. Joh. Baleus Angelus. Agrippa in Declam. ad Lovanienfes, &c. It is easy to perceive, that divers authors are there quoted indiscriminately who have spoken ill of Sixtus IV. Lydius, in all likelihood, used this testimony against him; and, whether by the error of the Printer, or of Lydius, or that of some author who had copied it before him, the words that are between Volater. and in Declam. were omitted. I add, that by an error of the press Leu. might very easily be changed into Leu. Mr Bayle hath acknowledged that Mr La Croze had very well guessed from whence the wrong citation of Lydius,

(18) Jam invideo magistro tuo, qui te tanta mercede. . . nihil sperare doceat. Quid est enim minus non dico Oratoris, sed hominis, quam id obicere alveitario, quod tibi si verbo negari, longius progressi non possit qui obicit?

Cicero Philipp. II, pag. 532, Edit. Abrami. To which these words of Lactantius may be added. Turpe est hominem ingeniosum dicere id quod si neget probare non possit. Infit. Divin. lib. iii, cap. xxviii, p. m. 219.

(19) The first volume of his Mnarchia, did not come out till after the Mystes d'Iniquité.

(20) Luther in a preface that was prefixed to a book of Wesselius. See Gelner's Bibliotheca, fol. 628.

(21) Saldenus, Oni Theolog. P. 162. Idem quibus Agrippa de Veneris. Scient. cap. 64.

* Pag. 9. Analec. ad Clemens. de corrupto Ecclesiæ statu.

+ See Mr Bayle's Letters, Tom. iii, Letter CCXLII, p. 914. of the Amsterdam edition, 1729.

(14) Coeffeteau, Réponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, p. 1207.

(15) Sed in illo libro (de Indulgentiis Papalibus) prout tomo primo memorabatur Goldastus & Goldastus Calvinista vulgatus est; nullum penitus de hac inexcipabili enormitate verbum reperitur; nec, quod mireris, Illyricus in Catalogo ejus meminit, eo loco ubi ex operibus Wesseli, ea, quæ ad fœrum forum facere credebant, excerptis. Gretserus, in Examini, Mysterii Phylæani, p. 545.

(16) Cent. VIII, cap. l.

(17) Andrew Rivet, See the second part of his book, pag. 625.

in the remarks. It is highly improbable [D]. If Sixtus IV, had granted such a petition, he Lydius proceeded; and he observes that Volaterranus speaks not at all of that dispensation in the XXIII^d book of his Anthropologia, and that he had read over the Declam. ad Lovanienfes of Agrippa, without finding there any such thing. Thus this testimony falls still to the share of Bale alone. RRM. CRIT.]

† Letter CCLIII, pag. 957, ubi supra.

[D] It is highly improbable.] My design is not to extenuate the vices of those, who are said to have presented that petition; on the contrary I aggravate them: for I maintain, that if those men had been so wicked as to present it, and make use of the permission granted them, they were too profligate to care for such a permission. You may be sure that such men would not forbear plunging themselves into vice, till the Pope had granted their petition. Besides, was it necessary to draw up a petition in form, and to expect an answer to it in writing? Was it not sufficient to whisper it in the ear, without discovering such an abominable impudence to several persons? In short, I could be sooner persuaded of the truth than of the probability of such a proposition. The most profligate men do commonly observe a decorum, when they cannot offend against it without acting needlessly, or to their prejudice. If that Pope had a mind to grant a privilege, he might have done it by word of mouth, without exposing his reputation. If he grants it in writing, the conscience of the petitioners will not be more at rest for it, and he runs the hazard of being convicted of an abominable action by his own hand. Will a profligate man, if he has any wit, commit such a fault?

I must not forget an observation that is proper enough to shew the falsity of this story. It is supposed that the family of the Cardinal of Santa Lucia asked leave to perform the act of sodomy during the three hottest months in the year, viz. June, July, and August. There is in it a mistake in matter of fact, which makes the whole story suspected: it is supposed that lewd people in Italy are more tormented with their passion during the greatest heat, than at any other time; which is a false supposition. If you consult Physicians, they will tell you, that of all the seasons of the year, men are less inclined to venery in summer, because the heat weakens and enervates them. 'Coi-tum porro mulieres æstate magis appetunt, quia femina carum frigidum tunc calore temporis contem-peratur, ac movetur, in viris autem fit exhalatus, consumptio, ac debilitas à calore adaucto: Hyemis vero frigore vigoratur, & vegetior ac fortior red-ditur, ideoque magis appetunt viri hyeme, quam mulieres (22). . . . The amorous desires of women are strongest in summer, because the female seed being cold, is tempered and put into motion by the heat of that season; whereas the increase of heat produces exhalation, waisting, and weakness in the male seed, but the coldness of winter adds vigour, life, and strength to it. And therefore the amorous desires of men are stronger in the winter, than those of women.' If those, who vented this story, had pitched upon March, April, and May, it had been more likely. We are told in the Menagiana of a woman, who confessed she would not engage to be chaste in May, tho' she pretended to overcome the temptations of the flesh all the other months of the year. In France the month of May is accounted the strongest in that respect: and because all the effects of the spring are earlier in Italy, the month of April must needs be there what the month of May is in other countries. I would not have any consequences drawn from what we observe in plants and animals to man; they might be unexact, because man's industry affords him a thousand remedies against the severity of the winter, which are unknown to vegetables and beasts: however, I shall take notice of what the Naturalists observe, that the spring is the usual time of generations (23).

(22) Rodericus à Castro, de mor-bis mulierum, lib. iii, cap. iii, p. m. 108.

(23) Vere tu-ment terræ, & genitalia femina poscunt. Virgil. Georg. lib. ii, ver. 324. Continuè av-di-dis ubi subdita flamma medullis Vere magis (quia vere calor redit ossibus.) Id. ibid. lib. iii, ver. 271.

Nam simul ac species patefacta'it verna diei,
Et referata viget genitalis aura Favoni;
Aëria primum volucres te, Diva, tuumque Significant initum percussæ corda tua vi:
Inde feræ pecudes persultant pabula læta,
Et rapidos tranant amnes; ita capta lepore,

Illecebrisque tuis omnis natura animantium
Te sequitur cupide, quo quamque inducere pergis:
Denique par maria, ac monteis fluviosque rapacis,
Frundiferaque domos avium, camposque virentis,
Omnibus incutiens blandum per pectora amorem,
Efficit, ut cupide generatim sæcla propagent (24).

(24) Lucret. lib. i, ver. 10.

When first the rising spring adorns the mead,
And a new scene of nature stands display'd,
When teeming buds and cheerful greens appear,
And western gales unlock the lazy year,
The joyous birds thy welcome first express,
Whose native songs thy genial fire confess:
Then savage beasts bound o'er their slighted food,
Struck with thy darts, and tempt the raging flood:
All nature is thy gift; earth, air, and sea:
Of all that breathe the various progeny,
Stung with delight, is goaded on by thee.
O'er barren mountains, o'er the flow'ry plain,
The leafy forest, and the liquid main,
Extends thy uncontrol'd and boundless reign.
Thro' all the living regions dost thou move,
And scatter'st where thou goest the kindly seeds of love.

DRYDEN.

What you have just now read out of the Menagiana, was quoted by me without book: I had not then time to look for the page; I have found it since; and tho' I saw I had not mistaken the sense of the author, I am sensible that I omitted some circumstances, that deserved to be mentioned. Here follows the whole passage. 'One day as we were discoursing of the effects of the month of May, which heats a new, not only the earth, and what is on it, but also revives love in the very bottom of the water: after a great deal of talk about that subject, the Marchioness de C. L. . . . mother of the Marchioness de S. . . . told me, I will engage to be chaste in all the months of the year, but I cannot be sure of it in May (25). A Physician, who continued the work of Laurence Joubert about popular errors, examines this question: Whether this saying be right, Do not sport much with women, but drink hard in the months that have no R (26). He disapproves that rule no farther than as it excludes the month of May; a month, says he (27), the most devoted to love: and I could easily believe that in ancient times people did not marry in that month, not so much out of jealousy, or for fear of getting bad wives, according to the Poet's saying, Maio nubunt malæ, ætate de fure furor, quibus is then so violent in women, that they can hardly be satisfied, and therefore they may think of other men, to be as Martæ viri, Maio mulieres. He had made use of these words in the foregoing page: 'If therefore the spring is the most proper time for such a sport, it seems unreasonable to abstain from it in all the months that have no R, since the spring begins only about the latter end of March, and lasts all April and May, which has the true qualities of heat and moistness; and it is then that the gaiety of the season fills all sorts of animals with love.'

(25) Menagiana, p. 170, of the second Dutch edition.

(26) Bachel, ubi infra.

(27) Bachel, Ex-reurs populum touchant la Medicine & Regne de Sainté, lib. ii, p. 301.

In furias ignemque ruunt, furor omnibus idem.

All are on fire, and the like flame
With equal fury burns the same.

'At this rate the spring, which is the best time of the year for such performances, would pass away without them (28). The doctrine of Rodericus à Castro above-mentioned (29), is that of the ancient Naturalists. One of the properties of summer, according to Hesiod, is to weaken the males, and kindle a greater love in females.

(28) Id. ibid.

(29) Abom. cit. tion (27).

Τῆμ' αὖ ποίτ' αἰ τ' αἰγες, καὶ οἱ αἰς αἰς,
Μαυλοτάλαι δὲ γυναῖκες, ἀναρῦτατοι δὲ τε αἰδρες Εἰσιν.

Tunt

he would have fallen far short of the prudence and virtue which Clement VII discovered, when he thought that some ladies desired of him a permission to do an unlawful thing [E].

It

*Tunc pinguesque capreae, & vinum optimum, Salacissima vero mulieres, & viri imbecillissimi
Junii* (30).

(30) Hesiod.
Oper. & Dies.
ver. 585.

(31) See Proclus in Hesiod. ibid.
Consult Menage,
in Diog. Laërt.
lib. ix, p. 352,
and Father Har-
down, in Plinium, Tom. iv,
p. 205, 206.

(32) Aristot.
Problem. 5. iv,
Quaest. xxvi.

The Poet Alcæus was of the same opinion (31). Aristotle supposes it to be true, and enquires into the reasons of it (32). The Moderns, who so much criticize the ancient Naturalists, have nothing to say against them upon that point. Mr Venette, a famous Physician, follows their opinion, and expresses himself fully to that purpose. 'The great heat of the months of July and of August, together with our fiery temper, destroys our natural heat, wastes our spirits, and weakens all the parts of our bodies. It produces a great deal of choler, and many sharp excrements, which afterwards make us weak and languishing. If we have then a mind to sport with women, our strength soon fails us; and tho' at first our passion enables us to make some efforts, we quickly find ourselves so weak, and so exhausted, that it is impossible for us to be stout champions. And if we have a mind to lose all our strength, and to be sick, we need only sport frequently with women. On the contrary, women are much more lascivious in summer-time. Their cold and moist temper is mended by the scorching heat of the sun. . . . Truly those amorous passions are not well distributed. Whilst women are fiery, we are languishing. Their passion no sooner begins to appear, but ours vanishes away, as if nature intended thereby to teach us, that the excess of love is wholly prejudicial to mens health (33).' This moral reflexion of Mr Venette puts me in mind of a passage in Pliny, wherein I thought he acknowledged a providence of nature in such a division of passions (34); but having more narrowly considered it, I find it ought not to be understood in that sense: nay, it seems to me that Pliny has committed a fault, which perhaps no body has taken notice of, and therefore I shall set down his words. Urinam certe præcipue traditur (scilicet) sanare lichenas & lepras ex aceto. Venerem stimulare in Vitis, Hefiodo & Alcæo testibus: qui florentes ea cicadas acerrimi cantus esse, & mulieris libidinis avidissimas, viresque in coitum pigerrimos scripsere, velut providentia naturæ hoc adjumento tunc valentissimo (35). That is to say, according to the artichok (36) is very proper to provoke urine:

(33) Venette,
Tableau de l'A-mour Conjugal,
p. 180, 181.
Edit. 1696.

(34) As if nature had designed thus to distribute the seasons of love, to prevent the ill consequences of excess.

(35) Plin. lib.
xxii, cap. xxii,
p. m. 205, 206.

(36) Observe that according to Salmafius the Scal- ymos of which Pliny speaks after Hesiod, is not the Arti-
choak. See Mr
Le Clerc in his Notes on Hesiod,
p. 282. Edit.
1701.

(37) Bachot, Vulgar Errors, book ii, ch. ix,
p. 302, 303.

(38) Venus tum (biem) non æque perniciosa est. . .
Neque æstate vero, neque autum-no utilis Venus
est. Tolerabilior tamen per autumnum: æstate
in totum, si fieri potest, abstin-dam est. Corn.
Celsus, lib. i,
cap. iii. p. 33, 34.

(39) Vir. that which I have mentioned above
citation (26).

*Dieta olivæta & quatre nodios in braguetta. . . .
A moist diet in June, July, and August, and four buttons on the codpiece.*

If any one should say that some reasons, well known at Rome to debauched people, did, perhaps, occasion the asking of a dispensation for the three hottest months in the year, he should deserve no answer. Such a general discourse ought neither to be examined nor minded; and until a better reason be alledged, the first who mentioned that petition, will justly be accounted one of those satirical writers, who know not how to observe the rules of probability. We may apply to him these words of an ancient Father, Voluntatem eum habere mentiendi, artem fingendi non habere: he is very willing to tell a lie, but he does not understand the art of lying (40). This does not concern Wesselus of Groningen; for first, it is not known whether he mentioned that petition; that fact is not to be found in his books that are extant; and, in the second place, it may be presumed, that if he said something of it, it was upon the credit of another. He quoted somebody, or at least he made use of this clause, Fama est, fertur, . . . It has been reported, it is said, &c. However it be, I declare I do not take him to be the first author of that story. Many controvertists have been imposed upon by the name of such a wife and eminent Divine; but since they knew not how he spoke of it, whether he gave some proofs of it, or none at all, whether it was upon a hear-say, or upon the testimony of grave men, they have been too hasty in their judgment, and in their quotations. It is particularly about libels diffused against such persons as Sixtus IV., that one ought to act with deliberation. He had disturbed the public peace of Italy: he had laid an interdiction upon the Republics of Venice and Florence, and engaged in a violent war with both. There was not a little corruption in his court; his relations had made themselves odious by their ambition and debauchery. It was impossible but that many palquinades would come out against him (41). Any Venetian or Florentine, skilled in the art of slandering, could not fail to please his sovereigns or his fellow-citizens, by using his talent against the Pope. He might expect that his satirical strokes, whether true or false, would be very acceptable: it is a consolation for those who fear or hate a prince, to see him abused in libels; they believe every thing, every thing goes down in such a disposition, and therefore satirical writers do not much care to observe the rules of probability, being sure to make people believe the grossest lies. Which they are particularly sure of, when they can justly charge others with ill actions: those truths serve as a safe conduct to the falsities that go along with them (42). This observation might be of use at all times to those, who are not willing to confound well-grounded slanders with malicious calumnies. But to speak only of Sixtus IV. I observe, that if there was any ground for the petition in question, Wesselus would not be the only writer that had said something of it. How could he have found out what was unknown to the satirical writers of Venice and Florence?

[E] The virtue which Clement VII discovered, when he thought that some ladies desired he would permit them to do an unlawful thing.] This particular may be seen in a chronicle; it is not a story preserved by tradition. It may be found in the annals of Aquitaine, published several times by John Bouchet, who lived at that time (43). He speaks of the interview between Clement VII, and Francis I, at Marfeilles in 1533. 'During that interview between the Pope and the King, where all the royal family of France was, and several princes and lords, and also the Queen of France and her retinue, there was a common report, that a pleasant trick, deserving to be remembered, had been plaid to three ladies of the queen, who were all virtuous, chaste, and devout women. Those three ladies, who were all widows, having a weakly and sickly constitution, desired to have a licence from the Pope to eat flesh upon prohibited days; and in order to it, they made their application to the Duke of Albania, his near relation, who gave them his promise, and then sent for them to come to the Pope. That duke, who was very familiar

(40) It is observed in the eighth volume of the Morale pratique
des Jéuites, pag.
152, that this lying was applied to the Jesuit Brisaciet.

(41) Non modo
omnes Italie po-tentatus in eos (Veneras) concu-tavit, sed etiam veluti Clemens
VI, alias fecerat, illos excoaravit, in-terdixit, & omnibus dignitatibus privavit. Nec quoad vixit, illi abolitionis beneficii impendere voluit. Ex quo multos detractores habuit.
*Nauclerus, Ge-
ner. l. fol. m.*
979.

(42) Note, that on the other hand this mixture of truths and falsities is favourable to those who make an apology for persons that are defamed; for when the writer of a libel is convicted of falshood upon several points, he becomes suspected of calumny in every thing else.

(43) He says,
fol. 270, verso,
edition of Poitiers 1557, that they were printed at Poitiers the third time, in the beginning of the year 1533.

(4) Under the word Rovere.

It is said that Sixtus died in the year 1484, of the grief he conceived, when he heard that the peace was concluded between the Duke of Ferrara and the Venetians [F]. He loved the war, and he has been looked upon as the disturber of the repose of Italy. Agrippa says one thing of him which deserves to be mentioned [G]. You may see in Moreri (d), that it has been said that this Pope got himself admitted into the house of la Rovere, which was very illustrious in Piedmont. That family was in possession of a strange prerogative [H].

All authors are agreed that Sixtus IV was a learned man. He had received his doctor's degree at Padua, and had read public lectures in the university of Bologna, at Pavia, at Siena, at Florence, and at Perugia. From the employment of a lecturer in the universities, he was promoted to several dignities: he was made first of all Provincial of the province of Liguria, and then Procurator-General of his order at the Court of Rome, and afterwards Vicar-General of Italy, and at last General of the Franciscans. After those preferments he received a cardinal's hat. He got a great reputation by the works, with those ladies, having a mind to give some sport to the Pope and to the King, told the Pope, holy Father, there are three young ladies, who are widows, and of an age to get children, whom I take to have some lustful temptations, because they have desired me to beg of you that they may be allowed to make use of a man without marrying, when they are in great want of one. How, cousin, said the Pope, it were against God's commandment, from which I can dispense no body? I beseech you, holy Father, to hear them, and to make this remonstrance to them. Whereupon the ladies came into the hall where the Pope was, and after they had kneeled and kissed his feet, one of them said to him, Holy Father, we have desired the Duke of Albania to beg a favour of you, and to represent to you our age, frailty, and weak constitution. Daughters, said the Pope, your request is not reasonable, for it is contrary to the command of God. The widows not knowing what the Duke of Albania had told him, answered, Holy Father, be pleased to give us such a dispensation, three times in a week, at least in Lent, and without scandal. How, replied the Pope, must I give you leave to commit fornication? I should be damned if I did. Whereupon the ladies were sensible that there was some jest in the matter; and one of them said, We beg a dispensation to eat flesh upon prohibited days. The Duke of Albania told them, I thought, ladies, you meant live flesh. The Pope perceiving the jest, smiled, and told the duke, Cousin, you make the ladies blush; when the queen comes to hear of this, she will be displeased with it. The king, the queen, and the princes, were immediately told of it, and liked the humour very well (44). You will find this adventure in Brantome's Memoirs, towards the end of the second volume of his Dames Galantes (45), where it is related more at large than in the Annals of Aquitaine. He knew not that this story was to be found in that book: for he concludes thus: I have been told the names of these three ladies, viz. the Lady de Chateau-briant, the Lady Chastillon, and the widow of the Bayliff of Caen, all very virtuous women. I have this story from the old courtiers (46).

(44) Bouchet
Annales d'Aquitaine, fol. m.
267.

(45) Pag. m.
356, & seq.

(46) Brant.
Dames Galantes,
Tom. ii, p. 358.

(47) Volaterran.
lib. xxii, p.
819.

(48) Non potuit
sævum vis ulla extinguere Sixtum; Audit tandem nomine pacis, ebit. See the end of this remark,
Item. Dic unde
Alesto pax ista
refulset, & unde Tam subito
reticent prelia?
Sixtus obit. Item, Pacis ut hostis eras, pace pe-remptus obis.
Apud du Pleffis Mornai, My-
stère d'Iniquité,
p. 556.

(49) That is, to make war against Tuscany.

[F] It is said he died . . . of the grief he conceived when he heard that a peace was made between the Duke of Ferrara and the Venetians. He had declared a war against the Republic of Venice, in favour of the Duke of Ferrara, and had a mind to keep it up; but his allies forsook him, and made a peace without consulting him. The grief he conceived upon it increased his gout, and carried him off in five days. What a vicar of the Prince of Peace, who says in his gospel, Blessed are the peace makers. Quum pacem à sociis præter ejus voluntatem & consensum fieri conspiceret, ex animi uti putatur dolore, podagra insuper aggravante qua in ultimis annis maxime laborabat, in quintum diem expiravit (47). He deserved the epitaphs, which the Poets made upon him (48).

I will not forget a fine passage of Alcyonius. 'Ad id (49) adductus videri poterat Ferdinandus à Xysto Pont. Max. qui & officii Pontificii, & religionis & Dei oblitus non secus in Italia bella excitare solebat atque illa Afiz aut Africa provincia esset, in qua Turcæ & Pœni regnarent, non pars Europæ ex flore clarissimorum virorum constans, cujus princeps esset pontifex maximus qui moderatissime & sapientissime clavum tanti imperii tenere & gubernacula Reip. tractare in maximo cursu & fluctibus deberet. Dein eodem Xysto si non suafore & impulsore certe approbatore Veneti terra & aquis arma intulerunt Herculi Ferrariensi Principi (50). . . . Ferdinandus was thought to be brought into the war against Tuscany by Sixtus; a man who forgetting his duty as a Pope, forgetting his religion and his GOD, used to raise his wars in Italy, as if that country was a province of Asia, or of Africa, under the dominion of Turks or Carthaginians, and not that part of Europe which produces the most eminent and most illustrious men, and which has for its prince, a Pope, who ought to steer the helm of so great a government amidst the most violent storms with the greatest moderation and wisdom. Afterwards if it was not by the persuasion and instigation of Sixtus, it was certainly by his approbation that the Venetians made war by sea and land upon Hercules, Prince of Ferrara. Take notice that I have been informed by Mr de la Monnoie, that the first of the three epitaphs, which I have mentioned (51), from Du Pleffis Mornai, does not concern Pope Sixtus, and that it contains two verses of Sannazarius against Pope Alexander VI; also that it ought to be read Sextum, and not Sixtum; and that Sannazarius did rather praise Sixtus than blame him, as it appears from this epigram against the same Alexander. Visuram se iterum Sixtum cum Roma putaret, Pro Sixto Sextum vidit & ingenuit.

[G] Agrippa says one thing of him which deserves to be mentioned. Du Pleffis relates it thus. Among the pimps of these latter times, says Agrippa, Sixtus IV was most remarkable, who built a noble bawdy-house at Rome . . . The courtizans of Rome pay a Giulio every week to the Pope, and this yearly income does sometimes amount to above twenty thousand ducats; and that office is so particularly appropriated to the chiefs of the Church, that the rent of pimping is reckoned part of the Ecclesiastical revenues. For, says he, I heard formerly the computation made in the following manner: He has two benefices, a curacy of twenty ducats, a priory of forty, and three abbacies in a bawdy-house, who bring him twenty Giulio's every week (52). Those, who desire to see Agrippa's words, need only read the following passage. 'Sed & recentioribus temporibus Sixtus Pontifex Maximus Romæ nobile admodum lupanar extruxit . . . Multi alii magistratus . . . in civitatibus suis lupanaria construunt foventque, nonnihil ex meretricio questu etiam ærario suo accumulantes emolumentis: quod quidem in Italia non rarum est, ubi etiam Romana seorta in singulas hebdomadas Julium pendunt Pontifici, qui centus annuus nonnunquam viginti millia ducatos excedit, adeoque Ecclesiæ procerum id munus est, ut unâ cum Ecclesiæ proventibus etiam lenociniorum numerent mercēdem. Sic enim ego illos supputantes aliquando adivi; Habet, inquentes, ille duo beneficia, unum curatum aureorum viginti, alterum prioratum ducatorum quadraginta, & tres putanas in burdello, quæ reddunt singulis hebdomadibus Julios viginti (53).

[H] The family of Rovere . . . possessed a strange prerogative. It was a right over the maidenheads of the virgins, whom their vassals married. A cardinal of that house threw into the fire the patent of that privilege. 'Cotal costume (54) de pagani & da gentili, fu gia in Piemonte, & il Cardinale Illustrissimo Hieronimo della Rovere mi diceva haver egli stesso abbruciato il privilegio, che havea di cio la sua Casa (55). . . . This Pagan custom prevailed formerly

(50) Petrus Alcyonius, in Medice legatio poliorum, fol. 1, verso.

(51) Above citation (48).

(52) Du Pleffis, Mystère of Iniquity, p. 557.

(53) Agrippa, de vanitate Scientiar. cap. lxxv, Tom. ii, Opera, p. 135.

(54) The author had been speaking of that, which Malcolm king of Scotland had established.

(55) Bonifacio Vannozzi, Avertimenti Politi, Tom. ii, p. 255.

(e) See the article PLATINA, in the text, citation (g), and Bonanni, ubi infra, citation (j), p. 430.

he published [J], and being raised to the Papal See he made it appear that he was still a lover of learning; for he set up the library of the Vatican (e), and gave the direction of it to the learned Platina, and allowed yearly pensions to several other persons, who were to help him in taking care of the books, and transcribing Greek, Latin, and Hebrew manuscripts (f). He ordered the same Platina to write the History of the Popes (g). It has been observed that he was much more liberal to his sisters sons than to his brothers sons, and that among his sisters sons he particularly favoured Peter and Jerome Riario. This would not be a meer fantastical humour, as it is pretended but rather a very natural thing, were it true that he was their father, as some writers will have it [K]. He was the first who instituted the feast of the Conception and Presentation of the Holy Virgin, as also that of St Anne and St Joseph, and that of Francis of Assisi (b). He canonized Bonaventura (i), and appointed him a feast among those of the apostolical palace (k). He restored a devotion invented by St Dominic, which was discontinued, viz. that of the Rosary and the Psalter of the Holy Virgin (l). It is a mistake to say that he was the first who ordered that the Jubilee should be celebrated once in twenty-five years. That ordinance was made by Paul II, his predecessor, in the year 1470. He only confirmed it, and was the first who put it in execution in the year 1475 (m). The place which Polydore Virgil gives him among the inventors of things, does him little honour; for he ascribes to him the first creation of several offices that were bought [L]. This was the source of a disorder that increased daily. All authors

(f) Taken from Ghilini Teatro d'Humorini Letterati, Tom. ii, p. 93.

(g) Platina, Epist. dedicat. ad Sixtum IV.

(b) Vite Sixti IV., ad calcem Platinae, fol. m. 364.

(i) Id. ibid.

(k) Bonanni, in Numism. Pontificum, Tom. i, p. 91.

(l) Id. ibid.

(m) Id. ibid. p. 98.

'in Piedmont, and the most illustrious Cardinal Jerome della Rovere, told me that he himself had burnt the patent which his family had for that privilege.' They are the words of an author, who lived in the beginning of the XVIIth century. See the margin (56).

[J] The works which he published. Here follow the titles of them. De sanguine Christi liber: De futuris contingentibus: Commentarii de Potentia Dei: De Conceptione B. Virginis: Contra errores cujusdam Carmelitæ Bononiensis qui affirmabat Deum sua omnipotentia, damnatum hominem salvare non posse. He writ also a book to shew that Thomas Aquinas and Scotus, who differ so much in words, are at the bottom of the same opinion (57).

[K] He particularly favoured Peter and Jerome Riario. This would not be . . . a fantastical humour . . . were it true that he was their father, as some writers will have it.] (58) He had nine nephews, viz. five, whose name was de la Rovere, as his was, and they were the sons of his three brothers deceased, and four who went by the names of Riario, Baffo, and Sansoni, the three families into which his sisters, and one of his nieces, had been married. . . . (59) It was not barely the excess of the Pope's ambition that made it intolerable, since it was attended with a kind of oddness, grounded neither upon interest, nor upon probability: for tho' Sixtus in all appearance should have shewn more kindness to the five nephews I have just now mentioned, than to the other four, who were only related to him by his sister's side; and tho' he had all the reason in the world to do it; and that Julian, the eldest of them all, was endowed with all the wonderful qualities, which made afterwards his Pontificate so famous under the name of Julius II; it is certain he never could obtain of his uncle that he should behave as head of the house of la Rovere, or perform the functions of Cardinal Nephew, or that his brother, or his three cousins should have what was denied him. In a word, the strongest inclinations of Sixtus were always in favour of his sisters children, especially to those of the eldest, who had two sons, viz. Peter and Jerome Riario. Peter had been a Franciscan as well as his uncle, and perhaps deferred upon that account to have a great share in his uncle's affection. He was made cardinal on the same day that Julian was; but he had this advantage above him, that he was declared Cardinal Nephew, and obtained the bishopric of Treviso, which Julian had asked. Afterwards the most considerable benefices, that came to be vacant, were bestowed upon him; and he became so powerful, that he had a greater train than the rest of the sacred college . . .

(56) Mr Paris, minister of Katwick says in a Dutch book, intitled, Kerwysle Oudebeden, that is Antiquities of Kerwic, pag. 396, that certain lords in Holland (he names some of them) had such a privilege, and that it was suppressed by the States who gave them some money for the suppression of it.

(57) Taken from Ghilini, Teatro, Part ii, p. 94.

(58) Varillas, A. neced. de Florence, p. 67.

(59) Id. ibid. p. 68.

(60) Id. ibid. p. 69.

(61) Machiavelli, delle Hist. Fiorentine, lib. vii, p. m. 289.

'per l'adietro errori, si potevano sotto la Pontificale autorità nascondere. Haveva tra la sua famiglia Piero e Girolamo, i quali (secondo che ciascuno credeva) erano suoi figliuoli, nondimeno sotto altri più honesti nomi gli palliava. . . . This Pope was the first who began to shew how much a Pope could do, and that many things, formerly called errors, could be concealed under the Papal authority. Among others of his family, he had Peter and Jerome, who (as every one believed) were his own children; however he concealed them under honest names.' John Michael Brutus affirms, that Sixtus begot those two boys when he was but a Franciscan, and had them bred up under the name of his nephews to conceal his fault. Ab eo cum adhuc ageret in Franciscanorum familia liberos susceptos fuisse: ac quo minor Parentis infamia esset, propinquorum honestiori nomine liberaliter quidem & honeste, sed non tamen in spem tantam educatos (62).

Some say he was neither the father nor the uncle of Peter and James Riario, but that they were only his favourites. Coëffeteau put that sense upon the parenthesis of a passage above quoted (63), which contains these three words, not without mystery. These are Coëffeteau's words. Du Plessis endeavours to find an abominable mystery in that love, which is a thing that a man who loves honour should have no thought of (64). I own it, replies Rivet (65), 'in order to approve it, and much less to delight in it; but an honest man may take notice of it, and detect it in a sinful man, and it will no more defile his imagination than the words of the Scripture concerning the sodomites, or those of St Paul speaking of the heathens, in the first chapter of his epistle to the Romans. Certainly the words of Raphael Volaterranus, together with that extraordinary indulgence, may raise a suspicion in the most charitable persons: for, speaking of those two men, he says, Petrus à puero, una cum Hieronymo fratre, sibi educaverat, that he had brought them up for himself from their infancy.' Observe, that Mr Du Plessis has not taken care to express himself clearly. His words are so ill placed, that the best sense which can be put upon them is a falsehood. Having provided for these two, says he (66), who were nearer related to him by love than kindred, he comes next to his relations. Jerome, his brother of the same nursery, whom he made Prince of Furl and of Imola. Compare this with the words preceding, you shall find that by having provided for these two, he understands the promotion of Peter and Jerome Riario, from whence it follows that he meant, that Jerome, who was made Prince of Furl, was brother of Pope Sixtus, and a different person from that Jerome Riario whom he had mentioned: but this is a grand mistake.

[L] Polydore Virgil . . . ascribes to him the first creation of many offices that were bought.] See the second chapter of the eighth book of Inventoribus Rerum, out of which I shall set down the following passage. Pius II . . . following the example of John XXII, created some Abbreviators, and made it an office, which was bought as well as the rest. Afterwards Paul II, being a conscientious man, turned out those

(62) Jo. Michael Brutus, Hist. Florent. lib. vii, p. 387, apud Joann. Zuingerum, de Fæsto Corporis Christi, pag. 133.

(63) Citat. (a).

(64) Coëffeteau, answer to the Mystery of Iniquity, p. 1205.

(65) Rivet, Remarques sur la Réponse au Mystère d'Iniquité, Part. ii, p. 623. Note that he is mistaken in calling Peter and Jerome Riario by the name of la Rovere. Mr Zuinger, de Fæsto Corporis Christi, p. 133, has committed the same fault: Ad Petri Ruerii, quem pro Cingolo habuerat Sixtus & Hieronymi fratris sui (it should be ejus) postulationes, &c.

(66) Du Plessis, Mystère d'Iniquité, p. 555.

SIXTUS IV.

164

are not agreed that this pontif was a man of a mean extraction [M]. If he was, he may be properly alledged in confirmation of what I have said in another place (n), that the most haughty and daring men may be born among the dregs of the people; for his haughtiness was very great: the Florentines found it so by experience; for they could not be reconciled to him, but by submitting to the most shameful humiliations (o). Never was satisfaction more severe than what he imposed upon them. It is in vain for Father Bonanni to say that John Michael Brutus has no reason to complain of the harsh answer that was made by that Pope to their deputies: what he relates and what he confesses is a sufficient proof of the great mortification they sustained (p).

In refuting the error of Mr Saldenus (q), I might have censured still upon better grounds the author of Turco-Papismus; for he quotes Agrippa as having related that this Pope appointed places of prostitution as well for sodomitical leudnesses, as for others more ordinary, and granted the permission of the sin contrary to nature to a cardinal. He adds that Wesselus also speaks of it [N].

(n) Remark [L] of the article GREGORY VII.

(o) In the year 1430.

(p) See Bonanni, ubi supra, p. 102, & seq.

(q) At the end of remark [B].

those blood-suckers; but Sixtus restored them as so many servants necessary to a master, who is resolved to get money by any means whatsoever. Nay, he did worse, for he set up a band of solicitors, proctors, and lawyers, without whom no patents, called Bulls, could be drawn up, that being examined by several persons they might not be so easily interpolated and falsified. At last he appointed nine controllers or supervisors of the treasury, to whom he gave a salary, that their offices might be the better sold. Nor was he frustrated in his expectation; for an office that was sold before for five hundred ducats, sold most times for one, two, or three thousand ducats by reason of that salary, so carefully do they ply their business who buy their places. This gain proved such a charm to Innocent VIII, who succeeded Sixtus, that he set up an office of secretaries . . . and increased their number. Alexander VI appointed the collectors of bribes to the number of fourscore. I leave you to judge whether among an army or innumerable multitude of recorders and scribes, there is any want of sergeants, whose faces (as the Poet has it) are always pale with hunger, and who greedily feed upon the people: to whom we may add the Griffins, those who so well know how to shear sheep, I mean notaries and scribes who suck poor peoples substance, whom Nicolas III turned out, being afraid they would destroy the whole sheepfold (67). I need not inform my reader that this invention of Sixtus IV is blamed, not only as an unlawful means of getting money, but also as a very ill example which makes way for greater mischiefs. I might say many things upon it, if I would set up for a maker of political reflexions; but I do not pretend to that. I rather chuse to quote another writer, who mentions the same conduct of Sixtus IV: it will appear from his words, that it was grounded upon the desire of aggrandizing one of his nephews. Consider well the words of Varillas. 'The only thing that remained to be done by Riario, in order to complete his settlement, was to get footing in Umbria, from whence he might have easily penetrated into Romagna, and perhaps also into Tuscany; but having no troops, and wanting a great deal of money to raise some, his uncle did not scruple to sell the offices of the Chancery, and of the Court of Rome, which had been the reward of virtue and ability under the foregoing Popes. He created five colleges, through whose hands all the dispatches of the Datary were to go successively, and nine new offices in the apostolical chamber, which were bought very dear. He neither considered the shameful trade he was going to introduce, nor the honest liberty of which he deprived the Court of Rome, nor the inconveniences that would arise from putting an end to the labour and industry of the most refined Italians; by taking from them offices freely given, which was an allurement to them, and kept up their emulation. He increased the old taxes, and laid new ones: He also ordered extraordinary tithes to be paid (68).

(67) Polyd. Virgil. de Inventor. Rerum, lib. viii, cap. ii, p. m. 432, 433. See Du Pleissin Mor-nay, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 556, 557.

(a) Taken from Sotuel, Biblioth. Scriptor. Societat. Jesu, p. 592, 593.

[M] All authors are not agreed that this Pontif was a man of mean extraction. He was so, if we believe Machiavel (69), and many other authors who say his father was a Fisherman. Their proof for it would be a weak one, should they go upon the authority of Panninius, who observes that the inhabitants of the village, where he was born, do hardly get their livelihood any other way but by fishing; for that Historian says on the other side, that the family of that Pope was none of the most inconsiderable in the town of Savona, and that it was a branch of the house della Rovere, one of the most antient in Piedmont (70). It appears by several letters of that Pope, that he pretended to be a native of Savona; and it is observed that he was born by chance in the village of Cella, because his father and mother had fled thither during the plague that raged at Savona. It is further said, that family bore the arms of the house della Rovere (71) before Sixtus was born; which is alledged by some, to confute those who say, that the lords of that family bestowed their name and their arms upon Pope Sixtus. Francis Carriere says so in his exposition of the Prophetic Symbols of Malachi the Irish man. Father Oldoini has collected several reasons, to prove that our Francesco della Rovere was of a noble family, and that he turned Franciscan of his own motion, and not because poverty put him upon looking for a livelihood at the expence of others (72). See Father Bonanni's History of the Popes by medals, and compare with this the remark [A] in the article JULIUS II.

(68) Varillas, Anecd. de Florence, p. 70.

(69) Huomo di bassissima & vile conditione. Machiavel, delle Histor. Fiorentine, lib. vii, p. 239.

(70) See Bonanni, Numismat. Poetific. Romanor. Tom. i, p. 91.

(71) They are rebuses, viz. that kind of Oak which the Latins call Robur, the Italians Rovere, or Rovero, and the French Rovere.

(72) Bonanni, Numismat. Poetific. Romanor. Tom. i, p. 92.

[N] He quotes Agrippa as having related, &c. You shall see that it is an express, not an indirect, quotation; for he hath put in Italic characters what he hath taken from Agrippa. 'Sixto quarto nihil cogitari potest turpius aut iniquius; erat enim, & propter lenocinium, & nefandissimas libidines, infamis. Lupanaria, ut inquit Agrippa, utriusque Veneri crexit, cardinalique cuidam masculæ veneris usum sciant. c. de lenocinio. certis mensibus indulgi: hoc etiam attigit Wesselus Groningenfis (73). - - - Nothing can be imagined more base and filthy, than Sixtus IV; for he was infamous, both for his prostituting and encouraging the most abominable lust. He erected stews, as Agrippa relates, to both sorts of Veneries, and indulged the use of Sodomy, to a certain cardinal in certain months. This is also mentioned by Wesselus of Groningen. It is most false that Agrippa says any of these two things. See above (74).

+ De vanit, scient. c. de lenocinio.

Lib. de indulgentiis.

(73) Sotuel, in Turco-Papismus, lib. i, cap. xvii, p. 115.

(74) In the remark [G].

SMIGLECIUS (MARTIN) a native of Lemberg in Poland, turned Jesuit at Rome in the year 1581, where he studied with great application and good success. Being sent back into Poland, he taught Philosophy at Vilna four years, and Divinity ten years. He was rector of several colleges, and superior of the religious house at Cracow. He died at Kalisz after a long sickness the twenty-sixth of July 1618, at fifty-six years of age. He shewed an admirable patience in his adversity, especially during the sickness which consumed him by degrees (a). He applied himself very much to controversy both against the Protestants and the Unitarians. This appears from the books books he published [A]. His Logic is very much esteemed [B]: it was printed in two volumes in 4to at Ingolstadt in the year 1618.

[A] The books he published. I omit those he wrote in his mother tongue, some of which are against the Arians (1); and I shall only set down the titles of those he composed in Latin, as I find them in Father Aleambe (2). Latine editi de Zecharie Prophetæ pro Christi divinitate illustri testimonio, adversus Faustis Socii Anabaptistæ cavillationes. Vlnæ MDXCVI in 4to. Nodum Gordium, seu, de Vocatione Ministrorum. Cracoviæ MDCIX in 4to. Nova Monstra novi Arianismi. Nissæ MDCXII in 4to. Verbum Caro factum, seu, de Divinâ Verbi Incarnati Natura, contra novos Arianos. Cracoviæ MDCXIII in 4to. Refutationem vanæ Dissolutionis Nodi Gordii de Vocatione Ministrorum, contra Joannem Volkium Ministrum Arianum. ib. MDCXIV in 4to. De erroribus novorum Arianorum, lib. ii, contra Valentinum Smalcium, ibid. MDCXV in 4to. De Christo vero & naturali filio Dei, ejusque pro nobis satisfactione, adversus Valentinum Smalcium Arianum, lib. ii. Accessit Responsio ad Refutationem C. errorum Smalcio objectorum. ibidem MDCXV in 4to. De Baptismo, adversus Hieronymum Moscorovium

Arianum, lib. i. Ibidem eodem anno ac formâ. De Ordinatione Sacerdotum in Ecclesiâ Romanâ, contra Jacobum Zaborovium Calvinianum Ministrum. Cracoviæ MDCXVII. De Notis Ministrorum. lib. ii. contra eundem. MDCXVII. Vanam sine viribus iram Ministrorum Evangelicorum. Coloniæ apud Antonium Boitxerum MDCXI in 16mo. Refutationem Epicherematis missionem Ministrorum Evangelicorum propugnantis. MDCXII.

[B] His Logic is very much esteemed. Smiglecius, a Polish Jesuit, was one of the last Logicians, who wrote upon Aristotle's Logic with the greatest subtilty and solidity. He dived into the bottom of that science with a clearness and exactness, hardly to be found in any other author. His Logic is an excellent work (3). This testimony of a fellow Jesuit will not appear a flattering one to those, who are capable of judging of such a book. The English have done justice to that work; it has been reprinted in their country.

(3) Rapin, Reflexions sur la Logique, num. viii, pag. m. 383.

SOCINUS (MARIANUS) a famous Civilian, was born at Siena the fourth of September 1401. He taught the Canon-Law at Padua and then at Siena: it appears from his works (a) that he understood it perfectly. He received in his country all the honours due to his great merit. He was deputed by his countrymen to Pope Pius II, who made him Advocate-Confistorial, and gave him several marks of a particular esteem. He was of a low stature [A], but of a strong constitution: he had a more universal knowledge than any other man in his time (b). It is said that one day he easily checked Politian's vanity [B]. What he answered to those, who asked him why he left off reading lectures, since he had a wife [C], is curious. He died at Siena the thirtieth of September 1467. See his encomium in the letters of Pius II (c). He left several children behind him, and among others a son, who exceeded him [D].

(a) See the remark [D], at the end.

(b) Æneas Silvius, Epist. cxlii, lib. i, apud Panzirol. de claris Legum Interpretibus, lib. iii, c. xxxv, p. m. 456, & seq.

(c) Taken from his Life, written by Panzirolus, in lib. iii, de claris Legum Interpretibus, p. m. 456, & seq.

[A] He was of a low stature. Æneas Silvius, his countryman, who was Pope by the name of Pius II, speaks of him thus (1). 'Nihil ei præter formam naturæ invidit. Humunculo est, nasci ex mea familia' (2) debuit cui parvorum hominum est cognomen. . . . Nature had been liberal to him in every thing, but his stature. He is a little man, he should have been of my family, whose surname is Piccolomini, i. e. little men.

(1) Pius II, was of the family Piccolomini.

(2) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, p. 457.

† Cornab. lib. iii, miscell. cap. xvi.

† Tiraquell. in 2. l. connubia glo. 1. part. 2. n. 25. Æneas Silvius, de dictis & factis Alexandri Regis, lib. iii, cap. xxviii.

(4) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, p. 457.

(5) Eo provectus est ut patrem superaverit. Panzirol. ibid. lib. ii, cap. xxviii, pag. 276.

[B] It is said that one day he . . . checked Politian's vanity. That great critic, who should have been contented with the reputation of an excellent Philologer, pretended also to be a Civilian of the first rank. He said one day that he could make better lectures of the Civil-law, than the famous Accursius; but our Socinus nonplussed him by the first question he put to him. (3) Semel etiam Angelum Politianum virum Græcis, Latinique literis impense eruditum, cum Senis in Juris civilis interpretationibus se vel Accursium superaturum jactabundus gloriaretur, leniter correxit, ab eo enim interrogatus Angelus, quis esset in jure suus heres, ob imperitiam obmutuit, ac pudore suffusus suæ audacie poenas dedit. . . . He one time gently reproved Politian, a man very well skilled in Greek and Latin, when he vainly boasted that he could exceed Accursius, in interpreting the Civil-law. Socinus asked him who was his heir at law, being ignorant, he made no answer, and suffered for his rashness, by the shame he was put to.

This seems to me a fabulous story, for Politian was but fifteen years of age, when Socinus died.

[C] Since he had a wife. He only answered, I have got a wife; and being told that Socrates did not leave off his lectures after he was married: it is, replied he, because Xantippe was an ill humoured woman, and perhaps ugly, whereas I have got a handsome and complaisant wife. Uxore ducta, cum docendi munus intermisisset, interrogatus, cur id non continuaret, se conjugem duxisse respondit; et cum verò replicaretur, Socratem nunquam philosophiam ob uxorem deservisse, subiecit, illum molestem, et fortè turpem Xantippam, se autem formosam. Et obsequenter habere (4).

[D] He left . . . behind him . . . a son who exceeded him (5). VIZ. BARTHOLOMEW SOCINUS, born at Siena the twenty-fifth of March 1437. He taught the Civil-law at Siena, and then at Pisa, whither he was called in 1474. Having a greater reputation than all the Civilians of his time, he was called to Ferrara, where he was a professor four years; and then he performed the same function at Bologna, from whence he returned to Pisa, where he had a salary of a thousand ducats. There arose a great emulation between him and Jaso Mainus: they grew so hot in their disputes, that Laurence de Medicis went to Pisa on purpose, to have the pleasure of such a sight. He removed several times from one university to another, and at last a kind of palsy in the tongue having deprived him of his speech, he was only a chamber counsellor. He died at Siena in 1507 (6). He had more learning than virtue, for he lived a debauched life, and made so many foolish expences, that he was buried at the public charges. 'Illiberalibus verò moribus insignem doctrinam maculasse dictus est, qui chartarum, & alex. ludo supra modum deditus, non modo debitis lectionibus quandoque auditores fraudasse, sed infomnes etiam noctes turpiter egisse dicitur. Eo vitio paternis opibus consumptis, & universa, quam docendo, & de jure respondendo plurimum coegerat, pecunia effusa, ad extremam inopiam deductus est, usque adeo ut nec quod funeri suppetere, post se reliquisset dicitur. Eam ob causam semper egens undique pecuniam avarius conquirere cogebatur (7). . . . He is said to have sullied his excellent learning by his sordid life, being so addicted to cards and dice, that he not only deprived his scholars of their lectures, but spent therein whole nights. Hereby having consumed his patrimony, and whatever he gained by his scholars and consultations, he was reduced to extreme poverty, inasmuch that he is said not to have left wherewithal to bury him. And therefore being always in want, and covetous, he was forced to get money any how.' His memory failed him upon two remarkable occasions. 'Memorize imbecillitate bis inter orandum excidit. Primo cum anno MCCCCXCII. à Republica Senensi Alexandro VI. Pont. Max. suæ civitatis nomine gratulatum missus in prima præp. oratione, quam illi Angelus Politianus dictaverat, defecit, quod ubi Pontifex deprehendit, manum sublevaris fati sibi notam viri virtutem esse dixit, eumque Advocati Confistorialis titulo honestavit. Idem iterum illi Venetis contigit, ubi dum apud Augustinum Barbadium Reipublicæ Principem dicere conatur, excidentibus quæ antea excogitaverat, nihil exprimere potuit (8). . . . By the weakness of his memory, he failed twice in his speech. Once, when sent by his Republic to congratulate Pope Alexander VI,

(6) Taken from Panzirolus, ubi supra, p. 275, & seq.

(7) Id. ibid. p. 279.

(8) Id. ibid. p. 280.

T t

'be stopped almost in the beginning of his oration, which Angelus Politianus dictated; this, when the Pontif perceived, lifting up his hand, he said, that he sufficiently knew the ability of the man; and honoured him with the title of a Confessorial Advocate. The same thing happened to him another time at Venice, where, when he was endeavouring to make a speech before Augustinus Barbadius, the Doge of that Republic, forgetting what he had designed to deliver, he could not express any thing.' His consultations, and those of his father, have been collected into four volumes (9). Besides, (9) Printed at Venice in 1579. each of them wrote several other books that are printed.

(a) He was the son of ALEXANDER SOCINUS, the son of Marianus. To distinguish those two Marianus, the first is first named Senior, and the second Junior.

(b) See, above, remark [G], of the article ALCIATUS (ANDREW), the reputation he there acquired.

(c) Taken from Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, lib. ii, cap. cxxii, pag. 338, & seq.

(d) Ibid. p. 341.

SOCINUS (MARIANUS) grand-son of the foregoing (a), was not less famous than his grand-father in the profession of the law. He was born at Siena the twenty-fifth of March 1482, and having taken his degree of Doctor of the Civil-law at Siena at twenty-one years of age, he taught that science there for several years, after which he was called to Pisa, where he taught it seven years. He was recalled to Siena, from whence at a year's end he went to Padua to be professor of the same science. From that place he removed to Bologna (b), to fill up the chair that was vacant by the return of Alciatus to Pavia in the year 1540. The pensions and privileges bestowed upon him, at Bologna, were so considerable, that he would not leave it, though he had very great offers made him in several other universities. He married Camilla Salvetta at Siena, and lost her after he had been married forty-six years. Having been used for a long time to lie with a woman, he could not be without one; he gave up himself to incontinency [A], whereby he got some distempers, which proved so troublesome to him, that at last the violence of the remedies he used, consumed his strength, and occasioned his death the nineteenth of August 1556 (c). If we believe Panzirolus (d), he had thirteen children (e), two of which only, viz. CELSUS and PHILIP out-lived him. Celsus who was professor of the Canon-law at Bologna, obtained there the professorship of the Civil-law after his father's death, and left it. Panzirolus should have known that Marianus left behind him a third son, called LÆLIUS SOCINUS, the first author of the Socinian sect [B]. ALEXANDER SOCINUS son of the same Marianus, and

(c) Panzirolus having said that they were ten sons, and three daughters, calls them all Filii a little after.

[A] He gave up himself to incontinency. I will express it in the words of Panzirolus. Apud eos (Bononienfes) Camillam uxorem LXIII annum agentem amiffit, quicum annis XLVI vixerat. Postea uxori affuetus parum continenter vixiffe dicitur; unde contracto morbo non semel egrotavit, ac demum dum præfentantis remediis fubi mederi conatur, potentium pharmacorum vi oppreffus LXXIV. ætatis anno decessit (1).

(1) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, pag. 341.

(2) Bibliotheca Antitrinitaria, pag. 18.

[B] He left behind him a third son called LÆLIUS SOCINUS, the first author of the Socinian sect. He was born at Siena in the year 1525 (2). Being designed for the Civil-law by his father, he began early to look for the foundations of that science in the word of God; and by that study he came to discover that the church of Rome taught many things contrary to revelation. Desiring to dive more and more into the true sense of the holy Scripture, he studied the Greek and the Hebrew, and even Arabic, and quickly left Italy to go into a Protestant country. Fear contributed also to his removing; for he knew that private opinions in matters of religion were not tolerated in his country. He began to travel in the year 1547, and spent four years in going thro' France, England, the Netherlands, Germany, and Poland; and then he settled at Zurich. He made himself known to the most learned men of that time, who expressed their esteem for him in their letters to him: but having discovered, by the doubts he proposed to them, that he suffered himself to be infected with the poison of the Arian or Photinian heresy, he made himself very much suspected. Calvin gave him very good advice about it in the year 1552. 'Quod pridem testatus sum, serio iterum moneo, nisi hunc quærendi pruritus mature corrigas, metuendum esse, ne tibi gravia tormenta accerfas (3). - - - What I formerly represented to you, I now again put you in mind of, that unless you in time restrain that itch of inquiry, it is to be feared, you will bring upon yourself grievous troubles.' Socinus making a good use of that advice, and more still of Servetus's execution, took care not to discover his thoughts but in a proper time and place, and behaved himself to dexterously, that he lived among the mortal enemies of his opinions, without being in the least injured by them. An example, that is proposed in his nephew's life to those, who expose themselves rashly to martyrdom, being sometimes more greedy of a great reputation, than truly zealous for truth. 'Sciant, quos nimia veri libertas in pericula sæpe interemptiva precipitat, ipsam illam, quam propugnant, veritatem in circumspècta prudentie lenitate, quam in effreni zelo plus habere præfidi. Ut qui ultro suis discriminiibus occurrant, magis ad privatam laudem, quam ad publici emolu-

(3) See the Life of Faustus Socinus, prefixed to the first volume of the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum.

menti rationem festinare videantur (4). - - - Let them know, whom too great liberty in speaking unseasonably the truth oftentimes throws into dangers unexpected, that what they maintain, is better advanced, by a circumspèct prudential meekness, than by a headstrong zeal. And those who of their own accord go to meet the danger seem more to hasten to their own glory, than to regard the public good.' He found some disciples, who respectfully heard his instructions: they were Italians, who wandered up and down in Germany and Poland. He also communicated his errors to his relations by some writings he sent to them at Siena. He took a journey into Poland after his father's death (5), and obtained from the king some letters of recommendation to the Doge of Venice, and the Duke of Florence, that he might be safe at Venice all the time his affairs should require his stay there; for he intended to possess himself of his father's estate, and to settle the matter with his relations. It was about the year 1558, that he travelled into Poland. Circa annum 1558, et 1559, literis Poloniæ atque Bohemiæ Regum muniri voluit, ut securus in urbe Veneta cum amicis de patrimonio agere posset. Tunc profecto patuit apud plerisque Germaniæ atque Poloniæ principes, ipsique adeo Reges, quantum in gratia potuerit. Summis enim studiis in ejus causa apud Ludovicum Prælum Venetiarum, atque Cosmum Hetrurici Duces certatum est (6). His family was dispersed at that time: they were suspected of Heresy: his brother Camillus was imprisoned; some others fled away, and his nephew Faustus was one of them. Lælius returned into Switzerland, and died at Zurich in May 1562. Faustus was then at Lyons, and set out immediately when he heard that his uncle was dead. He arrived at Zurich before any of Lælius's papers had been conveyed away; he took possession of them, and made use of them afterwards (7).

(5) His father as I have said before, died at Bologna, in the year 1556.

(6) Vita Pauli Socialis, pag. 2.

(7) Taken from the Life of Faustus Socinus.

Some other circumstances are to be found in the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum. LÆLIUS SOCINUS, born in the year 1525, began to confer about matters of religion in the year 1546, with above forty persons. They privately met in the territory of the Venetians (8), and brought into question particularly the mystery of the Trinity; and of Christ's satisfaction. Ochinus, Valentinus Gentilis, and Paul Acianus, assisted at those conferences. They were discovered: some of those innovators were apprehended, and condemned to death; the rest fled away. The Chronology of that author is not right, for Ochinus left Italy about the year 1542. Zanchius says, that Lælius Socinus endeavoured to infect him with his heretical notions, not by maintaining them in express words, but proposing them as doubts, and by way of a dispute. He adds, that

(8) Circa annum 1546, latitaverat cum sociis suis itidem Italia quorum nomen-rius quadragenarium excedebat, in Venetia, ditione, collegio colloqueque de religione, in quibus potissimum, &c. Biblioth. Antitrinit. pag.

and father of FAUSTUS SOCINUS, of whom I am going to speak, died very young, and with the reputation of a learned Civilian [C]. We have some works of his father that Lælius understood very well Greek and Hebrew, and was a man of an unblameable life. 'Fuit Lælius, nobili honestaque familia natus: bene Græcè & Hebraicè doctus; vitæque etiam externæ inculpata: quarum rerum causa mihi quoque intercesserat cum illo non vulgaris amicitia; sed homo fuit plenus diversarum heresium: quas tamen mihi nunquam proponebat, nisi disputandi causa: & semper interrogans, quasi cuperet doceri (9). - - - This Lælius was descended of a noble and honourable family: well learnt in Greek and Hebrew; and also of an unblameable outward life: wherefore there was betwixt us a more than ordinary friendship; but he was a man full of Heresies: which yet he never proposed to me, but by way of dispute: and always asking questions, as desiring to be informed.'

(9) Zanchius, in Prefat. Libri de tribus Elohim, apud Bibl. Antitrit. pag. 19.

(10) He wrote it in the year 1561. Biblioth. Antitrit. pag. 21.

(11) It was reprinted in Holland in the year 1612, with some other pieces of the same nature. The year following it was printed in Dutch in the same country. Ibid. pag. 20.

(12) In Prefat. Compendii Socinianismi confutati.

(13) In Summa Controversæ.

(14) In the Bibl. Antitritarior. pag. 21, the second edition of that work is placed in the year 1584. But Placcius, de Pseudon. pag. 176, mentions an edition in 1577, Christlingæ, in 8vo. which probably is not the first.

(15) Joh. Albertus Faber, Decad. num. 25.

(16) Placcius, de Pseudonymis, pag. 161.

(17) Summa Controversæ. pag. 563, of the second edition, and 442 of the first.

(18) Joh. Albertus Faber, His Decad. Decadum, was printed in 1689.

(19) Joh. Albertus Faber, ubi supra, num. 25.

It is certain, that when Zanchius wrote those words, Lælius had composed a paraphrase upon the first chapter of St John's Gospel full of Photinianism (10). The same Lælius wrote a dialogue in 1554, against the book published by Calvin, to shew that Heretics ought to be punished with death. Calvinus and Vaticanus are the interlocutors of that dialogue (11): some ascribe it to Castilio; but others, as Cloppenburg (12) and Hoornbeek (13) ascribe it to Lælius Socinus. He is said also to be the author of the book, intitled, de Hereticis capitali supplicio non afficiendis, that was published (14) under the fictitious name of Minus Celsus Senensis, and there is more reason to ascribe it to him, than to Faustus Socinus. Some pretend that Lælius is the author of a book, intitled, Martini Bellii Dialogus Lælius de Hereticis gladio coercendis, published against Calvin, and they endeavour to prove it against Placcius by the testimony of the Bibliotheca Antitritariorum (15).

Observe, that Placcius ascribes that dialogue to Castilio, and refers us to Calvin's Life, where Beza boasts of having confuted that book of Castilio (16); but it is certain Beza makes no mention there of a piece, intitled, Dialogus Lælius. He only speaks of a Farrago, which he ascribes to Castilio, and against which he wrote a book. What he calls Farrago, is intitled, De Hereticis, an sint persequendi, & omnino quomodo sit cum eis agendum, Luteri & Brentii, aliorumque multorum tam veterum tum recentiorum sententia. Liber hoc tam turbulento tempore pernecessarius, & cum omnibus tam potissimum principibus & magistratibus utilissimus, ad discendum, quodnam sit eorum in re tam controversa, tamque periculosa, officium; et contains the following pieces, MARTINI BELLII prefatio, in qua quid sit hereticus, & quidnam cum eo agendum sit, demonstratur. MARTINI LUTERI sententia, in qua aperit ostenditur, hereticorum punitionem ad magistratum non pertinere. JOANNIS BRENTII de Anabaptistis, & ceteris qui heretici habentur, sententia, qua idem docet. Aliorum autorum, tum veterum, tum recentiorum, eadem de re sententia. Basilii Montfortii refutatio eorum, que pro persecutione dici solent. We may observe another small error in Mr Placcius; for he refers us to a book of Hoornbeek (17), wherein he only mentions the dialogue between Calvinus and Vaticanus. A learned German whom I have quoted (18), alleges this testimony of Placcius, and does not rectify it: he also alleges Mr Teissier, who only says in page 238, of the first volume of his additions to the eulogies taken from Thuanus, that Castilio is the author of a book published under the name of Martin Bellius, in which he endeavours to prove that Heretics ought not to be punished. Thus here are two authors quoted, the last of which does not say what is imputed to him, and the other is mistaken: but let us see whether the objection raised against the latter is a solid one. It is objected against Placcius, that Martini Bellii Dialogus Lælius de Hereticis gladio coercendis, is ascribed to Lælius Socinus in the Bibliothèque de l'Antitritarian. Verum in Bibliotheca Antitritariorum . . . pag. LXIV, & XX. ille tractatus Lælio Socino tribuitur, allegata in hac sententia auctoritate Johannis Cloppenburgii & Hoornbeckii (19). Consult the 64th page of that Bibliothèque, and you will find that it is thought Lælius Socinus Senensis took the name of Minus Celsus Senensis in a book, De Hereticis non capitali supplicio afficiendis. Consult the 20th page, and you will find that the dialogues between Calvinus and Vaticanus, wherein it is asserted that the power of the sword ought not to be extended to Heretics, is ascribed to Lælius Socinus by Cloppenburg and Hoornbeek. I need not say that there is little exactness in this account. As for what concerns the other writings of Socinus, the uncle, see the same Bibliothèque.

I must not forget a passage of Hoornbeek quoted in it, which testifies the esteem that Melancthon had conceived for Lælius Socinus. That passage will confirm what has been said above of Lælius's design to take a journey to Venice. 'Uti Zanchium, quamdiu cum eo viveret, mirifice sefellit Lælius; similiter bono viro Philippo Melanthoni, quocum triennium exegit familiariter, adeo imposuit, ut Philippus pro eo tanquam optimo viro a. c. 1570. intercesseret tum ad Imp. Maximilianum II. tum ad Poloniz regem Sigismundum, ut horum nomine Lælius Legati vicem Venetiis obire, eaque ratione paternam hereditatem, sibi ob consuetudinem cum Protestantibus in Germania, interclusam adire tutius posset (20). - - - As Lælius wonderfully deceived Zanchius, so long as he lived with him; in like manner he so imposed on the good man Philip Melancthon, with whom he passed three years in a familiar manner, that Melancthon interceded for him, as for a deserving person, both with the Emperor Maximilian II, and with Sigismund, King of Poland, that Lælius might execute in their name an embassy to the Venetians, and by that means more safely get possession of his paternal inheritance, detained from him because of his familiarity with the German Protestants. Father Maimbourg has committed some faults, which ought to be observed. Lælius Socinus, says he (21), and Matthew Gribaldus, came to Gentilis in Poland. He had been saying, that Gentilis being sent for by Blandrata, went into Poland, after he had privately left Geneva. Now you must know, that Gentilis having left Geneva, some time after he had made Pamende honorable on the second of September 1558, acted so many parts before he went into Poland (22), that it is probable he went not thither till about the year 1560. The Socinian Historians place that Journey in the year 1562, or in the year 1563 (23), and therefore he did not make it with Lælius Socinus; for the latter was in Poland about the year 1558 (24). Maimbourg adds, that as Gentilis and Lælius Socinus were returning thro' Germany and Switzerland into Italy, teaching their Doctrine every where, Socinus died at Basil, and Gentilis was apprehended by the magistrates of Berne (25). But we may remember that Socinus died at Zurich the sixteenth of May 1562, and Gentilis did not leave Poland till the year 1566.

[C] ALEXANDER SOCINUS . . . father of FAUSTUS SOCINUS . . . died very young, and with the reputation of a learned Civilian. He was admitted Doctor of the Civil-law at Siena in 1530. He had before maintained, during five days at Padua, and during two days at Siena, three hundred theses with great success. After he had been made Doctor he explained the Institutes in his native country, and then he was called to Padua to be professor in ordinary. The quarrels, that arose between him and the other professors, obliged him to return to Siena, where he continued to read public lectures. He went to Macerata in the year 1540, to teach the Civil-law in the university lately founded there, where he died the twenty-sixth of April 1541 (26). He had married Agnes Petrucci daughter of Burgesio Petrucci, and of Victoria Piccolomini. This Petrucci having succeeded his father Pandolphus, who had been the head of the Republic of Siena, could not keep his post long: he was driven from it by a contrary faction, and died soon after. Victoria Piccolomini his widow, sister, niece, or cousin to many great lords, bore that misfortune with great constancy, and lived fifty-six years after the death of her husband, in the constant practice of the virtues most essential to her sex. Her daughter, brought up by such a mother, answered her education, and was married to Alexander Socinus a young man of great parts (27). These are the father and mother of Faustus Socinus. Relicta vidua Victoria animam, quem in prioris fastigii splendore nunquam sustulerat, tam iniqua rerum vicissitudine frangi non permixti. Itaque annis quinquaginta sex, quibus maritus vitæ & domum fortuneque singulari

(20) See his article.

(21) See the article ALCIA-TUS (JOHN PAUL) remark [A].

(22) See the Life of Faustus Socinus, pag. ii.

(23) Maimbourg, Hist. de l'Arianisme, Tom. iii, pag. 361.

(24) Taken from Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpret. p. 341.

(25) Alexander subtilitatem & pater ejus Marianus Junior Jurisconsultorum principes vocati sunt. Pile Fausti Socini, initio.

(20) Hoornbeek, Summa Controversæ, lib. vii, pag. 442, Edit. 1653.

(21) Maimbourg, Hist. de l'Arianisme, Tom. iii, pag. 351, 352, 353, Edit.

(22) See his article.

(23) See the article ALCIA-TUS (JOHN PAUL) remark [A].

(24) See the Life of Faustus Socinus, pag. ii.

(25) Maimbourg, Hist. de l'Arianisme, Tom. iii, pag. 361.

(26) Taken from Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpret. p. 341.

(27) Alexander subtilitatem & pater ejus Marianus Junior Jurisconsultorum principes vocati sunt. Pile Fausti Socini, initio.

father [D].

singulari modestia & spectata integritate ac pudicitia vidui status solitudinem toleravit. Filiam Agnetam, quam, ut tanto genere dignum erat, sanctissimis moribus imbuerat, Alexandro Socino in matrimonium dedit, patricio quidem juveni, sed tamen privato. Is fuit Fausti nostri pater (28). Had Panzirolus known how Faustus Socinus turned his studies, he would not have used the following words. 'Ex eo (Alexandro) & Agnete ex Burghesia Pandulfi Petruccii Senarum Principis nepte natus, faustus preclari ingenii juvenis parentum vestigia secutus esse speratur' (29). --- Faustus Socinus, son of Alexander

(28) Ibid.

(29) Panzirol, de claris Legum Interpret. p. 342.

'Socinus and Agnes Petrucci, a youth of an excellent disposition, gave hopes that he would follow the footsteps of his parents.'

[D] We have some works of Marianus Socinus. The catalogue of the Bodleian library mentions a Consilium in materia monetaria, printed at Cologne in the year 1591. He is said to be the author of Bartolus's distinctions. He is said to be the author of Bartolus's distinctions. His consultations furnished materials for the book of the common opinions of the Doctors, published by one Musculus (30).

(30) Scripta distinctiones Bartoli, quæ Venerabili A. MDLXIV edidit, & Socino vindicavit, Simon Schardius. Etiam ex ejus consiliis collecta sunt communes Doctorum opiniones, editæ ab Erasmo Musculo Hanojenſe. Hoornbeck, Apparatu ad Socinian. Contraverſas, pag. 50.

SOCINUS (FAUSTUS) grand-son of the foregoing, and the chief founder of a very ill sect that goes by his name, and which, notwithstanding the persecutions, hath flourished a considerable time in Poland [A], was born at Siena the fifth of December 1539. He studied but little in his youth; he only had a tincture of Classical learning, and learned only the elements of Logic. The letters his uncle Lelius did write to his relations,

[A] A sect . . . which notwithstanding the persecutions, hath flourished a considerable time in Poland. Sigismund Augustus granted liberty of conscience to the sects which forsook the Church of Rome. They made no separate bodies at first; but when the Evangelics came to know the opinions of the Unitarians, they would no longer communicate with them; which occasioned two different communions. That rupture began at Cracow by the care of Gregory Pauli. The Unitarians had several churches in Poland and Lithuania, some in the great towns (1), and others in the country-seats of gentlemen. They established their metropolis at Racovia, in the Lesser Poland. There they had a yearly synod, there they erected a college, and set up a printing-house. Some Catholics sent their children to that college; and some joined with those heretics. Some Protestants did the same, and a vast number of books came out of the printing-house of Racovia, and were dispersed in foreign countries. This prosperity was interrupted in 1638; for some scholars of the college of Racovia having broke a wooden cross set up in a high-way, the Diet of Warlaw ordered that the college should be demolished, the Church of Racovia shut up, the printing-house of the Unitarians destroyed, and the ministers and teachers banished (2). This was executed. Some time after the Judges of Lublin destroyed the church of Kifelin, and that of Bereſc in Volhinia, under pretence that the ministers of Racovia, and the teachers of the college, had fled thither. The Diet of the year 1647 banished Jonas Slichtingius for publishing a book intitled, Confessio Christiana, and that book was burnt by the hands of the executioner. But, notwithstanding these misfortunes, the Unitarians performed their religious exercises in many places of that kingdom, till the year 1658. They were then expelled upon pretence that some of them had put themselves under the protection of the King of Sweden, who had conquered the greatest part of Poland. However that reason was not alleged in the edict of banishment; for they were afraid of offending the Swedes, who had stipulated a general amnesty for all the subjects of the King of Poland, who adhered to them during the invasion. Their banishment was only grounded upon their doctrine: they pretended, that in order, to draw God's blessing upon the kingdom, it was necessary to banish those, who denied the eternal Divinity of the Son of God. They were therefore ordered to depart from it upon pain of death: all their estates were confiscated, all persons were forbidden upon the same penalty, to give them any assistance, or any mark of affection in their exile (3). Quum Suci Poloniam invaſissent, & pleraque ejus loca occupasset, ita ut & provinciæ multæ missis legatis Regi Suecorum ut victori sese subicerent, & exercitus ipsi cum Ducibus suis eidem sese addicerent, quia ex Unitariis nonnulli etiam ad Suecorum patrocinium & protectionem confugerant, quamvis multi eorum nullam cum Suecis inirent societatem, post Suecorum discesum, omnes ii quos Arianos vocant, publica regni constitutione, 1658 non prætextu perduellionis, ne Suci, qui per tractatus amnestiam iis qui ipsi adhaerant pacis sunt, offenderentur, sed directè ob religionem, ob id quod Jesu Filii Dei præeternam, quam vocant, Deitatem non agnoscant, ex-terres acii sunt, ut scilicet Deus hujus blasphemiam amitti,

(1) Such as Cracow, Lublin, and Novogrod.

(2) I shall quote an author in the remark [L], who denies that all those things were contained in the decree of the Diet.

(3) Taken from the preface to the first volume of the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum.

omnia prospera ipsi regno tribueret: ita ut nisi patria excederent, accusati pena capitali subicerentur: bona quoque eorum fisco publico sunt applicata (4): & vetitum ne quisquam eos ullo modo juvare, vel extra solum patrum exulantes, aliquo benignitatis ac benevolentiae indicio prosequi audeat, aliqui eidem cum ipsis penæ obnoxii futuri (5). The Socinians never recovered of that severe blow: they dispersed themselves as well as they could in Transylvania, Silesia, Prussia, &c. There is a great fault in those Latin words, for they intimate a great falsity, viz. That the estates of the Unitarians were confiscated; and they say nothing of their being permitted to stay two years in the kingdom to settle their affairs. It is an usual thing for those, who complain of their sufferings, to suppress whatever might make their persecution look less violent than it was. And therefore in order to represent the true state of the thing, I must give another account of it contained in the following passage. 'As during the last war of the Swedes in Poland, it was found out that the Arians, or Socinians intending to raise themselves upon the ruins of the state, kept intelligence with Ragotſki Prince of Transylvania, who had attacked that kingdom at the same time; the Catholic Lords, in the general Diet of Warlaw, in the year 1658, took hold of that opportunity to exterminate out of Poland that abominable Heresy, which might bring still greater calamities upon the state, that had not been far from ruin. The Lutheran and Calvinist deputies, who were in that Diet, being apprehensive that a law enacted against those Heretics might be a precedent against themselves, and that in time they would be treated in the same manner, joined together in order to oppose it. But because their number was very small, if compared with the Catholics, and they were not deprived of their liberty, and besides they did not love the Arians, having more than once before demanded that they should not be tolerated in Poland, a law was at last enacted, with a common consent, against Arianism; and the Arians and Socinians comprehended under the same name, were obliged to abjure their heresy, or to depart the kingdom within two years, which were allowed them to sell their estates. That law, which was afterwards confirmed in the other general Diets, was none of those that lose by degrees the force that was given them in the heat of a zeal conceived from time to time against public disorders. It was executed, and is so to this day' (6).

Left any one should think that the Jesuit Maimbourg has given an unfair account, to praise the King and the States of Poland for having observed a kind of moderation, I must acquaint the reader that some Socinian writers (7) say, that the edict of the year 1658, allowed them three years to sell their estates, and that afterwards one of those three years was taken from them; so that the 10th of July 1660, was the day appointed for their departure (8). There is hardly any thing more lamentable than the description they make of the miseries they were exposed to from the year 1648, till they left Poland. They suffered a thousand insults during the two years allowed them; they could not sell their estates but at a very low rate; their misery was aggravated by all sorts of artifices.

(4) This is only to be understood of those effects which they could not sell in the time allowed them.

(5) The same preface, pag. 50.

(6) Maimbourg's Hist. de l'Arianisme, lib. xii, pag. 375, 376. of the 10th Jan. Dutch edition.

(7) See the two Letters printed at the end of the Historia Reformationis Polonice, pag. 278. & seq.

(8) Ibid. pag. 294.

relations, whereby they and their wives had imbibed many seeds of heresy (a), made an impression upon him; so that knowing himself not innocent he fled away as the rest, when the inquisition began to persecute that family. He was at Lyons when he heard of his uncle's death, and immediately set out to take possession of all the writings of the deceased. He returned into Italy, and became so acceptable to the Great Duke, that the charms of the court, and the honourable employments bestowed upon him, hindered him for the space of twelve years from remembering that he had been looked upon as the man, who was to put the last hand to the system of the Samofatenian Theology, which his uncle Lælius had begun. At last, the search after the Gospel truths appearing to him more valuable than the delights of a court life, he voluntarily left his country, and went into Germany in the year 1574, nor would he hearken to any persuasions to return, though he was desired to do it by the Great Duke. He stayed three years at Basil, where he studied Divinity with great application; and having embraced a doctrine very different from that of the Protestants, he resolved to maintain and spread it; and in order to it, he wrote a book de Jesu Christo Servatore [B]. He disputed at Zurich with Francis Puccius, in the beginning of the year 1578. The differences occasioned by the ill doctrine of Francis David, about the honours and the power of the Son of God, caused a great disturbance in the churches of Transilvania. Blandrata, a man of great authority in those churches, and at court, sent for Socinus, whom he took to be a person well qualified to pacify those troubles. He lodged him in the same house with Francis David; but the latter would not be undeceived, and maintained his opinion so openly and so boldly, that he was imprisoned. He died soon after; and Socinus was ill spoken of upon that account, though it is affirmed he had no hand in the counsels that were given to the Prince of Transilvania, to oppress Francis David. He retired into Poland in the year 1579, and desired to be admitted into the communion of the Unitarians; but because he differed from them in some points, and would not be silent,

(a) Hos inter quoque, suggerenda veritatis militis artem Lælius, ejus semina pariterat, exque longis licet terrarum spatii divisus, tam efficaci studio fovebat, ut nonnullorum uxores ignotas adhuc & abiens in partes traxerit. Vita Faust. Socini, pag. 2.

artifices. They do not forget the open infraction of perpetual and irrevocable edicts, and of the royal oaths, by virtue of which, they had been unmolested near one hundred years: much less do they forget to observe, that the Clergy moved the States of the kingdom to such an infraction, and King John Casimir to break the oath he had taken ten years before. 'Cœpit id primum odium Theologicum & furor vulgi; vis deinde confectis sacerdotibus occupata auctoritate Comitiorum, rescissis, projectis, spretis, pro omnium diffidentium pace ac securitate, quâ annis admodum centum gavisi sumus inviolati, severissimis legibus, gravissimis statutis, pactis, foederibus, promissis quæ omnium ordinum sanctissimo scito & conceptissimo Regum, hujus nominatim & quidem ter repetito jurejurando, sæpè & nuperrimè erant religiosissime & amplissime renovata, asserta, atque confirmata; ut vim juris obtinerent inviolabilis atque æterni (9). - - - It was begun first by the hatred of the clergy and the fury of the vulgar; and after carried on and completed by the violent rage of the priests, who prevailed both with the Diets to disannul, disregard, and destroy the most express, important, sacred promises, laws, and ordinances made for the peace and security of all dissenters in religion, which we enjoyed for near a century of years unviolated; and, with our kings, to break the most express and solemn oaths, and our present king in particular his oath thrice renewed, and most religiously and amply confirmed; which should have had the force of an eternal and inviolable law.' Two pages after, they set down the oath taken by the king, in 1648, and then they say (10): 'Decimo post anno, octavo videlicet quinquagesimo mense eodem, Papali plerique fascino incantati, Ordines Regni, ac fidei suæ, honoris ac conscientie religiosissimis nexibus obligatæ turpiter oblitæ, perculsi qui rectè sentiebant violentis clamoribus & minaci turba, Sanctissimam & Saluberrimam pacis legem, tot Comitiorum cautionibus, pactis, foederibus, stipulationibus, tot Regum à Sigismundo Augusto continua serie succedentium, publicis Sacramentis firmissimè constitutam, & nuper adeo tam sollicitè ac solemni ter constabilitam nobiscum, proficribant, nosque hoc ferunt, & natali solo exterminant diro decreto. - - - Ten years after, namely the fifty-eighth year, in the same month, the estates of the kingdom, most of them by a Papal fascination, basely forgetting their faith given, with the sacred ties of honour and conscience, and the sounder part overborn by the violent clamours and threats of the rabble, disannul and abolish the most sacred and wholesome law of peace, most firmly established by so many provisions, promises, laws, obligations of general Diets, and assured by the 'public solemn oaths of so many kings by an uninterrupted succession from Sigismund Augustus; and but lately carefully and solemnly confirmed to us; and by this terrible decree, they proscribed and drive us from our native country.' In order to know the vexations they were under before the revocation of the edicts, you need only read the Latin passage I am going to quote. It will appear from it, that the King and the Republic of Poland struck many blows one after another, before they came to the last extremities. France took the same course (11) against the Protestants. It appears also from the same passage, that the Unitarians ascribed all the calamities of Poland to the persecution which the sects, separated from the Church of Rome, had suffered in that kingdom, contrary to the faith of edicts. 'Poloniam deinde inauso omine commemorant, patriam nostram; quæ dum non tantum nobis, sed etiam Evangelicis, & aliis, contra jurisjurandi & foederum fidem, templa adimit, exercendæ religionis libertatem labefaciat, & variis pressuris ob diversum in sacris sensum, infestam sese præbet; vindicem Dei manum in se provocavit, & iis sese cladibus & calamitatibus involvit, quarum necdum finem videmus ullum: quæ quamdiu tantam tectam cuius servavit conscientie & religionis libertatem, altissima pace, & omnium bonorum felicitate cumulata floruit; sed ubi vinculum illud, æquali lege omnes de rebus divinis dissentientes continens, solvi cepit, omnia

(11) That is before the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685.

In pejus ruere, & retro sublapsa referri (12).

'- - - Then they mention Poland, our country, with an unlucky omen; which, while it takes away the churches and liberty of religion, not only from us, but also the Protestants and others, contrary to the faith of oaths and covenants, and oppresses us with manifold injuries, because of our different sentiments in matters of religion, hath provoked the avenging hand of GOD against it self, and incurred these destructions and calamities, of which we can yet see no end: so long as it is preserved to every one their liberty of conscience and religion, it flourished in profound peace and plenty of all blessings; but when that bond, which by an impartial and just law comprehended all that have different sentiments about religion, began to be dissolved, all things grew worse, and tended towards utter destruction.' Thus they speak in a writing which they presented to the States of the province of Holland in the year 1654.

(12) Apologia pro Veritate accusata, adversus Edictum Ordinum Hollandiæ, pag. 40.

[B] A book de Jesu Christo Servatore.] Therein he disputes against a minister of Paris (13), who being come to Basil, in his way to Francfort, lodged in the

(13) Called James Couet. He has been minister of the French Church at Basil: See above the remark of the article ROTAN.

VOL. V.

U u

(8) Christophorus Morhinius Pawlikovii Domini.

he met with a repulse. Nevertheless, he ceased not to write in favour of their churches against their enemies. The book he wrote against James Paleologus afforded his enemies a pretence to exasperate the King of Poland; and yet that book did not at all favour the sedition [C]. But though the bare reading of that book was sufficient to confute the informers, Socinus thought it expedient to leave Cracow, after he had been there four years, and to take sanctuary in the house of a Polish lord (b). He lived above three years under the protection of several lords of the kingdom, and also married a woman of a good family. He lost her in the year 1587, at which he was extremely afflicted same house with him. That book was printed in 1595, by a disciple of the author. Socinus's name was put to it; it was the first time his name appeared in his works. Disputationem illam edidit postmodum Socini amicus & sequax, Elias Arcislevius, Polonus, An. M D XCV. præfixo, quod nunquam ante factum in aliis scriptis fuerat, Auctoris nomine (14). --- Elias Arcislevius, a native of Poland, a friend and follower of Socinus, published afterwards that dispute, prefixing to it the author's name, which had never been done in his other writings. I shall say by and by (15), why he was so long without putting his name to his books.

(14) Hoornbeek, in Apparatu ad Controvers. Socinianæ, pag. 51.

(15) In the remark [E].

[C] The book did not at all favour sedition. He there in so fully condemns the subjects who take up arms against their prince, and the Protestant divines who said that it was lawful to oppose those who oppressed the liberty of conscience, that perhaps the greatest sticklers for the arbitrary and despotical power of sovereigns never spoke more positively. He speaks rather like a monk, who let out to hire his pen, to make the Protestant Reformation odious, than like an Italian refugee. These are his words: 'Vestris belli gerendi Christiano populo concessionibus factum est, ut contra ipsum magistratum Christi nomine gaudens populus arma capere non dubitaverit, vobis non modo assentientibus, & approbantibus, verum etiam suadentibus, atque impellentibus, & libris præterea editis, id & posse, & debere fieri publice contestantibus, ac consentientibus. Testis est hodie eorum quæ dico orbis ipse terrarum, qui hæc fieri aut vidit, aut certissima fama accepit, sed testes potissimum sunt duæ nobilissimæ provincie Gallia, & Germania inferior, quæ civili sanguine jam diu madent, atque redundant, eo quod persuasum sit, ex certis quibusdam causis populo, seu populi parti, adversus dominum & principem suum Bellum gerere licere. Itaque hæc ætate nostra ab iis, qui Christianos se esse præcæteris jactant, per speciem Christianæ Religionis afferendæ, id fieri videmus, quod barbari atque effratati homines facere exhorrescunt, ut scilicet contra præprios reges arma ferant. Et tamen (si Deo placet) eos, qui ob prædictam sive in ipsa acie, sive alibi ceciderunt, & obtruncati sunt, in martyrum Christi numerum referri, publice audivimus. O seculum! Hi nimirum sunt, ut dixi, vestrarum belli gerendi concessionum fructus. Egregii vos scilicet magistratum defensores estis, qui populos contra magistratum, id est reges suos armatis, dum magistratu jubente, bello iuste geri posse docetis. Rege enim tyranno facto (quod quid sit, quilibet suo modo interpretatur) non regem amplius, sed populum ipsum, sive aliquos ex regni proceribus magistratum esse, vulgus hominum vobis ipsis indicantibus, vel certe annuentibus, contendit, quibus auctoribus, ex vestra disciplina, tyrannum illum, ut ipsi putant, ejusque vim armis repellere, cumque eo aperte bellum gerere non dubitant. Unde quot ingentia mala necessario proficiscantur plus fatis jam experientia novimus, quæ misere deplorari magis quam apte verbis explicari possunt (16). --- By your allowing Christian people to take up arms, it is come to pass, that people called by the name of Christ have not scrupled to rise up in arms against their magistrates, not only with your consent and approbation, but also by your advice and persuasion, and by printed books, publicly declaring and maintaining, that it may and ought to be done. All the world at this day, who have either seen or heard that such things are done, can witness the truth of what I say, but especially two famous countries, viz. France, and Lower Germany, which of a long time have been stained and overflowed with civil blood, because they are persuaded that it is lawful for a people, or a part of them, for certain causes, to fight against their lord and prince. Wherefore in these our days we have seen that done by those, who pretend to a greater perfection in Christianity than others, in defence, as they alledge, of religion, which barbarous and savage men would abhor; namely, to fight against their own kings. And notwithstanding such as have died on this account, whether in battle, or otherwise, have been publicly ranked amongst martyrs for CHRIST. These are, as I have said, the fruits of your allowing of making war. You are rare defenders of magistrates, who arm people against their magistrates, that is, their kings, whilst you teach that people may rise in arms without, and contrary to the command of their magistrates. For when a king becomes a tyrant, (and who is a tyrant every one pretends to judge) he is no more king, but the power devolves upon the people themselves, or some of the nobles, according to the opinion of the vulgar taught by you, or at least assented to, and that it is lawful to resist him, to repel force by force, and to wage open war against him, according to your doctrine. From whence, what prodigious and fatal mischiefs do necessarily arise, we are taught by awful experience, which may sooner be sadly lamented, than sufficiently described by words. Hoornbeek having quoted this long passage, adds a short confutation to it, and observes, among other things (17), that such a malicious reflection upon the conduct of the Dutch against Philip II, might have been alledged by the States-General, when they expelled the Socinians in the year 1598. I wonder that Cocceius, who quotes another passage out of that book of Socinus, knew not that this Heretic did particularly condemn the wars of the Dutch against Spain. Cocceius's words deserve to be inserted here: it appears from them, that in 1654, the Socinians did very much commend the conduct which Socinus had so much blamed in 1581. 'Socinus contra Paleologum, p. 261, dicit: Ex quo intelligi potest, quam præposterè ii se gerant, qui arma adversus eos, qui dominantur, capiunt, ut quemadmodum ajunt ipsi dominum & religionem tueantur. Ita Socinus A. C. 1581. locutus est. Neque est, puto, qui credat, cum non harum provinciarum proceres designasse. Nunc eques laudat scilicet Illustrium Ordinum pro præsumpta ipsa libertate conscientie gestum bellum, & Deum hanc præclaram Republicam elegisse dicit, ut illius libertatis, imò licentiæ, sedes esset (18). --- Socinus writing against Paleologus, says; Whereby it may be judged how posterously those act, who take up arms against their governors, that (as they give out) they may defend the worship of GOD and religion. Thus spoke Socinus in the year 1581. Nor is there any one, I think, who can imagine, that he did not here point out the chiefs of these provinces. Now truly the knight commendeth the war carried on by the illustrious States for that pretended liberty of conscience, and says, that GOD has chosen this famous Republic to be the seat of that liberty, or rather licence. But observe by the by, that informers are a sort of men that will do any thing; for Socinus was accused to the King of Poland as being the author of a seditious libel; and yet Socinus openly condemned in that book all the writers, who say that subjects may take up arms, and set up for judges of this question, Whether a prince is a tyrant or not? 'Stephanus tunc Regnum Poloniæ obtinebat. Ejus aures accusator imbutit seditiosi contra Magistratum scripti criminationes. Indignum esse, si auctore vago atque exuli Italo impune abeat hæc audacia. Libellus contra Paleologum designabatur. Qui licet aliud non postularet innocentie testimonium, quam sui lectionem, declinari tamen periculum placuit (19). --- Stephen was at that time King of Poland. He was told by an informer, that a seditious writing had been published against governors. That it would not be commendable to let this boldness of a vagrant author, an Italian, to go unpunished. The book against

(16) Socin. in Libro de Magistratu, advers. Paleologum, Part i, pag. 144, 145, apud Hoornbeek, in Apparatu ad Controvers. Socinianæ, pag. 58.

(17) Hoornbeek, ibid. pag. 59.

(18) Cocceius in Examine Apologie Equitis Poloni, pag. 141.

(19) Viti Fanti Socin. fol. 113.

afflicted [D]; and to complete his affliction, he was deprived of the yearly income of his patrimony by the death of Francis de Medicis, Great Duke of Florence [E]. The consolation he had to see his doctrine approved at last by many ministers, was very much disturbed in 1598; for he received a thousand insults at Cracow, and his friends had much ado to rescue him out of the hands of the mob. He lost his household-goods, and some of his manuscripts, the loss of which he extremely lamented [F]. He lost, among others, that which he had writ against the Atheists. To avoid the like dangers for the time to come, he retired to a village about nine miles distant from Cracow, and he spent the remaining part of his life in the house of Abraham Blonski a Polish Gentleman (c). He died there the third of March 1604 (d). His sect was so far from dying with him, that it very much increased; but since it was expelled from Poland in 1658, it is very much decayed and very much diminished as to its visible state: I express my self so, because most people are persuaded that it has made an invisible progress, and grows daily more numerous; and it is thought, considering the present state of things, that Europe would be amazed to perceive itself Socinian in a little time, if potent princes made a public profession of that heresy, or only ordered that those, who profess it, should be freed from the temporal disadvantages that attend it. It is the opinion of several people, which makes them uneasy and alarms them. But others pretend there is nothing to fear, and that princes will never embrace a sect, which does not approve war, and the exercise of magistracies [G]. That very thing, say they, will always prejudice parti-

(c) Cum ad tam barbarum servitiae exemplum minime quoque accederent, Cracovia Ludovicus migravit, in pagum ultima sua habitatione atque obitu nobilem, novem circiter miliaribus Cracovia distans; ubi aliquot annos, usque mensis de sedibus viri nobilis Abrahami Blonskii, vicinus Stoinio vixit. Vita Fausti Socini, folio 3.

(d) Taken from his Life, written by Samuel Przys-covius, a Polish gentleman. It is prefixed to the first volume of the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum.

^a Paleologus was meant. Which, tho' it wanted no other testimony of its innocence than only to be read, yet he thought fit to withdraw from that danger.

I do not think that any Socinian has hitherto maintained, That it is lawful to take up arms against one's prince; the reason of it is, that they have had no occasion to justify their sect upon that head. It has still its virginity in that respect, and is not like many others, which might say as the courtesan in Petronius, Nunquam memini me Virginem fuisse, &c. It is likely the Socinians have not had any convenient opportunity to imitate them.

[D] He lost his wife, in the year 1587, at which he was extremely afflicted. His grief was so violent, that his health was much impaired by it: he could not study for some time; he could not overcome the weakness that affected his body. His wife, some months before she died, was delivered of a daughter, who was afterwards married to a Polish gentleman, by whom she had several sons and daughters. Filiam Agnetem suscepit circa Pentecostem anni 1587, ætatis 48, ex qua, cum post mortem patris Stanislaus Wiscovatio Equiti Polono nupsisset, nepotes neptisque etiamnum supersunt. Eodem anno in Septembrem amisit uxorem Elisabetham: quem casum viro luctuosum & acerbum gravius ægritudo corporis excepit: adeo quidem pertinax, ut per aliquot menses studiorum usum interceperet (20).

(20) Vita F. Socini, ibid.

[E] He was deprived of the yearly income of his patrimony, by the death of Francis de Medicis, Great Duke of Florence. During the life of Isabella de Medicis, sister to the Great Duke, and wife of Paul Giordano de Ursini, the inquisitors endeavoured, in vain, to get that Heretic deprived of his estate. When she died, the Great Duke himself took care to protect him. He sent him word to return into Italy, and assured him that whatever happened, he would let him enjoy his income, and only recommended to him, not to put his name to his books. This was certainly a very great favour in a country where the court of Rome is so powerful. Ne qua calamitatis species abesset, eadem fere tempestate, per mortem Francisci Magni Ducis Hetruriae, fructus bonorum ejus, quem quotannis ex Italia capiebat, penitus ipsi fuit ereptus. Sane aliquanto ante, criminatorem acerbitate ac minis Pontificum, bona ejus in periculum venerant. Sed Isabella Medicæ Magni Ducis Hetruriae sororis, quæ Paulo Jordano Ursino, quem supra memoravimus, nupta fuerat, dum vixit, mixto studio, & postea ipsius Francisci Magni Ducis benevolentia, factum est, ut illo supersite annuus ex iis redditus Socinus caperet. Adeo nondum illic meritorum ejus exoleverat memoria, ut literis ac precibus, damnati & exulsi, pridem destituti ac sepe depudati, principes difficillima in re gratificarentur. Humanissimi quoque literis compellatus, & in posterum quoque bono animo esse jussus est, quamdiu vita illis suppetere, dum ne in libris edendis nomen suum publice extare pateretur. Sed tunc illos principes infestum Socini fatum abstulerat (21).

(21) Ibid.

[F] He lost . . . some . . . manuscripts, the loss of which he extremely lamented. The scholars of Cracow having stirred up some of the dregs of the people, they entered Socinus's house; they dragged him half naked out of his chamber, tho' he was sick; they carried him along the streets; they cried, that he should be hanged; they beat him, and it was with extreme difficulty that a professor got him out of the hands of this rabble. His house was plundered, he lost his goods; but he particularly lamented the loss of some manuscripts, which he would have redeemed at the price of his blood. Let us hear what his Historian says. Anno 1598. commota per Scholasticos infame plebis sæcæ, æger tunc & forte curandæ valetudini intentus, extrahitur à cubiculo seminudus, & per forum ac celeberrimas plateas, depositus ad supplicium plerisque contumeliose raptatur. Tandem in illa furentium colluvie pessime multatus, à M. Vadovita Professore Cracoviensi ægre furenti multitudini eripitur. Direptas tunc sarcinas & suppellectilem, quæque alia rapi potuere, longe minori dolore tulit, atque scriptorum quorundam jacturam irreparabilem, quam ipsius vitæ impendio sese redempturum fuisse sæpe professus est. Perit ibi una insignis contra Atheos labor, quem resellendis ingenuis magis cujusdam Viri commentis susceperat (22).

[G] Princes will never embrace a sect, which does not approve war, and the exercise of magistracy. How many princes make a trade of their own subjects, as a private man deals in horses and sheep? They raise troops not to defend their frontiers, or to attack their enemies, but to make them serve other princes for money (23). They are very glad to have subjects always ready to lift themselves upon the first beating of a drum; they get a great deal by it, and therefore they would be sorry if they should turn Socinians; their treasury would be the worse for it. On the other side, most sovereign princes love to make irruptions into the neighbouring states, or to confederate with other princes who are at war; and it is of great moment for them that it should be known, that whoever attacks them will not do it with impunity. In all these views nothing could be more insignificant than to rule over men, who are engaged not to bear arms out of a principle of religion. There goes a story, which perhaps is only a meer jest, viz. That the King of Poland being attacked by the rebellious Cossacks, and by the Tartars, and wanting all his subjects to oppose the enemies, sent word to the Socinians to take up arms. They answered, that their conscience did not allow them to shed human blood; nor to do any harm to reasonable creatures. Whereupon, it was proposed to them to go to the army without putting any shot in their muskets: they were told that they would make a shew; which would prove of some use, because their enemies would be more afraid; but they had much ado to relish that expedient. See the end of the next remark. I have it from very good hands, that the Polish gentlemen of the Socinian persuasion went to the war, when the laws of the kingdom required it, and even that some of them professed a military life, without being obliged to it out of a necessity of obeying the laws of the kingdom: their sect did not approve their conduct in the last case.

[H] Few

(22) Ibid. fol. 3.

(23) Compare what is said above, at the end of the remark [L] of the article ANABAPTISTS; and the remark [E], of the article BULLINGER.

SOCINUS.

172

cular men against Socinianism; for few people can renounce ambition, and give over a military life [H]. To be convinced of it we need only consult experience; and consider what is [H] Few people can renounce ambition, and give over a military life. Those, who love war, are innumerable, and are acted by very ambitious motives. Gentlemen, and those who live nobly, are excited thereto either by the sole desire of raising themselves, and acquiring glory, or, by a desire of supplying their wants. The soldiers are animated by laziness, and by debauchery: they hope to be idle the greatest part of the time; they hope to pillage and plunder, and to have plenty of good wine, and debauched women. In every town, those who are qualified to pretend to offices, sue for them with great earnestness, and leave nothing unattempted to obtain them. As soon as there is a vacancy, they immediately see several competitors, who have long before opened the way by their solicitations and liberalities: a plain demonstration that the desire of honours and dignities is very powerful, and very general. From whence it ought to be concluded that the Socinian religion cannot suit a whole nation, nay, nor the greatest number; it is only adapted to some persons of a particular temper: and if it be true, that a Pope hearing that the Protestants punished adulterers and fornicators, cried out, that their religion would be of no long continuance (24), it may be affirmed that his prognostication would have been more just, if he had applied it to a sect of men, who will neither bear arms nor exercise any office.

(24) See the article ABELIANS, citat. (3).

WHETHER the rejection of mysteries is a good way to get followers.

(25) See l'Esprit de Mr Arnaud, Tom. 1, cap. vii, pag. 211.

(26) According to Celsus, de Bello Civili, lib. ii, cap. iv, that state would be virtuous. Communis vitio nature, says he, ut invidis, latitantibus atque incognitis rebus magis confidamus, vehementiusque exterramur.

(27) Madam de Sablé, says in one of her Maxims (it is the xxxiith) We esteem those men most, the extent of whose ability we know not; for we always presume the best of what we see but by half.

to expect to be followed by the multitude. If he had a mind to satisfy his vanity in that respect, he should do as the hero of Lorenzo Gratian (28). But granting that those Italians have been so silly as to think that people would be freed from an intolerable yoke, if they were dispensed from believing the Trinity, &c. must we also grant that they thought the prohibition of civil and military employments would not be a yoke a thousand times heavier than that which they intended to break? Will any one be so unreasonable as to require that we should have such a notion of those men, who wanted neither wit nor address, as every body owns? What am I going to say will doubtless resolve the question. When men of parts, designing to set up a new sect, pitch upon a loose method, and substitute an easy doctrine in the room of a difficult one, it may be said that they do not pitch upon the most proper method to succeed in their design: but it ought not to be supposed that they are contented to suppress speculative mysteries, and that they keep the whole practical part, and even aggravate the yoke of the moral precepts. And yet this is supposed concerning the founders of the Socinian heresy; and therefore what is said of their design is a mistake. They are more rigid than other Christians about the prohibition of revenge, and the contempt of worldly honours; they are not for any mitigated or figurative explications of such texts of the Scripture as relate to morality. They have revived the severity of the Primitive Church, which did not approve that the Faithful should concern themselves with magistracies, and should have any hand in the death of their neighbour, so far that they would not have them to accuse malefactors. Non enim cum occidere Deus vetat, latrocinari nos tantum prohibet, quod ne per leges quidem publicas licet, sed ea quoque ne fiant monet, quæ apud homines pro licitis habentur. Ita neque militare iusto licebit, cujus militia est in ipsa iustitia, neque vero accusare quemquam crimine capitali, quia nihil distat, utrumne ferro, an verbo potius occidas, quoniam occisio ipsa prohibetur. Itaque in hoc Dei præcepto nullam prorsus exceptionem fieri oportet, quin occidere hominem sit semper nefas, quem Deus sanctum animal esse voluit (29). For when God forbids killing, he does not only prohibit robbery, which is done by the laws of the state, but also such things as by men are accounted lawful. Wherefore it is not lawful for a just man to fight, whose warfare must be the fight of faith; nor to accuse any of a capital crime; for if you kill it is no matter how, whether by sword or otherwise, because all killing is forbidden. Wherefore in this command of God, there ought to be no exception; but it is always a crime to kill a man, an animal, whom God would have saved. The prohibition of civil and military offices is a heavier burden than the prohibition of revenge; for it excludes the expedients both of deceiving one's self, and also of deceiving others. Those, who preach most earnestly against revenge, find out a thousand distinctions to elude that precept. Some say, they do not hate their neighbour as he is a man, but as he is an enemy of God: others protest, that they do him no harm to revenge a private quarrel, but for God's glory. This is approving, by the help of some distinctions, what one pretends to condemn. Some deceive themselves; others are mere hypocrites, who deceive the world: but no subterfuge can be alleged as to the doctrine which forbids going to the war, and exercising civil offices; those who profess such a doctrine must necessarily follow it; the practice cannot be separated from the theory; there are no distinctions, nor equivocations. It is therefore a true constraint; it is not a transient mortification, like that of those who discipline themselves once a year; it is a perpetual and continual state. We may therefore affirm that those Italian refugees were no cheats: they were deceived by their subtilties, and by relying too much upon the natural light of their reason; and if they kept only part of the Christian doctrines, it is because their first principle, whereby they will admit nothing that is directly against their reason, led them to it. This is apparently the cause of their choice; had they been meer cheats, greedy of followers, they would

(28) That hero says, that if he were platique incomprehensible, and that he discovered himself without being comprehended. Gran tressa en d'arte de extorsion ostentat alos caminientos, pero no a la comprehension. See Father Bouhours, Extraits d'Aristote, pag. 2. 34.

one right now

(29) Libani, lib. vi, cap. vii, pag. 2. 4th.

no cheat

(v) Apologie pour la Religion des Hollandais, by John Brun, printed in the year 1675.

is daily praftised. They alledge some other reasons [I] very proper to shew that this sect is not like to increafe. Those, who say that the Socinians have a full liberty of conscience in the United Provinces, are little acquainted with History [K], and will plainly see the contrary, if they read the answer that was made to Mr Stoupp's letters (f) Page 173. (e) they will find in it (f) the dates of many ordinances published against the sectaries. I shall say (g) something of those which concern the Socinians, and I shall dwell somewhat longer would have gone another way to work. Let us therefore condemn their principle, as a deceitful one, and not usurp the place of him that searcheth the reins and hearts. Their principle debases religion, and changes it into Philosophy. The greatness, authority and sovereignty of God require that we should here walk by faith and not by sight. A Spanish politician hath wisely said, that it is an excellent qualification to keep secret one's thoughts and resolutions. Si todo exceso en secreto, lo es en caudal; sacramentar una voluntad para soberania. . . . Argoe eminencia de caudal penetrar toda voluntad agena; y conculque superioridad saber celar la propia. See Father Bouhours, at page 201, of his Entretiens d'Ariste & d'Eugene.

(g) In the remark [L].

The Heathens said, that mysteries better discover God's majesty, and are an image of his nature, because he cannot be perceived by our senses. Ἡ κρύψις ἡ μυσικὴ τῶν ἱερῶν σεμνοποιεῖ τὸ θεῖον, μυστήριον τὴν φύσιν αὐτοῦ ἐκπνεύσαντων ἡμῶν τὴν αἰσθησιν. Mylica sacrorum occultatio maiestatem numini conciliat imitans ejus naturam effugientem sensus nostros. They are Strabo's words, page 322, of the 10th book.

But what I am going to say may undeceive those, who flatter themselves that the averfeness of the Socinians for military and civil offices will always be a great obstacle to the progress of that sect. It is no article of the Socinian faith, that one ought to renounce civil and military offices. The Socinians are, in that respect, more indulgent than the Mennonites. They do not scruple to exercise public employments in Transylvania, and it is likely they would bear arms against other men do, if they had a prince of their religion.

[I] They alledge some other reasons. For if it be considered, that most men are more inclined to acquiesce in the inward sentiments, than to follow the thread of innumerable consequences methodically connected, and proceeding from distinct notions, and that they may be quickly and easily offended by the paradoxes which reason throws them upon, it will appear somewhat probable that the Socinian system is not very proper to gain the people. It may rather lead studious and speculative men to Scepticism. There will always be something defective in that system, whereby people may be kept from it. The eternity of matter, God's extension, the limitation of this extension, and of the Divine knowledge, and of hell torments, are Socinian doctrines, which being eloquently represented to princes and their subjects, will always inspire them with great horror. If it be a convenient thing to each private person not to be afraid of being punished after this life, yet it is more inconvenient to think that one is daily conversant with people who are not afraid of it. And therefore it is not the interest of private persons, that any doctrine tending to lessen the fear of hell torments should be admitted in their country; and it is probable that the preachers of such a loose doctrine will always be more offensive than acceptable to the public. A certain author says, that the same persons, who reject the Gospel by reason of the austerity of its moral precepts, would express a greater horror for a religion enjoining them to plunge themselves into the most infamous disorders, if it was offered to them, when they are able to reason, and before they are blinded by the prejudices of education (30). He has made some reflexions upon this, but he has omitted one of the best; for he says nothing of self-love, and personal interest. It is true, that a wicked man would like a doctrine, with respect to his own conscience, that should allow him to be a poisoner, and to commit adultery, perjury, &c. but he would not like it upon many other accounts. He has a mother, a wife, a sister, and nieces, who would vex him horribly, if they grew infamous for their leudness. There are more people, who can poison, rob, and cheat him, &c. than there are against whom he can commit the same crimes: Every body is more capable of being offended than of offending others; for of twenty equal persons, it is evident that every one of them is less strong against nineteen than nineteen against one (31). It is therefore the interest of each private person, tho' never so wicked, that men should be taught such doctrines as will terrify the conscience.

[K] Those who say that the Socinians have a full liberty of conscience in the United Provinces, are little acquainted with History. The Unitarians made several attempts to settle in Holland. The first is ascribed to Erasmus Johannes, rector of a college at Antwerp, who published a book in the year 1585, without putting his name to it. That book is intitled, Antitibetis doctrinae Christi & Antichristi de uno vero Deo. Zanchius confuted it the year following. The second attempt was that of Cornelius Daems, a Civilian of Mechlin, who removed from Tergow, where he resided, to Utrecht, in order to disperse there some manuscript tracts of Socinus. The magistrates having notice of it, resolved to arrest him; but he ran away, and his papers were seized. He recovered them some months after, because the government of the town came into other hands. The third attempt was that of Ostorodius and Vaidovius, who came from Poland to Amsterdam in the year 1598, with many Socinian books printed and manuscript, which they began to get translated into Dutch (32). The magistrates having caused all those books to be seized, sent them to the university of Leyden, and then to the States-General; having first given a severe reprimand to those two Socinians, and commanded them to leave the country. The States-General being informed of the judgment passed upon those books by the Divines of Leyden, ordered them to be burnt in the presence of Ostorodius and Vaidovius, and commanded those two men to depart from the United Provinces within ten days (33). The judgment of the Leyden Divines imported, that those books were little different from Mahometism, and that they contained some blasphemies, that could not be tolerated among Christians without great impiety. Scripta ista ad Turcismum proxime accedere, & veram eternamque Deitatem Christi Filii Dei, & Spiritus Sancti, officium Christi, beneficia ejus salutaria, & Baptismi sancti institutionem, & nostram Religionem erga eum officium evertere, & similia multa adeo blasphemata, ut sine gravissima impietate nec in vulgus spargi, nec inter Christianos ferri possint continere (34). Adolphus Venator, a Minister of Alcaer, was confined to an island in 1617, for writing a book, that favoured of Socinianism, quod portenta Sarmatica saperet (35). The schism of the Arminians favoured the introduction of Socinianism into Holland; for they do not refuse to hold an ecclesiastical communion with the Socinians. Inasmuch that the latter might reside in many towns of the United Provinces without being known. The Prince of Transylvania intercepted a letter in 1638, wherein the Socinian John Sartorius (36), who lived at Amsterdam, acquainted a minister of his sect (37), that there were in Holland many persons (38) of their persuasion (39). It is certain that they had gained some followers at that time, and that their books were dispersed up and down. In order to put a stop to it, the magistrates of Amsterdam condemned some pieces of Volkelius to be burnt in the year 1642 (40). The synods of Holland have appeared very zealous to prevent the propagation of that heresy. They presented a petition to the States of the province in 1628, wherein they alledged several reasons why they should not tolerate it (41), and represented, among other things, that such a toleration would make the common-wealth of the United Provinces (42) stink all over Christendom. That remonstrance was published, and confuted. Those who confuted it, said in answer to that particular reason, that Poland then must be very stinking (43), since it granted liberty of conscience to the Socinians. Whereupon Voëtius says, that it is not true they ever had such liberty in Poland; and that the contrary appeared some years after by the ill usage they there met with. (44) Sed infelices illi historici perperam

(31) Even without supposing that the nineteen, act in concert against the twentieth.

(32) Taken from Gilbertus Voëtius, Disputat. Tom. iii, p. 811.

(33) Hoornbeek, Apparatu, ad Controversias Socinianas, pag. 98.

(34) Id. ibid.

(35) Voëtius Polit. Eccl. Tom. ii, lib. iv, p. 533.

(36) So Hoornbeek, and Voëtius, below citation (44), call him; but they should have said John Sartorius.

(37) Adam Franciscus, minister of Clauserburg.

(38) Magnam in his terris Socinianorum melleum effluat. Hoornbeek, ubi supra.

(39) Hoornbeek, Apparatu ad Controversias Socinianas, p. 97.

(40) See the article VOLKELIUS.

(41) Voëtius, ubi supra, Tom. ii, pag. 532.

(42) Inter alias motivas hanc fugerunt, quod hac ratione toti orbi Christiano fatidum redderetur federatum Belgium. Id. ibid.

(43) Oportere ut Regnum Poloniae admodum fetet. Id. ibid.

(44) Id. ibid.

(30) Penfées diverses sur les Comètes, num. 189, pag. 592.

VOL. V.

X x longer upon that of the year 1653 [L]. The accusation published by a modern author, is *perperam præsupponebant Regis & regni concessionem : quæ nulla erat (45), nec unquam fuit : & paucis an-tis post satis ostendit regnum Polonicum quid iftic liberta-tis cuius se fecit, & inter eas Socinianæ concessum sit.

Querant modo ex fratribus suis Sartorio, Jona Slichtingio, aliisque, quo loco nunc sit libertas iftorum.*
[L] I shall dwell somewhat longer upon the ordinance of the year 1653. I do not know what the States of Holland answered, in the year 1628, to the remonstrances of their fynods ; but I have read the acts of what was done in a like case in the year 1653. The deputies of the same fynods represented to them that the followers of Socinus, a fort of men who destroyed all Christianity, the resurrection of the dead, the hopes of an eternal life, &c. were so bold as to come into the United Provinces, and particularly into Holland, there to pervert the Faithful, and rend the Church ; that it was well known how zealous the Ragotki's had been against those Heretics in Transylvania, and what degrees had been made against them in Poland in the years 1638, and 1647. That they had been expelled from Poland ; that their church, their library, and their printing-house had been destroyed, because they had in the press a very scandalous book against the mystery of the Trinity. *Quemadmodum Rakociana domus in Transylvania adversus hos errorum seminatores zelaverit ; quid Anno 1638, & 1647, in Polonia contra ipfos actum sit, quomodo ex Polonia sint ejecti, & iftorum ædificia dispersa, iftorum cætus disjectus, templum, bibliotheca dispersa, iftorum ædificia, quid librum sub prelo habuerit hac inscriptione, Tormentum throno Trinitatem deturbans, in recenti memoria est (46). That the States-General proceeded severely against them in the year 1598. That in 1639, by the suggestion of the English ambassador, all the provinces were informed of the arrival of some Socinians, and desired, in time, to prevent the evil by their decrees. That in the year 1640, the States of Holland acquainted the Synod of Amsterdam with their resolution, importing that in what concerned the proscription of the Socinians and their books, all necessary orders would be given about it, as soon as the state of the thing should be more exactly known. Anno 1640 Synodo Amsterodamensi hoc decre-tum illustrium & Præpotentium Ordinum intimatum est :
Quod attinet Socinianorum exclusionem & librorum ejus
Sectæ scitum est, si accuratius illustres Ordines doceantur, Socinianos aut libros iftorum in hac provincia apparere, ipfos tunc promit adversus ipfos & iftorum libros, prout res exegerit, statuturos (47). That the States-General ordered, the 17th of July 1651, pursuant to the advice of the States of the province of Holland, given the 12th of April foregoing, that the infolence of the sectaries should be effectually repressed, and good edicts published against the Socinian books, &c. (48). After this, the deputies of the fynods represent, that it is plain those Heretics go all over the country, they use all their endeavours to get proselytes, and disperse many ill books (49) ; that they are the most dangerous enemies the Church can have, since, besides their being cunning, and apparently devout, they teach a doctrine that is not above the reach of reason. They conclude, 1. With most humbly beseeching their illustrious lordships to prevent the evil in due time, by proceeding against the persons, and forbidding the conventicles, and prohibiting the books : 2. With intimating that they hope that at last their lordships will execute the ordinances already made. Rogant submissè illustrium VV. DD. cultores, Deputati Synodorum Australis & Borealis Hollandiæ, ipsarum nomine, ut huic malo in tempore obviam eatur, ut in personas statutur, ut conventicula iftorum & libri prohibeantur, ut præla & typographia ifto stercore non contaminentur, & (50) Cocceius, in officina tam damnoſa merce vacuentur (50). The States of Holland communicated this synodal petition to the Faculty of Divinity of Leyden, desiring to have their opinion about it. The Faculty answered, that nothing could be more horrid and abominable than the Socia-nian sect ; that it differed but little from Paganism (51) ;
that it was certain it crept into the country, and that there was a necessity to pray to God that he would inspire the States with a steady and holy resolution of removing all those blasphemies, and suppressing such wicked books. *Conſilium ſapiens, utile averſendis omnibus Blaſphemiis & abolendis tam noxiis libris.

Whereupon the States made an edict, whereby all persons, whatever condition they might be of, were forbidden to bring any of the Socinian heresies into the country, or to impart them to others, or to hold any assembly with such an intent. They declared that all offenders should be banished the first time from the province, as blasphemers of God's name, and disturbers of the public peace ; and in case of a relapse they should be punished as should be thought fit. They also forbade, under severe penalties, the impression and the sale of the Socinian books, and ordered that this edict should be published, and posted up wherever it should be requisite, that none might pretend to be ignorant of it. This is what they decreed the 19th of September 1653. The magistrates of Utrecht published a like edict in the year 1655 (52).

The Socinians were not silent : they employed one of their ablest pens (53) to compose an apology, that came out in the year 1654, with this title, Apologia pro veritate accusata ad illustriſſimos & potentiſſimos Hollandiæ & Weſt-Friſiæ Ordines, conſcripta ab Equite Polono.
That piece is well written ; and with a great deal of moderation, with an artful boldness in denying the accuſa-tions. The author alleges the same general reasons (54) made use of by Tertullian in his Apology, and by Calvin in the Epistle Dedicatory of his Institutions, and by several other Reformers in their books against the Sorbonne. This is an unavoidable inconvenience :
a false Church, which pleads for Toleration, and complains of the penal laws, alleges the same common topics with the true Church in like circumstances.
The true Church, which desires that the sovereigns would extirpate a false one, uses the same motives and arguments alleged by the false one for the extirpation of the true Church. It were to be wished, that communities so different in the main, should not be like one another in using the same stile and the same topics ; but such a thing is not to be expected in this world. The evil is past curing in that respect : man, among other exercises, is obliged to search after truth, in the midst of a hundred pretenders, who express themselves the same way as to general reasons. But I proceed to another observation.

When people present petitions against a party, they ought to take special care not to alledge any facts whereof they are not well informed, or which are only equivocal proofs ; for some time after they are con-futed in a manner very displeasing. For instance, the Polish knight maintains, 1. That the Ragotki's never persecuted the Socinians (55), and always maintained them in the liberty of conscience which they had promised them, and did still maintain them in it (56).
2. That no advantage should have been taken of the oppression the Socinians were exposed to in Poland, nor of the destruction of their church at Racovia, since the Evangelics met with the same troubles in that country, and received at Vilna a treatment like that of Racovia two years after, and under the same pretence.
(57) Poloniam deinde, inſauſto omine cœmmemorant, patriam noſtram ; quæ dum non tantum nobis, ſed etiam Evangelicis (58) & aliis, contra juriſjurandi & fœderum fidem, templa adimit, exercenda religionis libertatem labefactat, & variis preſſuris, ob diverſum in ſacris ſenſum, inſeſtam ſeſe præbet ; vindicem Dei manum in ſe provocavit (59) Everſum nobis fuerit Racovia templum, quanquam de everſione templi decretum nihil habet, eo quo dicunt anno : ſed eodem exemplo everſum eſt & Vilnæ Evangelicis biennio poſt ſuum templum. Puſi fuerint Miniſtri Racovia, quanquam miniſtri Racovia de-creto puſi non ſunt, ſed ſoli Profeſſores ; puſi ſunt & Vilnæ ; proſcripti fuerint illi ; proſcripti ſunt & iſti ; & quidem illi iſti, qui paulo ante Racoviano caſui ex ambone inſultave-runt. Sic in nobis capſum, in Evangelicis, qui permiſerant, ulterius progreſſum eſt exemplum. Exemplum enim tramites querunt, nec ibi conſiſtunt, ubi capere. Occaſo & prætex-tus utriuſque injuriæ & calamitatis innocentibus inferenda ſuit idem, nempe imago juvenili quorundam temeritate violata. 3. That what happened at Racovia was not grounded upon the impression of a book, whose title was injurious to the Trinity. He proves it demonſtra-tively by the decree of the Diet, which mentioned no such book, and would have certainly mentioned it, if it had been the reason of inflicting such a punishment upon

(52) Voëtius,
Polit. Ecclesiæ,
Tom. 1, pag. 533.

(53) That of Joanna Slichtingus.
See Biblioth. An-
tiquitatis,
pag. 130.

(54) I use this epithet, because the circumſtances with respect to the severity of the penal laws, &c. are not the same as here in Tertullian's and Calvin's apologies.

for ag. a
tel. n

(55) Apolog. pro
Veritate accusata,
pag. 39.

(56) Quibus hec illuſtriſſima Domus pacem & li-bertatem con-ſcientiæ & reli-gionis juraſcit, ſacroſanctæ cultu-
divit temper, etiam ſanctiſſi-dit. Ibid.

(57) Ib. p. 40.

(58) See John Læſtus, in Com-pend. Hiſtoriæ,
pag. m. 531, &
alibi, where he ſhews the Evangelics of Poland
loſt their churches in ſeveral places, ſometimes by popular commotions, and ſometimes
by unjuſt pre-ſentences.

(59) Apolog. pro
Veritate accusata,
pag. 41. What I have omitted, is found above,
citation (13).

is altogether improbable, viz. that the Socinian Heresies were privately taught at Port-Royal; and it is certain the story he has told about it is false. The public has seen the refutation upon their sect. He adds, that John Lætus, the only author who mentions the pretended impression of that book, yet does not say that it occasioned the destruction of their school, and of their printing-house. Nam causa disturbance Racovianæ, quam accusatores nostros coram vobis pro vera venditare non pudet, ipso Decreto Comitiali manifestæ vanitatis coarguitur. Ajunt enim causam fuisse, quod librum habuerimus sub prælo, hoc titulo, Tormentum throno Trinitatem deturbans. Nullus liber unquam hoc titulo inter nos extitit, nedum ut sub prælo fuerit. . . .

Joan. Læti Compend. Hist.
Leidæ 1643.
pag. 766, and it is pag. 543, of the edition of 1661.

Auctor istius commentii fuit Lætus quidam, Moravia, qui profugum sese ex Moravia, religionisve rebellionis causa oblitus; sed odii in nos ex suorum disciplina concepti non inmemor, in ipsa patria nostra, quæ exulem benigne suscepit & fovit, eo protèr viæ progressus est, ut nobis patriæ civibus insultare ausus fuerit, edito fumorum pleno libello; inter quos & hæc de libro isto fabula est. Et tamen hic ipse, quamvis vanus Auctor, dicit quidem illo ipso tempore, quo res Ecclesiæ nostræ Racoviæ sunt everse, desudasse nostros in extrudendo ipso pessifero, quem ait, libello: sed hanc fuisse causam adversariis illarum eventuarum non dicit: Juventus, inquit, Scholæ animum præbuit, quæ effugium crucis deprecatur. Sed narrationi illius per se vanæ, quo speciosior esset, asserendum aliquid fuit ab accusatoribus (60). . . .

(60) Apolog. pro
Veritat. accusat.,
pag. 42.

For the cause alleged of our disturbance at Racovia, which our enemies are not ashamed to maintain for true, is manifestly convicted of falsehood by the decree of the senate. For they say, that we had a book in the press with this title, Tormentum Throno Trinitatem deturbans. There was never any book with such a title amongst us much less was there any such in the press. . . . The author of this fiction was one Lætus, a Moravian, who, forgetting whether he had fled his country for religion, or rebellion, but not unmindful of his hatred to us, even in our country, which had so favourably received and entertained him, when exiled from his own, had the impudence to insult us in our own country, by publishing a book full of stories, among which is this fable concerning that book. And yet this very man, tho' he says, that at the time when our churches at Racovia were destroyed, we were labouring to hasten the publishing of that prencious book, as he calls it; yet that this was the cause our enemies did so, he says not. The youth of the school, says he, which had thrown down a picture of the cross, gave occasion thereto. But to this relation of his, ridiculous in itself, something was to be tacked by our enemies, that it might have the better appearance. Cocceius published a very solid answer to that manifesto of the Socinians, in the year 1656. I have consulted it particularly upon those three heads; for I expected there to find the apology confounded: but I have found nothing in it neither upon the first, nor upon the second head; and as for the third, all that Cocceius says, is, that there was a report, that the Socinians had such a book in the press, when they were so ill used at Racovia. Quam causam habuerint Poloni eripiendæ vobis Racoviæ, non disputo. Certum est, eo tempore vulgatum fuisse rumorem, tale, quale libellus Deputatorum memorat, scriptum sub prælo sudasse (61). Uncertain reports should never be depended upon in juridical pieces, such as the remonstrance of a synod to their sovereign, designed to obtain the suppression of a sect. In accusations that concern doctrines, it is more easy to justify an unexact assertion: for instance, it was positively said in the remonstrance, that the Socinians denied the resurrection of the dead, and eternal life. The Faculty of Divinity at Leyden affirmed likewise that they deny, as the Sadducees do, the life of the soul separated from the body, and the resurrection of the wicked. The Polish knight maintained that such an accusation was a calumny (62). Quis non cupiat animas etiam corporibus carentes vivere, agere, intelligere; Dei conspectu & gaudiis celestibus perfrui, pro nobis, in corpore adhuc, tanquam in carcere agentibus, Deum orare, nostrique curam gerere? quis non pedibus in hanc sententiam eas? . . . (63) Nos animarum, quamvis sine corporibus fuit statum, Deo relinquimus, certissima fide, quæ propria Christianorum est, mortuorum

(61) Cocceius, in Examine Apolog.
Equisit. Poloni,
pag. 138.

(62) Apologia E. quisit. Poloni,
pag. 73, 74.

Proley
(63) lb. p. 74.

resurrectionem complexi . . . Negare nos ajunt impiorum resurrectionem. Nos vero cum Apostolo ipem habemus in Deo, resurrectionem fore mortuorum, justorum & injutorum; justorum ad vite eterne gaudia; injutorum ad ignis æterni supplicia. Et hunc terrorem Domini, (qui baudquaquam vanus in ullis futurus est) scientes, homines suademus, Deo autem manifesti sumus, speramus vero etiam conscientis vestris fore manifestos (64). Cocceius was not silenced by this denial, grounded upon a book, in some measure liturgical and at least authentic, since it was an apology for the confession of faith: he confessed he knew nothing of that book (65), but alleged several quotations, and had something to say.

I shall observe, by the by, that nothing has proved more prejudicial to the Socinians, than a certain doctrine which they thought very proper to remove the greatest difficulty a Philosopher can find in our Theology. A thinking man, who only consults reason, and the bright idea of infinite goodness, which, morally speaking, makes up the principal character of the divine nature, will be offended at what we read in the Scripture concerning the eternity of hell torments; especially if he adds to it the paraphrases, and the many explications that are to be found in several books (66). Deus optimus maximus were the current and usual titles of the Divine Nature among the ancient Heathens: It was their set form, when they spoke of God, and they never said Deus severissimus, implacabilissimus. The two epithets Optimus and Maximus, properly speaking, were only the image and expression of one sole quality, I mean a supreme goodness; for goodness ought to be attended with greatness to appear in all it's lustre. But what, I pray you, is greatness? Is it any thing else besides magnanimity, generosity, liberality, magnificence, and pouring out of favours? This natural idea, which made the Heathens speak in that manner, is confirmed by the Scripture, wherein the goodness of God is all along extolled above his other attributes. Doing good, shewing mercy, is the daily and pleasant work of God, according to the Scripture: chastizing, punishing, shewing severity, is to him unusual and unpleasant work. And therefore so long as a man shall adhere to his natural reason, and not humbly submit to some passages in the gospel, he will look with abhorrence upon that doctrine of the infinite torments and punishments of the whole human race, except a few only. The Socinians, relying too much upon reason, have limited those torments, so much the more carefully, because they considered that men would be made to suffer only for sufferings sake, since no advantage would accrue from those torments to the sufferers or the spectators; a thing never done by any well regulated legislature. They hoped to bring over to Christianity by that means those, who are offended with a notion, that seems little consistent with the supreme goodness. But those Heretics were not aware that this very thing would make them more odious, and more unworthy of a toleration than all their other tenets. After all, few people are offended with the doctrine concerning the eternal duration of hell torments, and are like Theodorus Camphusius (67). He was a minister, born at Gorcum in Holland: he turned Socinian, and publicly declared he should have had no religion, had he not met with some books, wherein he found that hell torments will not last for ever. Memini, meminere & alii, fuisse quandam Didericum Camphusium, qui in epistola typis expressa, & canticis ipsius adjuncta, profiteretur, se primum fuisse ad relinquendam omnem religionem, donec incidisset in illos libros, qui docerent, perpetuos ignes nihil esse & eternos cruciatus (68).

[M] A modern author hath published, that the Socinian Heresies were privately taught at Port-Royal. The author of the Politique du Clergé de France affirms, that there is a third party, from which the Gallican Church has every thing to fear. They profess, says he (69), to believe that the Church of Rome is the true Church, to which one ought to be inseparably united, and should never be separated from it; and yet they do not follow her doctrines, and have no respect for her worship. Such men were never so numerous in that kingdom at they † Act. xxiv. 15.

† 2 Cor. v. 11,
12. Vide Confess.
vindic. cap. xx.

(64) This may serve as a proof of what I observed in the article of ORIGEN, remark [C], at the end.

CONSIDERA-TION, on the Doctrine of the eternity of Hell torments.

(65) Negari à suis impiorum resurrectionem, ne-
gat Eques. Citat in margine Confess. vindic. cap.
xx. Ipse Confessio Belgica, quæ Apologie ad-jungi solet, in capita distincta non est. Quid libri fit Confess.
vindic. adhuc ignoro. Cocceius, in EXAMINE Apolog.
Equisit. Poloni,
pag. 220.

(66) See the book, intitled,
*Les Mercurilles
de l'autre Monde*, written by a canon of Riez called Arnoux.

(67) In the vulgar Tongue,
Dirk Raphaël Camphusius. He was born in the year 1586, and died at Dockum in Friesland in the year 1627.
See the *Biblioth.
Antiqu. p. 112*,
and therein mend Wicomi denatus.
He wrote several pieces in Dutch,
and among others
one printed above twenty times in several sizes, which consists of songs, and other Spiritual Poems,
very much esteemed by those who are skilled in Dutch Poetry.
The author dexterously inserted in them his opinions about several Christian Doctrines, especially upon those that concern morality.

(68) Cocceius, in Examine Apolog.
Equisit. Poloni,
pag. 305.

(69) Politig. du Clergé de France,
pag. m. 90.

refutation of it (b). There are very few people that would not be extremely concerned, if they are now. Some of them carry their unbelief so far as to call in question the most important doctrines of Christianity. They are Socinians; they believe neither the mystery of the Trinity, nor that of the Incarnation. I know some things about it, that are so particular that I cannot doubt of it: I shall not impart them to you, for fear of scandalizing you. And what is most terrible is, that it is not only the religion of our young Abbots, but also of some grave and wise societies, that make a great shew of the purity of their morals, and of their adherence to the Catholic Faith. Let us see what Mr Arnauld answers to that author. A man must have neither honour nor conscience, who ascribes dismal and odious crimes to many persons, when every body may easily know that such horrid accusations are only grounded upon a meer calumny. But who does not see that no other thoughts can be entertained of this writer? There may be in France, and even among Abbots, some persons that are so impious as to believe neither the Trinity nor the Incarnation: but something else is requisite to say, without being guilty of a notorious calumny, that it is now the religion of our young Abbots. He must be sure that there are at least many of those young Abbots, who have no other religion but that. But how could he know it? If any of them were so unhappy as to entertain such impious opinions, would they be so imprudent as to declare them up and down, and thereby expose themselves to the dangerous consequences of it? Could such a folly be common to so many persons, that one might say, without fearing to be accounted an impostor, that it is the religion of young Abbots? And yet he is so impudent as to suppose it as a thing so well known, that it serves him only for a prelude to authorize a more horrid calumny; for he affirms it as a thing, of which he is very sure, that some grave, wise, and orderly societies, very regular in their life, and which are accounted Catholic, believe neither the Trinity nor the Incarnation no more than those Abbots. And what is more terrible, says he, is, that it is not only the religion of our young Abbots, but also of some grave and wise societies, that make a great shew of the purity of their morals, and of their adherence to the Catholic Faith. This exceeds all impudence to impute not to some private persons, but to societies, and not to one only, but to some societies, whom he very much commends for their wisdom and morals, that they do not believe the first mysteries of the Christian religion; and to suppose that those, who could put a stop to so great a disorder, know nothing of it, or knowing it are unwilling to suffer it; and lastly, to fancy that the world will be so silly as to believe such an incredible thing, upon the credit of an inconsiderable writer, who says in an anonymous book: I know some things about it that are so particular, that I cannot doubt of it, adding with a sorry craftiness, I shall not impart them to you, for fear of scandalizing you. One can hardly conceive how a man can carry boldness and calumny to such a degree. However, the thing is not so surprising in a Calvinist, he hath only, &c. (70).

(b) See below the passage quoted citation (103).

(70) Arnauld, Apologie pour les Catholiques. Part. ii, ch. iv, pag. 31, & seq.

(71) Esprit de Monfr. Arnauld, Tom. i, ch. vi, pag. 196.

(72) Observe how little that author scruples to lie; for he wrote the Politique du Clergé, tho' he denies it.

The author of the Politique du Clergé could not well be silent after such a vigorous answer: I shall set down what he said in his vindication. He thought, says he (71), speaking of Mr Arnauld, that the author meant the Janfenists by those grave and wise societies, that make a great shew of the purity of their morals, and of their adherence to the Catholic Faith. Perhaps he is not in the wrong. I do not know the thoughts of the author of the Politique du Clergé (72); but I do very well know that there is ground to suspect those gentlemen of having a Theology not agreeable to Christianity, and bordering upon Socinianism. I am sorry I am obliged to say what you think on this, and what we have altogether reason to think. We do not love to oppress those unhappy men, who are already loaded with the public hatred. And indeed, were it not that we are forced to it by those gentlemen, we would not expose to the public view, what may confirm that suspicion. But they force us to it; and if they are displeased with what we are going to say, they must blame themselves for it. We would not be so positive as Filteau, and the Jesuite Meynier, who say that those who go by the name of Janfenists are downright Deists, enemies to the mysteries of the Christian religion. But it is certain they have dropped some words against the Divinity of Jesus Christ, which give ground to suspect that they harbour dreadful monsters in their breasts. Pray, mind the proofs he alledges. Those gentlemen, says he (73), do not scruple to confess that the Divinity of Jesus Christ is not sufficiently proved in the holy Scripture. . . . (74) The author of the Perpetuite de la Foy, asks, † Why did not Jesus Christ discover his Divinity in such clear words that they might not be eluded? From those words, and from these, God was not willing that the Christian doctrines should be proposed with the utmost evidence, the author of the Politique du Clergé infers, that the Janfenists admit this principle: The Divinity of Jesus Christ, and the Trinity, are not clearly expressed in the Scripture (75). Afterwards he tells us, 1. That this principle is utterly false; for it is not true that the passages which prove Jesus Christ's Divinity, may be any ways eluded. We know there are no passages, tho' ever so clear, but what the Heretics may cavil upon. If this be called eluding, there is nothing in the holy Scripture, nor in any book in the world, or language of men, but what may be eluded. This he proves by shewing how one might cavil about some texts in the gospel, wherein Christ's humanity is asserted, and about the canons of the council of Nice (76), and a passage contrived on purpose (77), to be the clearest and the most distinct proof of the Trinity and Incarnation that can be imagined. In the second place he says (78), that it is the most shameful thing, and the greatest prevarication an orthodox Divine can be guilty of against the eternal Divinity of the Son of God, thus to give it up to the Hereticks, by acknowledging a thing so false, so dangerous, and so proper to confirm them in their errors. . . . (79) This confession, that the Divinity of the Son is not sufficiently explained in the written Revelation, is that very thing which confirms the Socinians in their Heresy, and may induce others to embrace it. In the 3d place he says (80), that Mr Arnauld ought to acknowledge, That until the council of Nice, it was lawful to deny the Divinity of Christ without running the hazard of one's salvation, and that if the Divinity of the Son was not an article of faith, necessary to salvation, for the space of three hundred years, it could not become so by the decision of a council; because, according to the wisest Doctors of the Romish Church, among whom the gentlemen of Port-Royal are to be reckoned, the Church, the Pope, nor the Councils, cannot make new articles of faith. From whence it follows, that to this very day the Divinity of the Son is not an article of faith, for which those who deny it deserve to be anathematized. Thus, by proceeding from one principle to another, it is plain it is not unreasonable to suspect that Mr Arnauld does not believe the mysteries of the Incarnation and Trinity, or at least, that he does not look upon them as essential parts of the Christian religion. In the 4th place he proves (81), that those gentlemen have made it appear that they have no great regard for the authority of the Church. Which being so, concludes he (82), since on one side the mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation cannot be proved by any passages of the Scripture, but what may be eluded, according to those gentlemen; and, on the other hand, since they are only grounded upon decisions, to which they do not think themselves obliged blindly to submit; it is plain those mysteries are built upon no solid foundation, and are only meer problems according to the Theology of the Port-Royal. In the fifth and last place, he entertains us with a story, to which he prefixes a preamble worth its weight in gold. I shall add a story, says he (83), which I publish with reluctance, and after long debating with myself. If those gentlemen had not provoked us so unjustly and so cruelly, we would have been more reserved; but we are not obliged to shew any regard to such a man as Mr Arnauld, who so plainly transgresses against the laws of charity and sincerity. Here follows a short account of that story. (84) About 15 or 20 years ago (85), a young man, the son of a treasurer of France in the Generality of Orleans, whose name was Picaut or Picot, and who was designed for the Church, studied at Paris, in the house of the gentlemen of Port-Royal. The conversation of a minister, who had changed his religion, and

(73) Esprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. i, ch. vi, pag. 197.

(74) Id. ibid. pag. 198.

(75) Ibid. pag. 198.

(76) Ibid. pag. 198.

(77) Ibid. pag. 198.

(78) Ibid. pag. 198.

(79) Ibid. pag. 198.

(80) Ibid. pag. 198.

(81) Ibid. pag. 198.

(82) Ibid. pag. 198.

(83) Ibid. pag. 198.

(84) Ibid. pag. 198.

(85) Ibid. pag. 198.

(86) Ibid. pag. 198.

(87) Ibid. pag. 198.

(88) Ibid. pag. 198.

(89) Ibid. pag. 198.

(90) Ibid. pag. 198.

(91) Ibid. pag. 198.

(92) Ibid. pag. 198.

(93) Ibid. pag. 198.

(94) Ibid. pag. 198.

(95) Ibid. pag. 198.

(96) Ibid. pag. 198.

(97) Ibid. pag. 198.

(98) Ibid. pag. 198.

(99) Ibid. pag. 198.

(100) Ibid. pag. 198.

(101) Ibid. pag. 198.

(102) Ibid. pag. 198.

(103) Ibid. pag. 198.

(104) Ibid. pag. 198.

(105) Ibid. pag. 198.

(106) Ibid. pag. 198.

(107) Ibid. pag. 198.

(108) Ibid. pag. 198.

(109) Ibid. pag. 198.

(110) Ibid. pag. 198.

(111) Ibid. pag. 198.

(112) Ibid. pag. 198.

(113) Ibid. pag. 198.

(114) Ibid. pag. 198.

(115) Ibid. pag. 198.

if they had published a story as ill circumstantiated as that which concerns young Picaut, the

and the reading of some books, convinced him that the Pope is Anti-Christ; whereupon he wrote a piece for his own use, and being informed that it was come into the director's hands, and that his family had notice of it, he ran away. 'He came into Perche, where he had a living, to try whether he could get some money by it. He fell, by chance, into the hands of a Protestant gentleman, a person distinguished by his birth, and particularly by his merit. That gentleman being very well skilled in matters of religion, asked him several questions about the motives of his change; and as he proceeded from one subject to another, he perceived that this young man had the notions of the Socinians about the Trinity and Incarnation, and knew all their sorry objections; but otherwise, he was very fond of the opinions of the Church of Rome, and very little disposed to embrace the doctrines of the Reformed, excepting this, that the Pope is Anti-Christ. The gentleman was very much surprized to find this young man a Socinian, and asked where he had learned that doctrine. The young man answered, very freely, that he had learned it at Port-Royal, where he had studied; that several persons had the same opinions in that house; that the Novices and the Students were not allowed to read the books of Calvin and of the Calvinists, and that he had never read them; but for the Socinian books they were not shut up by themselves in the library, and every body might read them. Afterwards the young man made his escape into a remote province, and at last left the kingdom to avoid being molested by his relations. And it has been known since, that those who went about to instruct him, could never cure him of his Socinianism (86). What follows is the most curious part of the story, and therefore I must not forget it. The author of the apology for the Catholics, who falls into a violent passion when he meets with a word that vexes him ever so little, will doubtless call this story a piece of impudence, an imposture and a calumny. He will say, that all the fire in hell will not be sufficient to punish the author of so horrid a slander. But I must tell him, that I only warrant the truth of these two things. 1. That this young man told that story, and even to many persons very credible, and of known probity. 2. That this young man was truly Socinian, when he left the Divines of Port-Royal, and that he learned Socinianism in their house. As for what he adds, that his matters were infected with the same Herefy, I cannot tell whether it be true. But I see no reason why that Student should invent so horrid a calumny. And this, together with their way of speaking of the Trinity and Incarnation, may form, if not a proof, at least a very strong suspicion. This is what we know of the matter, and what we had to say about it. The public will judge of it, as they think fit. This is what people get by provoking others (87).'

This author did not think that Mr Arnauld's reply would contain but few words; he expected abundance of reflexions and exclamations, for he believed his History would produce great effects. But Mr Arnauld was contented to confute it in a few words, and with great moderation, tho' he knew very well how to be passionate. His answer runs thus: He had a mind to make people believe that the Divines of Port-Royal had an aversion for Calvinism, but that they were very much inclined to the Socinian Herefy, for which he gives this proof. Some young children of quality were instructed at Port-Royal, in human learning, and at the same time care was taken to give them a pious education. Most of them were but ten, twelve, or fourteen years of age, and the oldest was hardly sixteen. The Greek and Latin methods, and the Greek roots in French verses were made for them. Now let us see what Mr Jurieu tells us in his famous book, intituled, L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld. He says the books of the Calvinists were carefully kept from them; but that they had a full liberty to read those of the Socinians, as much as they would; and that by the reading of those books, one of those children whom he names, and who was a native of Orleans, as he says, taking a liking to the Socinian errors, left the church, and turned Hugenot. But this story is utterly false.

VOL. V.

There never was a child at Port-Royal of such a name and family as this is said to be; nay, there never was there any of the city of Orleans. The ground on which he builds that story, viz. that children of that age were allowed to read the Socinian books, sufficiently shews that one may expect any thing from a man, who does not scruple to publish such horrid and incredible lies (88).

Many reflexions might be made on the pains the author of L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld took to convict the gentlemen of Port-Royal of Socinianism; but I shall only make three.

The first is, that if any one accused that writer of the same thing, he would find the proofs of his accusation in L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld, for he needs only form this syllogism.

A man who believes on the one side, that the mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation cannot be proved by any passages of the scripture, but what may be eluded, and who on the other side does not blindly submit to the decisions of councils (89), is a Socinian.

But the author of L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld believes so, and makes no such submission.

Therefore he is a Socinian.

The major proposition of this syllogism is plainly the doctrine of that author; for intending to justify what he had said (90), that Socinianism was the Theology of some grave societies, meaning the gentlemen of Port-Royal, he alleges for a proof their teaching that Christ's Divinity has not been revealed with a sufficient evidence, and their giving ground to suspect that they do not believe one ought to submit to councils. He must therefore look upon this as an undoubted sign of the Socinian Herefy, otherwise he could not clear himself of calumny; his accusation would be ill proved, and he would be a false accuser. Wherefore I need only prove the minor proposition. It consists of two parts: the last does not want to be proved; for it is manifest enough that a Protestant minister does not blindly submit to councils: And the following words afford the proof of the first. I am far from designing to lessen the force and clearness of those characters of the Divinity of the scripture; but I dare say that there is none of them but may be eluded by prophane men. None of them makes a proof, to which something may not be answered; and if they be considered together, tho' they have a greater force than when they stand by themselves, yet they are not strong enough to form a moral demonstration (91). It were needless to object to me that this passage does not concern Christ's Divinity; for it were in vain to pretend that God has evidently revealed to us the Divinity of his Son in the scripture, if it was affirmed that it does not clearly appear, that the scripture is the word of God. But, besides, that author has (92) a dispute with another minister (93) about this question, Whether the belief of our mysteries supports the evidence of the testimony; and does not only deny it, but also maintains that the affirmative is a pernicious opinion. I am going to shew that he may receive another wound with his own weapon. You have said that it is not true that the passages, which prove Christ's Divinity, cannot be any ways eluded (94).

You have said that they are as clear as the passages which concern his humanity, and as clear as the decision of the council of Nice, or any text that one could contrive on purpose. The meaning of which is, that the cavils that might be raised against them are as insignificant, as those that should be raised against a text made on purpose. How come you then to confess (95) that the characters of the Divinity of the scripture may be eluded? How come you to say that the objections of the Socinians are considerable? These are your words. The proofs of the scripture, on which the Trinity, the Incarnation, and the necessity of Grace, are grounded, have not the utmost degree of evidence: Those mysteries are liable to and admit of difficulties, not only with respect to human reason, but also in relation to the holy scripture, wherein there are several passages that want to be reconciled with the truth. Those, who take the objections of the Socinians against mysteries, and those of the Pelagians against Grace, to be vain and inconsiderable, are mistaken, and do not consider the thing with a due attention. They are real difficulties, and deserve to be cleared (96). Remember that in the book, intituled, L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld, it is the greatest

(88) Arnauld, Differtation sur le prétendu bonheur du plaisir des sens, pag. 13, 14.

(89) See L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. i, pag. 220.

(90) In the Politique du Clergé, pag. 90.

(91) Jurieu, Traité de la Nature & de la Grace, pag. 246.

(92) I write this in July 1696.

(93) See his two books against Mr Saurin.

(94) Esprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. i, p. 201.

(95) Above citation (91).

(96) Jurieu, Défense de la Doctrine Universelle de l'Eglise, pag. 407.

(86) Esprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. i, ch. vi, pag. 222.

(87) Esprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. i, p. 224.

(i) Daniel Hartnagius, in Continuatione Jo. Micronii Synonymi Historiae Ecclesiasticae.

the chief witness alleged by the modern author I speak of [N]. I do not give a particular account of what concerns the opinions and books of Socinus: it may be seen in general in Moreri's Dictionary. A German Historian (i) has reduced the doctrine of the Socinians into 229 Propositions.

The most general objection, raised against them, is, that by refusing to believe what they think to be contrary to Philosophical truths, and by denying the unconceivable mysteries of the Christian religion, they open a way to Scepticism, Deism, and Atheism. Perhaps it might be objected to them, that they do the same, at least indirectly, by the way of explaining the passages of the Scripture, which concern the consubstantiality of the Word. For it seems to follow from their explications that the apostles, being animated with an ardent zeal for the glory of JESUS CHRIST, made use of the most strained figures and expressions that devotion can suggest, when they spoke of his perfections. Thus the votaries of the Holy Virgin have carried it as high, and as near a true and real deification as ever they could. But if the expressions of the Apostles were to be ascribed to an Enthusiastic zeal, and not to the immediate direction of the Holy Spirit, it is plain the Scripture would be of little more authority than the panegyrics upon the saints. But by over-throwing the inspiration of the sacred writers, the whole revelation comes to nothing, and then every thing will be a meer Philosophical dispute.

I forgot

baseness, and the highest prevarication an orthodox Divine can be guilty of against the eternal Divinity of the Son, thus to give it up to the Heretics, by making a confession so false, so dangerous, and so proper to confirm them in their errors (97), that is, by confessing as you do, that Christ has not discovered his Divinity in words so clear as not to be eluded (98).

(97) Esprit de Mr Arnauld, Tom. i, pag. 209.

(98) See l'Esprit de Mr Arnauld, ibid. pag. 198.

My second reflexion is, That if those proofs alleged to shew that the gentlemen of Port-Royal are Socinians, were good, it would follow from thence that the whole Romish Church is Socinian; for what has been said by those gentlemen concerning the obscurity of the Scripture, is the general doctrine of that Church. Besides, few Roman Catholics believe the Pope's infallibility in matters of fact; nay, they do not ascribe that privilege to universal councils. The Jesuits never denied the infallibility of those councils in point of doctrine, and even have acknowledged that the five propositions were heretical, in the sense they pretend the Popes have condemned them. What they have said in particular to justify some Nuns, who refused to subscribe to certain formularies, and to submit to some episcopal mandates, is of such a nature, that all Monks would say the same, if they were molested by Bishops. How often have they been at law with their Prelates? How often have they appealed against them to synods, or to the Pope? Is it not a plain demonstration, that they do not believe one ought to sacrifice one's knowledge to the authority of inferior tribunals? I confess, some say that a Monk ought blindly to obey his superior; but it is only in what concerns the discipline and observances; and they would not think themselves obliged to obey him, if he commanded them to believe what they know to have been condemned by the councils. And therefore if the gentlemen of Port-Royal are Socinians, because they say, on the one side, that our mysteries are not evidently contained in the Scripture; and, on the other, that one ought not to subscribe against one's conscience an episcopal mandate, or a bull that decides only a matter of fact, there is no university, nor religious community in the Church of Rome, but what is Socinian. Let us therefore admire the discerning faculty of Mr Arnauld's adversary; and let us confess that no man was ever more lucky than he in the choice of his proofs. It is not to be doubted, that if the Jesuits found themselves in the same circumstances with the Divines of Port-Royal, they would do what those Divines have done (99). Would that prove their being Socinians?

(99) During the congregation of Auxerre, Clement VIII, being not favourable to them, they publicly maintained at Rome, that it was no article of faith, to believe that Clement VIII was Pope. Others taught that he was not infallible. See the History of that Congregation printed in the year 1687, pag. 49. Matthæus, Hist. de France, book ii, is quoted in it.

My third reflexion concerns the great care that writer takes to excuse himself to the public, for revealing the secret of one Picaut, or Picot. He is afraid of undoing Port-Royal; he declares he has been a long time doubtful whether he should strike such a blow; he would never have done it, had those gentlemen been less unjust, and less cruel to his party: However, he applauds himself for his victory; this is what people get, says he, by provoking others. Does it not look like a convincing proof? Would not one think it is one of those productions, that put an end to all cavils, and further proceedings in a cause? But, after all, it appears that the only thing he objects against the gentlemen of Port-Royal is a story, which he dares not warrant: He knows not whether it be true. Who will then believe it, since he himself doubts of it, being otherwise fully enough to fancy that his tale would cast so shameful a blot upon those gentlemen, that he is afraid of being guilty of a piece of cruelty? But let not that trouble his conscience: He may be very sure that such stories will never make any impression upon impartial men, nor even upon the Jesuits. I would not deny that Picaut said so; but he must be compared to those deserters, who tell a thousand lies to the besiegers about the state of the towns that are besieged out of which they escaped. I have a book printed at Cologne for Peter Marteau in the year 1679, and intitled, Traité des Parlemens ou États généraux, composé par Pierre Picaut. This is doubtless our fugitive; for there is a great deal of Socinianism in that book. When a grave man, who has a great reputation, leaves his country and his Church, what he says may be depended upon. This is what makes me believe that the author of the Politique du Clergé knew not what he said when he spoke of a third party, and of that vast number of Socinians of which he supposes France is full; for when I asked two or three years ago (100) a famous Father of the Oratory (101), whether it was true that there were many Socinians among the Clergy of France, he answered me that there was hardly any body who knew the works and doctrines of that sect. There are every where Unbelievers and Sceptics; but they are not Socinians.

Let us conclude, That the author of the Politique du Clergé not being able to prove the heinous accusation published by him against Port-Royal, is duly convicted of being a downright calumniator. The proofs alleged by him, ought to be compared with those of a man, who having said that the governor of a place is a traitor to his sovereign, should prove it; First, By imputing to him a conduct like that of all other governors, and of those whose fidelity he could not deny. Secondly, By publishing some silly story, which a soldier, who deserted from the place, told the enemies.

[N] What concerns young Picaut, the chief witness alleged by the modern author I speak of.] Here follows what Mr le Vassor did me the honour to write to me, the second of January 1697. 'If you had told me that you designed to speak of Picaut's adventure, which Mr Jurieu relates very wrong, I would have given you a good account of it. He was my countryman (102), and I was very well acquainted with him. His eldest brother married a near relation of mine. He was a young man, whom Aubert de Verfé spoiled with Socinianism, not at Port-Royal, but in a house of the Oratory, where they happened both to be. The Fathers of the Oratory sent away de Verfé as soon as they perceived that he dogmatized, and they kept Picaut for some time in order to cure him, but they could not do it.' This account does perfectly agree with a printed letter of Mr Simon, who says (103), 'I can assure you that there are in that libel (104) many false stories, which could not be spoiled by M. J. (105). For instance, can any thing be more false and more ridiculous than that, which is to be found at large in the two hundred no 10 cm

100ms

(100) I write this in July 1696.

(101) M. le Vassor, who is now at London, and is very well known by his works, who professed Divinity in the Oratory, and is perfectly acquainted with the Civil and Ecclesiastical State of France.

(102) Mr le Vassor is a Native of Orleans.

(103) Lettres Choisies de Mr Simon, pag. 145.

(104) That is, L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld.

(105) This refers to these words of the same page. The man being vexed at that blunder, answered me very ingeniously, and without much consideration on what he said, speaking of Mr J. That man spoils every thing that is sent to him.

I forgot to say that there are some of the Orthodox who have complained that certain refutations of his books have notably conduced to the increasing of his sect [O].

and twenty first page, and the following, of the first volume. He supposes the gentlemen of Port-Royal had a house in Paris, where they taught their scholars Socinianism, and permitted them to read the books of the Socinians. That romance is so well circumstantiated, that any body would think at first, it is rather a true history than a fictitious story. And yet it is certain, the gentlemen of Port-Royal have had no school in Paris where they taught youth. Here is what gave occasion to that romance. The young man spoken of in that book, called Picaut, was in the institution of the Fathers of the Oratory, which is properly a place for the novices, who desire to be admitted into that congregation. A man very well known in the world, who had been a minister in Burgundy, and was expelled by his brethren, being convicted of Socinianism, happened to be there at the same time. The Fathers of the Oratory, who took him to be a converted minister, admitted him into their institution. It was he who turned the young man's brains with what he told him about the Apocalypse and Socinianism. Thus that Socinianism proceeded from your people, and not from the gentlemen of Port-Royal, nor from the Fathers of the Oratory. That school, wherein the Socinian books are not locked up, is a meer dream of your men, who give out through the whole book manifest lies for true stories.

[O] They have complained that certain refutations of his books have . . . conduced to the increasing of his sect.

(106) See his Letter, ad Fratres Belgas, it is the CCLIII of the collection of Letters published by the Remonstrants, Edit. Amst. 1684.

(107) Bodechoerus innotiens, pag. 15, apud Crenium Animadu. Part. xi, pag. 120, 121.

hurts his own cause

This is the judgment of Druſius (106) concerning a work published against Socinus by Sibrandus Lubbertus in the year 1611. 'Credebat ille (Lubbertus) . . . recte se facere atque utiliter, quod Socinum de Servatore integrum ederet cum proluxa refutatione. Sed vide quid collega ipſius J. Druſius de facto isto judicaverit: Plures solâ libri Socini lectione, & parum accuratâ ejus confutatione, Socinianos brevi tempore factos fuisse scribit, quàm multis ante annis per ceteros libros eorum facti fuerant. Nec mirum. Qui enim argumenta adversarii sui, cum nervis suis omnibus vibrata ac torta, valide non retorquet, is proponendo illa, plus obest causâ suâ, quàm confutando prodest (107). --- Lubbertus thought he did an useful thing in publishing the book of Socinus, de Servatore, entire, with a large refutation of it. But see what his colleague Druſius thought of it. He writes, that in a little time more people were made Socinians, by the reading of Socinus's book only, and its insufficient refutation, than for many years past by all their other writings. And no wonder. For whoever does not sufficiently answer all the arguments skillfully proposed and managed by an adversary, does more hurt to his own cause by proposing, than good by refuting them.' This we find in a work printed in the year 1624. The same thing is to be found in a letter which Arnold Poelenburg published in the year 1655. I will give you his own words, which censure two other authors who refuted the Socinians. 'Laudant vulgò & magnificè deprædicant Reformati consilium Magistratus Amstelodamensis, quò libros Crellii & Volckelii de vera religione jussit exurere. At à quo decretum istud Amplissimi Magistratus majore contemptu violatur, quàm a D. Mareſio, qui nobis duas jam partes istius operis combuſti ac intermortui in lucem vitæque revocavit? Qua in re aliorum Reformatorum exemplum imitari se dicit; nec dubium est, quin hunc quoque alii secuturi sint, qui pro sua parte diligenter incumbant, ut plurima Socinianorum scripta protrudant in lucem. Adjicitur quidem, factor, in plerisque adversariorum libris refutato; sed ut est hominum indoles ad deteriora proclivior, multo facilis hæresin, quàm veritatem alluere vulgò creditum est. Deinde addita refutatio interdum usque adeo frigida & infirma est, ut nulla res efficacius errorem in animos infillat, quàm ejusmodi refutatio. Hinc cum Sibrandus Lubbertus Socini librum de Servatore edidisset integrum, addidit proluxa responsione, Vir Clar. Joan. Druſius ipſius collega hoc factum sanè quàm ægerimè tulit, scriptique ejus libri editione, & parum accuratâ refutatione, plures ad Socinianismum brevi spatio temporis adductos, quàm omnibus Socinianorum libris, qui multis retrò annis exstitissent. Constat mihi ex relatu viri cujuscumque & docti, & pii, & à Socinianismo alieni, D. Gomarus

(at quales virum!) olim in Academia Leidensi prælegentes, argumenta quædam Socini refutasse; sed ita infelicitè, ut multò facturus fuisset satius, si ea penitus intacta reliquisset. Quod idem affirmare possis de plerisque scriptoribus hodiernis, qui ex Socini refutatione student inclarescere, magnamque nomen (imperitiæ credo suæ) ad posteros transmittere, cum passim paucas rationes, & multa convicia, velut de plauſtro, in adversarios congerant. Junium tamen, Placeum, aliisque his similes semper excipio, qui non maledictis, sed ut Theologos decuit, argumentis Socinum oppugnant (108). --- The methods taken to suppress the Socinian sect and their writings, by burning or answering their books, was so far from succeeding, that thereby their numbers were more increased, and their books became more known and sought after. That after the magistrates of Amsterdam had ordered the books of Crellius and Volckelii de vera religione to be burnt publicly, Mareſius began to reprint them, and had published two parts. That there was no doubt that example would be followed by others of the Reformed. That when Sibrandus Lubbertus had published the entire book of Socinus de Servatore, together with a long confutation, the famous Joannes Druſius, his colleague, was exceedingly displeased, and wrote to him, that by his publishing that book, and his insufficient answer, more people had been turned to Socinianism, than for many years past. That a certain learned and pious person, who also was aversè from Socinianism, had told him, that Gomarus, formerly a Professor of Divinity in the university of Leyden, had endeavored to refute some of the arguments of Socinus, but so unhappily, that he had done much better not to attempt it. And, finally, that the like might be said of most of the writers at that time, who thought to transmit their names to posterity by refuting Socinus; who may indeed be famous (or rather infamous) for using reproaches instead of arguments. But that Junius, Placeus, and others like them, who opposed to the Socinians not foul language but strong arguments, as it became Divines, were always to be excepted. See also the preface which Christian Hartfoecker (109) hath prefixed to this letter. Druſius, who is there quoted on the same account, is styled doctissimus & orthodoxus, most learned and most orthodox.

(108) Arnould Poelenburg, in Epistola ad C. H. thes ii, Christianum Hartfoeckerum, pag. 59, apud Crenium, ibid. pag. 122.

I leave my reader to judge of all this, and content myself to observe in general, that a slight refutation of a book, does only serve the more to recommend it. Mezerai has said the same thing many years ago. 'Du Pleſſis Mornai . . . had written a large volume against the Mafes: the importance of the subject, the quality of the author, the politeness of his stile, and strength which appeared in his arguments, and the authorities taken from the Fathers, to the number upwards of four thousand, had acquired him a great reputation; and it had been still heightened by the weak attacks of all who had attempted to refute him (110).'

(109) He was minister of the Arminians at Rotterdam, and is the father of Mr Hartfoecker the Philosopher.

(110) Mezerai, Abrégé Chron. Tom. vi, at the year 1600, pag. m. 223.

Others have observed that nothing is more pernicious than to use bad arguments against impious persons (111). The author of Religio Medici observes (112) that a man who would confirm himself in his opinions ought to dispute with such as are not well able to defend themselves, and that every one is not qualified to maintain the truth, there being such as know not the first principles, and that suffer themselves to be led by a preposterous zeal. They give occasion to the erroneous to attack some truths, which weak defenders are not able to support. Observe what St Augustine (113) acknowledges concerning disputes wherein he triumphed over the orthodox. It must not be forgot, that the most understanding authors choose rather to be silent than to attack a book which they find too hard. In this respect they take that course, which a great Politician would have to be pursued, when abuses are so confirmed by long custom, that a magistrate who would attempt a reformation, would but discover his own want of power, and indiscreetly expose his authority (114). These things were taken into consideration by Father Paul, when he was desired to write against the Squittinio della Libertà Pnera (115).

(111) Religio Medici, §. vi, pag. m. 36.

(112) See the remark [D] of his article.

(113) Omittere potius prævidua & adulta vitia quam hoc adsequi ut palam fieret quibus flagitiis impares essemus. Tiberius, apud Tacitum, Annal. lib. iii, cap. liii. See in the remark [L] of the article NESTORIUS, the application I have made of this passage of Tacitus.

(114) See the Abbé de St Real, pag. m. 37, of the Conjuraton des Espagnols contre Venise.

Nevertheless I think, that this assertion, It is better to give no answer at all to a dangerous book than a bad one, admits of a distinction; it is better, I say, with with regard to those, who, laying aside prejudice, compare the objections and their answers, and who attentively consider every thing. But good souls, pious, and easy to be satisfied in matters which they believe, are much more scandalized with no answer than a weak one. They do not readily discern when an answer is insufficient: they always find some occasion to triumph; for there is no refutation so pitiful as not to discover some defects in the book of an adversary. These observations, I own, will signify little, and will be no decision of the principal question: but, however, they will please, and give satisfaction by an idea of superiority, to the prepossessed readers, and such as compare not one whole book to another whole book.

For the rest, the quotation from Mezerai brings to my memory what hath been said of the famous Count de Tilly, that he often acquired honour, partly by his own good conduct, and partly by the bad conduct of those he had to do with (116). He is not the only person of whom this may be said, Cæsar observed that Pompey, by a very singular good fortune, had acquired the surname of Great, for having vanquished some people that knew nothing of war (117). It hath been said of some princes that they were great by their own virtues, and by the evil qualities of others, magni sui virtutibus & vitiiis aliorum.

[P] The treatise de Autoritate S. Scripture, which Vorstius caused to be reprinted at Steinfurt in the year 1611, in 8vo, with some additions, is a work of Faustus Socinus, who published it in the year 1588, under the name of Dominicus Lopez Societatis Jesu. They put in the title that it was printed at Sevil, Hispali ex officina Lazari Ferrerii. This work was printed in French at Basil without the author's name in the year 1592. In the advertisement of the Bookfeller it is said that the Divines of Basil had approved it after a careful examination, and that they had only disallowed three places, the censure whereof was inserted (118). The care of Vorstius to procure a new edition of it was used as a proof of his Socinianism. It cannot be denied that the doctrine of Socinus is to be found in that book; but it is otherwise full of very good proofs of the truth of the Christian Religion.

(117) See Apian, de Bello Civili, lib. ii, pag. m. 793; and Suetonius, in Cæfare, cap. xxxv.

(118) See the preface to the edition of Steinfurt.

(a) See Mr de la Loubere, Relation de Siam, Tom. i, ch. xxii, num. 4, 5, pag. m. 500, 501.

SOMMONA-CODOM. So the Siamese call a certain extraordinary man, whom they think to have attained to the supreme felicity (a). I mention him only to have an opportunity of examining a very subtle objection which Mr du Rondel proposed to me [A] against what I have said in the article of Lucretius (b), that the belief of GOD's existence without the belief of a providence, cannot be an inducement to virtue.

(b) At the end of the remark [K], of the article LUCRETIUS, the Philosopher.

Father

[A] I mention him only to have an opportunity of examining an objection . . . which Mr du Rondel proposed to me. Mr du Rondel having read what I have said at the end of the remark [I], in the article of Lucretius, was pleased to write to me, that he thought it would be opposed both by examples and arguments. For in the first place, at Siam, and in other countries, where they believe in Sommona-Codom, it is an undoubted doctrine that this God concerns himself with nothing in his Nireupan, and suffers every thing upon earth to take its own course; and yet they pray to him, call upon him, and use all their endeavours to imitate him in the practice of virtue. See the first tome of Mr de la Loubere's relation. But in the second place, supposing there was no Sommona-Codom, nor any other god in this world, the bare speaking of the gods, and annexing to those ideas all the beauty of morals, would induce many people to aspire to that degree of glory (1). Being under a necessity of laying aside a great many things till another time, I am forced, to my great grief, to suppress the sequel of Mr du Rondel's fine letter; but I shall give the substance of it in these few words: he in a lively manner sets forth the power of admiration, and shews by great examples, that the bare desire of imitating an excellent model, has induced men to very difficult actions (2).

(1) A Letter of Mr du Rondel, of the 28th of January, 1696.

(2) See the answer to the second part of the objection, below.

(3) La Loubere, Relation de Siam, Tom. i, ch. xxiv, pag. m. 533-534.

I. I shall answer first the objection he grounds upon the conduct of the Siamese; and the better to clear the matter, I shall first of all set down the words of the Historian. 'Sommona-Codom ordered, before he died, that statues and temples should be consecrated to him, and since his death he is in that state of rest, which they express by the word Nireupan. It is not a place, but a manner of being; for, say they, to speak properly, Sommona-Codom is no where, and enjoys no felicity: he has no power, and is not in a condition to do men either good or harm: the Portuguese call it annihilation. Nevertheless, the Siamese believe on the other side, that Sommona-Codom is happy, they put up prayers to him, and ask him whatever they want: whether it be that their doctrine is inconsistent with itself, or that they carry their worship beyond their doctrine: but in whatever sense they ascribe a power to Sommona-Codom, they are agreed in this, that he has no power, but over the Siamese, and does not concern himself with nations, that worship other men than him (3).' By this it plainly appears, that the Siamese speak inconsistently of their Sommona-Codom. They say that he enjoys no felicity; and, on the other hand, they think he is happy. One may therefore believe, that though they say he has no power, they take him to be very powerful: and therefore, it is no wonder if they pray to him; their notions are so confused, that they allow them to affirm contradictory things of one and the same object. When they consider it in a certain sense, they say one thing of it, and when they consider it in another sense, they deny it. Their notions are different from their inward sentiments, which is the reason why their theory does not agree with their practice: however it be, we ought to believe that they do not invoke Sommona-Codom, as a Being to which they ascribe no power, and which minds nothing, but as a Being in which they acknowledge some power in some respects, by virtue of an inward sentiment, which commonly has a greater influence upon people, than the clear doctrines of speculative men. The Historian does clearly insinuate, that they ascribe some power to him; in whatever sense, says he, they ascribe it to him, they are agreed in this, that he has no power but over the Siamese. This is my first remark, to which I add this observation. They are fully persuaded that some things lead the soul to an eternal happiness or misery, and that whatever they can do in the honour of Sommona-Codom is fine, praise-worthy, just, and proper to make one attain to the supreme good. And therefore, though they should teach constantly, and without any appearance of contradiction, that he concerns himself with nothing, that he has no power, and does not hear the prayers put up to him, yet they would apply themselves to him in their necessity, and practise such virtues as he was pleased with; for it must, in their opinion, be the way to the supreme felicity. And therefore, I say, that their devotion and their practical morality are not contrary to what I advance; for they believe both an existence and a providence. It is true, they ascribe no providence to Sommona-Codom; but it is sufficient for my purpose, that they attribute it to something else, from which they expect to be rewarded for their good works. They have lost the idea of GOD, as well as the Chinese: but they have nevertheless preserved that antient maxim according to which virtue is to be rewarded, and vice to be punished (4). They ascribe therefore that distributive Justice to a blind fatality. It is from this fatality they expect their happiness, if they live virtuously; and they are persuaded it will reward them for the honours paid to Sommona-Codom. To have a right notion of their impious doctrine, one needs only consider the opinions of the Literati among the Chinese: they are those, who have degrees of literature, and the only men who have a share in the government. They are grown altogether impious, and though they have not altered the language of their predecessors, yet have made the soul of the heavens, and all other souls, to be I know not what aerial substances, destitute of intelligence: and they have established a blind fatality, as the only judge of men's actions.

distributed with some good

(4) Id. Ibid. ch. xxiii, num. 15, pag. 515.

Father Tachard relates several things of this Sommona-Codom, whom he calls Sommonokbodom. He is, says he (c), the god whom the Siamefe worship at this time. They suppose he was born a god by his own virtue, and that immediately after his birth, without any master to instruct him, he acquired, by a bare intuition of his mind, a perfect knowledge of whatever concerns Heaven and Earth, Paradise and Hell, and of the most impenetrable secrets of nature; that he remembered at the same time, whatever he had done in all the several lives he had lived; and that after he had taught those morid with god actions, that does, as they believe, what an omnipotent and most wise justice could do. They pretend that it is a thing consonant to the principles of nature, that virtue should be always attended with happiness, and vice with misery, by a certain, though unknown, sympathy between virtue and happiness, and between vice and misery (5). Thus the Chinese and Siamefe very much differ from Epicurus: they deny the existence of God, and acknowledge a providence (6), whereas Epicurus rejected a providence, and acknowledged the existence of a Deity. It is not therefore strange that the Siamefe should invoke Sommona-Codom, and endeavour to imitate his virtuous life; but one might wonder at Epicurus, if he had prayed to Jupiter, and laid a great constraint upon himself to honour the gods; for he was persuaded that his prayers and endeavours would be of no use to him. On the contrary, the Siamefe believe that their worship of the hero will bring them an ample reward. The blind fatality, the natural laws and sympathies they acknowledge between virtue and happiness, and between vice and misery, are as powerful a motive and as great a curb as the belief of a knowing providence.

(c) Tachard, Voyage de Siam, book vii, p. 205, Dutch Edit.

(5) Id. ibid. mem. 14. p. 514.

(6) That is, a law whereby evil is punished, and virtue rewarded.

blind fatal

THAT the Doctrine of a natural and blind connexion between virtue and happiness, and between vice and misery, would have a greater influence on men than the Christian doctrine, concerning providence.

(7) That is, without considering the operation of the Divine Grace, upon souls predestinated.

(8) Compare with this the xviiith chapter of Ezekiel.

I go farther still, and I say that according to the course of nature (7), that belief has not so great an influence as the opinion of the Siamefe. A natural connexion between virtue and happiness, and between vice and misery, would be more proper to act upon a mercenary mind, than the persuasion of the orthodox, without the divine grace. That connexion would never fail to produce its full and perfect effect, since it would not be submitted to a cause, which thinks fit sometimes to derogate from its laws, to extend or confine them, and to hasten or retard the execution of them, in a word, to dispose of them according to its designs and various circumstances. That connexion, for that very reason that it were only a blind fatality, would afford good men a perfect certainty of a quick reward, and fill the wicked with a necessary fear of a quick punishment. But by supposing a providence, which disposes of all things according to its will, and with a wisdom, all the designs of which we do not comprehend, one cannot be certain that a good action will be profitable, or a bad one detrimental; for one may think, in each particular juncture, that it is one of the cases, wherein God is not pleased to follow the general law of rewarding good actions, or that of punishing evil ones. Christians are agreed that God suspends the execution of those laws as long as he thinks fit. They even say, that an old sinner, who has enjoyed all the pleasures of life, will be eternally happy, provided that on his death-bed he perform one act of true repentance; and that whoever in his old age departs from the way of virtue, tho' he hath pursued it for a long time through many troubles, will be eternally damned (8). Doubtless this may be the reason why the fear of God's judgments, or the hope of his rewards, make no great impression upon worldly people. If there was an indissoluble connexion between devoutly asking a good thing of God, and obtaining it, none could doubt of the efficacy of a devout prayer; but, according to the doctrine of divines about that part of Divine worship, none can be sure that the most earnest and devout prayers of a mother for the recovery or conversion of her son, or for the deliverance of her husband unjustly imprisoned, will be heard. Those, who have heard some Divines preach about the efficacy of prayer, or who have read some books upon that subject, know that the proofs alleged and grounded either upon arguments or examples, are very strong and cogent: however, the difficulties must be examined at last. Preachers do not conclude without supposing that it will be asked, How comes it that some things are not obtained tho' they be asked with faith, and for the greatest glory of God? Their answer is, That God refuses us what we asked of him upon several occasions, in order to try us, or humble us more and more, or because he knows that the favours we pray for would be prejudicial to us, and because our wants, and what concerns his glory, are better known to him than to us. There is no case in which every body may not judge that his prayers may not be granted thro' one of those motives; hence it is that the hope of being heard is always mixed with great uncertainty, and that many people grow remiss in the practice of prayer, or only ask of God the general grace of acquiescing in his will. Men would act quite otherwise, were they persuaded that there is a necessary connexion between a devout prayer, and the obtaining of what is prayed for; they would apply themselves to providence in all their wants, as they come near a fire, when they are troubled with cold. And therefore since the Siamefe are persuaded that there is a fatal, immutable, and necessary connexion between virtue and happiness, and between vice and misery, that doctrine should be a more powerful inducement to virtue among them, than religion is in other countries. They should apply themselves to virtue in order to be happy, as they have recourse to food, when they are hungry; and they should depart from vice to avoid misery, as they keep off from the fire when they are afraid of being burnt. But then their morals would be wholly mercenary. The pure notions of honesty would not be their principle. I must observe, by the by, that it is very strange they should believe what is told of them concerning that fatal connexion. Is there no man among them that grows rich by unlawful means, or is poor without being accounted vicious, or that is wounded by endeavouring to save another man's life? I fancy, if they were pressed hard upon this head, they would come off with some Stoical notions, viz: that diseases, vexation, and poverty, are no evils, and that riches, pleasure, and health, are not good things (9). I could easily believe that the common people do not follow that opinion of a natural sympathy between virtue and happiness, and between vice and misery; and that it is only a doctrine of their men of letters, who have denied a providence, and nevertheless were sensible that it is an useful thing to preserve the common opinion concerning rewards and punishments.

imertu

fatal connexion

(9) Compare what is said before remark [X] of the article SADUCEES.

II. I come now to examine the other part of the objection. I grant, that a man may admire and honour an object without expecting any reward for it, besides the satisfaction of doing justice to merit; but I cannot grant that any man will invoke it against his inclinations, and offer sacrifices to it in order to please it, and appease its anger, if he be well persuaded, 1. That it concerns itself with nothing; takes care of nothing; that the ill lives of men do not displease it, and that their good lives are not acceptable to it. 2. That there is no other Being that can reward the honours paid to that Being, or punish men for indulging their passions. This is the ground of the maxim I have advanced, that the belief of the existence of GOD without the belief of a providence, cannot be an inducement to virtue, nor a curb to vice. But, will some say, May not men full of admiration for an excellent, holy, and happy being, that is honoured all over the world, propose it to themselves as the model of their lives, and resist their bad inclinations, and use their utmost endeavours to practise virtue in order to imitate it? I answer, they may do it, if they believe that this painful imitation will make them like that being, or procure them some other advantage of great value. But then their belief of the Divine existence will be attended with the belief of a providence: they will believe, either as the Siamefe and Chinese do, that nature has inseparably united, by a blind fatality, happiness with virtue, and misery with vice; and that the imitation of one Sommona-Codom will in time put them in a state like his; or they will believe that an intelligent legislator has designed rewards for those, who shall chuse the holy and happy life of the immortal gods for their pattern. At least,

WHETHER the admiration of an excellent Being, that can do neither good nor harm, may be of any use to make us virtuous.

VOL. V.

Z z

those great things, he left them in writing, that posterity might be benefitted by them. He says in those books, that being a god, he desired one day to manifest his divinity to men by some extraordinary prodigy (d). That immediately he found himself carried through the air on a throne shining with gold and precious stones, that came out of the earth in the very same place where he was; and that the angels at the same time coming down from Heaven paid him the honour and worship due to him (e). That ever since he aspired to be a god, he returned into the world five hundred and fifty times under different shapes; that in each new birth, he had always been the first, and as it were the prince of those animals under whose shapes he came into the world; that he had often given his life for his subjects, and that being an ape he delivered a town from a horrid monster which desolated it; that he had been a most potent king, and that seven days before he obtained the empire of the world, he removed, in imitation of a certain anchorite, with his wife and his two children, into remote solitudes, where he renounced the world and his passions (f) That he had gone all over the world teaching men what is good and evil, and the true religion, which he writ down to leave it to posterity. He had several disciples, who, in the quality of priests, were to imitate him in a most particular manner by wearing an habit like his, and observing the rules he prescribed to them, when at last he attained to the eighty second year of his age He was seized with a violent cholic of which he died. His soul ascended into the eighth Heaven [B]. We shall see below what is related of his brother [C].

least, they will hope that mankind will be so equitable as to admire their virtue, and to bestow glorious rewards upon it; and that, perhaps, some time or other they shall be deified. The glory of Miltiades had a great influence over Themistocles, tho' Themistocles expected nothing from Miltiades; I grant it: May not at this day the memory of the Alexanders and Cæsars have such a power over the passions of some men, as to make them undertake the most difficult things? And yet they are fully persuaded that those conquerors know not what passes upon earth, and can do neither good nor harm. I own all this; but did not Themistocles know that by imitating Miltiades, he would attain to the same glory he did? Could those who should now tread in the steps of Cæsar and Alexander, be ignorant that trophies, panegyrics, and the immortality of their name would be the price and glorious reward of their labours? And therefore all the examples of the power of admiration and imitation, that can be alleged, suppose the existence of a cause, which rewards the trouble of the admirer and the imitator; and consequently they are not contrary to my assertion. Here is another reflexion. The belief of the Divine existence, without a belief of a providence, ought not to be accounted an inducement to virtue, if whatever it can produce, may be produced by the mere idea of what is honest, and by the mere desire of being praised: but the mere idea of what is honest, and the mere desire of being praised, may produce whatever the admiration and imitation of the gods of Epicurus could effect. This is manifest if it be attentively considered. Therefore, &c. I would not take advantage of this, viz. That a follower of Epicurus could not flatter himself, that by imitating the virtues of the gods, he would be in time as happy as they were (10). That had been to no purpose, since Mr du Rondel does not suppose that Epicurus is also concerned in the objection. See the margin (11).

(10) Epicurus and his followers taught that the soul dies for ever with the body.

(11) I propose this only as a problem, which Mr du Rondel may examine, and I desire him to confute it as much as he will think fit, for the further instruction of my readers.

(12) Tachard, Voiege de Siam, book vi, pag. 275, Dutch Edit.

(13) Id. ibid. pag. 206.

(14) Id. ibid. pag. 208.

[B] His soul ascended into the eighth heaven. It is properly the paradise called Nyruppaam: the soul is no longer subject to pain and misery, and enjoys a perfect felicity; and therefore she will never be born again: this is what they call being annihilated. For they do not understand by that word the entire destruction of a thing, whereby it is reduced to nothing; but they only mean that it appears no longer upon earth, though it lives in heaven. As for his body it was burnt; and his bones, as they say, have been preserved to this present time. They are partly in the kingdom of Pegu, and partly in that of Siam. They ascribe a wonderful virtue to those bones, and affirm that they shine with a divine splendor (12). It may be inferred from these last words, that the worship which the Siamese pay to that god, is attended with the hopes of some advantage accruing from it.

[C] We shall see below what is related of his brother. His name was Thevathat (13). (14) He was always born anew with his brother Sommonokbodom, of the same kind with him; but always inferior in dignity, because Sommonokbodom was the prince of the animals, whose figure he assumed. But Thevathat, tho' he found means to form a new sect, in which he engaged several kings, and several nations, who followed him, to be his imitators. This occasioned a schism, which divided the world into two parts, and gave birth to two religions, whereas before there was but one. Some became disciples to Thevathat, and others to Sommonokbodom. Thevathat, tho' the younger brother, finding himself supported by so many princes, who had undertook to defend him, made use of open force, as well as treachery, to destroy his brother, and invented the most horrid calumnies to blast his reputation; but he did not succeed in his designs. Nay, he was overcome more than once, when, in order to confirm his followers in his doctrine, he durst contend with his brother, who should work the greatest miracles. His ambition made him wish to be a god; but not being truly one, he was ignorant of many things, whereof his brother had a perfect knowledge; and because his pride did not permit him to hear Sommonokbodom, he did not learn of him what passed in paradise and in hell, nor the doctrine of transmigration, nor the changes which had happened and were to happen in all ages. The Siamese (17) believe that the doctrine of Thevathat, as a source of schism and division, has produced seven other sects, which have a great affinity one with another.

(17) Thevathat having done so many injuries to his brother, without any respect for the rights of nature, and for the deity itself, it was just he should be punished for it. Accordingly the writings of the Siamese mention his punishment; and Sommonokbodom also says in those books, that being made a god, he saw his impious brother in the deepest part of hell. I saw him, says he, overwhelmed with evils, and groaning under the weight of his misery. He was in the eighth abode, that is, in the place where the greatest malefactors are tormented, where he expiated, by a horrid punishment, all the sins he had committed, especially the injuries he had done me. Afterwards, explaining the punishment he inflicted upon Thevathat, he says he was fastened to a cross with large nails (19), which piercing his hands and his feet, gave him violent pain; that he had a crown of thorns on his head, that his body was full of wounds, and to complete his misery, the infernal fire burnt him without consuming him. He was moved with compassion at the sight of such a dreadful spectacle; he forgot all the injuries his brother had

(15) This story seems to be derived from the History of Cais and Abel.

(16) Tachard, ubi supra, pag. 209.

(17) Id. ibid. pag. 211.

(18) Id. ibid. pag. 212, 213.

(19) This makes them believe that Jesus Christ is the same with Thevathat, and what confirms them most in that opinion (these are Father Tachard's words, ubi supra, book vi, pag. 214.) is that we worship the image of the crucified Saviour, which does perfectly represent the punishment inflicted upon Thevathat.

* had done him, and he could not see him in that condition without resolving to come to his assistance. In order to it, he proposed to him to adore these three words, Pphang, Thamang, Sangkhang: words sacred and mysterious, for which the Siamese have a profound veneration; the first whereof signifies God, the second the word of God, and the third the imitator of God; promising him, that if he would accept such reasonable and easy terms, he would deliver him from all the torments to which he was condemned. Thevathat consented to adore the two first words, but utterly refused to adore the third, because it signified priest, or imitator of God, protesting that priests were sinful men, who deserved no respect. It is for a punishment of such a pride that he is under sufferings to this day, and will suffer in hell for the space of many years.

Judge by this whether the Siamese can say, without contradicting themselves, that he is a god who has no power. Do they not acknowledge that he can deliver from the most horrid torments of hell those, who accept the conditions he proposes to them? If you answer me, that this concerns the time when he was not yet in the eighth heaven; I will reply, that the example of Thevathat may make them afraid of being miserable, if they do not conform to the good pleasure and to the rules prescribed to them by Somonokhodom; and consequently, their worship is not free from self-interest. They fancy (20) that the Christians are Thevathat's disciples (21), and they are so afraid of being thrown into hell with Thevathat, if they follow his doctrine, that they cannot be persuaded to embrace Christianity.

(20) Tachard, supra, book 4, pag. 209.
(21) Id. ibid., pag. 213.

SOPHRONIA, is the name that is given to a Roman lady, whom Eusebius commends for her courage and chastity. I cannot tell where they have found her name; for Eusebius does not name her either in the xivth chapter (a) of the viiith book of his Ecclesiastical History, or in the xxxivth chapter of the first book of Constantine's life. He only says that this lady was married to the governor of Rome, and that knowing that the soldiers whom Maxentius made use of to bring him the woman he intended to ravish, were already got into her house, with a permission extorted from her husband; she demanded a little time under pretence of dressing her self; and afterwards finding she was alone in her chamber, she thrust a sword into her breast, and shewed by this action, to that and the following ages, that nothing but Christian virtue is invincible and proof against death. This is Eusebius's account. He does not say that she asked her husband's leave, and GOD's pardon, for what she was going to do; nor that the Church has given a testimony of the truth of her martyrdom by the declaration of her holiness. They are meer glosses, which Moreri, being deceived by Charles Stephens [A], falsely ascribes to that Historian.

(a) Moreri quotes the 17th after Charles Stephens, and several other Dictionaries.

[A] Moreri, being deceived by Charles Stephens. The article of Sophronia not being very long in Charles Stephens, I shall set it down at length. 'Sophronia matrona Romana, altera Lucretia Christiana, cum vim Decii Principis videret se passuram, consentiente viro arrepto gladio seipsum transfixit, ac inter sanctas mulieres est relata. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 17. - - - Sophronia, a Roman lady, another Christian Lucretia, perceiving that, with her husband's consent, she was to be ravished by Decius, she stabbed herself with a sword, and was numbered amongst the holy women.' Moreri had from thence, that Sophronia is called the Christian Lucretia; which is one fault, for he gives too large an extent to the words of the Latin Dictionary. The words consentiente viro, which ought to be referred to passuram, and not to arrepto gladio, was a trap for Moreri; a comma ill placed, which made him believe that this lady did not kill herself without asking her husband's permission to do it, caused his mistake. Perhaps the comma signifies nothing to the matter; for if you put one next to passuram, and one next to viro, as Lloyd and Hofman do, the ambiguity will be the same. An exact and careful writer would have placed passuram next to viro, and then the reader would not have been uncertain. I need not take notice of the other mistakes. I shall only say, that Moreri has not transcribed all the mistakes of Charles Stephens; he has left out Decii Principis, and put the tyrant Maxentius in the room of Decius. Lloyd and Hofman have not corrected one syllable. I wonder Rivetus should say, that Eusebius tells us, that Sophronia having prayed to God upon her knees, as it were to sacrifice her chastity to JESUS CHRIST; killed herself in the presence of the tyrant Maxentius. Euseb. lib. 8. Historia refert de Sophronia prefati Romanæ urbis uxore quod cum animadverteret maritum metu mortis perterritum, prodidisse pudicitiam suam Maxentio Tyranno, cum prius defixis genibus Deum orasset, tanquam pudicitiam suam Christo immolaturam, petens coram eo ferro transfixisse (1). From whence I learn that he is also one of those, who quote from the modern writers, without consulting the originals. I had a better opinion of him. I was not surprised that Ravius Textor in his Officina, and Decimator in his Sylva Vocabulorum, had committed the same faults with Charles Stephens. Those authors did not think of verifying their quotations. Decimator seems to me more exact than all the rest as to the allusion to Lucretia; he does not say, as Moreri does, that Sophronia was called the Christian Lucretia; but that she might justly be called so: Castitatis nomine celebris, ita ut altera Lucretia Christiana non immerito dici possit.

(1) Andr. Rivet, in Gens. Exercit. lxxiii, Oper. Tom. 1, pag. 281. I have referred coram eo to Maxentius; perhaps it should be referred to maritus. Rivetus has committed a solecism in this place.

SORANUS (QUINTUS VALERIUS) flourished in the VIIth century of Rome (a). He was esteemed for his eloquence, but much more for his learning. He was the most learned man, that had been seen among the Latin authors. Though he was born near Rome (b), he had the country pronunciation [A], which doubtless did some prejudice to his eloquence. He had observed in his works a method, which Pliny followed

(a) See the remark [A], citation (a).

(b) See the same remark, citat. (4).

[A] The most learned man he had the country pronunciation.] The proof of all this is to be found in the IIId book of Oratore; where Cicero says, that the most agreeable pronunciation of the Greek tongue was that of the Athenians (1). They spoke better without any learning, than the most learned Asiatics. This is not to be understood as if their words had been better placed; it concerns only the tone of their voice, and their accent. Cicero says the same to the praise of the city of Rome: he observes that the most ignorant Roman surpassed in that respect the learned Soranus; learned, did I say, I should rather call him the most learned man of that time. Hanc dico suavitatem, quæ exit ex ore, quæ quidem ut apud Græcos Atticorum, sic in latino sermone hujus est urbis maxime propria Nostri minus student literis quam Latini, tamen ex istis quos nostis; urbanis, in quibus minimum est literarum, nemo est quin literatissimum togatorum omnium Q. Valerium Soranum lenitate vocis, atque ipso oris pressu facile vincat (2). These words plainly insinuate that Soranus was then living; and therefore I had reason to say, that he flourished in the VIIth century of Rome; for Cicero supposes that the discourses, which make up his work de Oratore, were made in the year 662.

(2) Id. ib.

662. Many believe that this Soranus was a friend of Cicero, and understand the following passage of him : Q. & D. Valerii Sorani, vicini & familiares mei non tam in dicendo admirabiles, quam docti & grævis literis & latinis (3). What goes before, shews that those two Soranus's were not born at Rome, but in the Latium. I believe they were natives of Sora, a town of that country according to Pliny and Pto-

(3) Cícero, in Bruto, pag. m.
283.

(4) See Corradus, in Brutum Ciceronis, pag. 284.

(5) Plinius, in Praefat. in fine.

(6) Harduin. in hunc locum Plinij.

(7) Varro de Lingua Latina,
lib. vi, pag. m.
71.

(8) Aulus Gellius, lib. ii, cap. x.

(9) Plinius, lib.
iii, cap. v, pa-
m. 330, 331.

(10) See the passage of Macbius in the remark [E].

(11) Valerius
denique Soranus quod contra indictum id eloqausus foret ob meritum profu-næ vocis neci-
tum. Solin. c.
i, pag. 1.

(12) Servius,
lib. i, Georg
ver. 499.

(13) Vives in August. de C vitate Dei, l.
vii, cap. ix.

(14) Plut. Quæst. Rom.
pag. 278.

[B] A method which Pliny followed.] These are his words in his preface to Titus son of Vespasian: 'Quia occupationibus tuis publico bono parcendum erat, quod singulis continenter libris huic epistolæ subijunxi: summæque cura, ne per aliquos eos haberet, operam dedi. Tu per hoc & aliis præstabis nec perlegant: sed ut quicque desideraverit aliquid, id tantum querat & sciat quo loco inveniat. Hoc ante me fecit in litteris nostris Valerius Soranus, in quibus libris quos ἐπιστολῶν inscripsit (5). - - Because your time was to be saved for the public good, I have subjoined to this epistle the contents of each book, and endeavoured to spare you the pains of reading them over. And thereby others may by you be benefited; not being obliged to read them over: but as any thing is wanted, to look only for that, and know where to find it. This was done before me, by Valerius Soranus, in the books which he intitled, ἐπιστολῶν.' I must not forget the note of Father Hardouin: Epistides scripserat, bonæst, ut Turnebus quidem interpretatur, de Grammaticæ libris: tanquam de mysteriis literarum & doctrinæ. Erat enim ἐπιστολῆς qui ad inspicendam sacra occultâ ad mittebant (6). It is certain our Soranus wrote some grammatical books. See Varro (7), and Aulus Gellius (8).

[C] To divulge a mystery . . . that he was punished with death upon that account.] Pliny does not say in express terms that Soranus divulged the name of the tutelal god of Rome; but it may be inferred from his words; Cuius (Romæ) nomen alterum dicere arcanum ceremoniarum nefas habetur: optimaque & salutaris fiducia aboluit enunciatum Valerius Soranus luitque max pœne

(9). He says the city of Rome had two names : one that was known to every body ; and the other so mysterious that religion did not permit it should be revealed ; and that Soranus having divulged it, was immediately punished for it. It is not to be doubted, but that the mysterious name was the same with that of the tutelary god of the town, or at least, that it was looked upon as a thing that protected it (10). Solinus, who transcribed

Pliny, took the liberty to specify the punishment inflicted upon Soranus for his profanation: he says that he was condemned to death (11); but speaks only of the unknown and mysterious name of the city, and does not say it was the name of the tutelal god of Rome. I am going to quote two authors, who are more particular upon this point, and leave us not to the trouble of making inferences: Pecrum nomen ejus numinis qui urbi Romae praesit, firi carcerem lege prohibetur, quod ausus quidam tribunus plebis evnitiare, in crucem levatus est (12). This is all that I have to say.

or Soranus was tribune of the people; and that was crucified (13). They are obliged to add something of their own, for Servius names no body. The other passage, which I am to quote, is out of Plutarch διὰ τὸν Θωδῆν ἐκείνον ὁ καλίστα τὸν Ῥώμιον ζῆν προσέειπε καὶ φυλάττειν, εἴτε ἐν ἀρχῇ Σίγκια, καὶ ἔπειτα ἀπείρηται καὶ ζῆτει καὶ μαρτυρῇ; ταῦτ' ἐν τῇ ἀπορίᾳ ἐξήλθοις σιδημαίνων, ἰσορροπῇ Ὀυαλέων Σωκράτη λίσσας κακῶς διὰ τὸ ζῆσειν. Cur tutelam Romæ Deum, mafne fit an femina, dicere aut ere, ejusque nomen efferre nefas est? quod quidem interdictum à superstitione repetunt, narrantes V.
 rium Soranum tribu-

(14). - - - Why is it a crime to speak or ask, whether the tutelary god of Rome is male or female, and to pronounce his name? Which prohibition some ascribe to superstition, saying that Soranus miserably perished for disobedience.

ing his name. Note, that according to Plutarch, it was not allowed to inquire into the sex or the name of the tutelal god of Rome. Note also, that some authors find something more mysterious in Soranus's punishment; for they say, that as soon as he uttered that concealed name, he fell dead upon the place. They affirm (15) that this is to be found in Pliny, and several other writers. It is false that Pliny says so. We shall see in the remark [D] that, perhaps, Soranus's indifference was not the occasion of his death. Finally, take notice of a great mistake in Gyraldus. Having said, 1, (16) That Pliny and Solinus relate that Valerius Soranus was condemned to death for being so bold as to pronounce the occult name of Rome (17) ; 2, That Sempronius (18) wrote the same thing; he adds, that others affirm, that this Soranus was crucified, which occasioned the worship of the goddess Angerona, the patroness of Silence. Alii in crucem sublatum tradunt, & PROPTEREA cultum Deam Angeronam silentii præfident (19). Servius is the only author who mentions the crucifixion of that impious person who divulged that mystery; but neither he nor any other, hath observed that this punishment gave occasion to the worship of the goddess Angerona. It plainly appears from Pliny that this was a very ancient worship, grounded upon the mystery of the occult name of Rome. Exemplum religionis: ANTIQVÆ ob hoc maxime silentium instituta. Namque Diva Angerona, &c (20). Solinus expresses himself more clearly still: Inter ANTIQVISSIMAS sane res religionis Sacellum colitur Angerona (21). There is hardly any illusion more dangerous than that of the particle termed casualis by the Grammarians. They have occasioned horrid blunders in the most learned compilers and when a man goes about to give a different turn to what he transcribes, and to shorten it as much as he can, he will be apt to perplex and confound himself, unless he be very attentive. The learned Gyraldus was mistaken for want of duly considering Pliny's words.

[D] Perhaps he ought not to be distinguished from that Quintus Valerius, whom Pompey caused to be put to death. If I am not mistaken, Plutarch is the only author who informs us of this particular. He saw that Pompey being well informed of that man's leading, took him aside, and walked with him. Noting that Pompey was then in Sicily, and that very day judging the criminals, that is, those of Marius's party who were to be put to death. When he saw Quintus Valerius brought to the tribunal, he rose up to take course with him in private; but as soon as he knew of him what he desired to know, he ordered him to be killed. Plutarch relates this only upon the credit of author, whom he mistrusts as to those things which concerned the friends or enemies of Cæsar (2 Ταῖς δὲ Ὅπτις, ὁ Καίσαρος ἑταῖρος, πρὸς πάν-τας φησὶ καὶ Κούριον Οὐαλερίον συγκαταριθμεῖται. ἐπιστάμενον γὰρ ὡς ἐστὶ φιλοπόνητος καὶ φιλομαθὴς ἐν ὀλίγοις ὁ Οὐαλερίος, ὡς ἦν πρὸς αὐτὸν, ἐπιστάμενον καὶ συμπεριστατικὸν αὐτὸν καὶ πυνδόμενον ἂν ἔχοντος καὶ μαζὸν ἄσας ἐν τοῖς ὑπηρεταῖς ἐνδὺς ἀνελὼν ἀπαγαγόντος. Addit C. Oppius Cæsaris familiaris secum Pompetiæ etiam in V. Valerium extitisse: quum enim sciret bunitatis & literarum inter paucos studiosum Valerium, ædus ad ipsum est, defussisse illum & deambum-per, ubi accepit & didicit ab eo quæ cuperet, imper-hibitoris ut illud asserent eam & interficiat, imper-

MAY NOT one suppose, 1, That it was upon this o-fession that our Soranus divulged the unknown name the city of Rome? 2, That Oppius omitted this ticular, not to afford a pretence to excuse Pompe-For if it might have been alleged that Soranus disvealed to him such a secret, he who caused him to put to death might have been cleared, and his severmight have been looked upon as an act of devotion and a holy zeal against prophane men. I affirm thing, and leave it to the judgement of the Cr

(15) Hermolae apud Gyraldum de Poëtis, Dis-
logo vi, p. 192.
Edit. Lugd.
1606.

(16) Gyraldus,
Poët. Historia.
Dial. iv, pag.
192.

(17) Pliny does not say so.

(18) It were to be wished that Gyraldus had more clearly pressed what Sempronius here means; for Sempronius Tudinus, and Sempronius Afellius, who wrote books lived before Valerius Soranus mentioned by Cero.

; (19) Gyalda
ubi supra.

(20) Plin. lib.
cap. v, pag.
221.

(21) Solin.

(22). ὅταν περὶ Καίσαρος λαμῖν ἡ λων διακοταί, σφῶ δαί τις μετὰ εἰας. Cx Oppio qui Cæsarib vel amicis non tempe jungenda est. Plut Pompeio, 623. E.

par- Pompeio
672 E.

solidity in it [E]. It appears from two verses of Soranus, which are still extant, that he believed that God is the immanent cause of all things. That opinion does not differ from

I shall only say, that it is not to be imagined that Pompey had a mind to learn of him some political secrets, and some intrigues of Marius; for his desire of having a private discourse with him, was only grounded upon his knowing that he was a man of great learning. Plutarch observes it in express words. Now it is certain that the knowledge of the Belles Lettres, and the study of Antiquity enabled Soranus to discover to Pompey a secret of religion, an unknown law, an old ceremony; but not the most private intrigues of Marius's factions. On the other side, it is not improbable that, as things stood then, Pompey was willing to know the occult name of Rome. His party, which was that of Sylla, had lately taken that town. Was Pompey sure that the other party would never conquer it again? Did not Pompey see that the Republic would be exposed to civil wars? Was he not sensible of his own ambition? Could he think that the discovery of the name of the tutelar god would be of no use to him? However it be, if Quintus Valerius in Plutarch, and Soranus in Pliny are one and the same man, which is very likely, there is little reason to say that the profane indiscretion of the man, who divulged the unknown name of Rome, was immediately punished; for, according to Plutarch, he was punished as one of Marius's accomplices. It is not true that Plutarch calls him a Philosopher (24). Ludovicus Vives (25), Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hofman, are in the wrong to say so. Note, that Florus reckons the death of the Prætor Soranus among the cruel actions of Sylla's party. Piget post hæc referre, says he (26), ludibrio habita fata Carbonis, fata Sorani prætoris, &c. This might be of some use to those, who would prove that our Soranus was Prætor, and the same Valerius whom Pompey caused to be put to death.

[E] The reason why the Romans concealed the name of their tutelar god, has little solidity in it. They had called forth, on some occasions, the tutelar gods of other towns, and were afraid the like would be done to them. This was the reason why they were not willing that the name of their tutelar deity should be known. They hoped the ignorance of that name would secure his protection to them, as the Tyrians believed they might keep their gods from removing by loading them with chains. This is one of Plutarch's answers to the question above-mentioned (27). Πότερον, ὡς τῶν Ῥωμαίων τινὲς ἰσχυροῦσιν, ἐκλήσεις εἰσὶ καὶ γυνταίαι θεῶν; αἱς νομίζονται καὶ αὐτοὶ θεῶς τινὰς ἐκκεκλησάσαι παρὰ τῶν πολεμίων, καὶ μετὰ τὴν πόλιν αὐτῶν, ἐφοβῶντο τὸ αὐτὸ παθεῖν ὡς ἑτέρον; ὥστερ ἐν τούτοις δεσμεύει ἀγῶμασι λύνεσθαι περιεκαλεῖν, ἔτεροι δὲ αἰεὶ ἐν ἑσπέρῳ ἐπὶ λατρίᾳ ἢ καθαρμῶν τινα περὶ μυστηρίων, ὥτως ὅσοι Ῥωμαῖοι τὸ ἀρρῆτον καὶ τὸ ἀγῶμα ἀσφαλεστέον εἶναι θεῶ καὶ θεσποτάτην ὀρεῖν. An quia, ut nonnulli rerum Romanarum scriptores tradunt, carmina quædam sunt & præstigiæ quibus dii eliciuntur: quibus usi Romani cum putarent se quosdam hostium deos ad se traduxisse, covere vulerunt ne idem sibi ab aliis eveniret? Itaque sicut Tyrii (28)

(28) See Quintus Curtius, lib. iv, cap. iv, num. 22, & ibi Frischmuller.

(29) Plin. lib. xlviii, cap. ii, pag. 559, 560.

is (30), that every town is under the protection of a god, and that the Romans perceiving that it was likely the towns they besieged, would be obliged to surrender, called forth their tutelar gods, whether they believed they could not take a town without it, or because they thought it an impious thing to make the gods prisoners. The other is, that for these reasons they concealed the name of the tutelar god of Rome, and the Latin name of that town. He adds, that the name of that deity was nevertheless seen in the books of some Antients: It is true they mentioned it differently; but as for the occult name of Rome, it was never known, no not to the most learned men; for the Romans took an effectual care to prevent their being treated as they had treated others, by calling forth the gods who protected them. Propterea ipsi Romani & deum in cuius tutela urbi Roma est ut ipsius orbis Latinum nomen ignotum esse voluerunt, sed dei quidem nomen nonnullis antiquorum licet inter se lib. iii, cap. ix, diffidentium libris insitum: & ideo vetusta persequentibus quidquid de hoc putatur innuit . . . Ipsius vero urbis nomen etiam doctissimis ignotum est: carentibus Romanis ne quod sepe adversus urbes hostium fecisse se noverant, idem ipsi quoque hostili evocatione paterentur, si tutelæ suæ nomen divulgaretur (31). I wonder Macrobius did not know what Pliny and Plutarch relate of Soranus. He knew it not, since he says the mysterious name of Rome was always unknown even to the most learned men. I wonder also at his distinction between the tutelar god of Rome, and the concealed name of that city, to which he ascribes likewise the same protection. But I wonder more still, that having said what I have just now mentioned, he should give us the formulæ of calling forth tutelar gods; for it appears by that formulæ that there was no necessity to know the name or the sex of the deities who protected a town. They called them forth without naming them, and with this clause, Whether you be a god or a goddess. Est autem carmen huiusmodi, quo dii evocantur cum oppugnatione civitas cingitur. SI. DEUS. SI. DEA. EST. CUI. POPULUS. CIVITAS. QUE. KARTHAGINIENSIS. EST. IN. TUTELA. TE. QUE. MAXIME. ILLE. QUI. URBIS. HUIUS. POPOLI. QUE. TUTELAM. RECEPISTI. PRECOR. VENEROR. QUE. VENIAM. QUE. A. VOBIS. PETO. UT. VOS. POPULUM. CIVITATEM. QUE. KARTHAGINENSEM. DESERATIS. LOCA. TEMPLA. SACRA. URBEM. QUE. EORUM. RELINQUATIS. ABSQUE. HIS. ABSTATIS. &c (32). Was not

I in the right to say that the reason why the Romans kept the name of their tutelar god secret, was not a solid one? They knew not the names, nor even the sex of the tutelar gods they called forth, and yet they called them forth; and therefore, what could it avail them that their enemies should not know the name of the god who was the protector of Rome, or the true name of that city? Could this prevent practising against the Romans what they had done against other towns? Macrobius in particular is less excusable than the other writers, since, in the very same page where he speaks as they do, he recites a formulæ of evocation, which confutes what he says. It is most certain that the conditional particle si Deus, si Dea, undeniably proves that they knew not the name of the god whom they called forth; for Varro affirms that they used those words, when they were afraid of mistaking the name of one deity for that of another. They made use of them when they offered sacrifices upon occasion of an earthquake; because they knew not the name of the god, who was the cause of such a calamity. Aulus Gellius is my author for it. Propterea, that is, because the name of that god was unknown, veteres Romani . . . ubi terram movisset senserant, nuntiandum erat, ferias ejus rei causa edito imperabant; sed dei nomen, ita uti solet, cui servari ferias oporteret, statuere & edicere quiescebant; ne, alium pro alio nominando, falsa religione populum alligarent, eas ferias si quis polluisset, piaculoque ob hanc rem opus esset, hostium, SI. DEO. SI. DEAE. immolabat. idque ita ex decreto pontificum observatum esse M. Varro dicit: quantum & qua vi & per quem deorum dearamve terra tremaret incertum esset (33).

Macrobius in particular is less excusable than the other writers, since, in the very same page where he speaks as they do, he recites a formulæ of evocation, which confutes what he says. It is most certain that the conditional particle si Deus, si Dea, undeniably proves that they knew not the name of the god whom they called forth; for Varro affirms that they used those words, when they were afraid of mistaking the name of one deity for that of another. They made use of them when they offered sacrifices upon occasion of an earthquake; because they knew not the name of the god, who was the cause of such a calamity. Aulus Gellius is my author for it. Propterea, that is, because the name of that god was unknown, veteres Romani . . . ubi terram movisset senserant, nuntiandum erat, ferias ejus rei causa edito imperabant; sed dei nomen, ita uti solet, cui servari ferias oporteret, statuere & edicere quiescebant; ne, alium pro alio nominando, falsa religione populum alligarent, eas ferias si quis polluisset, piaculoque ob hanc rem opus esset, hostium, SI. DEO. SI. DEAE. immolabat. idque ita ex decreto pontificum observatum esse M. Varro dicit: quantum & qua vi & per quem deorum dearamve terra tremaret incertum esset (33).

A a a

[F] That xxviii.

(30) Constat omnes urbes in aliquo Dei esse tutelâ, moremque Romanorum arcanum & multis ignotum fuisse, ut cum obsiderent urbem hostium eamque jam capi posse confiderent, certo carmine evocarent tutelares deos: quod aut aliter urbem capi posse non crederent, aut si posset nefas estimarent deos habere captivos. Macrobius, Saturnal. pag. m. 323.

(31) Id. ibid.

(32) Macrobius, ubi supra. He says he takes it from the fifth book Rerum conditarum, of Sammonicus Serenus, who had found it in a book of Furius.

(33) Aulus Gellius, lib. ii, cap.

VOL. V.

(c) In the remark [C].

(d) See the remark [A], citation (3).

from Spinozism [F]. I must also observe (c) why some think that he was tribune of the people. I make no doubt that he was related to D. VALERIUS SORANUS, who, as well as he, made himself more considerable for his learning, than for the beauty of his discourses (d).

[F] That opinion does not differ from Spinozism. I need only quote a passage of St Augustin to prove this: (34) 'Jovem ut Deus sit, & maximè ut rex deorum, non alium possunt estimare, quàm mundum: ut in diis cæteris secundum istos suis partibus regnet. In hanc sententiam etiam quodam versus Valerii Sorani exponit idem Varro, in eo libro, quem seorsum ab istis de cultu deorum scripsit, qui versus hi sunt.

(35) There is in the old manuscripts, as Lodericus Vives observes, rerumque deumque, and I find the same reading in the 11th chapter of the same book of St Augustin in my edition.

Jupiter omnipotens regum rex ipse, deusque (35). Progenitor, genitrixque deum, deus unus, & omnis.

Exponitur autem in eodem libro, ita ut eum marem existimarent, qui semen emitteret, feminam quæ acciperet: Jovemque esse mundum, & eum omnia, femina ex se emittere, & in se recipere, qua causa, inquit, scripsit Soranus: Jupiter progenitor genitrixque: nec minus cum causa unum & eundem omnia esse. Mundus enim unus, & in eo uno omnia sunt. . . . They think that Jupiter, as a god, and especially as king of the gods, can be nothing else but the world, that he reigns by the other gods in their several respects: in this sense, the same Varro likewise explains some verses of Valerius Soranus, found in that book, which he wrote separately from his books concerning the worship of the gods. These are the verses:

Omnipotent Jove, king and god of kings,
Progenitor and progenitrix of the gods, one god, and containing all.

And in that book they are so explained, as if he was understood to be the male who emitted, and the female who received the seed: and as if Jupiter was understood to be the world, and the being who emitted seeds of all kinds, and who received them. For this reason, says he, Soranus wrote Jupiter Progenitor genitrixque; and that the world is nevertheless one and the same with it's cause: for the world is one, and in it are all things.

SOUBISE, a town in Saintonge. Many persons of quality had their name from it. In 1575, it fell to the house of Rohan by the marriage of Catherine de Parthenai, daughter and heiress of John de Parthenai-l'Archevesque, with Renatus de Rohan II of that name. This John de Parthenai, known by the name of Soubise, will be the subject of the following article.

SOUBISE (JOHN DE PARTHENAI LORD OF) is one of the heroes of the XVIth century among the Protestants of France. He began to learn their doctrine at the court of the Duke of Ferrara (a); when Renata of France, daughter of Lewis XII, and wife of that Duke, received there some preachers of the Reformed Religion, and embraced their opinions. Being returned into France, he laboured with great zeal [A] to propagate the truths he had learned; and Catherine de Medicis was like to become his profelyte [B]. In the very beginning of the crisis, which made the war unavoidable between the two religions in 1562, he was one of the most considerable associates of the Prince of Condé, who chose him to command at Lyons, when that great town, which had declared for the Cause, did not seem to be safe in the hands of the Baron des Adrets. Soubise wonderfully justified the choice that was made of him to keep such a place; for notwithstanding all the difficulties he went through, he preserved it, and gave a good account of it. He performed there many valiant and masterly actions (b). The Duke of Nemours besieged that town to no purpose, and the queen-mother endeavoured in vain to impose upon him by negotiations (c). He was very much suspected of having a hand in the murder of the Duke of Guise; and it appears that Poltrot laid many things to his charge in his depositions: nevertheless, it is the opinion of the most equitable writers of the Church of Rome [C], that he was not concerned in that abominable action. He had

(a) Varillas, Hist. de l'Hérésie, lib. x, towards the end.

(b) See Varillas, Hist. de Charles IX, tom. i, pag. 212, 213, Dutch edition; but see particularly, Besa, Hist. Eccles. book xi.

(c) Varillas, ibid. pag. 225.

(1) Besa, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii, ad ann. 1559, pag. 199.

(2) He means a minister, called Michael Mulot, who was above sixty years old.

(3) Varillas, Hist. de Charles IX, tom. i, pag. 60.

[A] He laboured with great zeal. The author of the history of the Reformed Churches, makes the following observation concerning the Reformation of the town of Soubise (1). 'As for the town of Soubise, the lord of that place, who was a man of an extraordinary piety, had so ordered it, that many people, living in his lands, were already very well instructed. Which that good old man (2) perceiving, he so earnestly laboured in the work of the Lord, that every body looked upon his labours as a miraculous thing. He never slept in the night, (because they durst not meet but in the night, and very secretly) and then went through all the adjacent places, being often obliged to make his escape into the woods, where he spent whole nights. In short, the lord did so effectually employ him in his work, that in a little time a great part of the people forsook the mass in the neighbouring country.'

[B] Catherine de Medicis was like to become his profelyte. I shall quote an author (3), who read a manuscript life of Soubise, wherein, doubtless, he found many particulars. 'The admiral, says he, was only mistaken in believing that Catherine de Medicis was a Calvinist in her heart; but any body else would have been deceived in it Soubise acquainted him with the long conferences he daily had with that prince's about Calvinism. He assured him that she was as well instructed in it as the Queen of Navarre. He supposed at least, that she was no less inclined to it. . . . The Duchesse of Montpensier was always present at those conversations, and seemed to be so well persuaded of Soubise's discourses, that she opposed, as much as she could, the design of her husband, who intended to put into a nunnery their three last daughters. . . . And, indeed, the duchesse being at the point of death, when dissimulation can be of no use, sent for John Malot, a minister of Paris, and desired to receive the sacrament in the Calvinistical way, which was denied her.' Varillas informs us in another place (4), that Soubise, who left the queen at last, being weary of her delays, affirmed, that tho' she wanted courage to declare herself a Calvinist, she would not be forced to it. He was not much mistaken in thinking so, witness what she said (5), when she heard the false news that the Protestants had won the battle of Dreux, Well, we must then pray to GOD in French; to which I add, the great fondness she shewed to the friends of the new opinions. She would have quickly resolved to abjure Popery, if it had been worked, and to procure to Soubise the glory of a great converter. Varillas owns (6), that she sided with the Catholic party more out of necessity than out of choice.

[C] It is the opinion of the most equitable writers of the Church of Rome. Mr Le Laboureur made no scruple to publish these remarkable words. 'The Admiral

(4) Ibid. pag. 139.

(5) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. v, pag. m. 72, ad. ann. 1562.

(6) Varillas, ubi supra, pag. 357.

- (d) Bera, Hist. Eccl. book iii, pag. 257.
- (e) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caillien. Tom. i, pag. 378.
- (f) Le Laboureur, ibid. pag. 304.
- (g) Id. ibid. pag. 378.
- (h) Varillas, Charles IX, Tom. i, pag. 275.
- (i) D'Aubigné, Tom. i, p. 396.
- had been gentleman of the kings chamber (d), and was made knight of the order the seventh of December 1561 (e). He had commanded the army of Henry II, in Tuscany [D]; and to use Le Laboureur's words (f), he was a man of great conduct and experience. He died in 1566 (g), being about fifty-four years of age (b). He had married Antoinette Bouchard, eldest daughter of the house of Aubeterre. She was a lady very zealous for her religion [E]. They left but one daughter; viz. Catherine de Parthenai, whom I have mentioned in its proper place. The first husband she had, viz. the Baron du Pont in Bretagne, took the name of SOUBISE: it is he who makes a glorious figure in the most remarkable actions of the second and third civil wars. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Jarnac in 1569; but he dextrously made his escape (i). La Nouë being wounded at the siege of Fontenai-la-Comte the year following (k), Soubise commanded in chief, and made himself chief master of the place. In the same year he received two wounds at the siege of Saintes (l). He was killed during the Paris massacre [F], after he had defended himself like a lion. The ladies (m) were curious to see what ground there was for the action (n) that was brought against him. I speak of it in another place (o).

- 'miral de Chatillon, the Count de la Rouchefoucault, and the Sieurs de Soubise and Feuquieres had no hand in Poltrot's conspiracy. . . One cannot believe such a thing of men of their quality; and it is so ill proved by the interrogatories of the murderer, that it is plain, his only design in accusing them was to make the world believe, that some leaders of a faction that was actually in arms, had a hand in that plot (7).'
- [D] The army of Henry II in Tuscany. If we believe Brantome, he was brought into trouble when he had that employment. That Historian says (8), that as to the affair of Poltrot, Mr de Soubise was by many accused of ingratitude; for being charged by the Siense with several things he had done in Tuscany, when he was employed there in King Henry's reign, the Duke of Guise interceded for him. I cannot tell why Varillas amplifies and paraphrases those words in the following manner (9). After the war of Siena, in which it was said that Soubise had been guilty of a misdemeanour, both as to the war, and the distribution of money, some accusations were brought against him by his enemies, tending to deprive him of his honour and life: but the Duke of Guise openly protested him.
- [E] A lady very zealous for her religion. A report being spread that the Catholics designed to take her, to carry her to the gates of Lyons, and to threaten to stab her and her daughter in the sight of her husband, if he refused to surrender that place; Soubise sent to her Poltrot, who came back with some letters of that lady, wherein she intreated him to suffer them both to be killed, and to remain faithful to his party (10). She was a worthy wife of a man, who expressed an unsurmountable aversion for all separate treaties, and protested he would never sign none but such as should be already signed with the Prince of Condé's hand (11). She was likewise a worthy sister of the viscount d'Aubeterre, who forsook all for the Protestant religion, and submitted to a very hard life. Brantome speaks of him in the following manner (12): 'He was a refugee at Geneva, and a Button-maker by trade; for there was a law in that town, that every body should have a trade and live by it, tho' he were a gentleman or a lord. The said Aubeterre, tho' a man of a noble family, was a Button-maker: I saw him once, as I went through Geneva, very poor and miserable. Afterwards he was taken, during the conspiracy of Amboise, and condemned like the rest; but the duke of Guise, at the request of the Marechal de St André, procured him his pardon, and saved his life.' Some have said (13) that by the recommendation of the lady de Soubise, counsellor Fumée was set at liberty, when he ran the same danger as counsellor du Bourg; but others (14) ascribe it to the expedients suggested by Soubise to the Queen-mother, who had been kind to him long before. Catharina, they are Thuanus's words (15), in gratiam Joannis Partbenai Soubise reguli sibi percarit, et Fumee amicissimi sua commendatione apud judices illius causam non parum sublevari creditur. It is very likely d'Aubigné mistook the wife for the husband.
- [F] Was killed during the Paris massacre. Varillas says, that after Poltrot's attempt, Soubise went but once to court, which he left before he had been taken notice of, being afraid that the Guises were not persuaded of the truth of what was published, to invalidate the deposition of an assassin, who had been his domestic. If this be true, he would not have gone to the King of Navarre's wedding, or to the Parisian Vespers, if he had been living; and it would be a new proof that Soubise mentioned by d'Aubigné, was the Baron du Pont (16).

SOUBISE (BENJAMIN DE ROHAN, DUKE OF [A]) grand-son of the foregoing, and the son of Renatus de Rohan II of that name, and of Catherine de Parthenai vigorously seconded the enterprises of the Duke of Rohan his brother, both to relieve Rochelle, and to support the Protestant party in France. He had learned the art of war in Holland, under Prince Maurice, and he was one of the French gentlemen who threw themselves into Bergue (a), when the Spaniards besieged that place in the year 1606. He sustained the siege of St Jean d'Angely in 1621, against an army commanded by Lewis XIII in person; and when he surrendered the place, obtained an amnesty for what was passed, upon promise of obedience for the time to come [B]. Nevertheless he made himself master of Royan towards the latter end of the same year. In the month of February

[A] Duke of Soubise. I give him that title in imitation of the author who published the life of the Duke of Rohan in 1666. That writer only follows the common road. Nevertheless, it must be acknowledged, that the lordship of Soubise was never erected into a duchy, and that the Geographer du Val, who affirms it (1), does it without reason. It is an abuse that strangely prevails in the noble families of France, to annex sometimes one title, and sometimes another to an estate, without expecting letters of erection. Do not we see that the sons of dukes bear, under the title of marquisate, the name of the estates of which their fathers style themselves dukes? Nay, there are some estates that belong no longer to a family, and yet the persons belonging to that family take the name of those estates; one calls himself Marquis, another Count, another Viscount or Baron, &c. of the same estate. Mr le Laboureur exclaims very justly against it (2).

[B] Upon promise of obedience for the time to come. The author who answered the Duke of Soubise's manifesto in 1625, pretends (3), that the duke asked the king's pardon when he came out of St Jean d'Angely, and that he swore to be for ever his most faithful subject, and servant; to bear arms no longer against his service, upon any pretence whatsoever; and to adhere no more to the associations and assemblies that should be made without his majesty's authority. He pretends also that the Protestant Historians took care not to insert in their Histories the

(1) In his book, intitled, la France, in the chapter of Xaintonge.

(b) Vraye Hist. des Troubles, lib. xiii.

(c) D'Aubigné, Tom. i, pag. 475.

(d) Id. ibid. pag. 546.

(e) It was a process about impotency.

(f) In the article QUELLENEC, and in the remark [C] of the article P A R T H E N A I.

(g) Memoirs, ubi supra.

(h) D'Aubigné, Tom. i, p. 123.

(i) La Planché, Hist. de Franç. II, pag. 147. Bera, Hist. Eccl. lib. iii, pag. 257.

(j) Thuanus, lib. xxiii, pag. m. 467.

(k) This is undeniable.

(l) Grotius, Ann. lib. xv.

(m) Addit. à Caillien. Tom. ii, pag. 793.

(n) Mercure Franç. Tom. xi, pag. 268.

(b) This event is placed in the year 1624, in the Ministère du Card. de Richelieu.

(c) Taken from several volumes of the Mercurius Francicus.

February 1622, he seized upon Olonne, and was so fully master of the country in the lower Poitou, that his parties went and made some prisoners within five leagues from Nantes. This good fortune was of short continuance, for he was so vigorously attacked in the isle of Rié [C], soon after he had subdued it, that all his forces were there scattered. He retired to Rochelle, where the inhabitants expressed some contempt and dissatisfaction against him; which moved him to go the sooner into England to ask for succours. The court of France being informed of it, he was declared guilty of high-treason the fifteenth of July 1622. He found means to fit out some ships, notwithstanding the refusal of his Britannic Majesty; but they were cast away at Plymouth. In the beginning of the year 1625 (b), he seized on the isle of Ré, and made an attempt upon Blavet or Port-Louis in Bretagne, in which he had but an imperfect success; for it was commonly his fate not to be very fortunate [D] in the vast projects he formed. He took the port and six men of war he found in it; the landing forces took the town; but meeting with some resistance in the fort, he re-embarked his troops, and went away, not without leaving behind him some ships that run a-ground [E]. One of those he took, called the Virgin Mary, carried eighty guns, and cost above two hundred thousand crowns. He had the mortification of being disowned by the Protestants, though it was not doubted that he had concerted every thing with the Duke of Rohan his brother, in the conferences he had with him at Castrès, during the autumn of the year 1624. He published a manifesto, which was ascribed to La Milletiere, who styled himself intendant of the Church's Admiralty; and while he waited a proper time to make a descent near Bourdeaux, he made himself formidable by taking several merchant-ships, and kept all the coast in awe from the mouth of the Garonne to the mouth of the Loire. He entered the Garonne the eleventh of June 1625 with a fleet of seventy-four sail, and making a descent into the Medoc, possessed himself of Castillon. After all, this undertaking signified but little; he was quickly obliged to return into the isle of Ré, from whence advancing some days after towards the fleet of the enemy's, he burnt the Dutch Admiral [F], which made the court hasten the preparations that were making to clear that coast. The Duke of Montmorency, Admiral of France, supported by the Dutch ships, beat Soubise's fleet. He was driven from the isle of Ré, and then from that of Oleron, and forced to retire into England (c). He was there very instrumental to procure to the Rochellers the succours that were sent to them; and when that town was taken, notwithstanding that assistance, he did not care to enjoy the benefit of the amnesty in France, but rather chose to stay in England, where he died without issue, and from whence the oath taken by M. de Soubise, and by those that came out of St Jean d'Angeli with him, but that it is to be found in the registry of the Provostship of the Hôtel, and in the memoirs of the Sieur de Modene, great Provost of France, printed at Toulouse in the year 1621.

(4) Memoires, pag. 37, Dutch Edit.

[C] In the isle of Rié. Mr de Puységur has confounded that defeat with the loss which the Duke of Soubise sustained in the isle of Ré in the year 1625. After the siege of Montpellier, says he (4), there was no war against the Protestants for the space of four years. The king caused a fort to be built near Rochelle and then he went into the isle of Ré with his army commanded by the Prince of Condé. The Duke of Soubise, who had four thousand men in that island, was beaten. Thus you see how the resemblance of names occasions Anachronisms. The victory of the isle of Rié, wherein Lewis XIII was in person, was obtained before the siege of Montpellier; but neither he nor the Prince of Condé were present at that of Ré, which happened after that siege.

(5) Merc. Franc. Tom. ii, pag. 391.

(6) Ibid. pag. 382. See also the Ministère du Cardinal de Richelieu, at the year 1625, pag. 179, Dutch Edit.

(7) See the Mercurius Franc. Tom. viii, pag. 559.

[D] It was his fate not to be very fortunate. If this was the only thing charged upon him in the relations of the Roman Catholic writers, they could not be suspected of being too passionate; but they go so far as to accuse him of want of courage. It is too great an insult. They pretend that a great lord told the king, Sir, M. de Soubise having shewn your presence at Rié, and now that of your admiral in the isle of Ré, there is reason to believe that if he goes on, he will be, one day, the oldest captain in your kingdom (5). It is said in the same relations (6), that he did not engage in the fight of the isle of Ré, and that as soon as he saw the ill success of it, he hastily made his escape in a shallop, without his hat and his sword. Nay, we are told, that his captain of the guards having seen that sword, said it had certainly dropt from his belt, because he was sure he had not drawn it. The satires upon the defeat in the isle of Ré are still more injurious (7). He has been reproached with another thing very different from that, viz. That at his return from England, he made a gentleman belonging to him swear, that if he saw his ship ready to be taken, and if they could not make their escape, he would set the powder on fire to burn them all, choosing to die in such a manner, rather than make their enemies triumph by their being made prisoners.

(8) But that the reader may have a better reason to mistrust the Histories published by the Catholic party, I shall mention a slander that looks like one of those calumnies, that are spread among the people to keep up their zeal by stirring their passions. It was given out (9), that when the inhabitants of Olonne desired to capitulate, Mr de Soubise answered them haughtily and impudently, that he would have them choose the most handsome maids they had, to be bestowed on his favourites, after he had satiated himself, or give him a hundred thousand crowns; that both conditions being rejected, he promised to exempt them from being plundered for twenty thousand crowns, eighty pieces of canon, and three ships, and that he plundered them, tho' they had granted him all his demands.

[E] Not without leaving behind him some ships that run a-ground. To shew the partiality of those relations, I shall set down here what a Catholic author (10) tells us about that attempt upon Blavet. He says that the Duke of Soubise with only three hundred soldiers and a hundred seamen, so vigorously attacked the large ship called the Virgin, that, after some resistance, he boarded her sword in hand, took her, and then all the rest. . . . And that the Port having been shut up with men, and with an iron chain and a large cable, he was confined in it three weeks; but the wind turning about, he made use of it, and caused the chain and the cable to be cut with hatchets, notwithstanding the fire that was made upon him, and went out with the king's ships, and possessed himself of the isle of Oleron. How come these passages that are glorious to him, to be omitted in the Mercurius Francicus?

[F] He burnt the Dutch Admiral. I have seen no author yet, that makes a solid answer to those, who say that the Duke of Soubise broke his word to the Dutch admiral. We are told (11) they had agreed to undertake nothing one against another, during the negotiations for a peace that were carrying on at the court; but that Soubise taking advantage of the promise the Admiral had made him, came up with him in half an hour's time by the help of the wind and tide, took

(8) Merc. Franc. Tom. ii, pag. 281.

(9) Claudian Mirlingre Hist. de la Rebellion, Tom. ii, pag. 23.

(10) The author of the History of the Duke of Rohan, printed at Paris 1666. I have said in another place that this History is ascribed to M. Fauvellet de Toc.

(11) Ministère du Card. de Richelieu, p. 177.

whence he endeavoured to prejudice the court of France as much as he could [G]. The name of SOUBISE continues still in the house of Rohan, in the person of FRANCIS DE ROHAN, son of HERCULES DE ROHAN Duke of Mombazon, which Francis de Rohan styles himself Prince of SOUBISE. He married the sixteenth of April 1663 Anne de Rohan, daughter of Henry Chabot and of Margaret de Rohan, heiress of the Duke of Rohan. He is captain of the Gendarmes, and has signalized himself on several occasions, for instance, at the battle of Senef, where he had his leg broke. The Princess of Soubise, his consort, was lady of honour to the late Queen of France, and has been accounted one of the greatest beauties of the court (d). She has been very much praised by the authors of that time, and no less admired for her virtue and wisdom than for her beauty. The news writers in Holland gave out that the Prince of Soubise was one of those, who laid down their commissions of lieutenants-general, because they were not comprehended in the promotion of the Marshals of France, that was made in March 1693.

The Abbot de SOUBISE, his son, distinguished himself during the course of his studies. He was made coadjutor of the bishopric of Strasburg some months ago (e). His elegy may be seen in the epistle dedicatory of the posthumous works of the Chevalier de Meré.

(d) See Catin's Oeuvres Galantes. Mr. Menage made some Greek verses upon that lady's being advised to bath herself in the sea, after she had been bitten by a dog. They are very fine verses, and may be seen at pag. 178, of his Poems, Edit. Amstel. 1687.

(e) I write this in May 1701. The Prince of Rohan, elder brother of this coadjutor, was made Field-Marshal, in 1702, and married the heiress of Ventadour, (Mercure Galant, January 1702, pag. 421, 422) widow of the Prince de Turenne killed at the battle of Steinkerk. Ibid. July 1701, pag. 345.

(12) Tom. xi, pag. 374.

took his ship, when he expected no such thing, and burnt it by means of two pinaces full of fire-works. It is further said in the Mercure François (12) that hostages had been given on both sides. It is likely the aggressor was not without an answer, when he was charged with unfaithfulness in that respect. The Catholic writer of the Duke of Rohan's life makes no mention of that reproach: he says that Soubise being informed that Manty, and Hautin, Admiral of Zealand, came upon him with forty ships, he went to meet them, sunk five of their ships, and killed above fifteen hundred men. I have just now read what the Protestant author, who took the fictitious name of Theophile Misaëbe, published in Soubise's vindication (13). It is something, but I could desire a better discussion, and a more exact verification.

[G] To prejudice the court of France as much as he could. For it appears by a declaration of Lewis XIII, dated the eighth of June 1641 (14). That it was a year since some of those who had been sent by the Sieurs de Soubise and la Valette, to corrupt the fidelity of several Frenchmen, fell into his majesty's hands, and had confessed, that the said Soubise and la Valette . . . were treating with the king of Spain to make a descent into Bretagne and Aunis, or into the river of Bourdeaux.

(13) Apologie pour les Eglises Réformées de France, printed in 1625, chap. x.

(14) See Montreuil's Memoirs, pag. 366.

SOUCHES (LEWIS RATTUIT, COUNT DE) son of a gentleman of Rochelle [A] called John Rattuit Sieur de Barres, left France after the war of the Protestants, and went through Holland and Germany in his way to Sweden. He was no sooner arrived there but he had a prospect of being raised by the good offices of Count de la Gardie, who quickly procured him a regiment of Dragoons, and then a regiment of Foot. After he had served some years, he had a quarrel with his General (a), laid down his commission, and fought him; and intending to return into France by the way of Austria and Italy, he staid some days at Vienna; and because the Arch-Duke William, brother

(a) Called Stalhans.

[A] He was son of a gentleman of Rochelle. The author of the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary was sadly deceived by what he had heard in common discourse; when he affirmed that Count de Souches was the son of a Grocer of Rochelle. There is not any occasion, wherein a hear-say is more to be mistrusted, than when it concerns the birth of a person raised to great posts, whose ancestors are not mentioned in History. This silence proves only that they did not appear at court, or had no considerable employments in their provinces; but it is no proof that they were not gentlemen. And yet through I know not what base or malicious inclination to tell lies, people take delight in vilifying, as much as they can, the birth of a favourite, a minister of state, or a general of an army, who is the first of his family, that was raised to great preferments (1). Some say, his father was a Peasant, a Fisherman, or a Servant; others will have it, that he was the son of a Shoemaker, a Pedlar, or at most, of a Scrivener, or an Attorney's Clerk. They are sometimes in the right, and very often mistaken; and therefore prudence requires one should mistrust those common reports; for when the thing is narrowly examined, it commonly appears that this pretended son of a Pedlar, or Fisherman, is of a very noble family, but little known out of its district. However it be, here are the proofs of Count de Souches's nobility, as they have been communicated to me (2).

(1) See the remark [A] in the article TOUCHE, and the end of the remark [A] of the first article SFORZ A.

(2) They have been sent from Vienna to the Bookeller by Mr. . . . See the marginal note (b).

The sixth of August 1686, before Gabriel Beraudin Esq; lord of Grandjai, counsellor to the king, and his lieutenant-general in the Senechaussée, and presidial court of the city and government of Rochelle; at the request of M^{re} Amathée Huet, Knt. lord of Rivau, captain of the Marines, appeared fourteen of the most eminent persons of the country d'Aunis, whose names and offices are specified in the act whereof I have a copy, collated with the original at Vienna in Austria the 18th of September 1692, by Henry Castellani d'Avister, sworn apostolical protonotary. The lieutenant-general in the Senechaussée of Rochelle above-named declares, that those fourteen persons all living and settled in Aunis have certified to all those, whom it may concern, that M^{re} Lewis Rattuit Count de Souches, was born a gentleman, being the son of John Rattuit, Esq; Sieur de Barres, and of the Lady Margaret de Bourdigale, and that they have good and certain knowledge, that the said late John Rattuit, father of the said late Lord Count de Souches, was descended from a noble family, and one of the most considerable in the city of Rochelle, where he and his predecessors made their abode, and kept their rank among other gentlemen, suitable to their noble extraction. In witness whereof they have signed this present declaration, and put to it the seal of their arms; which declaration we have received, and given a copy of it to the said lord at his request, for his use and service, which we have also signed, and for a greater approbation we have caused his majesty's seal to be put to it in this presidial chancery of the city of Rochelle. I need not name all those, who signed that act; it being sufficient to say that Mr. Millet, marshal de camp, governor of the principality of Chateaurnaud, and lieutenant-general in the government of Aunis; Mr. Arnou, intendant of the province; Mr. Gabaret, first Commadore; Mr. de Chastellailon, commander for the King at Rochelle, were some of those who certified it.

Here follows another attestation: I have a copy of it collated with the original at Vienna in Austria the 18th of September 1692, by the same Henry Castellani d'Avister above-mentioned. We whose names are under-written, attest and certify that we certainly know, that Mr. Lewis Rattuit de Souches is of a noble extraction both by the father's and mother's side, and of one of the most ancient families of this country, and that they have enjoyed the honours, privileges and exemptions granted by our kings to the

B b b

(b) Mr  sent it from Vienna, whilst he was there Envoy Extraordinary of the United Provinces. He sent also the acts mentioned by me in the remark [A].

brother of the Emperor Ferdinand III proposed to him to serve in the Emperor's armies, he agreed to it, and accepted a regiment of Dragoons, that was vacant and proffered him. He made a great fortune in the service of his Imperial Majesty; for he was successively raised to the dignities of Gentleman of his Chamber, Counsellor of War and State, Field-Marshal, and Commander-General of the frontiers of Slavonia. He died in Moravia in the year 1682, being seventy-four years of age, and left children as we shall see below [B]. These are the contents of a memoir communicated to me, which comes from very good hands (b). I shall add to it a thing, which very much heightens the glory of Count de Souches, viz. that he was the principal cause of the long resistance of the town of Brin against the Swedes, who were forced to raise the siege upon that account. This proved of great service to the Emperor [C]. I shall take notice of some mistakes in Moreri's Dictionary [D], and make some observations on what concerns the Count

(3) Henry de Laval.

'the nobles and gentlemen of this kingdom, and that they always kept their rank among other gentlemen. In witness whereof we have signed the present attestation for his use and service. Done at Rochelle the 12th of March 1687.' This attestation was signed by eighteen persons: the first is the Bishop of Rochelle (3); the second Mr de Castellailon, Commander for the King in Aunis and at Rochelle; the third Mr Beraudin lieutenant-general of Rochelle. Amongst the others are Mr Villette Commodore, the Chevalier de Blenac, the Chevalier d'Arbouville, Captain of a Ship of War; Mr d'Ofmont Knight of Malta, &c. I add that I have seen the copy of a letter written by the Bailiff of la Vieuville from Paris the 29th of March 1699, to Count de la Tour, son-in-law to Count de Souches. He writes to him, that he has been very well pleased to find an opportunity to write to Malta what he had heard, being at Rochelle, of the family of Count de Souches, whose ancestors, says he, without much raising themselves in the war, have always enjoyed the privileges of nobility, and never done any thing derogatory to it.

Note, that Mr Menage observes that the name Souches is the name of a lordship belonging to the Count I speak of. He says the ancient name was Des-Oufches. I shall set down his words, which I take from a chapter, wherein he proves by several examples, that proper names are not always pronounced according to the ancient and true Orthography. 'Likewise they always say de Souches instead of Des-Oufches, speaking of the governor of Moravia, who commands now the Emperor's troops in Flanders. Souches is the name of that General's lordship, for his name is Rattuit. Rattuit is a family of the city of Rochelle, where that lord was born; and Oufche is an old French word, which signifies a garden inclosed with a hedge, and full of trees, under which they sow pulse, or hemp. And that French word is derived from the Latin ulca, which is to be found in Gregorius Turonensis, much in the same sense (4).'

(4) Menage, Observations sur la Langue Française, Tom. i, pag. 307, Paris 1675.

(5) See, above, the remark [A] of the article RECKHEIM.

(6) Taken from the Memoir, quoted in the margin of the text of this article, note (b).

(7) See John Cluverius's Universal History, in the Appendix, p. 759. Edit. of 1668.

[B] He left children as we shall see below. He was married twice, first to Anne Elizabeth Countess of Hoffkirk, and then to Anne Salome Countess of Aspermont and Reckheim (5). He had two sons and one daughter by his first wife. JOHN LEWIS, his eldest son, is still living, and is married to Eve Eleonora de Notthafft and Werenberg, Countess of the Empire, by whom he has had three daughters, viz. 1. LOUISA, lady of honour at the Emperor's court, and now the wife of Count de Horn. 2. CLAUDIA, lady of honour at the Emperor's court in her sister's room. 3. THERESA, a Carmelite Nun in Stiria. The second son of Count de Souches was called CHARLES. He was General of the Emperor's Infantry, and died of a wound he received at the battle of Salankemen in Hungary in the year 1691. He had lost his wife Marianne Countess de Bucham, by whom he left two sons, LEWIS and CHARLES-JOSEPH. The latter has been admitted Knight of Malta in the priory of Bohemia. The daughter of Count de Souches is married to Count Charles de la Tour, and has several children (6).

[C] He was the principal cause of the long resistance of the town of Brin . . . against the Swedes . . . which proved a great service to the Emperor. Torstenfon having beaten the Imperialists in February 1645, made himself master of several places in Moravia, and was so dreaded, that upon the news of his march the enemies raised the siege of Olmutz; and then he besieged Brin, the only strong place that was still for the Emperor in that province (7). The besieged made such a vigorous defence, that his Imperial Majesty had time to settle his affairs which were in a very ill posture. He made a treaty with Ragotzki, Prince of Transylvania, and yielded to him seven lordships in Hungary: ninety churches were opened in his confederation, wherein the Protestants were to teach their doctrine publicly, and the privileges of the Hungarians were restored to them. This treaty seemed disadvantageous to the Catholics; but it proved more prejudicial to the Swedes: for the Emperor having removed this rub out of his way, relieved Brin, and forced Torstenfon to raise the siege. Then Lewis Count de Souches, a French gentleman, who had been the principal cause of its preservation, was made governor of it as a reward for so great a service (8). An Historian observes that Torstenfon lost more soldiers before that place, than he would have lost in a pitched battle: he adds that in the mean time the Emperor repaired his forces. Longa illic difficultate obsidio, atque ad extremum irrita fuit. Ac satis constabat plus ibi militum, quam si justa acie depugnatum foret, Torstenfonis perissee. Interea Caesari spaciun datum reparandi vires, colligendique & confribendi novum exercitum, quem hosti opponeret (9). Never was service more seasonable than that, and Count de Souches did certainly deserve to be rewarded for it. Note, that the town of Brin was also rewarded as it deserved; for the Emperor gave it the first rank among the towns of Moravia: that rank formerly belonged to the town of Olmutz, which was deprived of it by reason of their weak resistance against the Swedes. This observation is to be found in the voyage of Count de Brienne. Cracovia relicta Vindobonam versus pergitur, per Silesiam, & Moraviam: ubi praeter Olomutium & Brinnum nihil notatu dignum: illud, fide Episcopali; hoc, obsidione quam adversus Suecos tam fortiter sustinuit, ut inde ob memoriam facti extiterit caput regionis, virtutis praemium; dignitate illa Olomutio sublata, nota recordis (10).

[D] I shall take notice of some mistakes in Moreri's Dictionary (11). I. The first concerns the extraction of Count de Souches, and has been sufficiently confuted in the remark [A]. II. He should not have been called General of the Empire; he was only the Emperor's General. III. It is certain, from the memoir communicated to me, out of which I have composed the text of this article, that his father did not give him to a German gentleman, and that he entered not into the Emperor's service before he had fought that gentleman. IV. An exact Historian will take care not to say that this Count was defeated at the battle of Senef by the Prince of Condé, in the year 1674. For, properly speaking, that battle was neither won nor lost by either of the parties. The Allies, as well as the French, ascribed the victory to themselves, and caused Te Deum to be sung, and bonfires to be made: both did it out of policy, being fully convinced that there was no ground to boast of any advantage (12). The beginning of that bloody battle was advantageous to the French, and the end proved advantageous to their enemies. Many are of opinion that the Prince of Condé behaved himself like a great captain for some hours, and then like Orlando; but which Orlando, him of Boiardo or of Ariosto? Orlando Furioso, Roland the furious, Roland like Hercules in Seneca, Hercules furens, Hercules in a fury? Was it not a kind of Enthusiasm, and Delirium (13), say they, to leave the best troops so long exposed to the fire of the enemy well covered with hedges and hop-fields; I say, to leave them exposed to a perfect slaughter, which they could not avoid, and to sustain, as it were, with

(8) Lewis de Mai, Discours Historique & Politique sur les causes de la Guerre de Hongrie, pag. m. 283.

(9) Appendix Joh. Cluveri, pag. 759.

(10) Lud. Hen. Lomeni Brienne Comitibus narrat, pag. 54. Edit. 1662.

(11) See also the article LEUWENTZ.

(12) We went near Mons, where Te Deum was sung as it was at Paris; both parties pretended to have got the victory. For my own part I have always been of opinion that neither party had reason to boast of it. Mémoires de Charpentier, pag. 388, 389, Dutch Edit. This is perhaps the best thing that is in those Memoirs.

(13) Compare what is above, citation (17), of the second article of the second article folded Count de Souches in Chavagnac's memoirs [E]. That book was reprinted in Holland in the year 1700, after the style had been mended in several places.

As it does not plainly enough appear in a passage which I have quoted (a) whether he was governor of Brin when that town resisted the Swedes, I shall produce another which will

(a) In the remark [C].

(14) The battle of Senef was with respect to the French, as the picture mentioned by Horace, de Arte Poet. ver. 3. . . . ut turpiter arum Definat in pifem mulier formosa superne. At the beginning, it were a smiling face of beauty, but it ended in blackness and horror.

(15) This addition is also to be found in Morel's Dictionary, printed at Paris in 1699.

(16) Mercur Hollandicus, for the year 1674, pag. 451.

(17) That is the Prince of Orange.

(18) Mercur, ubi supra, pag. 452, 453.

(19) It should not be, and Swis, but opposed to the Swis, or something like it; for it appears by the whole thread of the discourse, that the author means the Swis in the French army.

(20) Ibid. pag. 457.

(21) Ibid. pag. 462, 463.

(22) Ibid. pag. 464.

the thigh. The vigorous resistance of the Marquis de Grana, who was near the village with his battalion, has much contributed to the happy success of the battle; as well as the bravery of the battalions of the regiment of Souches commanded by the son of the said Count. How then can it be said that Count de Souches, by refusing to expose the Imperialists, occasioned the victory obtained by the French?

There are still three faults in the supplement to Morel's Dictionary, which ought to be corrected. VI. Count de Souches did not live fourscore years, but only seventy-four. VII. His son did not command the armies of the empire; he has been only employed in the Emperor's troops. VIII. He was not killed at Rhinfeld in 1678, but in Hungary in the year 1691.

[E] Upon what concerns Count de Souches in Chavagnac's Memoirs. He is there described (23) as the most silly and most cowardly man in the world; and after having mentioned whatever may induce one to think that he was a traitor, he nevertheless says, I do not think he was; but he was a malicious and ignorant man, and the greatest robber that ever lived (24). Many reasons convince me that these slanders ought not to be minded. 1. The author of those memoirs commends himself eternally. He pretends to have given all the counsels that have proved successful; if a thing does not succeed, it is because they would not believe him; he has frequently prevented great inconveniences; he takes upon him the boldest and the most laborious enterprises; in a word, every thing goes well, and always succeeds when he is concerned in it, and every thing goes ill without him. His commending himself so much, shews he had a great opinion of his merit, and was willing others should have the same. It appears from his own history that he was a haughty, ambitious, fantastical, and impatient man. From whence it may be inferred, that whoever was his enemy could not mis being slandered by him. I observe in the second place, that he was at variance with Count de Souches from the beginning of the campaign of 1674 (25); and that probably his rude way moved sometimes that General to make him sensible of his inferiority. Thus subaltern officers expose themselves to several mortifications, when they have not that deference for their General which they owe him. This irritated Count de Chavagnac more and more, and disposed him to speak ill of Count de Souches. Note, in the third place, that he loved to speak ill of Generals. He gives us a most wretched character of Count Montecuculi (26); and that with respect to the most fortunate, most glorious, and brightest campaign that can be found in the long life of that renowned General: I mean, the campaign of 1673, in which he disappointed all the designs of M. de Turenne, and destroyed by the taking only of one town (27), all the advantage the French had gotten in Holland in the year 1672. Can any body give credit to such slanders? Are they not contrary to the rules of probability? And therefore must we not conclude that what such a writer says of his enemies ought to be suspected? I omit many sharp and satirical stories, to be found in his memoirs against the chief officers of the imperial troops, which seem to proceed from a resentment, that made him unwilling to do them justice. For every body owns that the imperial armies have been above these hundred years one of the best schools of war, and that there are very few that form so many good officers. Note, in the fourth place, that he is often mistaken in his accounts, even when he does not design to speak ill of those with whom he was displeased. Consult the notes inserted in the Dutch edition, which concern what passed in Germany in the year 1675. The Marquis de  who is the author of those notes, and who commanded one of the best French regiments in that year, contradicts him in several important points: If other officers would give themselves the trouble of criticizing him, doubtless they would find matter enough for it. In the fifth place, there are so many incredible things in what he says against Count de Souches, that this alone is sufficient to confute him. Souches, who had received

(23) See Chavagnac's Memoirs from page 390, to page 401, Dutch edition.

(24) Ibid. pag. 401.

(25) Ibid. pag. 371.

(26) Ibid. from page 339, to page 358.

(27) Bonn in the country of Cologne. He took it jointly with the Dutch troops, commanded by the Prince of Orange now King of England.

will put it out of doubt, and let us into the knowledge of some circumstances very much to the glory of that brave man [F]. It hath been falsely published in one of the pamphlets that appeared in Holland in the year 1702, concerning the insurrection in the Cevennes, that he was a native of that country.

(28) Mémoires de Chavagnac,
pag. 372, 373.

(29) Ibid. pag.
374, 375.

(30) Ibid. pag.
372.

(31) Ibid. pag.
373.

(32) Ibid. pag.
374.

(33) Ibid.

(34) Ibid. pag.
373, 374.

(35) Dinant, which he took before his army passed the Maefe at Namur. See the Mercur Hol-landois, ubi ju-
pra, pag. 436.

orders from the Emperor not to pass the Maefe upon any pretence whatsoever, to act only between the Maefe and the Moselle, and to give four thousand horse, with a General, if the Allies wanted them, or dered me to stay in the camp, whilst he went and dined with all the Generals in the camp of the Spanish troops (28). . . . Souches decamped to go and besiege Mont-Olympe; but because the Prince of Orange demanded the four thousand horse which the Emperor had promised him, I was detached to command them; so that I went back and encamped in the suburb of Namur: I cannot tell what jealousy he had upon my account; but he himself came thither with his whole army. Every body who knew that the orders were positive, could not imagine what he meant; but he was not long unresolved, for he brought the army through Namur. Monterey and the Prince of Orange joined him, and asked him what good angel had moved him to pass the Maefe: He answered that he passed the Moselle and not the Maefe. I could not forbear laughing, and telling him that I pitied him, and that the Moselle was above fifteen leagues from thence. He told me that I was not a man of a sufficient capacity to teach him the country, and fell into a great passion against me. Caplières, our Commissary-General, and the Emperor's agent, came upon this, and asked him what was the matter. This gentleman, said he, uses me like a child, but I will complain of it to his Imperial Majesty. I told Caplières what was the subject of his discontent, and Caplières told him that I was in the right: Whereupon he grew angry again, and asked his guides what river we had passed: They told him it was the Maefe; which made him change his countenance, and cry out, I am undone (29). The falsity contained in those words is so plain and obvious, that one may perceive it on first reading, without any examination; but whoever considers the circumstances of the narrative, when, I say, one considers that this General brought his army into the country of Liège (30), that he went and dined in the camp of Count Monterey (31), which he could not do without passing the Maefe, that he went up again towards Charleville to form the siege of Mont-Olympe, a place situated on the Maefe (32), that he came again near Namur, another place standing on the Maefe (33), will think it impossible that he should have been ignorant of the situation of that river. The most stupid soldiers could not be ignorant of it, after so many marches and countermarches of that nature; how then can one believe that a General above sixty years old knew it not, he who had received an express order to act only between the Moselle and the Maefe (34). Whoever can believe such a thing must be more credulous than a child of four years of age. The absurdity of Chavagnac's narrative will be more evident, if it be considered that Count de Souches had raised himself to so high a post in the Emperor's court. He was a Frenchman, and this was an obstacle not easily to be removed in that court. He was a gentleman born; but his nobility not being attended with a title, and supported by the credit and wealth of his family, would hardly have been of greater use to him to become a General in the French armies, than if he had been a citizen's son: Much more was it insignificant to him in Germany. He had therefore no other way to raise himself but his valour, and the art of war; and he must needs have excelled in it to overcome all the obstacles which a mere French gentleman could meet with at the Emperor's court. We should therefore be very silly to believe that a General besieges and takes a town upon a river (35), and goes along that river for whole months, without knowing its name, nor those of the fortresses that are washed by it; without knowing, I say, that Namur, to which he hath several times approached, is situated upon the Maefe, and not upon the Moselle. Had he behaved himself in that manner, when he had a particular reason to be well informed of the situation of the Maefe, since he had been ordered not to serve beyond that river, he would have been the most ridiculous man in the world; but we should be very near as ridiculous as he, should we believe that he thought he went over the Moselle, when his troops crossed the Maefe at Namur (36). We may therefore look upon this as one of those romances, which to some never appear too extravagant, when they intend to give out a singular thing, or to ridicule an enemy. I omit saying that it is not likely the Emperor gave express orders to Count de Souches not to pass the Maefe. Did not the Emperor design to do as much mischief to the enemy as ever he could? Why then should he have forbidden his General to join with the Dutch and the Spaniards, if such a conjunction was necessary to strike a greater blow? To which I add, that if Count de Souches had perceived that he had been surprised, he would have ordered his army to repass immediately. He would have chose rather to mend his fault in such a manner, than to expose himself to lose his head for having acted against the express orders of his Imperial Majesty. How comes it that Count de Chavagnac, having said that this General cried out, I am undone, forgets to tell us whether his fault was approved or excused? This was necessary in an accurate account; but the writer of those memoirs did not much trouble himself about it. All this confirms the suspicion that there are numberless falsehoods in this part of Count de Chavagnac's memoirs.

After all the observations I have made, the reader will be apt to give no credit to the satirical description he gives of Count de Souches's conduct before Oudenarde (37). I am willing to believe according to the most common opinion that this General would not follow the advice of the rest, nor take with them the necessary measures for the good success of that enterprise; but none can believe the extravagance and cowardly stupidity that he is taxed with in Chavagnac's memoirs. It is plain that author was angry when he wrote that passage. The reader perceives that his pen was guided by the resentment of some offence, and is confirmed in that opinion by considering the conduct of the Imperial court. The punishment inflicted upon Count de Souches was so slight and so disproportioned to what he deserved, were Chavagnac's memoirs true, that this very thing is sufficient to convince us that this author has much aggravated matters. I do not think the relations of Count de Souches need give themselves any trouble to justify him against the reflections of such an enemy (38), who knew not how to observe any appearance of probability or equity; for it is not to be thought that he was ignorant of the reasons on which the Count de Souches grounded his opinions and his conduct. Why did not he say something of the matter at least to console him? equity required it of him.

[F] I shall produce another passage, which will put it out of doubt, and let us into the knowledge of some circumstances very much to the glory of that brave man].

The Swedes took Crembs by storm, and laid siege to Brin. It was here their good fortune made a stand, gave time to the Imperialists to take breath, to take care of themselves, and of the people beyond the river, and to put themselves in a better posture. The commander in the place was Mr de Souche a Rocheller, who, upon some great discontent, had left the Swedes, whom he had served with a religious zeal, and affection, and had the post of a colonel, which he also enjoyed on the other side. Torstenfon, after a siege of three weeks, ordered the place to be summoned, and gave notice, that if they refused to surrender, they should have no quarter: He made answer, that neither would he demand, neither would he grant any. . . . Torstenfon, after having several times stormed the place, mined, fapped, and thrown a great number of grenades into it, was forced to retire. That siege lasted four months, cost the Swedes four thousand men, without reckoning the deserters, acquired immortal honour to the governor, or the favour of his Imperial Majesty, who being desirous to distinguish a man of so rare virtue, made him a Baron, raised his fortune, and gave him a place in the privy-council (39).

(36) To confirm all this, I add that if he had thought that he was passing the Moselle, when he went thro' Namur, he must have believed that he had not yet followed the order of sitting between the Maefe and the Moselle, or he must have thought that he was passing the Moselle to go towards Philipsburg or Nancy, which are monstrous suppositions.

(37) Chavagnac, Mémoires, pag. 390, & seq.

(38) Perhaps they apply to him what the Jesuit Boissier, above, citation (40), of the article SIX. TUS IV.

(39) Parival, Abrégé de l'Histoire de ce Siècle, de fer, Tom. i, pag. 401. Edit. de Bruffels 1658.

SOZOMENUS

SOZOMENUS (JOHN) a Civilian of Venice in the XVIIth century, was originally of the isle of Cyprus, from whence his ancestors retired when it fell under the power of the Turks (a). He hath given a new Latin translation of the ten books of Plato's Republic, which he has reduced to a continued discourse, being originally in the form of a dialogue. This renders the work clearer and shorter. That translation was printed at Venice in the year 1626 in 4to.

SPANHEIM (FREDERIC) professor of Divinity at Leyden, was a man of great merit. He was born at Amberg in the Upper Palatinate the first day of January 1600 (a); and very carefully bred up under the eye of a father, who was not only a learned man, but also very much esteemed at the Electoral Court [A]. After he had studied in the college of Amberg till the year 1613, he was sent the next year to the university of Heidelberg, which was then in a very flourishing condition, where he made so great a progress both in the languages and Philosophy, that it appeared he would one day prove a great man. He returned to his father's house in 1619, and soon after was sent to Geneva to study Divinity. The unhappy state of the Palatinate made him resolve to save his father the charges of his maintenance; and therefore he went into Dauphiné in the year 1621, and was three years in the house of the governor of Ambrun (b) in the quality of preceptor. He had twice a set conference about matters of controversy (c), which was an usual thing at that time, and came off gloriously. He returned to Geneva, and then went to Paris, where he found a kinsman, who was minister of Charenton [B], and dissuaded him from accepting the professorship of Philosophy at Lausanne, which the magistrates of Berne offered him. He took a journey into England for four months in 1625, and after he had made a further stay at Paris, he returned to Geneva, where he disputed for a chair of Philosophy in 1626, and carried it. The year following he married a gentlewoman originally of Poitou [C]. Some time after he was admitted minister, and in the year 1631, he succeeded Benedict Turretin in his professorship of Divinity which was vacant. He discharged the duties of those places both as an able, and an indefatigable man; so that his great reputation, spreading every where, made several universities desirous to have him, that by his means they might become more famous. That of Leyden succeeded best in their suit, for he accepted their offers: but the utmost endeavours were used to keep him at Geneva, and the marks of esteem and affection he received at his departure cannot be expressed. He took his degree of Doctor of Divinity at Basil, to comply with the use of the country he was going to; for neither at Geneva nor in the Protestant academies of France, the professors of Divinity were admitted doctors; it had been of no use to them. He set out from Geneva in the year 1642, after he had been professor of Divinity eleven years successively. He happened to be rector, when they celebrated the jubilee or the secular year of the Reformation, and he made a very fine oration upon that subject. He arrived at Leyden the third of October 1642, where he kept up, and even increased, the reputation he had got; but he died in May 1649. His great labours shortened his days. His lectures, his academical disputations, his sermons (d), the books he wrote, and several domestic cares, and several visits he made, did not hinder him from holding a great correspondence by way of letters. Besides, he was obliged to make visits to the Queen of Bohemia and the Prince of Orange; he was very much esteemed in those two courts. Queen Christina did him the honour to write to him, in order to let him know her great esteem for him, and how much she was pleased with the reading of his works. He published several

(a) See the Epistle Dedicatory of his translation of Plato de Republica.

(a) Ut ita annos cum seculo computaverit, qui lucem cum incluyente anno & seculo primam vidit. Heidanus, in Orat. fun. Fr. Spanheimi. He is mistaken in taking the year 1600, to be the first of the XVIIth century. It is the last of the XVIth. Many commit the same fault.

(b) John de Bonne, Baron de Vitrolle.

(c) First with Father Hugo, a Jesuit of Avignon, who preached the Lent Sermons at Ambrun, and then with a Franciscan of Naples.

(d) He was minister of the Walloon church at Leyden.

[A] He was born . . . of a father, who was not only a learned man, but also very much esteemed at the Electoral Court. His name was WIGAND SPANHEIM; he was Doctor of Divinity, and ecclesiastical counsellor to the Elector Palatine. He married Renata Toffan, daughter of Daniel Toffan, minister of Orleans, and then professor of Divinity at Heidelberg. Daniel Toffan had married Mary Couët, a Parisian, daughter of Philibert Couët, advocate in the parliament of Paris, who had fled to Orleans for her religion with her mother and two sisters in the year 1562. Toffan, in order to avoid the persecution, retired through several by-ways to Montargis, where his wife was brought to bed of a daughter, and Renata of France, Duchess of Ferrara, was her god-mother. That duchess, daughter of Lewis XII, being extremely zealous for the Reformed Religion, received at Montargis as many refugees as she could; but it is not true, as Heidanus will have it, that she kept there Daniel Toffan till the year 1575. We shall see in the article of TOSSAN in what year he retired to Montargis, and when he went away from thence. His daughter Renata (god-daughter of the Duchess of Ferrara) was married to Wigand Spanheim, and was the mother of our Frederic and of two daughters (1). Wigand was a very pious man, a learned Divine, and a good Philologist, as it appears from his letters to Christian Becman (2). He died in the year 1620, having in his hands a letter of his son, which made him cry with joy. Freherus mentions (3) this particular as being taken from the funeral oration of Frederic Spanheim; but he is mistaken, for it is not there. Letto affixus postquam literas à filio Geneva accepisset eas præ gaudio totas lacrymis conpersit, & tenaciter ambabus manibus retinuit, donec in Christo exspiravit A. 1620.

[B] A kinsman, who was minister of Charenton. His name was Samuel Durant: I cannot tell in what degree he was related to him, for the Latin words of my author are ambiguous. Humanissime à Samuele Durantio . . . cognato suo (erat enim Durantii mater soror aviae parentis ejus) exceptus est (4). The ambiguity lies in the parenthesis. For it is uncertain whether the word parentis signifies there the father or the mother; besides, every man having two grand-mothers, we must look back into many families, in order to find the grand-mother of our Spanheim, sister to Durant's mother. The best of it is, that Durant left his whole library to our Frederic Spanheim (5).

[C] He married a gentlewoman originally of Poitou. Heidanus (6) calls her in Latin Charlottam à Portu, which I take to signify Charlotte du Port. She was the daughter of Peter du Port, Lord of Mouillepiep and Boiffaillon, counsellor to the king, and commissary for provisions in his majesty's armies, only son of Joachim du Port, a gentleman of Poitou, Lord of Mouillepiep.

(3) Theatre pag. 406.

(4) Heidanus, ibid. pag. 17.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 18.

(6) Ibid. pag. 19.

(1) Ex Heidano, in Orat. funeb. Frid. Spanheim. pag. 6, 7.

(2) De Wigando Spanheimio nihil aliud mihi compertum est nisi singularis planè & exquisitæ pietatis hominem fuisse, nec Theologica solum sed & Philologica eruditione instructissimum, & linguarum Latine imprimis & Græcæ callentissimum. Id quod ex literis à Spanheimio quæ in operibus Philologici Christiani Becmanni . . . leguntur constat. Heidanus, Orat. funeb. pag. 7.

VOL. V. No. CXXIII.

C c c

several books [D]. He left seven children (e), whereof the two eldest are become very famous [E]. He was rigid in point of innovations [F], and in that respect, spared neither friends nor foes. He could not forbear writing against Amyrault, and did not live long enough to reply to him in the manner he intended. His adversaries boasted of it [G]. A man who cannot be suspected of flattery, hath bestowed upon him praises which will be seen below [H].

Mouillepiéd. The mother of Peter du Port, called Joan du Chêne, was the only daughter of Joseph du Chêne (Sieur de la Violette, Counsellor and physician to the king) and of Anne de Trie, daughter of Margaret Budé, whose father was the learned William Budé (Budæus) (7).

[D] He published several books. At the request of the Envoy of Guitavus Adolphus, at Geneva, he wrote a book intitled, Le Soldat Suedois (8), which sold very well. That book was quickly followed by the Mercure Suisse (9). He published in 1639, a Commentaire Historique de la vie & de la mort de Messire Christofle Vicomte de Dhona, at the widow's request: I shall speak of it hereafter. He published six years after, some memoirs upon the life and death of the most Serene Prince Louis Juliana, Electress Palatine, born Princess of Orange. He undertook that work, at the request of the Queen of Bohemia, all these books are anonymous (10). Le Throne de Grace, de Jugement, & de Gloire, are three sermons excessively long, and written in pretty old French, but they contain excellent things. The first was preached at Charenton. His Dubia Evangelica, in three parts, written at Geneva, on occasion of the objections dispersed among the students of Divinity, by one Antoine, who being a Christian, had turned Jew, is a good book. He composed his Chamierus Contractus, for the benefit of the students of Divinity, who could not conveniently make use of Chamierus's vast Panstratia. Whilst he lived at Leyden, he wrote against Amyrault's hypothesis Exercitationes de gratia universali, in three volumes, in 8vo. Item Epistolam ad Gottierum de conciliatione gratia universali. He also wrote a letter ad Buchanannum de Controversiis Anglicanis, and Vindicia de Gratia universali (11). It is a reply to M. Amyrault, which he could not finish, and it favours of a posthumous piece. The author I quote has omitted a letter, which M. Spanheim wrote to Prince Edward, when he changed his religion. Since he mentions a consolatory letter upon the death of an only son (12), he might also have mentioned this other letter. I must not forget M. Spanheim's speeches, which are very good, especially his funeral oration of Frederic Henry, Prince of Orange. See Balzac's letter of thanks to him, after he had read that oration (13).

(7) Heidanus, Orat. funeb. Fr. Spanheim. pag. 19, 20.
(8) Printed in 1633.
(9) Printed in 1634.
(10) The Epistle Dedicatory of the Commentaire Historique, is signed F. S. that is, Frederic Spanheim. He made use of the same signature in the Epistle Dedicatory of Geneva restituta. The Catalogue of the Bodleian Library, places those two books under the unknown name of F. S. If it be reprinted, these words may be added to it, id est Fredericus Spanheimius.

(11) Heidanus, in Orat. funeb. Spanheimii, pag. 38, & seq.

(12) He observes that it was translated out of French into Dutch and German.

(13) It is the 29th Letter among those that are at the end of the collection of his Letters to Contrart.

(14) He is professor of Philosophy at Berlin.

(15) A Physician of Geneva.

(16) See an Extract of it in the Journal des Sçavans, of the fourth of August 1698, pag. 551, & seq. Dutch Edit.

(17) EXERCITII SPANHEIMI.

(18) FRIDERICI SPANHEIMI.

(19) I write this the 26th of May 1701.

I have said that this Professor of Divinity, is the author of the Commentaire Historique de la vie & de la mort de Messire Christofle Vicomte de Dhona. But I must add, that the word Viscount he made use of, is very improper, and does not answer the title of Burggrave, which has been given to the illustrious family of DHONA for several ages. It is a nobler title than that of Viscount. See the Nouveau Journal des Sçavans, published at Berlin, by Mr Chauvin (14), in 1696: and look for the extract of the first and second volumes of Mr Manger's (15) Bibliotheca Prætica, dedicated to Count Alexander de Dhona, governor to the Electoral Prince of Brandenburg, where you will find some things very instructive concerning the Burggraves. This is not a proper place to enlarge upon the great merit of that count, and the glory of the house of Dhona. I shall only refer the reader to Moreri's Dictionary, and occasionally observe that a fault has crept into it; for instead of saying that Count Alexander's mother was Countess de Terrasserres Montbrun, it should be de Ferrasserres Montbrun. She was the only daughter of Count de Ferrasserres, Lieutenant-General in the French armies, and brother to Mr de St André Montbrun, who was General of the Venetians in Candia, and whose history was printed at Paris, in the year 1698 (16).

[E] He left seven children, whereof the two eldest are become very famous. The first (17) has a perfect knowledge of medals, and all sorts of literature: besides, his embassies give him a glorious rank among statesmen. He is a person of an extraordinary merit. The second (18) died within these few days (19), being Professor of Divinity at Leyden. He had been a long time in that employment, and was justly accounted one of the most considerable men in the Reformed Church. He has written several books, which have procured him a great reputation. The Journalists have often made honourable mention of him. That of Paris, tho' it seldom speak of books written by Protestant ministers, yet has given large extracts of this learned man's Ecclesiastical History: you will find them in the twenty-eighth volume of the Journal des Sçavans. Whoever desires to be informed of the great learning of Mr Spanheim the eldest, need only read his book de Præstantia & usu Numismatum, which I have quoted before (20); the five letters he wrote to Mr Morel, a famous Antiquarian, and a great Medallist, which have been printed with the Specimen universæ rei nummarie antiquæ, published by the same Mr Morel at Leipzig, in 1695; his notes upon Callimachus, and Julian's Cæsars, and some other tracts, the titles whereof may be seen in Moreri's Dictionary of the Paris edition 1699; together, with a list of all his employments in the courts of princes (21), till he was sent the fourth time to the court of France after the peace of Ryfwic. He was at Paris from that time till the beginning of the year 1701, that is, till his Electoral Highness of Brandenburg became King of Prussia. He took then his audience of leave, because the change of the ceremonial was not yet regulated at the court of France. He is lately (22) gone into England by order of the new king, his matter. I shall observe by the by, that this new epoch of the royalty of Prussia will signalize the beginning of the XVIIIth century, and that there was in it a remarkable concurrence of circumstances; for about the same time that the Electress of Brandenburg was crowned Queen of Prussia, the Electress of Brunswic, her mother, daughter to the King of Bohemia, was named to succeed to the crown of England. Never have two princesses better deserved than these to fill a throne, or to renew the glory acquired by Queen Elizabeth.

[F] He was rigid in point of innovation. It was a maxim with him, that we ought to make war even against our own brethren, whenever they act against Orthodoxy: The neglect of little evils, said he, will sometimes occasion the greatest disorders. Sæpe profitemur audivimus se licet mallet cum Ecclesiæ hostibus congressi, tamen & bellum illis etiam fratribus indicendum judicare, qui vel data opera, vel ex ignorantia & infirmitate periculis illam subruerent. Quod enim initio parvum videtur, id sæpe neglectum magna incendia dare in progressu. Cum cui quis semel patrocinium commodavit ei mordicus inhaeret, & sæpe error non detectus cum occultè serpant, placere incipit, & tandem pudor est retrahere quæ semel defunderis (23). A hundred fine reasons may be alledged to maintain this common topic, and this great maxim; but, in order to persuade, they ought to be attended with choler. With such an ingredient they generally produce a conviction; but without it, they are weak, and are confuted by a hundred other fine maxims. Heidanus observes, that the person he praises, was a man of a fiery temper (24). That fire is a wonderful light to shew that the reasons alledged for toleration, are bad ones, and that those who cry out, to arms, to arms, bella, horrida bella, have well dived into the bottom of things. Tros Rutulique suat, nullo discrimine babebo (25); no matter tho' they be friends, allies, or relations; let us fall upon them, per calcatum perge patrem (26); this is the cause of truth.

[G] His adversaries boasted of it. See the passage quoted by Colomelius out of a book of M. Amyrault (27).

[H] A man . . . hath bestowed upon him praises which will be seen below. Sorbieri is the person I speak of: what he says of M. Spanheim deserves to be transcribed; it contains some particulars that will be acceptable to the curious; and besides, they belong to the design of this Dictionary. Barleus, says he (28), having made a funeral oration in verse, upon the death of the Prince of Orange, and Dr Spanheim having delivered one in prose, was very much displeased with the inequality of their reward; for, as Salmasius aversity

(20) In the text of the article ABDEKA.

(21) That list had already appeared in the Dutch edition of Moreri's Dictionary, down to the year 1693.

(22) I write this in May 1701.

(23) Heidan. in Orat. fun. Fr. Spanheim. p. 34.

(24) Oligotus, etiam ut ipse dicitur, fuit & subtilis cholera nonnulli habuit, quæ inter famulæ salubre momento locustebatur, at tunc fumo & adeo momento dispersgebatur. Ibid. pag. 33.

(25) Virgil. Æn. lib. 3, ver. 108.

(26) Ita apud illum prepotens erat amor virtutis ut nulla remittit iura, nullæ necessitudines, nullus necesse illum à defendenda illa avocanda possent. tere possent. Ibid. pag. 33.

(27) Colomelius in Gallia Orientali pag. 208.

(28) Sorbieri, Letter ixv, pag. 442, 443.

said, it was a great oversight to give the pay of a trooper to a foot-soldier, and that of a foot-soldier to a trooper. Barleus received but five hundred livres, and the other five hundred crowns. All that I can tell you of the latter, is what was said of him after his decease, viz. That Salmasius had killed him, and that Morus had been the dagger. It is a long story, and, to be short, I shall only tell you that Salmasius did not love the late Mr Spanheim, from a jealousy of merit and reputation for learning; that, in order to mortify him, he caused Mr Morus to be sent for into Holland, whom he only knew by his name, but he was the scourge and the aversion of his colleague; that the doctor left no stone unturned to prevent his coming, and that he died when he heard that his adversary was set out on his journey. However I must do this justice to that learned German, even by Salmasius's confession, who was not prodigal of his praises, that he had a strong head, and full of learning; that he was fit for business, steady and dexterous, zealous and laborious. He read public lectures of Divinity four times in a week; and besides made private ones upon different subjects to his scholars; he heard the probation sermons of the students of Divinity; he preached in two languages, German and French; he visited the sick; he wrote a vast number of letters; he composed at the same time, two or three books upon quite different subjects; he assisted every Wednesday at his Highness's council, who sent for him to the Hague; he was rector of the university; and notwithstanding so many occupations, he kept an account of all the expenses of his house, that was full of boarders.

S P I F A M E (JAMES PAUL) Bishop of Nevers in the XVIth century, left his bishopric, and retired to Geneva, in order to profess the Reformed Religion. He went by the name of Monsieur de Passy (a), and at last he became minister, to have, as it is said, a more easy access into the councils, and a greater share in affairs (b). The parliament of Paris issued out a warrant against him in the year 1559 (c). He was very serviceable to the Protestant cause in Germany, whither the Prince of Condé sent him to justify his taking up arms (d). He published there the four letters which Catherine de Medicis had written to that prince, to recommend to him the welfare of the kingdom, and the interest of the king her son (e); he discovered many secrets, obtained great succours of the Princes of Germany (f), and harangued the Emperor at the Diet of Francfort in the year 1562, with so much force, that it proved one of the best manifestos of the Protestants (g). He caused the Reisters and Lansquenets to be recalled, and Count de Rocquendolfe, and other chiefs, who commanded them in the king's service, to be put to the ban of the empire (h). He made three speeches in that country. His end was not answerable to such a noble beginning (i); for he found himself involved in some crimes, for which he was beheaded at Geneva the twenty-third of March 1566 [A]. His birth, his parts, and his learning, might have raised him to the highest dignities in France, where he had quickly gone through several employments [B]. Nothing can be more absurd than what Moreri says, that Calvin caused him to be put to death [C]. Others ascribe his tragical end to Beza's jealousy [D], but cannot prove it. I have confuted in another

(c) Spondan. An-
nal. Eccle. ad
ann. 1559, num.
18. See also Thuanus, lib.
xxii, pag. 453.

(d) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Castelnau, Tom. i,
pag. 796.

(e) Id. ibid.

(f) Id. ibid.
Tom. ii, pag. 29.

(g) You will find his Oration in Le Laboureur's additions, ibid.
pag. 29.

(h) Id. ibid. pag.
42.

(i) Thuan. lib.
xxxiii, pag. 675.

(a) Le Labou-reur, Addit. à Castelnau, Tom.
ii, pag. 29.

(b) Id. ibid. pag.
53.

(1) Spon, Histoire de Geneve,
book iii, pag.
263, Utrecht
1685. See also
Mr Leti, Historia Genevrina,
Tom. iii, p. 162.

[A] . . . In some crimes for which he was beheaded at Geneva the twenty-third of March, 1566.] Mr Spon gives the following account of it (1): 'James Paul Spifame, Bishop of Nevers, having left his bishopric, and a yearly income of forty thousand livres, retired to Geneva, to profess the doctrine of the Protestants. He presented a petition to be made a citizen, which was granted him, and even was admitted into the councils of two hundred and of sixty. The magistrates, and the men of letters, had a great esteem for him on account of his learning. Some time after he was sent into France to serve there as a minister; but the magistrates of Geneva were informed that he privately endeavoured to get another bishopric. Wherefore at his return, his conduct was more narrowly observed, and his former life examined. It was found out that before his marriage he had a child by the woman he married, and left it should be accounted a bastard, he caused a false contract of marriage to be made and antedated, and a false seal to be put to it, that his son might inherit his estate, which was pretty considerable. For all these causes he was imprisoned, and having confessed the whole matter, he was beheaded in the place du Molard, with a great repentance of his faults, which he shewed by a fine discourse he made to the people upon the scaffold. Some will have it that those accusations were only a pretence to condemn him, but that he was really executed to gratify Catherine de Medicis, who had bribed the Syndics, being solicited to it by the Pope.' See the passage of Mr de Roccolles in the remark [E].

[B] His birth, his parts, and his learning, might have raised him . . . he had . . . gone through several employments.] 'He was of a noble family, originally come from Lucca, and settled at Paris in the year 1550, when BARTHOLOMEW SPIFAME was living, from whom are descended all those of that name, lords of Bisseaux, Granges, and Passy. His father was JOHN SPIFAME, Sieur de Passy, secretary to the king, and pay-master-general to the army; and his mother Jaquette Ruzé: he was the youngest of five brothers . . . The progress he made in learning procured him an office of counsellor in the parliament of Paris; afterwards he became president of the inquests, master of the requests, and counsellor of state; and he shewed to great a capacity and learning in all his employments, that having devoted himself to the Church, there was no dignity above the great reputation he was in. From a canon of Paris, chancellor of the university, and an abbot of St Paul of Sens, he became great vicar of Charles Cardinal de Lorraine, Archbishop of Rheims, and in that quality, he was named by Henry II, to the bishopric of Nevers, of which he took possession in the year 1548 (2). . . . Being intoxicated with his learning and reputation, he followed the new opinions as some of the most learned prelates had done, and left the Romish Church to take a wife (3).

[C] Nothing can be more absurd than what Moreri says, that Calvin caused him to be put to death.] See with what rhetorical flourishes he adorned his Dictionary. Calvin, who was then the great Caliph of Geneva, the infamous receptacle of Heresy and Heretics, being acted by an intolerable vanity, thought that every body was to submit to him, and was not satisfied with the civility Spifame shewed him, and perhaps, having observed that Spifame repented of his Apostasy, he falsely accused him of some crimes, especially of being a meer spy at Geneva, and caused him to be beheaded to be revenged of him. This happened on the 25th of March 1565 (4). That passionate author might be confuted several ways; but I shall only use this chronological reason. Calvin died the 27th of May 1564, and Spifame was beheaded the 23d of March 1566, according to Mr Spon, who, in that respect, is a more credible author than those who place that execution on the 25th of March 1565 (5). Though we should prefer this date to that of Mr Spon, and suppose it agrees with the custom of beginning the year in January, it were still most certain, that Calvin died above nine months before this late Bishop of Nevers was executed.

[D] Others ascribe his death to Beza's jealousy.] Le Laboureur speaks of it as confidently as if he had some proofs for it. Beza, says he (6), who envied him mortally, did so narrowly observe him, when that man (7) was vexed to be reduced to a miserable and private life, that

(2) Le Labou-
reur, Addit. à Castelnau, Tom.
ii, pag. 51, 52.

(3) Id. ibid. pag.
53.

(4) Moreri, at the word Spifame. This passage has been left out in the Dutch editions.

(5) Mr Le Laboureur, Tom. ii,
pag. 53, is one of them.

(6) Le Labou-
reur, ibid.

(7) Man refers to Spifame. A good author would not have left so fallacious an equivocation.

SPIFAME.

196

(k) See the Nouvelles Lettres de la Critique Générale du Calvinisme de Mr Maimbourg, pag. 460, & seq.

(l) Catherineot, Calvinisme de Berri, pag. 3.

(m) Huber. Lanquetus, Epistola lxvii, lib. ii, pag. 197.

book (k) Maimbourg's reflexions, and therefore I need not do it again. One of those, who wrote against his History of Calvinism, wants to be rectified. He has given us several curious particulars concerning the true cause of that bishop's execution [E]. It is not true that Spifame wrote a book under the name of Peter Richer [F]. Some say he assisted at the council of Trent, and was afterwards minister of the communion in the town-house of (1). It is certain, that when the Reformed received the communion in the town-house of Bourges, towards the beginning of the year 1562, it was he who officiated. He went thither from Ifoudun, with a guard of 150 troopers (m). The author, who informs me of this, says, in a letter dated from Paris the eleventh of December 1561, that Spifame had been called by the Reformed Church of Lyons, to be their minister, and that four years before he had been accused of Lutheranism, for which he would have been put to death, had he not quickly fled to Geneva (n).

(n) Ibid. Epist. lxiv, suprad. lib. pag. 184.

that he made him suspected of keeping intelligence with Queen Catherine and the Catholics, and of intending to leave Geneva. He was imprisoned, tried, and beheaded the 25th of March 1565, and was the first victim of the liberty he had procured to that city (8). Beza, who was his enemy, not contented with his execution, made the following Latin verses against his memory, wherein he could not forbear reflecting upon him, concerning the maxims of his religion, for preferring a wife to a bishopric; and besides, he owns, that she was rather a concubine than a lawful wife. That author quotes ten Latin verses, which he ascribes to Beza, upon the death of James Spifame, with a cruel answer that was made to them likewise in Latin verse. I question whether it can be proved that the epigram of ten verses has been justly ascribed to Beza. It will not be improper to see what he answered to Claudius de Saintes, who had reproached him with some things relating to James Spifame: 'Spifamius mihi nunquam collega fuit, & cur ego illum odissem, à quo nunquam injuriam acceperam? num, sicut in alterius nomine ineptus ille tuus monitor mihi exprobrat, nequē veterer ne meis luminibus officeret? Atqui, neque hoc ille unquam cogitavit, opinor, neque (absit verbo invidia) causa ulla fuit cur id timerem. Ais tamen illi à me intentata vana crimina fuisse proditiōis, illiciti matrimonii, & stupri, quum longe gravius ipso in istis deliquissem. Quod si vana illa fuerunt, quomodo ille minus quam ego graviter deliquerit? an quod apud vos ista pro nihilo ducatur? At tu hominum vanissime, vide quam teipsum fallas. Num enim ego accusator, num subscriptor in iis fui quæ nunquam in illius causa in disceptationem venerunt? Nam de proditiōe vel stupro nulla quod sciam fuit mentio. Sciunt autem omnes ex hujus civitatis more qua quisque de causa damnatur. Nec de adulterio quaesitum est. De quo igitur dices? hoc verò tu ex me non audies, qui ne hæc quidem nisi à te coactus commemoro. Jure tamen damnatum fuisse si mihi non credis, ipsimet saltem credere te oportuit (9). . . . Spifame was never my colleague, and why should I hate him who never did me any injury? Is it, what your foolish monitor upbraids me with in the name of another person, because I am afraid lest he should eclipse my glory? But he never had so much as any thoughts of doing it, in my opinion, nor (to speak without envy) had I any ground to fear it. But you say that I have charged him with the vain crimes of treason, unlawful marriage, and fornication, when I am much more guilty of these crimes than Spifame. If these are vain crimes, how could he be more innocent of them than I am? Are they accounted trivial with you? But, most vain man, see how you deceive yourself. Could I accuse him of any thing, or could I subscribe to any thing which was never considered in his trial? For as to treason or fornication, in my knowledge there was no mention made of them. And every body knows, according to the custom of this city, for what crimes any man is condemned. Nor was he charged with adultery. With what then say you? But this you shall not know from me, who would not have mentioned these things, if you had not forced me to it. But if you will not believe me, that he was justly condemned, you ought to believe himself. There are three things in this Latin passage. 1. That Spifame was not a man who pretended to be afraid of such a thing. 2. That Beza did not set up for an accuser of Spifame. 3. That Spifame was not accused either of adultery, or of fornication, or of treason. Mezerai is therefore to blame for saying that upon I know not what umbrage that was taken at him, at Geneva, he was accused of adultery, and beheaded for that pretended crime (10).

(8) Theod. Beza, Apologia altera ad F. Claudium de Saintes, pag. 361.

(10) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. vi, towards the end, pag. 450.

[E] Rocolles wants to be rectified. He has given us some curious particulars about the true cause of that bishop's execution.] Spifame . . . having retired to Geneva could not be quiet. Having formed an intrigue with the counsellors of the Queen-mother, Catherine de Medicis, to get the Catholics restored in the town, and to enable the bishop to come into it with main force, in hopes of being provided with a new bishopric, better than that of Nevers, his treacherous practices were discovered by Grillon, Colonel of the regiment of guards, who gave notice of it to the agent of Geneva who attended the court. The agent took care to acquaint the magistrates of Geneva with it: whereupon Spifame was arrested; and the pretence on which he was brought to his trial, was that he kept a married woman, and not, as Maimbourg brutally says, that he had made a false contract, or false seals. Spifame not being guilty of any such crime; but adultery may be punished with death according to the law Julia de adulteriis. It was upon this just pretence that he was beheaded in the place du Molard, without mentioning his conspiracy, for fear of displeasing the court of France. And to prevent that court from concerning themselves for him, and sending an express to save his life, the council made a quick dispatch of his trial, which ended the third day after he had been arrested (11). You see here a severe reflexion upon Maimbourg without a cause; for that Jesuit goes upon the credit of a Protestant writer (12). The same author tells us that Spifame was condemned under pretence of adultery, which is not true. He takes no notice of a falsity in Maimbourg. The Prince of Condé, says he (13), employed Spifame in other things besides making sermons; for he sent him into Germany to demand the succours, which he could not obtain. It is certain he obtained them. Beza (14), d'Aubigné (15), Le Laboureur (16), and several others say so. And Maimbourg himself mentions above three hundred Reisters, and four thousand Lanquetus (17), whom the Prince of Condé received from Germany.

(11) Rocolles, l'Histoire véritable du Calvinisme, pag. 444, 445.

(12) Mr Spoc. See the remark [A].

(13) Maimbourg, Hist. du Calvinisme, lib. iv, pag. 285.

(14) Beza, Hist. des Eglises, book vi, pag. 33.

(15) D'Aubigné, Hist. Univ. Tom. i, book iii, ch. xii, pag. 226.

(16) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mémoires de Castelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 42. See the text of this article.

(17) Maimbourg, Hist. du Calvinisme, book iv, pag. 285.

[F] It is not true that Spifame wrote a book under the name of Peter Richer. Du Verdier Vau-Privas says (18), that James Spifame, who left his bishopric, wrote, under the name of Peter Richer, a confutation of the idle fancies and lies of Nicholas Durand, called the Chevalier de Villegaignon, in the year 1562, in 8vo. Moreri affirms the same thing. But I have shewed before (19) that Peter Richer is a real man, and not a fictitious name.

(18) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 620.

(19) In the article of this Richer.

SPINA

SPINA (ALPHONSUS) a Spanish Jew being converted to the Christian religion became a Franciscan Friar, and was rector of the academy of Salamanca, and at last Bishop of Orense (a). He wrote a book intitled, Fortalium Fidei contra Judæos, Saracenos, alioque Christiana Fidei inimicos [A]. He tells us himself that he was composing it at Valladolid in the year 1458 (b).

(a) A city of Galicia.

[A] He wrote a book intitled Fortalium Fidei, &c. Some have been of opinion that a Dominican Friar, called William Totan, was the author of it; but they should only have said that he published a new edition of it, which is that of Lyons in 1511. The first is printed at Nuremberg in 1494, in 4to. The name of the author was not put to it, only it was said in the title, that it was composed per quendam Doctorem eximium Ordinis Minorum anno 1459 in partibus Occidentis. Mariana hath informed us, that it is a work of Francis Spina (1). Mr Wharton, who hath made an analysis of it (2), censures those who have ascribed it to Thomas Patriarche Barbarinfi. He might have censured those who attribute it to Bartholomew de Spina who lived in the XVIIth century. Selden and Mr Hoornbeeck give it, either to that Bartholomew, or to William Totan (3). Mr Hoornbeeck has been censured (4) for having

(1) Mariana, de Rebus Hispan. lib. xii, cap. xiii.

(2) Whart. Append. ad Cave de Script. Eccl. pag. 143.

(3) See Crenii, Animadv. Philol. & Hist. Part. xiii, pag. 87.

(4) Ibid. pag. 22.

said that this work was printed in the year 1490. He might also have been criticized for having said that this Bartholomew de Spina, was a Carmelite Friar of Cologne (5): he was a Dominican and a native of Pisa. Theophilus Raynaud affirms that 'this same Bartholomew hath set his name to the Fortalium Fidei, in order to appropriate the work to himself (6): but he does not name the edition where that is to be seen.

The opinion of Mr du Pin concerning the Fortalium Fidei, is as follows. 'It is a work which promises more in the title than is to be found in the body of the book; for it is not well done: there is nothing in it sufficiently examined, and he often brings very weak proofs, reasonings, and answers. Nevertheless there is some learning in it, and it may be of some use (7).'

(b) Fortalit. Fidei, lib. ii. Consider. vii, Hier. v, fol. 61, apud Hent. Wharton, Append. ad Cave de Script. Eccl. pag. 143.

(c) Hoornb. de convert. Judæis, in Prælog. p. 9.

(6) Theoph. Rayn. de malis ac bonis Libris, num. 272, pag. m. 166.

(7) Du Pin, Bibl. Tom. xii, pag. 100, Edit. of Holland.

(a) He is also called de L'Espine.

(b) In the article CHARPENTIER, remark [A].

SPINA (a) (JOHN DE) in Latin Spinæus, a Protestant minister in the XVIIth century, had been a Monk. I shall observe upon what occasion he forsook his order [A], and sided with the Protestants. He did many services to the cause. He was one of the deputies at the conference of Poissi: I have said in another place (b), that he was distinguished from the ministers that were called factious, and that he and du Rosier disputed with two Catholic doctors in the year 1566 (c). The Church of Rochelle desired him to be their minister in the year 1561, and sent some deputies to him at Fontenai le Comte (d); but the consequences of that deputation are not known. He wrote very edifying books [B], full of piety and good morality. He died at Saumur in 1594 (e). Anjou was his native country, as La Croix du Maine observes. He escaped the Paris massacre, because the murderers were too eager in running after a lady whom he accompanied, and killing her in the river (f). I do not think he was then seventy-eight years old, as it is affirmed in a marginal note of Varillas's History of Charles IX, of the Paris edition in 12mo 1684.

(c) In the article R. C. SIER, remark [B].

(d) Vincent, Recherches sur les commencemens de la Reformation de la Rochelle, p. 65.

(e) Id. ibid. pag. 68.

(f) Varillas, Hist. de Charles IX, Tom. ii, pag. m. 4. 8. See also Thuanus, lib. iii, pag. m. 1078.

[A] I shall observe upon what occasion he forsook his order. Mr Vincent's grandmother by his mother's side said, that John Rabec was taken at Chateau-Gontier, in Anjou, in her father's house. Mr de l'Espine, who was then a Carmelite, and was going to preach at Angers, happened to be in that house, where he was known and well beloved, as one who had a great reputation, though he was but a young man. He had been there some days with Rabec, without knowing him; but being well pleased with his conversation, he was very much concerned for his imprisonment: which moved him to pay him several visits in his prison, in order to dissuade him from the Reformed Religion, and bring him back to the Catholic. His visits had an effect quite contrary to his intention; for Rabec's arguments convinced him, and prevailed upon him by degrees. Besides, he was extremely moved with the admirable constancy Rabec expressed when he was burnt, and with the wonder GOD wrought in him; for though his tongue had been cut off, he sang at the place of execution with an audible voice, the LXXXIXth Psalm.

O GOD, the Gentiles do invade
Thine heritage, to spoil, &c.

As he was continually reflecting upon those things, he made no doubt that the doctrine, against which he had so much disputed with Rabec, was that which he ought to embrace. He therefore preached it at Angers above a year, though without openly professing it, and quitting his habit. He censured several abuses; and instead of insisting, as others of his profession did, upon Indulgences, Pilgrimages, and the Intercession of the Saints, he exhorted his hearers to repent, and to implore the Divine Grace through JESUS CHRIST. He was very much followed at first; but at last he was suspected, which made him think of removing. He went to Renata of France, Duchess of Ferrara, who was a Protestant and resided at Montargis. This is what Mr Vincent, a minister of Rochelle (1), heard his grandmother say several times. He observes, that she was twelve or thirteen years of age, when Mr de l'Espine and Rabec happened to meet at Chateau-Gontier, and that she died in the year 1624, being about 80 years old (2). This Chronology is not very exact; and indeed a great accuracy is seldom minded in such narratives. We read in Beza, that Rabec was arrested at Chateau-Gontier the first of August 1555, and that he suffered martyrdom the 24th of April 1556 (3). Mr Vincent's grandmother must therefore have been then younger than she said, or must have lived more years than her grandson gives her. Note, as he observes (4), that L'Espine had been an Augustin Monk, if we rely upon the preface of his tracts. Others say, he had been a Dominican (5). D'Aubigné (6) says he did not make an open profession of the Protestant religion, until the conference of Poissi.

(1) Vincent, Recherches sur les commencemens de la Reformation en la Ville de la Rochelle, pag. 65, & seq.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 68.

(3) Beza, Hist. Ecclesiast. book ii, pag. 108.

(4) Vincent, Recherches, &c.

(5) Varillas, Hist. de l'Herésie, book xxiiv, pag. m. 254.

(6) D'Aubigné, Hist. Univers. Tom. i, book ii, ch. xxv, pag. 146.

[B] He wrote very edifying books. Here follow the titles of them: Traicté des tentations, & moiens d'y résister, Lyons 1566, in 8vo. Traicté consolatoire contre toutes afflictions, qui adviennent ordinairement aux fideles Chrestiens, Lyons 1565, in 8vo. Traicté pour offer la crainte de mort, & la faire desirer à l'homme fidele, Lyons 1558, in 8vo. He published also some controversial pieces, among others, Discours du vrai sacrifice & du vrai sacrificeur, Lyons 1564. Défense & Confirmation du Traicté du vrai sacrifice & sacrificeur à l'encontre des frivoles réponses & arguments de René Benoist Docteur en Theologie, Geneva 1567, in 8vo (7). Some of his works were translated into Latin; for we have of him the following books in that tongue, De tranquillitate animi libri 7. De justitia Christiana, de confessione peccatorum, de agrotis consolandis & de Providentia Dei. He made an excellent Sermon at Rochelle in 1587, upon the LORD's Supper, which Mr Vincent intended to publish (8). Simon Goulart of Senlis published in 1591, a collection of excellent discourses made by John de l'Espine, to which, as he used to do, he added notes and summaries. They are the same seven books concerning the tranquillity of the mind, which, as has been said above, were translated into Latin (§).

(7) Taken from Du Verdier's, Bibliothèque Française, pag. 688.

(8) Vincent, Recherches, &c. pag. 69.

[§] The edition of Rochelle in 16mo printed by Jerom Haütin, 1594, hath an Epistle Dedicatory of Simon Goulart to Mr de la Nouë, dated in the year 1587. R. E. M. C. R. I. T.]

D d d

SPINOSA

V O L. V.

SPINOSA (JOHN DE) lived in the XVIth century. He was born at Belovado in the province of Rioja in the kingdom of Castile, and at fourteen years of age was taken into the house of the Marquis d'Alarcon. He became an able man, and shewed so much integrity, that the marquis conceived a particular affection and esteem for him, so far as to entrust him with the greatest secrets, and to consult him on the most important affairs. After the decease of that lord, Don Pero Gonzalez de Mendoça, his son-in-law, succeeded him in his offices, and was afterwards made Captain-General in Sicily by the Emperor Charles V. He made John de Spinosa secretary of the cyphers, and of state affairs, and was very well satisfied with his conduct; for when Barberouffe's fleet occupied all the streights of Messina, John de Spinosa was so fortunate and dexterous as to cross the Streights, and bring into Sicily the emperor's orders, and the money due to the soldiers. Some time after he quelled the mutiny of the troops in the kingdom of Naples. He followed the same Mendoça in the wars of Piedmont, and was his secretary; and after the death of that lord, he was sent twice to Venice for the affairs of the Milanese. That employment made him stay twelve years at Venice, and gave him occasion to discover some qualities, which procured him the approbation and the praises of the Venetians. He also received several marks of a particular esteem from the Emperors Charles V, and Ferdinand, and from Philip II. He commanded in some provinces of Lombardy under the Duke de la Cueva, governor of the Milanese, and General of the Spaniards in Italy. He had before commanded in a part of Abruzzo with great probity, where he caused two famous robbers to be punished [A]. He loved study, applied himself to it as much as his employments and journeys could permit him; and even wrote some pieces (a) [B].

(a) Taken from the preface which Jerome Serranus prefixed to the Gynæceum, of John de Spinosa, printed at Milan in 1580.

[A] Where he caused two famous robbers to be punished. One of them was so cruel, that he drank the blood of those whom he killed; the other added a horrid lewdness to his robberies and murders, for he ravished as many women as he could get. Here are the Spanish words of my author. 'Gouernò en Abbruzzo el estado de la valle Siciliana, dando de su integridad muy grandes fennales, con su pobreza: De su prudentia con diversos juizios, y sentencias notables: y de su justitia con la muerte de Prospera Camisola cruelissimo homicida, e, insolentissimo violador de mugeres, y de Entino de Baxan, atroce salteador de caminos, (y tan inhumano, que como fiera saluaje acostumbraua beuer la sangre de aquellos aquien por los bolques heria, o mataua: y con la cabeza de scachia diablo puesta por terror de los mal hechores, en una pica a las almenas; y su cuerpo en quatro partes, en los pafios mas peligrosos del estado (1). - - He governed in Abruzzo, in the Sicilian valley, and gave very great proofs of his integrity, notwithstanding his poverty; of his prudence by several remarkable sentences and punishments; and of his justice by putting to death Prospero Camisola, a most cruel murderer, and a most insolent ravisher of women, and Entino de Baxan, a notorious highway-man, (so inhuman that, like a wild beast, he used to drink the blood of those whom he wounded or murdered in the woods) he ordered his head to be placed on a pole for the terror of wicked men, his body to be quartered, and his quarters to be placed in the most suspicious roads of the country.'

(1) Hieronymus Serranus, in Præfat. Dialogi en laude de las Mugeres.

[B] And even wrote some pieces. I have only seen his Gynæceum, or his Dialogo en laude de las Mugeres. It was printed at Milan in 4to, in the year 1580, and dedicated by the author to Mary of Austria, daughter of the Emperor Charles V, and wife of the Emperor Maximilian II. Women are highly praised in that book, which is stuffed with examples and quotations; the choice whereof is none of the best. The author promised a second part, wherein he was to bestow encomiums upon several illustrious ladies of that age. I wish he had performed his promise, and that I might see his book. He wrote another book, intituled, Micracanthos, wherein he inserted the actions and memorable sayings of great men, and observed the tragical end of the wicked, that his book might teach his readers how to attain to glory, and how to avoid infamy. He inserted in it a digression concerning those, who take delight in speaking ill of a book. It will be thought to be good, if we judge of it by the following words. They are very judicious, and teach us how to make a difference between censures and flatteries, and then between censures that may be useful, and those that can be of no use. Pero contra aquellos que . . . quiescien por ventura en otras cosas tacharme: dextare por agora de hazer excusaciones, o, respuesta defensiva; refiriendome ala apologia que en el micracanthos tengo escrita. Donde suficientemente se tratta delas species de maldicientes, y detractores: y dela reprehension que deue (exclusas todas las de mas) aceptar, y como obra saludable, y virtuosa, agradecerse. Alo qual remi tiendome, solamente dire agora, que fin delear contra los mal dicentes, y arrogantes burladores; mas venganza de aquella con que la scriptura los amenaza diziendo, parata sunt derisoribus judicia. † Prov. Salom. cap. xii. Y sin admitir por otra parte, las alabanzas enganno, fas delos aduladores: sperare gratamente con defeo, y humildad la correction delos buenos, y sabios varones. Teniendo para ello siempre en la memoria, aquellas divinas palabras del Ecclesiaste, que dizen, † Melius est à sapiente corripi: quam stultorum adulatione decipi (2). - - As for what relates to detraction, I shall not enter now upon that subject, but refer to what I have said in my Micracanthos, wherein I treat of the different species of slanderers and detractors, and of the reproofs that are to be thankfully received, as wholesome and virtuous. I shall only say as to slanderers and proud scoffers, that they shall meet with a due chastisement, as the Scripture threatens them, Judgments are prepared for scornful. And, on the other side, as we ought not to give ear to the deceitful praises of flatterers, so we must receive with gratitude, pleasure, and humility, the corrections of good and wise men, always remembering these divine words of Ecclesiastes, It is better to hear the rebuke of the wise, than for a man to hear the song of fools. Nicolas Antonio (3) never saw that Micracanthos; (3) See his Bibl. Scri. tot. Hispanie, at the word Joannes de Epinosa, Tom. i. pag. 521.

Nicolas Antonio (3) never saw that Micracanthos; add, that our Spinoza made a large collection of proverbs, and filled it with moral reflexions. He did not publish it, and gave his reasons for it in the second part of the Micracanthos. 'Ha escrito algunas otras obras. Entre las quales (allende de los Dialogos dichos): no es de poca importancia, la que yo he visto de mas de seismil proverbios vulgares que ha recogido, y parte dellos compuesto; (aunque no acabada de comentar, ni impresa; por las causas que in los posteros razonamientos de la segunda parte del Micracanthos, se dize) obra cierto de maravillosa Doctrina, y provecho, y muy agradable: (ainfi como las otras) por la copia, y diversidad de las materias, Todas ellas puramente aplicadas ala virtud (4). - - He wrote some other works; among which (besides the above-mentioned dialogues) the most considerable part which I have seen, contains more than six thousand proverbs, which he collected, and part of which he himself composed (tho' he did not finish his comments on them, nor publish them, for the reasons he gave in his last discourse in the second part of the Micracanthos), a work surely of wonderful doctrine, profitable, and very entertaining, (as well as his other works) by the copiousness and variety of matters which they contain. He employed them for the advancement of virtue.'

This author may be therefore added to those, who were mentioned in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres for the year 1686. I shall set down the passage, without minding the morose humour of those, who will

AUTHORS, who have written on Proverbs.

will not like it: I rather chuse to have a regard for those, who will be very well pleased with it. 'Mr Menage promises to publish an etymological treatise upon the French proverbs. There are few subjects that are so curious as that is, and that require a greater skill in the knowledge of history. There has been a vast number of proverbs in all languages. Didymus made a collection of them in ten books, which he dedicated to those, who had writ upon that subject. Aldus Manutius published something of Didymus's work with Tharraeus's proverbs, in the year 1505. But it is to be observed, that Greek and Latin proverbs are not so numerous, as Erasmus, and those who have collected what was omitted by him, would make us believe; for it is certain, and they have been sufficiently censured for it, that they took for a proverbial expression what was not so. Oudin made a pretty large collection of French proverbs, intituled, Curiositez Françaises, but he does not give their etymologies. The dialogues between a clown and a Philosopher have been often reprinted at Paris; they contain the origin of a considerable number of proverbs, sometimes right, and sometimes wrong. The edition of 1665 is intituled, Les illustres Proverbes nouveaux & Historiques expliqués par diverses Questions curieuses & morales 2 vol. in 12mo. Mr Furetiere, who has published a second case very satirical against several members of the French academy, pretends that the proverbs of his Universal Dictionary are not taken from that of the academy, and that in order to remove their meaness, he has enriched most of them by enquiring into their origin, or applying to them curious histories, and comparing them with the proverbs of other nations, such as Paquier, Belinghen, and other grave authors, have not thought unworthy of their pen (5). A good supplement might be made to this long passage. It might be said that Belinghen, mentioned by Furetiere, should have been called Fleury de Belinghen, which was his true name. I think he taught French in Holland. He published at the Hague in 1656, L'Etymologie ou Explication des Proverbes François, divided into three books by way of a dialogue. It is a book in 8vo of 303 pages. The Premiers essais des Proverbes, published by that author in 1653, having met with a good reception, he resolved to put out a second edition much larger, viz. that whose title I have just now mentioned. Mr de Brieux published at Caen the origins of some proverbs in the year 1672, in 12mo. If we go higher, we shall find at the end of Nicod's Dictionary (6) the Explications morales d'aucuns Proverbes communs en la Langue Française, with a translation of some French proverbs into Latin verse, by Joannes Agidius Nucernensis. You will find in Morhofius's Polybistor many things upon this subject; you will find there that Angelus Monofinius has treated at large of the Italian proverbs in a book printed at Venice in the year 1604, and (7) that Julius Varini wrote a book, intituled, Scuola del Vago (8), wherein the Italian proverbs are placed according to the order of human actions, and attended with some prudential precepts. You will see there that the alphabetical collection of Italian proverbs, made by Orland Perquet, is to be found in Gruterus's Theaurus, and that one Thomas Buoni, who is mentioned, published a collection of Italian proverbs, in two volumes (9). But you will not find there the origine de vulgari Proverbia, published by Aloysio Cinthio, at Venice, in the year 1526 (10). Morhofius had forgot the name of a modern author, who has collected the Italian proverbs, and is mentioned in the Journals (11): This new author is no other than Mr Menage. It does not appear that Morhofius was well acquainted with the writers of our French proverbs. He only mentions the collection of an anonymous author, and that of Job. Agidius Nucernensis, and the first edition of Belinghen's proverbs, and lastly, of one le Duc, who put out a book (12), intituled, Proverbes en Rimes, ou Rimes en Proverbes. Morhofius knew the collection of Spanish proverbs made by Ferdinand Nunez, Professor of Eloquence and of the Greek tongue at Salamanca, and the Philosophia vulgar of Juan de Mal Lara (13), and the Medicina Española contenida en Proverbios vulgares de nuestra Lengua, composed by Juan Soropán de Rieros. That Philosophia vulgar is a collection of a thousand proverbs, with their explication. I do not wonder he does not mention the book of our Spinoza; for it is lost. He does not forget the compilers of German, English, and Dutch proverbs. I know no author that mentions Polydore Virgil, who pretends to have broke the ice, both with respect to proverbs, and to the inventors of things. His treatise of proverbs came out in 1498, and was dedicated to Guido Ubaldio, Duke of Urbino (14). I have an edition of it revised and enlarged the fourth time. It was printed at Basil 1541, it contains 456 pages in 8vo.

(5) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for February 1686, Art. iii. In the Abstract of the Etymologies of the Italian tongue written by Mr Menage, at the end of which there is an explication of several Italian Proverbs.

(6) The edition I make use of is that of Paris 1606, in folio.
(7) Morhofius, Polybistor, lib. 1, cap. xxi, pag. 256.
(8) Printed at Verona 1642, in 12mo.
(9) Printed at Venice in 8vo, in the year 1604 and 1606.
(10) See Nicolas Antonio, Bibl. Hisp. Tom. 1, pag. 559.
(11) Mentio etiam fit, 6 rectâ memini, in postremis Ephe- meridibus Galli- cis novi cujusdam autoris qui Pro- verbia Italica con- gesserit, cujus mihi nunc nomen excidit. Mor- bosi, Polybistor, lib. 1, cap. xxi, pag. 256. The Journal des Sça- vants, 1686, pag. 164, Dutch E- dit. and the Nou- velles de la Rep. des Lettres, for the same year pag. 164, men- tion that collection of Mr Menage.

(12) Printed at Paris, 1665, in 12mo.
(13) It should be Mallara.
(14) See the E- pistle Dedicatory of the book of Inventoribus Re- rum, written by Polydore Virgil.

SPINOZA (BENEDICT DE) a Jew by birth, who forsook Judaism, and at last became an Atheist, was a native of Amsterdam. He was a systematical Atheist, and brought his Atheism into a new method, tho' the ground of his doctrine was the same with that of several antient and modern Philosophers, both in Europe and the Eastern countries, [A]. As for the latter, one needs only read what I have said

[A] He was a systematical Atheist, and brought his Atheism into a new method, tho' the ground of his new doctrine was the same with that of several antient and modern Philosophers, both in Europe and the eastern countries. I think he is the first who reduced Atheism into a system, and formed it into a body of doctrine, ordered and connected according to the manner of the Geometricians; but otherwise his opinion is not new. It has been believed long ago, that the whole universe is but one substance, and that God and the world are but one Being. Pietro della Valle mentions certain Mahometans, who call themselves Ebl Elrabik, or men of truth, men of certainty, who believe that there is nothing existent but the four elements, which are God, man, and every thing else (1). He also mentions the Zindikites, another Mahometan sect. They come near the Sadducees, and have their name from them. They do not believe a providence, nor the resurrection of the dead, as Giggious shews upon the word Zindik (2). . . . One of their opinions is, that whatever is seen, whatever is in the world, whatever hath been created is God (3). There have been such Heretics among Christians; for we find in the beginning of the XIIIth century, one David of Dinant, who made no distinction between God and the first matter. It is a mistake to say that he is the first who vented such a foolish doctrine (4). Does not Albertus Magnus mention a Philosopher, who had done the like?

A LIST of some persons who had the same opinion with Spinoza.

(1) See the article ABUMUS. LIMUS, remark [A].
(2) Belpier, Remarques curieuses sur Ricaut, Etat présent de l'Empire Ottoman, pag. 648.
(3) Pietro della Valle, pag. 394, of the mid Tom. apud Belpier, ib.
(4) Afferuit Deum esse materiam primam, quod nemo ante eum deliraverat. Theophr. Raynaud. Theol. Naturali. Distinct. vi, num. 6, pag. 563.

'Alexander Epicureus dixit Deum esse materiam, vel non esse extra ipsam, & omnia essentialiter esse Deum, & formas esse accidentia imaginata; & non habere veram entitatem, & ideo dixit omnia idem esse substantialiter, & hunc Deum appellavit aliquando Jovem, aliquando Apollinem, & aliquando Palladem; & formas esse peplum Palladis, & vestem Jovis; & neminem sapientum ajebat ad plenum revelare posse ea quæ latebant sub pepllo Palladis & sub veste Jovis (5). - - - Alexander the Epicurean held, that GOD was matter, or was not different from it, & that all things were essentially GOD, and that forms were imaginary accidents, and had no real entity, and therefore he said all things were substantially the same; and this GOD he called sometimes Jupiter, sometimes Apollo, and sometimes Pallas: and that forms were the robe of Pallas, and garment of Jupiter; and he asserted that none of the wise men could fully reveal what was concealed under the robe of Pallas, and the garment of Jupiter.' Some believe that this Alexander lived in Plutarch's time (6); others say XIIth, ad Phil. in express words, that he lived before David of Dinant. Secutus fuit Alexandrum qui fecit librum de materia, ubi probare conatur omnia esse unum in materia. This we find in the margin of the treatise, in which Thomas Aquinas confutes that monstrous and extravagant opinion (7). Perhaps, David of Dinant knew not that there was such a Philosopher of the Epicurean sect,

(5) Albertus in 1^a Phys. Tract. iii, cap. xiii, apud Pererium de communibus Principiis, lib. 2, cap. xli, pag. 309, 310.
(6) Is est, opinor, quos inter fideles Plutarchus II, symph. 3, Theophrastus, Dissertat. ad Phil. pag. 199.
(7) Ad lib. 1, Tomæ contra Gentil. cap. xvii, f. 23. ed. Lugd. A. 1586. Thomæ, ibid. p. 200.

Ζαὶ τῶν φυσικῶν παθῶν ἕκασον. Denique mundum ipsum animal esse negat (Strato) vultque naturam sequi temerarios fortunæ impetus, initium enim rebus dare spontaneam quandam naturæ vim, & sic deinceps ab eadem natura physicis motibus imponi nesciam (12). (12) Platonem
 — Finally, Strato denies that the world itself is an adversa Colo-— — — will have it, that nature obeys the casual tem, p. 1113.

animal, and will have it, that nature ooeily the causa impulse of fortune, for a certain spontaneous power of nature gives to things a beginning, and in like manner afterwards, an end it put by the same nature to Physical motions. This translation, which I have found in page 58 of Lefcaloperius's commentary upon Cicero de Natura Deorum, and to which I have added anim after initium, is better than that of Amyot, and that of Xylander: nevertheless, there is something in it that does not suit the notion one ought to have of the opinion of that famous Philosopher, the greatest of all the Peripatetics (13). The words temerarii fortune impetus spoil the symmetry of his system; and we see that Lactantius distinguishes it from that of the Epicureans, and ascribes no chance to it. 'Qui nolunt, jay be (14), divina providentia factum esse mundum, aut principii inter se temeræ coeuntibus dicunt esse concretum, aut repente nasci. Natus vero (ut ait Socrates) habere fura extitine. Natura vero (de deo) in se vim gignendi, & vivendi, fed em nec fenfum habere ullum, nec figuram: ut intelligamus, omnia (14) Laetue.

quafi via sponte effe generata, nullo artifice, nec auctore. Utrumque vanum, & impoffibile.
In the roba will not have the world to have been made in divine providence, say, that is either produced from the fortuitous concourse of principles, or, on a sudden, exists by nature. But nature (as Strato says) has in itself the power of producing, and of living, but hath neither any sense nor figure: that we may understand all things to be produced spontaneously, without any artificer

'or author. But both these opinions are frivolous and absurd.' Note, that Seneca represents Plato's doctrine and that of Strato, as two opposite extremes: one of them deprived God of a body, and the other deprived him of a soul (15). I think I have read in Father Salier's book upon the species of the Eucharist,

(15) Ego sic aut Platonem Respicimus

that several antient Philosophers or Heretics taught the unity of all things ; but because I have not that book now, I only mention this by the by. Father Salier is a French Minimie. His book printed at Paris, in the year 1689, is intitled, Historia Scholastica de speciebus Eucharistici, sive de formarum materialium na-

The doctrine of the foul of the world, which was so common among the Antients, and made the principal part of the system of the Stoics is, at the bottom, the —fame with that of Spinoza. Which would more clearly appear, if it had been explained by authors versed in Geometry; but because the books wherein it is mentioned, are written rather in a rhetorical than a dogmatical method; whereas Spinoza is a precise writer, and avoids the figurative style, which often hinders us from having a just notion of a body of doctrine ; hence it is that we find several material differences between his system, and that of the foul of the world. If any one should maintain that Spinozism is more coherent, he should also maintain that it is not so orthodox : for the Stoics did not deprive God of his providence; they re-united in him the knowledge of all things; whereas Spinoza ascribes to him only separated and very limited knowledge. Read these words of Seneca. 'Eundem quem nos Jovem intelligunt, custodem rectoremque universi, animum ac spiritum, mundi huius operis dominum, sacrificem, cui nomen omne convenit. Vis illum fatum vocare?

 non errabis. Hic est, ex quo suspensa sunt omnia, causa causerum. Vis illum providentiam dicere?
 recte dices. Est enim, cujus consilio huic mundo providetur, ut inconcussus eat, et actus suos explicet.
 Vis illum naturam vocare? non errabis. Est enim ex quo nata sunt omnia, cujus spiritui vivimus. Vis illum vocare mundum? non falleris. Ipse enim est, totum quod videmus, totus suis partibus inditus, & se sustinens vi sua (16). Quid est autem, cur non existimes in eo divini aliquid existere, qui Dei pars est? Totum hoc quoque sentimus, quod est in eo.

Original from

nat. a god

(II) Idem, Adem. Quæst.
lib. ii. cap.

(13) Τῶν ἀ-λων Περὶ τῶν
τικῶν ὁ παρὼν

(14) Lactone.
Ira Dei, cap. 1.
pag. 533.

n (15) Ego fer
t, aut Platonem nt Peripateticu fo bal

he

If co-non (16) S pars Quæst.

, & lib. ii,

Theology of a sect of the Chinese [B]. I have not been able to learn any particulars relating (17) Idem, Epist. XCII, pag. m. 381.

Deus, & socii ejus sumus & membra (17). -- They mean the same Jupiter as we, the preserver and co-vernors of the universe, a mind and spirit, the Lord and artificer of this mundane fabric, to whom every appellation doth agree. Will you call him Fate? You will not be mistaken. It is he upon whom all things depend, the cause of causes. Will you name him Providence? You will be in the right. For it is by his whose care this world is so ordered that it goes on steadily, and exerts its operations. Will you give him the name of Nature? You mistake not. For it is he from whom all things receive their beginning, by whose spirit we live. Will you call him the World? You speak the truth. For he is all what you see, all diffused through all its parts, and supporting himself by his own power. Why therefore do not you believe that there is something divine in that which is a part of God? All that in which we are contained, is both one, and God, and we are his companions and members. Read also Cato's discourse in the ninth book of Lucan's Pharalia, especially these three verses:

Estne Dei sedes nisi terra, & pontus, & aer,
Et coelum & virtus? Superos quid quærimus ultra?
Juppiter est quodcunque vides, quodcunque moveris (18).

(18) Lucan. Pharal. lib. ix, ver. 578.

Is not the seat of Jove, earth, sea, and air,
And heaven, and virtue? Where would we further trace
The god? Where'er we move, what'er we see Is Jove.

animal bottles

I shall observe, by the way, an absurdity of those, who maintain the system of the soul of the world. They say, that all the souls both of men and brutes, are particles of the soul of the world, which are re-united to their whole, by the death of the body: And to make us understand it, they compare animals to bottles full of water; floating upon the sea. If those bottles were broke, their water would be re-united to its whole; thus it is with particular souls, say they, when death destroys the organs in which they were shut up. Nay, some say that extasies, dreams, and intense meditations, re-unite a man's soul to the soul of the world, and that this is the reason why people foretell things to come by composing figures of Geomancy. Nihil heic attingo de arte illa prophetica deque Geomantia, quibus ipse Fluddus quam plurimum tribuit. Etsi enim mens cogitando sic in seipsam colligit, ac veluti abstrahi possit, ut humanas res contempletur velut à quadam specula: attamen quod illa possit, quando hoc mortali circumvenitur corpore, ita utri animæ mundanae, ut sicut illa omnia cognoscit, ita ipsa particeps fiat cognitionis hujusmodi: quod illa item in hac extasi digitis regat ad exprimentum varia punctula, ex quibus effectus sive arbitrarius, sive fortuitos colligere liceat: hoc aut longe fallor, aut fabulam sapit (19). ---- It is no difficult thing to perceive the falsity of this parallel. The matter of the bottles floating in the sea is an inclosure, which keeps the sea water from touching the water they are full of; but if there was a soul of the world, it would be dispersed through all the parts of the universe, and therefore nothing could prevent the union of the soul to its whole, and death could not produce that re-union. I shall set down a long passage of Bernier, whereby it will appear, that Spinozism is only a particular method of explaining a doctrine, which very much prevails in the East Indies.

(19) Gassendus, in Examine Philosoph. Fluddanae, num. 29, Opusculum Tom. iii, pag. 247.

You are not ignorant of the doctrine of many ancient philosophers concerning the great soul of the world, whereof they say our souls and those of Brutes are portions. Should we thoroughly examine Plato's and Aristotle's doctrine, perhaps we should find that it was their opinion. This is in a manner the universal doctrine of the Pendets, Pagans in the East Indies; and that very same doctrine constitutes to this day the cabala of the Soufys, and of the greatest part of the men of letters in Persia, and is explained in Persian verses very sublime and emphatical in their Goult-chez-raz, or parterre of mysteries; as it has been the doctrine of Flud, which our great Gassendus has so learnedly confuted, and that wherein most of our Chymists are bewildered. Now those Cabalists, or Indian Pendets, carry the extravagance farther than all those philosophers, and pretend that

VOL. V.

God, or that Supreme Being, which they call Achar, immutable, immovable, has not only produced or taken souls out of its own substance, but also whatever is material and corporeal in the universe, and that their production was not made in the way of efficient causes, but as a spider produces a cob-web out of its own bowels, and re-assumes it whenever it pleases. Creation therefore, say these imaginary doctors, is only an extraction or extension, which God makes of his own substance, of those webs which he draws, as it were, out of his own bowels, in the same manner as destruction is only his re-assuming that divine substance, those divine webs into himself; so that the last day of the world, which they call Maperlé, or Pralea, in which they believe there will be a general destruction of all things, will only be a general re-assuming of all those webs which God had thus emitted out of himself. And therefore, say they, there is nothing real and effective in any thing which we think we see, hear, smell, taste, or touch: this world is nothing but a kind of dream, and a meer illusion, because that multitude and great variety of things, that appear to us, are but one and the same thing, viz. God himself, as all our different numbers, ten, twenty, one hundred, a thousand, and so of others, are but one and the same unity repeated several times. But if you ask them a reason of such a fancy, and if you desire them to explain that emanation and return of substance, that extension, that apparent diversity, or how it comes to pass that God, who is not corporeal, but Biapex, as they own, and incorruptible, should nevertheless be divided into so many portions of bodies and souls; their answer consists only in comparisons, that God is like an immense ocean, in which many vials full of water should move; that those vials, wherever they should go, would be always in the same ocean, in the same water; and that if they should break, the waters contained in them would then be united to their whole, to that ocean of which they are portions. Or they will tell you, that it is with God as it is with light, which is the same all over the world, and yet appears a thousand ways different, according to the variety of the objects (20) on which it falls, or according to the different colours and figures of the glasses thro' which it is conveyed. They will answer you, I say, only with these comparisons, which have no proportion to God, and are only fit to cast a mist before the eyes of ignorant people; and no solid answer can be expected from them. If they be told that those vials would indeed be in the like water, but not in the same (21), and that there is indeed a like light all over the world, but not the same; and so with many other strong objections, with which they are perpetually confounded; they repeat still the same comparisons, and the same fine words, or, as the Soufys do, the fine poems of their Goult-chez-raz (22).

weath

god like ocean

(20) There is here an error of the press in the original.

(21) Note, that the Spinozists make no better answer to the distinction between same and like.

(22) Bernier, Suite des Mémoires sur l'Empire de grand Mogol, pag. 208 & seq. Dutch Edit.

(23) Caramuel, Philosophie Révisée, lib. iii, §. iii, pag. 175.

It appears from the following passage that Peter Abelard is accused of asserting that all things are God, and that God is all things. Primum elementorum concordiam esse Deum & materiam ex qua reliqua fierent, docuit Empedocles. . . . Hæc erat illius ætatis Theosophia, hæc notitia quæ de Causa principiæ habebatur. Jam tandem obsoleverat, & inter veterum somnia & phantasmata recensebatur. Eam inter veteris Philosophiæ parietinas & rudera revocavit Petrus Abailardus, ingenio audax, & famâ celebris: Sepultam cineribus invenit, & quasi Eurydicen Orpheus ab inferis tandem revocavit. Testor Vazquezium i. part. quest. 3. art. 8. numb. 28. & Smisingum de Deo tract. 1. disp. 2. quest. 2. numb. 54. Deum esse omnia, & omnia esse Deum, eum in omnia converti, omnia in eum transmutari asseruit, quia Empedocleæ, aut fortè Anaxagoricæ præventus Theosophiâ, distinguebat species secundum solam apparentiam, nempe quia aliquot Atomî in uno subjecto erant eductæ quæ latebant in alio (23). . . . Empedocles taught, that the first amicable conjunction of the elements was GOD and matter, of which the other beings were made. . . . This was the Theology of that age, this their opinion of the first cause. But at last it grew obsolete, and was reckoned amongst the dreams and chimeras of the antients. This among the ruins and rubbish of the antients was revived by Peter Abelard, a man

E e c

relating to Spinoza's family; but there is ground to believe it was mean and inconsiderable

a man bold, and famous: he found it buried in ashes, and, as Orpheus did Eurydice, brought it back from hell. My authors are Vasquez and Smifungus. He asserted, that GOD was all things, and all things were GOD, that GOD was converted into all things, and all things transformed into God, because prepossessed with the Theology of Empedocles, or perhaps of Anaxagoras, he distinguished the species according to appearance only, namely, because some atoms appear in one subject which lay hid in another.

[B] What I say concerning the Theology of a set of the Chinese. The name of that sect is Foe Kia. It was established by royal authority among the Chinese in the year 65 of the Christian Era. Its first founder was a son of the King In san nam, and was at first called Xe, or Xe Kia (24); and afterwards when he was thirty years of age, Foe, that is, no man (25).

(24) The Japanese call him Xaca.

(25) See the Alta Eruditor, 1688, pag. 257, in the Extract of the book of Confucius, printed at Paris in the year 1687.

(26) Biblioth. Univers. Tom. vii, pag. 403, 404, in the Extract of the book of Confucius.

The Prolegomena of the Jesuits prefixed to Confucius's book published by them at Paris, treats of that founder at large. It is said there, that (26) having retired into a desert, as soon as he came to be nineteen years of age, and having put himself under the discipline of four Gymnosophists to learn Philosophy of them, he remained under their direction till the age of thirty years, when rising in the morning before break of day, and contemplating the planet Venus, that bare sight gave him immediately a perfect knowledge of the first principle; so that being full of a divine inspiration, or rather of pride and folly, he betook himself to instruct men, gave out himself as a god, and drew after him fourscore thousand disciples. . . . At seventy-nine years of age, being upon the point of death he declared to his disciples, that for the space of forty years that he had preached to the world, he had not told them the truth; that he had concealed it under the veil of metaphors and figures; but that it was time now to declare it to them. There is nothing, said he, to be inquired after, and on which one may place ones hopes, but nothingness and a vacuum.

* P. 29. Vacuum & inane, Cum huius in the Chinese Language.

(27) See, above, remark [E] of the article BION the Borythenite.

(28) Acta Eruditor, Lipsienf. 1688, pag. 257.

(29) Biblioth. Univers. Tom. vii, pag. 404, & seq. See also the remark [C], of the article JAPAN, and the Nouveaux Mémoires sur l'état présent de la Chine par le Père le Comte, Tom. ii, pag. 101, Amst. 1698.

His method was the reason why his disciples divided his doctrine into two parts: one is outward, and is that which is publicly preached and taught; the other is inward, which is carefully concealed from the vulgar, and discovered only to those that are initiated. The outward doctrine, which, as the Bonzes express it, 'is only like the wooden frame on which an arch is built, and that is afterwards removed, when the building is finished, consists 1. In teaching that there is a real difference between good and evil, justice and injustice: 2. That there is another life wherein men shall be punished or rewarded for what they have done in this world: 3. That happiness may be attained by thirty two figures and fourscore qualities. 4. That Foe or Xaca is a deity and the saviour of men, that he was born for their sake, out of compassion for the errors he saw them in, that he has expiated their sins, and that by virtue of his expiation they shall obtain salvation after death, and shall have a new and more happy birth in another world (29). They add to this five moral precepts, and six works of mercy, and threaten with damnation those who neglect those duties.

The inward doctrine, which is never imparted to the vulgar, because they ought to be kept to their duty by the fear of hell, and such like stories, as those Philosophers say, is however in their opinion, the solid and true one. It consists in laying down, as the principle and end of all things, a certain vacuum and real nothingness. They say, our first parents issued from that vacuum, and returned into it when they died, and that it is so with all men, who are resolved into that principle by death; that men, all the elements, and all creatures, make part of that vacuum; and that therefore there is but one and the same substance, which is different in all particular beings only by figures and qualities, or an internal configuration, much like water, which is always essentially water, whether it has the form of snow, hail, rain, or ice (30). If it be a monstrous thing to assert that plants, brutes, and men are really the same thing, and to ground such an opinion upon this that all particular beings are not distinct from their principle (31), it is still more monstrous to say, that this principle has no thought, no power, no virtue. And yet, this is the doctrine of those Philosophers, they place the supreme perfection of that principle in its inaction, and absolute repose. Hoc autem principium cum doceant esse prorsus admirandum quid, purum, limpidum, infinitum, subtile, quod nec generari possit nec corrumpi, quod perfectio sit rerum omnium ipsamque summe perfectum & quietum negant tamen, corde, virtute, mente, potentia ulla instructum esse: imo hoc esse maxime Enudi. Lipp. proprium essentia ipsius, ut nihil agitet, nihil intelligat, appetat nihil (32). Spinoza was not so absurd: the only or sole substance he admits, is always acting, always thinking; and his most general abstractions could not enable him to divert it of action and thought. The foundations of his doctrine do not allow it.

Observe, by the by, that the followers of Foe teach Quietism; for they say that all those, who seek true happiness, ought to be so far absorbed by profound meditations, as to make no use of their intellect, and that they ought, through a perfect insensibility, to sink into the repose and inaction of the first principle; which is the true way of being perfectly like it and partaking of happiness. They further say, that those, who have attained to that state of quietude, may follow the usual course of life as to the outside, and teach others the doctrine commonly received. It is only in private and inwardly, that one ought to practise the contemplative institute of the beatific inaction. Quæcirca quisquis bene beatusque vivendi sit cupidus, huc assidue meditatione, suisque victoria erit oportere, ut principio suo quam simillimus, affectus omnes humanos domat ac prorsus extinguit, neque jam turbetur, vel angatur re ulla, sed æstatis prorsus inflat absorptus altissima contemplatione, sine ullo prorsus usu vel ratiocinio intellectus, divina illa quiete, qua nihil sit beatus, perfruatur: quam ubi nactus fuerit, communem vivendi modum & doctrinam tradit aliis, & ipsemet specie tenuis sequatur, clam vero sibi vacet ac veritati, & arcana illa quiete vitæque celestis instituto gaudeat (33). Those who were most intent upon this contemplation of the first principle, formed a new sect, called Fu guei Kia, that is, the sect of the idle or slothful, nihil agentium. Thus among Monks those, who pretend to the most strict observance, form new communities, or a new sect.

The greatest lords and the most illustrious persons suffered themselves to be so infatuated with this Quietism, that they believed insensibility to be the way to perfection and beatitude, and that the nearer a man came to the nature of a block or a stone, the greater progress he made, the more he was like the first principle, into which he was to return. It was not enough that the body should be without motion for several hours; the soul was also to be unmoveable, and destitute of all manner of sense. What I have said comes short of the Latin which follows: Optimates imperii & summos quosque viros hac infania adeo occupatos, ut quo quisque propius ad naturam saxi truncive accessisset, boras complures sine ullo corporis animique motu perfrerent, sine ullo vel sensuum usu vel potentiarum, eo proficiscerentur, propiorque & similior evasisset principio suo aërio, in quod aliquando reverfurus esset, putaretur (34). A follower of Confucius refuted the impertinences of that sect, and fully proved this maxim of Aristotle, that nothing can be made out of nothing (35), nevertheless they maintained and spread themselves, and there are many people to this day, who apply themselves to those vain contemplations (36). Did we not know the extravagances of our Quietists (37), we should be apt to think that the writers, who mention those speculative Chinese, neither well understood nor faithfully related what they say of them; but if we consider what

Pope
(30) Bibl. Universelle, Tom. vii, p. 406.

(31) Omnia, quæcumque existunt, vita, sensus, mens prædicta, quævis inter se vis & figura differant, intrinsece tamen eundem quid idem esse, quippe à principio suo in distincta. Alta Eruditor, 1688, pag. 258.

(32) Ibid.
Quietism taught and preached by some Chinese.

(33) Alta Eruditor, 1688, pag. 258. See also the remark [K] of the article BRACHMAN.

like stone

(34) Ibid.
(35) Copiole probans Aristotelis illud et nihil ex nihilo fieri.

(36) Ibid.
(37) See the remark [K] in the article BRACHMAN.

(a) Called Francis Van der Ende. Note, that Mr Kortholt, in the preface to the second edition of his father's book de tribus Impostribus, says that a young woman taught Spinoza Latin, and that she was afterwards married to Mr Kerkerling, who was her scholar at the same time with Spinoza.

able [C]. He learned the Latin tongue of a Physician (a) who taught it at Amsterdam, and applied himself early to the study of Divinity (b), and bestowed many years upon it: and afterwards he wholly devoted himself to the study of Philosophy. Having a Geometrical Genius, and being desirous to have a good reason for every thing, he quickly disliked the Doctrine of the Rabbins: so that the Jews easily perceived, he did not approve several articles of their religion; for he was against any constraint in matters of belief, and a great enemy to dissimulation, and therefore he freely declared his doubts and his opinions. It is said that the Jews offered to tolerate him, provided he would comply outwardly with their ceremonies, and even that they promised him a yearly pension; but he could not resolve upon such an hypocrisy. However, it was only by degrees that he left their synagogue; and perhaps he would not have broke with them so soon, had he not been treacherously attacked coming from a play, by a Jew, who gave him a thrust with a knife. The wound was slight but he believed the assassin designed to kill him. From that time he left them altogether, which was the reason of his excommunication. I have enquired into the circumstances of it, but have not been able to find them out (c). He wrote, in the Spanish tongue, an apology for his leaving the synagogue, which has not been printed. However it is known that he inserted several things in it, that have appeared since in his Traëtatus Theologico-Politicus (d), printed at Amsterdam (e) in the year 1670, a pernicious and execrable book, which contains all the seeds of the Atheism he plainly discovered in his Opera Posthuma. Mr Stoupp has no reason to insult the ministers of Holland for not answering the Traëtatus Theologico-Politicus [D]. What he says of him is not always true [E]. When

(b) See the 16th mark [F].

(c) Taken from a Memoir imparted to the Bookeller.

(d) See the book of Mr Van Til, minister and professor of Divinity at Dort, intitled, Het Voorbif der Hidenen voor de Ongebovigen geest. That book mentioned in the Acta Erudit. 1695, pag. 393.

(e) And not at Hamburg, as it is in the title page.

Spinoza

what passes among Christians, we cannot with reason disbelieve the extravagancies ascribed to the sect Foë Kia, or Fu gui Kia.

I am apt to believe either that the sense, which those men put upon Cum bin, is not exactly expressed, or that their notions are contradictory. They tell us that those words signify emptiness and nothingness, vacuum & inane; and in order to confute that sect, this axiom, Nothing can be made out of nothing, has been alledged against them; therefore those who alledged it, must have believed that, according to that sect, nothing is the principle of all Beings. I cannot believe that those Chinese take the word nothing in its proper signification, and I fancy they understand it, as people do, when they say that there is nothing in an empty trunk. We have seen that they ascribe some attributes to the first principle, which suppose that they conceive it as a liquid (38). And therefore it is likely they only divert it of the gross and sensible parts of matter. If it be so, the disciple of Confucius would be guilty of the sophism called ignoratio elenchis; for he would have understood by the word nihil, what has no existence; whereas his adversaries understood by it what has not the properties of sensible matter. I fancy they meant by that word, near the same as what the moderns mean by the word space; I say, the moderns, who being neither Cartesian nor Aristotelians, maintain that space is distinct from matter, and that its indivisible, unpalpable, penetrable, unmoveable, and infinite, extension is something real. The disciple of Confucius would have easily proved that such a thing cannot be the first principle, if it be besides destitute of activity, as the speculative Chinese will have it. An extension, tho' never so real, can produce no particular Being, unless it be moved; and if it be supposed that there is no mover, the production of the world will be equally impossible, whether there be an infinite extension, or nothing at all. Spinoza would not deny that position; but he does not admit of a first principle without action. The abstracted extension he gives it in general is only, properly speaking, the idea of space; but he adds motion to it, which may produce the varieties of matter.

[C] His family . . . was poor and very inconsiderable. It is well known that Spinoza would not have had a sufficient subsistence, if one of his friends had not left him by his will, wherewithal to maintain himself. The pension that the synagogue offered him, shews that he was not rich.

[D] Mr Stoupp has no reason to insult the ministers of Holland for not answering the Traëtatus Theologico-Politicus. He is the author of some letters, intitled, La Religion des Hollandais. That book was written at Utrecht in the year 1673, whilst the French were masters of it. Mr Stoupp was then lieutenant-colonel of a Swiss regiment. He raised himself afterwards so far as to be made a Brigadier, and would have been promoted to higher offices, had he not been killed at the battle of Steinkerken (39). He had been formerly a minister, and had officiated in the French Church of the Savoy at London in Cromwell's time. He affected in the letters I speak of to make an odious description of the great number of sects that are in Holland. Here follows what he says of Spinozism. 'I should think that I have not mentioned all the religions of this country, if I should say nothing of a famous and learned man, who, as I have been assured, has many followers wholly devoted to his opinions. His name is Spinoza; he was born a Jew, and has not abjured the Jewish religion, nor embraced the Christian: and indeed he is a very bad Jew, and not a better Christian. He has published within these few years a Latin book intitled, Traëtatus Theologico-Politicus, wherein the chief thing he seems to aim at is, to destroy all religions, particularly the Jewish and the Christian, and to introduce Atheism, Libertinism, and a full liberty for all religions. He maintains that all of them have been invented for the public good, to the end that all citizens may live honestly and obey their magistrates, and practise virtue, not in hopes of any reward after death, but for the excellency of virtue itself, and the advantages that accrue in this very life to those who follow it. He does not openly declare in that book what he thinks of the Deity; he only gives some hints of it, and thereby discovers it, whereas in conversation he plainly declares that God is not an intelligent, and a most perfect and happy Being, as we fancy; but only the power of nature, diffused all over the world. Spinoza lives in this country; he has been some time at the Hague, where he was visited by all the curious, and even by some women of quality, who pretend to more wit than is allotted to their sex. His followers dare not discover themselves, because his book wholly overthrows the foundations of all religions, and has been condemned by a public decree of the States, and the sale of it is forbidden, tho' they sell it still publicly. Among all the Divines that are in this country, none has ventured to confute the opinions contained in that treatise. I am the more surprised at it, because the author discovers a great knowledge of the Hebrew tongue, of all the ceremonies of the Jewish religion, of all the customs of the Jews, and of Philosophy; and therefore those Divines cannot say that it is a book that deserves no answer. If they continue to be silent, it will be said that they have no charity, since they leave such a pernicious book unanswered, or that they approve the opinions of the author, or have not the courage and ability to confute them (40).'

The reader may be pleased to observe, that whereas in the first edition of this Dictionary, I quoted this passage, according to my own translation, from the Italian, in this I give it according to the words of the original,

(39) In the beginning of August, 1695.

(40) Religion des Hollandais, Let. ter III, pag. 65, & seq.

(38) Parum, limpidum, subtilis. See before the citation (32), ærium, see above, citation (34).

God not in all things

Spinoza betook himself to the study of Philosophy, he quickly grew out of conceit with the common systems, and was wonderfully pleased with that of Des Cartes (f). He felt so strong an inclination to inquire after truth [F], that he renounced the world in a manner, the better to succeed in that enquiry. Not contented to free himself from all

(41) Of whom I have spoken in citation (90) of the article R. A. M. U. S.

(42) The substance of what concerns Spinoza in that answer is as follows (43): 'I think Stoupp is mistaken, when he says, that Spinoza has not abjured the Jewish religion, since he has not only renounced the opinions of the Jews, having forsaken all their practices and ceremonies; but also eats and drinks every thing that is set before him, be it even swine's flesh, or wine come from the Pope's cellar, without enquiring whether it be Cafker or Nefech. It is true, he professes no other religion, and he seems to be very indifferent for all religions, unless God moves his heart. I shall not enquire whether he maintains all the opinions which Stoupe ascribes to him; and it had been more edifying if Stoupe had said nothing of it: let him justify himself, if he will. Neither shall I enquire whether he is the author of the book, intitled, Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. However I am assured that he does not own it; and if we may believe the title-page, it has been printed at Hamburg, and not in these provinces. But suppose this wicked book had been printed in Holland; the States endeavoured to stifle it in its birth, they have condemned it, and have prohibited the sale of it by a public decree, as soon as it came out in their country, as Stoupe himself confesses, pag. 67. I know it has been sold in England, in Germany, and France, and even in Switzerland as well as in Holland; but I do not know whether it has been prohibited in those countries. The States, whilst I am writing this, express their piety by forbidding that book again, with many others of the same stamp.' As for what concerns the reproaches and complaints, that this book had not been confuted, the author answers, 1. (44), That since it has been printed at Hamburg, at least according to the title, Stoupp should rather complain of the Divines of that city, than of the Dutch. 2. (45) That since that pernicious book tends to the subversion of Christianity, the Roman Catholics and the Lutherans were no less obliged to confute it than the Reformed, and among the Reformed, the Divines of Germany, France, England, and Switzerland, should have done their duty in that respect as well as the Dutch Divines. 3. That Mr Stoupe may be blamed for the same thing. Why did he not answer it himself? 4. (46) That Spinoza's book is not more pernicious than his; for, if the first teaches Atheism openly, the other does it covertly: both of them show the same indifference for religion. An enemy, who attacks us privately, and under the appearance of friendship, is much more dangerous than an open enemy. It is necessary to cry out against a private enemy, that every body may know of it, whereas every body stands upon his guard against a professed enemy. Perhaps, this is the reason why the Divines of Holland and Switzerland have been of opinion that there was no necessity to make a speedy answer to Spinoza, believing that the horror of his doctrine is a sufficient confutation of it; the more, because there is nothing new in that treatise, what is contained in it having been a thousand times repeated by prophane men, and yet, thanks be to God, the Church has received no great harm by it. 5. (47), That he (John Brun) has written several remarks upon that execrable book, which, perhaps, he would have published, had not the war prevented it: 'Tho', says he, I think I have spent my time much better upon some other works: nay, I never took Spinoza's book to be so pernicious as the defamatory libel of Stoupe's. 6. (48) That, in fine, Spinoza's tract has been confuted in Holland by an excellent man, who was a very good Divine, and a great Philosopher, viz. by the late Mr Mansfeldt, Professor at Utrecht. Doubtless that confutation had been sooner published, had not the author been prevented by death. And I do not question that others would have confuted it long ago, had not Stoupe, and his accomplices, hindered it by this bloody war. I shall set down below (49)

(43) Pag. 158.

(44) Pag. 160.

(45) Ibid. pag. 161.

(46) Ibid. pag. 162.

(47) Brun, Veritable Religion des Hollandais, pag. 163.

(48) Ibid. pag. 164.

(49) In the remark [M].

the titles of some other answers to that book of Spinoza.

[E] What he says of him, is not always true.] Does he not say, that, according to Spinoza, religions have been invented to induce men to the practice of virtue, not in hopes of being rewarded in another world, but because virtue is an excellent thing in itself, and profitable in this life? Is it not certain that this Atheist had no such thoughts, and that he could not have argued thus without making himself ridiculous? All the religions in the world, both the true and the false ones, turn upon this great hinge, That there is an invisible Judge, who rewards and punishes after this life, as well the outward, as the inward actions of men. The great use of religion is supposed to derive from that; and if religion had been invented, this had been the chief motive of the contrivers of it. It is plain enough that in this life good actions do not generally procure temporal advantages to men, and that bad ones are the most usual and most effectual way to wealth and power; and therefore in order to inspire men with the love of virtue, and prevent their running into vice, it had been necessary to propose to them rewards and punishments after this life. This is the craft which the libertines ascribe to those, whom they pretend to have been the first contrivers of religion. This is what Spinoza should have believed, and doubtless he believed it; and therefore Mr Soupp did not understand him in that respect, but took him in the quite contrary sense to what he meant. I wonder this fault was left in the Supplement to Moren's Dictionary, in an article that bears Mr Simon's name. Note, that those who deny the immortality of the soul, and providence, as the Epicureans did, are those who maintain, that virtue ought to be followed by reason of its excellency, and because the practice of morality is attended in this life with so considerable advantages, that we have no reason to complain. Doubtless, this is the doctrine Spinoza would have taught, if he had been so bold as to dogmatize publicly.

[F] He found himself so strongly inclined to enquire after truth.] The proof of these words, and of several others in the text of this article, is to be found in the preface to the posthumous works of this author. 'Fuit ab ineunte ætate literis innutritus, & in adolescentiâ per multos annos in Theologiâ se exercuit; postquam verò eo ætatis pervenerat, in quâ ingenium maturefecit, & ad rerum naturas indagandas aptum redditur, se totum Philosophiæ dedit: quum autem nec preceptores, nec harum Scientiarum Auctores pro voto ei facerent fati, & ille tamen summo sciendi amore arderet, quid in hisce ingenii vires valeret, experiri decrevit. Ad hoc propositum urgent Scripta Philosophica Nobilissimi & summi Philosophi Renati des Cartes magno ei fuerant adiumento. Postquam igitur sese ab omnigenis occupationibus, & negotiorum curis, veritatis inquisitioni magnâ ex parte officientibus, liberasset, quò minus à familiaribus in suis turbaretur meditationibus, urbem Amstelædamum, in quâ natus, & educatus fuit, deferuit, atque primò Renoburgum, deinde Voorburgum, & tandem Hagam Comitibus habitatum concessit, ubi etiam IX Kalend. Martii anno supra millesimum & sexcentimum septuagesimo septimo ex Pthisi hanc vitam reliquit, postquam annum ætatis quadragesimum quartum excessisset. Nec tantum in veritate perquirendâ totus fuit, sed etiam se speciatim in Opticis & vitris, quæ Telescopiis ac Microscopiis inservire possent, tornandis, poliendisque exercuit; & nisi mors eum intempestiva rapuisset, (quid enim in his efficere potuerit, fati ostendit) præstantiora ab eo fuissent speranda. Licet verò se totum mundo subduxerit, & latuerit, plurimis tamen doctrinâ, & honore conficiis Viris ob eruditionem solidam, magnamque ingenii acumen innotuit: uti videre est ex Epistolis ad ipsum scriptis, & ipsius ad eas Responsionibus. Plurimum temporis in Naturâ rerum percrutandâ, inventis in ordinem redigendis, & amicis communicandis, minimum in animo recreando infumpsit: quin tantus veritatis expiscandæ in eo ardor exarsit, all manner of business, he also left Amsterdam, because the visits of his friends too much interrupted his speculations, and retired into the country, where he meditated without any hindrance, and made Microscopes and Telescopes. He continued in the same course of life after he had settled at the Hague; and was so well pleased with meditating, and putting his meditations into order, and communicating them to his friends, that he spent very little time in any recreation, and was sometimes three whole months without stepping out of douts. Though he lived a very retired life, his name and his reputation flew every where. Free-thinkers resorted to him from all parts [G]. The Palatine court desired to have him, and offered him a professorship of Philosophy at Heidelberg [H]. But he refused it, as being an employment little consistent with his great desire of inquiring into truth without any interruption. He fell sick of a lingering disease, of which he died at the Hague, the twenty-first of February 1677, being somewhat above forty-four years of age (g). I have heard say that the Prince of Condé being at Utrecht in the year 1673, sent him word that he would be glad to see him (b). Those who have been

(g) Taken from the Preface of his Posthumous Works. See the remark [F].

(b) See the remark [G].

(50) Mr Fabricius, professor of Divinity at Heidelberg, and counsellor to the Elector Palatine, wrote that letter to Spinoza, by his master's order, the 16th of February 1673. The following letter is Spinoza's answer to Mr Fabricius. Note, that he was then known to be the author of the Traité de Théologie-Politique.

(51) Prefat. Oper. posthumor. B. D. S.

(52) See the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary, at the word Spinoza.

(53) See at the end of his Opera Posthuma, his abridgement of the Hebrew Grammar.

(54) Tam exactam linguæ Græcæ cognitionem non habeo, ut hanc Provinciam suscipere audeam. Spinoza, in Traité de Théologie-Politique, cap. x. sub fin. pag. 136.

(55) See the article HENAU, V. O. L. V.

he was at Utrecht. For I have been assured that the Prince of Condé, at his solicitation, sent for him from the Hague to Utrecht on purpose to discourse with him, and that Stoupe praised him very much, and was very familiar with him (56). Having more exactly informed myself in this matter, I learned that the Prince of Condé was returned to Utrecht before Spinoza left it, and that it is very true that he discoursed with that author.

[H] The Palatine court . . . offered him a professorship of Philosophy at Heidelberg. M. Chevreau says thereupon a thing that wants to be rectified. 'Being at the court of the Elector Palatine, says he (57), I gave a good character of Spinoza, though I then knew that Protestant Jew only by the first (58) and second parts of Des Cartes's Philosophy, printed at Amsterdam for John Rieuwertz in 1663. The Elector had that book; and after I had read some chapters of it to him, he resolved to call him to his university of Heidelberg to teach Philosophy, on condition that he should not dogmatize. Mr Fabricius, who was then professor of Divinity, was ordered to write to him and though Spinoza was not in very good circumstances, yet he refused to accept that honourable employment. The reasons of his refusal were enquired into; and I conjectured from some letters I received from the Hague and Amsterdam, that these words, on condition that he should not dogmatize, had frightened him'. M. Chevreau is mistaken as to the condition that he should not dogmatize, and Mr Bernard rightly observes that it had been a contradiction. These are his words, 'One may very well wonder, that since Spinoza was already so well known, the Elector should have been willing to entrust him with the care of teaching young people Philosophy, and much more to require from him that he should not dogmatize; for since his impious doctrine was built upon the grounds and principles of his Philosophy, how could he have taught Philosophy without infilling his poisonous errors? Such a proposal, together with the law imposed on him, implied a kind of contradiction (59)'. It is certain, that this condition was not required from him, and that Mr Chevreau is mistaken in that particular: We may easily prove it by the letter that was written to him. Mr Fabricius, who was ordered to write it, promised Spinoza a full liberty of philosophizing; of which, adds he, the Elector thinks you will not make an ill use to the prejudice of the religion by law established. If you come hither, you will live a pleasant life, and such as becomes a Philosopher. Philosophandi LIBERTATEM habebis AMPLISSIMAM, quæ te ad publicæ stabilitatæ Religionem conturbandam non abusurum credit. . . . Hoc unum addo, te, si huc veneris, vitam Philosopho dignam cum voluptate transacturum, nisi præter spem & opinionem nostram alia omnia acciderent (60). Spinoza answered, that if he had ever wished to be a Professor, he could not have wished for any other professorship than that which was offered him in the Palatine, especially on account of the liberty of philosophizing, which his Electoral Highness granted him. Si unquam mihi desiderium fuisset alicujus facultatis professorum suscipiendi, hanc solum optare potuissem quæ mihi à Serenissimo Electore Palatino per te offertur, PRÆSENTIM O LIBERTATEM PHILOSOPHANDI quam Principi Clementissimus concedere dignatur (61). I confess, that among other reasons for which he declares he does not find himself disposed to accept that professorship,

(56) Brun, veritable Religion des Hollandais, pag. 164.

(57) Chevreau, Tom. ii. pag. 99, 100. Dutch Edit.

(58) To speak like an orthodox, Mr Chevreau should have said, because I only knew that Protestant Jew by the first, &c.

(59) Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for September, 1700, pag. 301.

(60) Epist. liii. Spinoza, pag. 562, Oper. posthumor.

(61) Ibid. Epist. lvi.

F f f

(1) Taken from the Memoir imparted to the Bookeller.

(4) Here is the title of that work: Renati Des Cartes Principiorum Philosophiæ Pars I, & II, more Geometrico demonstratæ per Benedictum de Spino-acquainted with Spinoza, and the peasants of the villages where he lived a retired life for some time, do all say that he was a sociable, affable, honest, friendly, and a good moral man [1]. This is strange; but after all, it is not a more surprising thing than to see men live an ill life, though they be fully persuaded of the truth of the Gospel (i). Some will have it that he followed the maxim, Nemo repente turpissimus, and that he became an Atheist only by degrees, and that he was very far from being so in the year 1663, when he published the Geometrical demonstration of Des Cartes's principles (k). He appears as orthodox in that book upon the nature of God, as Des Cartes himself; but we must know that he did not then speak according to his persuasion [K]. There is ground to believe that the ill use he made of some maxims of that Philosopher, occasioned his Atheism. Some say that the pseudonymous piece de Jure Ecclesiasticorum, printed in 1665, 22 Antichristum. Antichristum ejusdem Cogitata Metaphysica, in quibus diffinitiones, que tam in parte Metaphysica generaliter, quam specialiter occurrunt, breviter explicantur.

(62) Ibid. pag. 563.

professorship, he says, he does not know within what bounds he must confine himself, that he might not seem to be a disturber of the religion established by law. Cogito deinde, me nescire, quibus limitibus libertas ista philosophandi intercludi debeat, ne videatur publica stabilitatem Religionem perturbare velle (62). But this does not prove that the condition mentioned by Mr Chevreau was required from him. This shews that even good authors are very apt to give a wrong account of a fact. Mr Chevreau should have been contented to say, that Spinoza was given in a civil manner to understand, that if he should impugn the principles of the Reformed Church, it would be taken amiss. Instead of which he uses a general proposition, importing a formal prohibition of dogmatizing: This is a perfect contradiction in the terms. However, it is certain that the clause inserted in the letter written to Spinoza, seemed very inconvenient to him: and this is what I meant to express in a general way, when I said, That he refused that professorship of Philosophy, being an employment little consistent with his great desire of inquiring after truth without any interruption; for he had reason to believe he should be continually interrupted, and that the divines of the Palatinate would make him lose a great deal of time in justifying to the prince what he should dictate to his scholars, or what he should say in his lectures. They would have found in them sometimes one thing directly contrary to the catechism of the country, and sometimes another indirectly contrary to it. Which would have occasioned many complaints and accusations: He knew not how far the thing would go, and therefore he could not be sure of living a quiet life; and though he had not fore-seen that it would make him lose a great deal of time, he was sensible that his meditations would be very much interrupted by the obligation he would be under of giving lectures at stated times, and by many other functions belonging to a professor. I desire my reader to join with this explanation, which has been published in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (63).

(63) In December, 1700, pag. 689, 690.

(64) See the remark [7].

(65) Sebastian: he is professor of Poetry at Kiel, since the month of February 1701.

(66) Sebastianus Kortholtus, Præfat. Editionis 2. Tractatus Christiani Kortholti patris sui de tribus Impostoribus.

[1] He was a good moral man.] If you except what he told his intimate friends, who were very desirous to be his disciples, he said nothing in conversation but what was edifying. He never swore; he never spoke disrespectfully of God; he went sometimes to hear sermons, and exhorted others to go constantly to church (64). He did not care for wine, good cheer, or money. What he paid for his lodgings at a Painter's at the Hague was very inconsiderable. He minded nothing but study, in which he spent the greatest part of the night. He lived a perfect solitary life. It is true, he did not refuse the visits occasioned by his reputation; and that sometimes he visited considerable persons, not to talk of trifling things, or for his diversion, but to discourse of state-affairs. He understood them well, though he had no share in them, and guessed pretty right what course general affairs would take. I find all these particulars in a preface of Mr Kortholt (65), who in a journey he made to Holland, informed himself of Spinoza's life as well as he could. 'Vacavit interdum doctis & principibus viris, says he (66), quos non tam convenit, quam admitti, cum iisque de rebus civilibus sermones instituit. Politici enim nomen affectabat, & futura mente ac cogitatione sagaciter prospiciebat, qualia hospitibus suis haud rara prædixit Se professus est Christianum, & vel Reformatorem vel Lutheranorum certibus non modopse adfuit, sed & aliis auctor serpenumero & hortator extitit, ut templa frequentarent, domesticque verbi quosdam divini præcones maximopere commendavit. Nec unquam jusjurandum aut petulantia de Deo dictum ex ore Spinozæ exiit: nec largiore usus est vino, & satis duriter vixit. Ideoque hospiti quavis anni parte LXXX, aureos Belgicos tantummodo percolavit, & summum CCCC, quotannis impendit. Auro plane non inhiabat. He sometimes passed his spare hours in conversing with learned and considerable men, whose company he rather admitted than desired, and with whom he talked of political affairs. For he loved the name of a Politician, and sagaciously pierced into futurity, and foretold his friends several events. He professed to be a Christian, and not only went himself to the churches of the Calvinists or Lutherans, but likewise frequently exhorted and encouraged others to go to church and greatly recommended some preachers to his domestics. Nor did ever an oath, or indecent expression concerning GOD, come from the mouth of Spinoza. He used wine very moderately, and lived an abstemious life. Thus he paid his landlord only eighty guilders in the quarter, and spent about 400 guilders yearly. He was certainly not covetous of money.

[K] He did not then speak according to his persuasion.] On the contrary, he believed then the same things which are to be found in his posthumous works, viz. That our souls are but modifications of the substance of God. This may be certainly inferred from the preface of the book, by any person who knows Spinoza's system. I shall set down the passage of that preface, wherein it is said, that having a scholar to whom he had promised to explain Des Cartes's Philosophy, he scrupled to depart ever so little from the opinions of that Philosopher, though he did not approve of them in several things, especially in what concerns the will, and human liberty. 'Cum Discipulum suum Cartesii Philosophiam docere promississet, religio ipsi fuit, ab ejus sententia latum unguem discedere, aut quid, quod ejus dogmatibus aut non responderet, aut contrarium esset, dictare. Quamobrem judicet nemo, illum hic, aut fus, aut tantum ea, quæ probat, docere. Quamvis enim quedam vera judicet, quedam de suis addita fateatur; multa tamen occurrunt, quæ tanquam falsa rejicit, & à quibus longè diveriam fovet sententiam. Cujus note inter alia, ut ex multis unum tantum in medium afferam, sunt, quæ de voluntate habentur. Schol. Prop. 15. part. 1. Principior. & cap. 12. part. 2. Appendic. quamvis satis magno molimine atque apparatu probata videantur: Neque enim eam distinctam ab intellectu, multò minus tali præditam esse libertate existimat. Etenim in his afferendis, ut ex Dissertat. de Method. part. 4. & Meditat. 2. aliisque locis liquet, tantum supponit, non probat Cartesius, mentem Humanam esse substantiam absolute cogitantem. Cum contrà author noster admittat quidem, in Rerum natura esse substantiam cogitantem: Attamen neget illam constituturam essentiam Mentis humanæ; sed statuat, eodem modo quo Extensio nullis limitibus determinata est, Cogitationem etiam nullis limitibus determinari: adeoque, quemadmodum corpus humanum non est absolute, sed tantum certo modo secundum leges naturæ extensæ per motum & quietem determinata extensio; sic etiam mentem five Animam humanam non esse absolute, sed tantum secundum leges naturæ cogitantis per ideas certo modo determinatam cogitationem: quæ necessario dari concluditur, ubi corpus humanum existere incipit. Ex quâ definitione, non difficile demonstratu esse putat, Voluntatem ab intellectu non distingui, multò minus eâ, quàm illi Cartesius adscribit, pollere libertate; quin imò ipsam affirmandi & negandi facultatem prorsus fictitiam (67). When he had promised to teach his disciple the Philosophy of Des Cartes, he religiously observed this rule, not to depart in the least from Des Cartes's

(67) Ludovico Meyer, Præfat. Renati Des Cartes, &c. Principiorum more Geometrico demonstrat. per Benedictum de Spinoza.

1665, was the fore-runner of the Traſſatus Theologico-Politicus [L]. All thoſe, who have confuted the Traſſatus Theologico-Politicus, have diſcovered in it the ſeeds of Atheiſm; but none has done it ſo clearly as Mr John Bredenburg [M]. It is not ſo eaſy to answer all the difficulties contained in that book, as utterly to deſtroy the ſyſtem

* Cartes's opinions, nor diſſate any thing which either was not agreeable, or was contrary to them. Therefore let no man think that he here teaches his own opinions, or even ſuch as he approves. For though he judges ſome things in this book to be true, and owns that he has added ſome of his own, yet it contains many tenets which he rejects as falſe, and which are very different from thoſe he entertains. Of this I ſhall give one inſtance among many, in what concerns the Will, though that ſeems to be copiouſly proved. For he does not believe the will to be diſtinct from the underſtanding, much leſs does he believe it to be endowed with ſuch a liberty. For it appears from ſeveral places in Des Cartes's books that in theſe aſſertions he only ſuppoſes that the human mind is an abſolutely thinking ſubſtance; but does not prove it. Whereas our author admits indeed that there is in nature a thinking ſubſtance: but he denies that it conſtitutes the eſſence of the human mind, and lays it down that Thought, like Extension, is not determined by any limits. Thus, as the human body is not extension abſolutely, but extension determined in a certain manner by motion and reſt, according to the laws of extended nature, after the ſame manner the human mind or ſoul is not thinking abſolutely, but thinking determined in a certain manner by ideas, according to the laws of thinking nature; which thinking is concluded neceſſarily to be in the human body when it begins to exiſt. From this definition it appeared to him not difficult to demonſtrate that the will is not diſtinct from the underſtanding, much leſs that it has that liberty which Des Cartes aſſigns to it; nay even that the faculty of affirming and denying is falſe.

(68) It is the ninth.

(69) Page 41, & ſeq.

(70) His book concerning conſcience.

(71) Journal de Hambourg, Monday the 26th of October, 1694, pag. 133.

(72) Called Regnier de Manſvelt. His book was printed at Amſterdam 1674, in 4to.

[L] The ſeudonymus piece de Jure Eccleſiaſticorum, which was printed in the year 1665, was the fore-runner, &c.] Mr Dartis inſerting in his journal ſome objections againſt a book of M. de la Placette (70), ſays that ſincere men, who deſpise the eccleſiaſtical authority, and at the ſame time ſo much the more raiſe the temporal one . . . do not obſerve that they fall into the firſt ſnare laid by Spinoza, to open the way to his impious doctrine. This conjecture is grounded upon the date of two books published by that pernicious man, one in 1665, and the other in 1670. The firſt is intitled, Lucii Antiftii Conſtanti de jure Eccleſiaſticorum liber ſingularis quo dicitur: Quodcumque Divini humanique juris Eccleſiaſtici tribuitur, vel ipſi ſibi tribuunt, hoc aut falſe impieque illis tribui, aut non aliunde quam à ſuis, hoc eſt ejus Reipublice ſive Civitatis Prodiu, in qua ſunt conſtituti, accepiſſe. The ſecond is his Traſſatus Theologico-Politicus, which made a much greater noiſe than the firſt. The ſtyle and the principles of thoſe two books are ſo like, that one needs only compare them together, to be fully convinced that they were written by the ſame author. And the bare reading of them is ſufficient to ſhow, that he has only diſcredited the authority of the Clergy in the firſt, and at the ſame time raiſed that of Kings and Magiſtrates, only to make way for the impious doctrines which he aſſerts in the ſecond (71).

[M] All thoſe, who have confuted the Traſſatus Theologico-Politicus, have diſcovered in it the ſeeds of Atheiſm . . . but none has done it ſo clearly as Mr John Bredenburg.] I have already mentioned the poſthumous answer of a profeſſor of Philoſophy in the univerſity of Utrecht (72). To which I add, that a Socinian called Francis Cuper, who died at Rotterdam in 1695, intitled his answer to that book of Spinoza, Arcana Atheiſmi revelata, philoſophice & paradoxe reſutata. It is a book in 4to, printed at Rotterdam, in 1676. Mr Yvon, a diſciple of Labadie, and miniſter of the Labadiſts, at Wiewert in Frieſland, confuted the ſame book of Spinoza, in a work which he intitled, L'Impieſt convaincu, and published it Amſterdam in 1681, in 8vo. It is ſaid in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary, 1. That Mr Huet, in his Demonſtratio Evangelica, and Mr Simon, in his book concerning the Inſpiration of the Sacred Writings, have confuted the impious ſyſtem contained in the Traſſatus Theologico-Politicus. 2. That this Traſſatus has alſo been tranſlated into French, and printed with this title, Reſlexions curieuſes d'un Eſprit deſintereſſé ſur les matieres les plus importantes au ſalut tant public que particulier. I add, that this tranſlation, printed in the year 1678, in 12mo, came out with two other titles (73), as it has been rightly obſerved in the catalogue of the library of the Archbiſhop of Reims, and that the Latin original has been reprinted in 8vo, with ſeveral odd and chimerical titles, as the Bookſellers thought fit, to deceive the public, and elude the prohibitions of the magiſtrates. I further add, that Father le Vaſſor (74) has very well confuted Spinoza, in his treatiſe concerning the true religion, printed at Paris, in the year 1688. See the Journal de Sçavans of the thirty-fiſt of January, 1689; the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, and the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans of the ſame year. Mr Van Til, a miniſter of Dort, wrote very good books in Dutch, to maintain the Divinity and authority of the Scripture againſt that impious man (75). The paſſage I am going to quote out of Mr Saldenus, a miniſter at the Hague, will inform us of the names of ſome other writers againſt Spinoza. That miniſter does not approve that Spinoza ſhould be confuted in the vulgar tongue; he is afraid that perſons curious, and lovers of paradoxes, will learn by that means, what it were better for them never to know all their life. 'Neque deſuere, qui ſe abominandis ipſius Hypotheſibus (76) voce calamoque oppoſuerunt. Hos inter fuere, Batelerius (77), Manſveldius, Cuperus, Muſeus, &c. qui omnes an æque feliciter contra eum decertarint, non ſine ratione à quibuſdam dubitatur. Hos ſecutus poſtmodum eſt Guilielmus Blyenbergius (78), civis Dordracenus, qui idiomate etiam vernaculo confodere ipſum laboravit; licet nesciam, an conſilio fatiſ tuto; tum quod, quem oppugnat, Adverſarius Sermone illo non ſcripſerit, tum quod periculo vix careat, ne peſtilentiſſimum impudentiſſimi Novatoris venenum, quod ſub lingua ignota latere haſtenuſ plurimos poterat, Sermone vulgato in ipſum etiam vulgus, plus juſto fere curioſum, & in paradoxo proclive, proſperat tandem & tranſeat (79). Nor were there wanting men who both preached and wrote againſt his abominable tenets; among whom were Batelerius, Manſvelt, Cuper, Muſeus, &c. Some very reaſonably doubt whether all theſe writers attacked Spinoza with equal ſucceſs. After them appeared William Blyenberg, a citizen of Dort, who endeavoured to reſute him in Dutch; tho' I know not whether this was ſafely done, both becauſe the adverſary whom he attacked, wrote not in that language, and becauſe there is ſome danger, left the poiſonous venom of that impudent innovator, which, till then, might have lain hid from ſeveral people, in an unknown language, ſhould, by being brought into the common language, creep, and diſſuſe itſelf among the generality of people who are too curious and prone to embrace paradoxes.

An anonymous writer, who denoted his name by theſe initial letters, J. M. V. D. M. published a Latin letter at Utrecht, in the year 1671, againſt the Traſſatus Theologico-Politicus. As for thoſe, who have inſerted in ſome books, which they did not write deſignedly againſt that tract of Spinoza, ſeveral things whereby they confute his principles, I cannot name them all, they are ſo many: I ſhall only point out two famous profeſſors of Divinity, Mr Witzius, and Mr Majus, one in Holland, and the other in Germany, and Mr de la Mothe, a French miniſter at London.

I ſhall now ſpeak of Mr John Bredenburg. He was a citizen of Rotterdam, who published there a book in 1675, intitled, Joannis Bredenburgii Enervatio Traſſatus Theologico-Politiici, una cum Demonſtratione, geometrico ordine diſpoſita, NATURAM NON ESSE DEUM, cujus eſſati contrario prædictus Traſſatus unice innititur

(73) One of them is, Traité des Ceremonies ſuperſtitieſes des Juifs tant anciens que modernes, and the other La clef du Sanctuaire.

(74) He was then Father of the Oratory: He is turned Proteſtant ſince.

(75) See the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, for March 1696, Art. iii.

(76) See how he ſpeaks of the Traſſatus Theologico-Politicus, p. 23.

(77) He ſhould have ſaid Batelerius (Jacobus): his book was printed at Amſterdam 1674, and contains 103 pages in 12mo. It is intitled, Vindiciæ Miraculorum per quæ divine Religionis & Fidei Chriſtiane Veritas olim confirmata fuit, adverſus profanum auctorem Traſſatus Theologico-Politiici.

(78) I think he wrote againſt the Poſthumous Works, and not againſt the Traſſatus Theologico-Politicus.

(79) Saldenus, in Oditi Theologici, pag. 25.

system of his Opera posthuma; for it is the most absurd and monstrous hypothesis that can be imagined, and the most contrary to the most evident notions of our mind [N]. It seems as if providence punished in a particular manner the boldness of that

(80) It is a book in 4to, of 100 pages.

(81) He owns in his preface, that not being able to express himself in Latin, he had writ his book in Dutch and then had it translated into Latin.

(82) I have been informed just now, that Cuiper did always deny it, and that he always protested that he found the demonstration among the papers of the Sieur Hartshorn, whose heir he was.

(83) I have seen the tract published at Amsterdam, in 1684, intitled, Certamen Philosophicum pro veritate divinæ ac naturalis, adversus J. B. principia, &c. It is in Latin and Dutch.

(84) I have seen something of what he published in the same year under the name of Latinae Sententiarum. It is a book in Latin and Dutch.

(85) See his third Dialogue at the end, or the extract of it in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for August 1684, Art. VI, p. m. 605.

(80) He set in a full light what Spinoza had endeavoured to wrap up and disguise, and made a solid confutation of it. The readers were surprised that a man, who was no professed scholar, and who had very little learning (81), should have been able to dive into all the principles of Spinoza, and to confute them so successfully, after he had represented them in their full strength, by a fair analysis. I have heard of a remarkable thing, viz. That this author having many times considered his answer, and the principle of his adversary, found, at last, that his principle might be brought to a demonstration. Whereupon he undertook to prove, that there is no other cause of all things, but a Being, which necessarily exists, and acts, by an immutable, unavoidable, and unalterable necessity. He followed the method of the Geometricians, and after he had drawn up his demonstration, he examined it all manner of ways; he endeavoured to find out the weak side of it, and could never think of any way to confute it, nor even to weaken it. Which made him very uneasy; he groaned, and sighed, he was angry with reason, and desired his most learned friends to help him to find out the fault of that demonstration. Nevertheless, he suffered no body to take a copy of it. Francis Cuiper transcribed it by stealth, tho' he had promised not to do it (82). That man, perhaps, moved by the mutual jealousy of authors, for he had writ against Spinoza, and had not been so successful as John Bredenburg, made use of that copy some time after to accuse him of Atheism. He published it in Dutch with some reflexions; Bredenburg defended himself in the same language: several pieces were published on both sides, which I have not read, for I do not understand Dutch. Orobio, a Jew, who was an able Physician (83), and Aubert de Verfe (84) engaged in that quarrel, and sided with Cuiper. They maintained that the author of the demonstration was a Spinozist, and consequently an Atheist. As far as I have been able to understand by what I have heard, the latter defended himself, by alleging the common distinction between faith and reason. He pretended that as the Protestants and the Catholics believe the mystery of the Trinity, tho' inconsistent with the light of nature, he believed free-will, tho' reason afforded him strong proofs that every thing happens by an unavoidable necessity, and consequently that there can be no religion. It is no easy thing to drive a man out of such an entrenchment. It may be said that he is not sincere, and that is impossible to believe, as a truth, what is contrary to a Geometrical demonstration: but can this be said without setting yourself up for a judge in a case, wherein incompetency may be objected against you? Have we a right to decide what passes in other mens hearts? Have we a sufficient knowledge of a man's soul, to be positive that such and such combinations cannot be found in it? Have we not many instances of absurd combinations, and such as come nearer to a contradiction than that which John Bredenburg alleged? For it ought to be observed that there is no contradiction between these two things: 1. Reason teaches me that this is false; 2. And yet I believe it, because I am persuaded that reason is not infallible, and because I had rather follow an inward sense, and the impressions of conscience, in short, the word of God, than a metaphysical demonstration. This is not believing, and disbelieving at the same time one and the same thing. Such a combination is impossible, and no man ought to be admitted to allege it for his vindication. However it be, the man I speak of made it appear that the sense of religion, and the hopes of another life prevailed in his soul against his demonstration; and I have been told that the marks he gave of it, during his last sickness, put his sincerity out of all doubt. The Abbot de Dangeau (85) speaks of some men, whose religion is in their mind, and not in their heart; they are persuaded of the truth of it, but their conscience is not affected with the love of God. I think it may likewise be said that there are some men, whose religion is in their heart, and not in their mind. They lose sight of it, when they make use of reason to come to the knowledge of it; it escapes the subtilties and sophisms of their Logic; they know not which way to turn whilst they proclaim the arguments pro and con: but when they leave off disputing, and mind only their inward sense, the instinct of conscience, the power of education, &c. they are persuaded that there is a religion, and conform their lives to it as much as human infirmities can permit. This was the case of Cicero: one can hardly doubt it who compares his other books with those of Natura Deorum, wherein he makes Cotta triumph over all the interlocutors, who maintained the existence of the gods.

Whoever desires to know the shifts and equivocations made use of by Spinoza to conceal his Atheism, needs only read Christian Kortholt's book de tribus Impostoribus magnis (86), printed at Kiel in 1680, in 12mo. The author has there collected several passages of Spinoza, and shown all the venom and artifice that lie in them. This is not the least curious part of the history and character of that Atheist. He quotes (87), among other things, his letter (88), wherein Spinoza complains that there was a report (89) that he had a book in the press to prove that there is no God.

[N] The most absurd and monstrous hypothesis . . . the most contrary to the most evident notions of our mind. He supposes (90) that there is but one substance in nature, and that this only substance is endowed with infinite attributes, and among others, with extension. In the universe are modifications of that substance, as it is extended; and that for instance, the souls of men are modifications of that substance, as it thinks: so that God, the necessary and most perfect Being, is the cause of all things that exist, but does not differ from them. There is but one Being, and one Nature, and that Being produces in itself, and by an immanent action, whatever goes by the name of creatures. He is at once both agent and patient, efficient cause, and subject; He produces nothing but what is his own modification. This is the most extravagant hypothesis that can be thought of. The most infamous things sung by the heathen Poets against Jupiter, and against Venus, do not come near the horrid notion Spinoza gives us of God. For the Poets did not ascribe to the gods all the crimes that are committed, all the infirmities of mankind; but, according to Spinoza, there is no other agent, nor other patient but God, with respect to physical and moral evil. Let us observe some of the absurdities of his system.

I. It is impossible that the universe should be the only substance; for whatever is extended must necessarily consist of parts, and whatever consists of parts must be compounded: and as the parts of extension do not subsist one in another, it necessarily follows that extension in general is not a substance, or that each part of extension is a particular substance, and distinct from all others. But, according to Spinoza, extension in general is the attribute of a substance. He owns, as all other Philosophers do, that the attribute of a substance does not really differ from that substance; and therefore he must acknowledge that extension in general is a substance: from whence it ought to be concluded, that each part of extension is a particular substance; which overthrows the foundation of the whole system of that author. He cannot say that extension in general is distinct from the substance of God; for should he say so, it would follow that this substance is in itself unextended: and therefore it could never have acquired the three dimensions but by creating them, since it is manifest that extension cannot proceed from an unextended subject, but by way of creation. But Spinoza did not believe that any thing could be made out of nothing. Again, it is manifest, that a substance unextended by its nature, can never become the subject of the three dimensions; for how could they be placed upon a mathematical point? They would therefore subsist without a subject; and therefore they would be a substance: so that if this author admitted a real distinction between the substance of God and extension in general, he would be obliged to say, that God is composed of two substances distinct one from another, viz. of his unextended being, and

(86) Viz. Edward Lord Herbert of Cherbury; Thomas Hobbes; and Benedict de Spinoza.

(87) Christ. Kortholt, de tribus Impostoribus, p. 171.

(88) Written to Mr. Oldenbourg, in 1675.

(89) See what is said in the Opera posthuma, where he complains of the report that he had a book in the press to prove that there is no God.

(90) See among his Posthuma Works the piece intitled Ethica.

THAT according to Spinoza, God and extension are the same thing.

that author, by blinding him to such a degree, that in order to avoid some difficulties, which of extension. Thus he is obliged to acknowledge that extension and God are but one and the same thing; and besides, as he maintains that there is but one substance in the universe, he must needs teach that extension is a simple Being, and as much compounded as Mathematical points. But is not this a most ridiculous assertion, and contrary to our most distinct ideas? Is it more evident that the number one thousand is made up of a thousand units, than it is evident that a body of an hundred inches is made up of a hundred parts really distinct one from another, each of which has the extension of an inch?

THAT extension is composed of parts, each of which is a particular substance.

It were in vain to raise any objections against our imagination and our senses; for the most intellectual and the most immaterial notions discover to us, with the utmost evidence, that there is a most real distinction between things, one of which has a property, which the other has not. The school-men have been very successful in showing the characters and infallible signs of distinction. When, say they, we may affirm of one thing, what cannot be affirmed of another, those two things are distinct: things that may be separated one from another, either with respect to time, or with respect to place, are distinct. If we apply those characters to the twelve inches of the foot of extension, we shall find a true distinction between them. I can affirm of the fifth, that it is contiguous to the sixth, and I can deny it of the first and second, &c. I can remove the sixth to the place of the twelfth; and therefore it may be separated from the fifth. Note, that Spinoza cannot deny that the characters of distinction made use of by the school-men are very just; for it is by these characters he acknowledges that stones and animals are not the same modification of the infinite Being. He acknowledges therefore, will they say, that there is some difference between things. He must needs own it, for he was not so extravagant as to believe that there was no difference between him and the Jew, who gave him a stab with a knife; or to say, that his bed and his chamber were, in all respects, the same being with the Emperor of China. What did he say then? He taught, not that two trees are two parts of extension, but only two modifications. You will be surprised that he spent so many years in forging a new system, since one of the main pillars of it was to be the pretended difference between the word part and the word modification. Could he expect any advantage from this change of a word? What signifies it, whether he declines to use the word part, and substitutes the word modification in the room of it? Will the notions annexed to the word part vanish away? Will they not be applied to the word modification? Are the signs and characters of difference less real or evident, when matter is divided into modifications, than when it is divided into parts? Not at all. The idea of matter still remains the idea of a compound being, of a system of several substances. This will be fully proved by what I am going to say.

MODIFICATIONS inconsistent, require distinct subjects.

Modifications are beings, which cannot exist without the substance they modify; and therefore there ought to be a substance wherever there are modifications; nay, it must needs be multiplied in proportion as modifications inconsistent one with another are multiplied: so that wherever there are five or six such modifications, there are also five or six substances. It is evident, and no Spinozist can deny it, that the square and the circular figures cannot be in the same piece of wax. And therefore the substance modified by a square figure is not the same substance with that which is modified by the circular figure. When therefore I see a round table, and a square table, in a room, I may affirm that the extension, which is the subject of the round table, is a substance distinct from the extension, which is the subject of the other table; for otherwise the square figure and the round figure would be at the same time in one and the same subject; which is impossible. Iron and water, wine and wood, are incompatible; and therefore they require distinct subjects. The lower end of a stake driven into a river is not the same modification with the other end: It is surrounded with earth, whilst the other is surrounded with water; and therefore they have two contradictory attributes, viz. being surrounded with water, not being surrounded with water: and therefore the subject they modify must be at least two substances; for one only substance cannot be at the same time modified by an accident surrounded with water, and by an accident not surrounded with water. This shows that extension is made up of as many distinct substances as there are modifications.

VOL. V.

II. If it be an absurd thing to say that God is extended, because, it is depriving him of his simplicity, and ascribing to him an infinite number of parts; what shall we say when we consider that this opinion reduces him to the condition of matter, the vilest of all beings, and such as most of the ancient Philosophers have placed immediately next to nothing. Matter is the stage of all sorts of changes, the field of battle of contrary causes, the subject of all corruptions, and of all generations; in a word, there is no being, whose nature is more inconsistent with the immutability of God. And yet the Spinozists maintain that it suffers no division; and the reason they alledge for it is the most frivolous and most silly cavilling in the world. They pretend that if matter was divided, one of its portions should be separated from others by empty spaces; which never happens. This is certainly a very wrong definition of division. We are as really separated from our friends, when the space that divides us is taken up by other men placed a breast, as if it was full of earth. And therefore when the Spinozists maintain, that matter reduced into ashes and smoke is not actually divided, they advance a thing quite contrary to our notions and manner of speaking. But what will they get, if we should lay aside the advantage we may draw from their wrong defining division? There will remain still many proofs of the mutability and corruptibility of the god of Spinoza. All men have a very clear idea of an immutable Being: They understand by that word a Being, which never acquires any thing new; which never loses what it is once possessed of; which is always the same, both with respect to its substance, and to the manner of its Being. The clearness of this idea enables us to apprehend most distinctly what a mutable Being is: It is not only a Being, whose existence may begin and have an end; but a Being, which always subsisting as to its substance, may successively acquire several modifications, and lose the accidents or forms which it once had. All the ancient Philosophers have acknowledged, that the continual series of generations and corruptions, which is observed in the world, neither produces nor destroys any portion of matter: hence it is, that they said that matter is ingenerable and incorruptible as to its substance, though it be the subject of all generations and all corruptions. The same matter which is fire now, was wood before; all its essential attributes remain the same under the form of wood; and under the form of fire: and therefore it loses and acquires nothing but accidents and modes, when wood is changed into fire, bread into flesh, flesh into earth, &c. And yet it is the most sensible and the most proper example that can be given of a mutable Being, and actually liable to all sorts of alterations and internal changes. I call them internal; for the different forms under which it exists are not like the different cloaths under which actors appear upon the stage. The bodies of those actors may subsist without any manner of change or alteration under a thousand different dresses: Cloth and linnen, silk and gold, are not united with the man that wears them; they are still foreign bodies, and outward ornaments; but the forms produced in matter are inwardly and penetratively united to it; it is their subject of inherence, and according to right Philosophy, there is no other distinction between them and matter, than what is to be found between modes and a thing modified. From whence it follows, that the god of the Spinozists is a Being actually changing, that goes continually through several states internally and really different one from another. It is not therefore the most perfect Being, with whom there is no variability, neither shadow of turning (91).

Note, that the Proteus mentioned by the Poets, their Theris, and their Vertumhus, who were images and examples of inconsistency, and which occasioned

G g g

THE immutability of God is inconsistent with the nature of extension. That matter is actually divided into parts.

matter form

(91) Jan. i. 17.

which may perplex a Philosopher, he run himself into others infinitely more inexplicable, and the proverbs whereby the oddest fickleness of men was denoted, would have been immutable gods, if the god of the Spinozists was immutable; for it was never pretended that there happened any alteration in their substance, but only new modifications.

(92) Horat.
Epist. I, lib. i,
ver. 90.

Quo teneam vultus mutantem Proteus nodo (92).

What charm can hold this varying Proteus fast. CREECH.

..... sæpe notatus

Cum tribus annellis, modo læva Priæcus inani, Vixit inæqualis, clavum ut mutaret in horas:
Ædibus ex magnis subito se conderet, unde
Mundior exiret vix libertinus honeste.
Jam mæchus Romæ, jam mallet doctus Athenis Vivere: Vertumanis, quotquot sunt, natus iniquis.

• Horat. Sat.
VII, lib. ii,
ver. 3.

Fop Priæcus with himself doth disagree,
Sometimes he wears no rings, and sometimes three.
He changes every hour his cloaths and gown,
Now takes the best house, now the worst in town,
And there he goes as natty as a clown.
Now studies hard at Athens, now he'll come,
And turn gallant, and follow vobores at Rome:
The most unsteady, fickle man on earth
As if Vertumna's self had rul'd his birth. CREECH.

See below remark [CC]. If any reader wants here something to entertain him, let him read these Verses of Virgil concerning Proteus.

Verum, ubi correptum manibus, vinclicque tenebis,
Tum variæ illudent species, atque ora ferarum:
Fiet enim subito sus horridus, atque tigris,
Squamosusque draco, & fulvâ cervice leæna:
Aut acrem flammæ sonitum dabit, atque ita vinculis
Excidet: aut in aquas tenues delapsus abibit.
Sed, quanto ille magis formas se vertet in omnes,
Tantò, nate, magis contende tenacia vincla:
Donec talis erit mutato corpore, qualem
Videris, incepto tegetet cum lumina fomno (93).

(93) Virgil.
Georg. lib. iv,
ver. 405. See
also Horace, Sat.
III, lib. ii. They took it from Homer, Odyss.
lib. iv.

Thus surely bound, yet be not over bold,
The slippery god will try to lose his hold.
And various forms assume, to cheat thy sight;
And with vain images of beasts affright.
With foamy tusks will seem a bristly boar,
Or imitate the lion's angry roar;
Break out in crackling flames to shun thy snares,
Or hiss a dragon, or a tyger stares:
Or with a snake, thy caution to betray,
In fleeting streams attempt to slide away.
But thou, the more he varies forms, beware
To strain his fetters with a stricter care.
Till tiring all his arts, he turns agen
To his true shape, in which he first was seen.

DRYDEN.

(94) Ovid. Me-
tam. lib. xi, Fab.
vii, ver. 221, &
seq.

(95) Id. ibid.
lib. xiv, Fab.
xvi, ver. 647,
& seq.

THAT God cannot be the subject of inher-ence of men's thoughts, since they are contrary to one another.

As for what concerns Thetis see Ovid (94): See also the same Poet concerning Vertumnus (95), and besides consult the fourth book of Propertius in the second Elegy.

III. We shall see still more monstrous absurdities, if we consider the god of Spinoza as being the subject of all the modifications of thought. The combination of extension and thought, in one and the same substance, is already one great difficulty; for the question is not about a mixture like that of metals, or that of wine and water, which requires only a juxta-position: But the combination of thought and extension ought to be an identity; thought and extension are two attributes identified with substance. They are therefore identified among themselves, by the fundamental and essential rule of human Logic (96). I am sure that if Spinoza had found the same intricacy in another sect, he would

(96) Quæ sunt
idem uni tertio, sunt idem inter se.

have thought it unworthy of his attention; but he did not much trouble himself with it in his own cause: So true it is that the most disdainful censurers of other mens thoughts, are very indulgent to themselves. Doubtless, he derided the mystery of the Trinity, and wondered that so many people should speak of a nature terminated by three hypostases; and yet, properly speaking, he ascribed as many persons to the divine nature as there are men upon earth. He looked upon those as fools who believed Transubstantiation, and who say that a man may be in many places at one and the same time, may be alive in Paris, and dead at Rome, &c. and yet he maintains, that the extended substance, though but one and indivisible, is all at once every where, cold in one place, hot in another, melancholy in one place, merry in another, &c. This by the by: but mind what I am going to say. If there is any thing certain and undeniable in human knowledge, it is this proposition: Opposita sunt quæ neque de se invicem, neque de eodem tercio secundum idem, ad idem, eodem modo atque tempore vere affirmari possunt

(97). That is, two opposite terms cannot be truly affirmed of the same subject in the same respects, and at the same time. For instance, one cannot say without lying, Peter is well, Peter is sick: He denies that, and he affirms it: supposing, that the terms have always the same relation, and are taken in the same sense. The Spinozists destroy that idea, and falsify it in such a manner, that I do not know whence they can take the character of truth; for if such propositions were false, there is none that can be warranted to be true. And therefore it is vain to dispute with them; for if they deny this, they may as well deny any other reason alledged against them. I shall make it appear that this axiom (98) is very false in their system; and in order to it, I lay down first of all this undeniable maxim, that all the names that are given to a subject to signify what it does, or what it suffers, do properly and physically belong to its substance, and not to its accidents. When we say iron is hard, iron is heavy, it sinks into water, it cleaves wood, we do not pretend to say that its hardness is hard, that its heaviness is heavy, &c. This would be an impertinent way of speaking: we mean that the extended substance it is made of resists, is heavy, goes down into water, and cleaves wood. In like manner when we say that a man denies, affirms, is angry, is kind, praises, &c. we ascribe all those attributes to the substance of his soul, and not to his thoughts, as they are accidents or modifications. And therefore were it true, as Spinoza will have it, that men are modifications of God, we should speak falsely should we say, Peter denies this, he wills that, he affirms such a thing; for, according to that system, it is properly God who denies, who wills, who affirms, and consequently all the denominations, resulting from the thoughts of all men, do properly and physically belong to the substance of God. From whence it follows that God hates and loves, denies and affirms, the same things, at the same time, and according to all the conditions requisite, to make the rule I have mentioned concerning opposite terms false: for it cannot be denied, that according to all those conditions strictly taken, some men love and affirm what other men hate and deny. I go further still: the contradictory terms, to will and not to will, belong at the same time to different men according to all those conditions; and therefore according to Spinoza's system they belong to that sole and indivisible substance he calls God. It is therefore God who at the same time forms an act of will, and does not form it with respect to the same object. And therefore two contradictory terms are true of him; which overthrows the first principles in Metaphysics (99). I am not ignorant that in disputes concerning Transubstantiation, a cavil is made use of which might help the Spinozists. It is said that if Peter wills a thing at Rome, which he does not will at Paris, the contradictory terms to will and not to will, are not true with respect to him; for since it is supposed he wills at Rome, it were a lie to say he wills not. I leave them this vain subtilty, and I shall only say, that as a square circle is a contradiction, a substance is so too, when it loves and hates the same object at the same time. A square circle would be and would not be

(97) See Logica, Comin. in Crisp. x, Aristotelis de Predicamentis, pag. n. 275, and the Logic of Burgeff, lib. i, cap. xxii, p. n. 127.

(98) That is, the above-mentioned definition of opposite terms, citation (97).

all things

(99) Duo contradictoria non possunt esse simul
vera: de quibus
re vera est asser-
tio vel negatio.
See Aristotle's
Metaphysics, ch. iii, re, of the fourth book.

and so obvious that any man of a right judgment must needs perceive them. They who complain that the authors who have undertaken to confute him, have not been successful, confound be a circle; which is a plain contradiction: It would be a circle according to the supposition, and it would be no circle, since the circular figure is wholly inconsistent with the square figure. I say the same of a substance, that loves and hates the same thing: it loves, and does not love it; this is a downright contradiction: it loves it, according to the supposition; it does not love it, since hatred does essentially exclude love. Thus you see what it is to be over-nice.

Spinoza could not bear the least obscurity of Peripateticism, Judaism, or Christianity; and yet he heartily embraced an hypothesis, which reconciles two things so contrary to one another, as the square and the circular figures, and whereby an infinite number of inconsistent attributes, and all the variety and antipathy of the thoughts of mankind are made true and consistent at the same time in one and the same most simple and indivisible substance. We commonly say, quod capitis tot sensus, as many men so many minds; but according to Spinoza all the minds or thoughts of men are in one head. The bare relating of such things is a sufficient confutation of them, and clearly shews they are contradictory; for it is manifest either that nothing is impossible, no not that two and two should make twelve, or that there are in the universe as many substances as subjects, which cannot receive at the same time the same denominations.

ANOTHER proof of what has been said, taken from the wickedness of man's thoughts.

IV. But if it be, physically speaking, a prodigious absurdity, that a simple and only Being should be modified at the same time by the thoughts of all men, it is an execrable abomination, if it be considered with regard to morality. How then? shall not the infinite, the necessary, the most perfect Being be steady, constant, and immutable? Why do I say, immutable? it will not be one moment the same; its thoughts will continually succeed one another; the same odd mixture of passions and sentiments will never happen twice. This is hard to be digested; but here is something worse. This continual changeableness will be very uniform in this sense, that for one good thought the infinite Being will have a thousand foolish, extravagant, filthy, and abominable. It will produce in it self all the follies, idle fancies, lewd and unjust practices of mankind: it will be not only the efficient cause of them, but also the passive subject, the subiectum inbecillitatis: it will be united to them by the most intimate union that can be conceived; for it is a penetrative union, or rather a perfect identity, since the modification is not really distinct from the modified substance. Several great Philosophers not being able to apprehend how the most perfect Being can permit that man should be so wicked and so unhappy, have supposed two principles, the one good, and the other bad (100); but here is a Philosopher, who is pleased to make God himself the agent and patient, the cause and subject of all the crimes and miseries of men. If men hate and assassinate one another, if they form themselves into armies to kill one another, if the conquerors eat sometimes the conquered; it is a thing that may be apprehended, because it is supposed they are distinct one from another, and that meum and tuum produce contrary passions in them. But to affirm that men are only the modification of one and the same Being, that consequently God only acts, and that the same individual God being modified into Turks and Hungarians, there are wars and battles, is to advance a thing more monstrous and chimerical than all the deliriums of men shut up in mad-houses. Take particular notice, as I have said before, that modes do nothing, and that substances only act and suffer. This phrase, the sweetness of honey pleases the palate, is only true, as it signifies that the extended substance of which honey is made up pleases the palate. Thus according to Spinoza's system, whoever says, the Germans have killed ten thousand Turks, speaks improperly and falsely, unless he means GOD modified into Germans has killed GOD modified into ten thousand Turks: And therefore all the phrases made use of to express what men do one against another, have no other true sense but this, GOD hates himself; he asks favours of himself, and refuses them to himself; he persecutes himself, kills himself, eats himself (101), calumniates himself, executes himself, &c. This would be less incomprehensible, if Spinoza had represented God as a collection of many distinct parts; but he reduces him to the most perfect simplicity, to an unity of substance, to indivisibility. And therefore he asserts the most infamous and the maddest extravagances that can be conceived, infinitely more ridiculous than those of the Poets concerning the gods of the Heathens. I wonder he either did not perceive them, or, if he did, how he persisted obstinately in his principle. A man of sense would rather chafe to grub up a piece of ground with his teeth and nails, than to cultivate such an offensive and absurd hypothesis.

V. Here follow two other objections. Some Philosophers have been so impious as to deny the being of a God; but they did not carry their extravagance so far, as to say, that if he did exist, he would not be perfectly happy. The greatest Sceptics among the Ancients said, that all men have an idea of God, according to which he is a living, happy, and incorruptible Being, of a perfect felicity, and susceptible of no evil. Κοινὴν ἀπόληψιν ἔχουσι πάντες ἄνθρωποι περὶ Θεοῦ, καθ' ἣν μακάριον τι ἐστὶ ζῶν καὶ ἀθάνατον, καὶ τέλειον ἐν εὐδαιμονίᾳ, καὶ παντὸς κακῆ ἀνεπίδεκτον: Communem anticipatam homines omnes habent de Deo notionem, ex qua est beatum quoddam animal, ab interitu alienum, in felicitate perfectum, in quod nullum possit malum cadere (102). Happiness was the most inseparable property contained in this idea: those who deprived him of power and the direction of the world, acknowledged his felicity and immortal beatitude.

ANOTHER proof of what has been said above, taken from man's misery.

(102) Sextus Empiricus adversus Mathematicos. lib. viii. §. ii.

Omnia enim per se Divum natura necesse est Immortali ævo summa cum pace fruatur, Semota ab nostris rebus sejunctaque longe; Nam privata dolore omni, privata periculis, Ipsa suis pollens opibus, nihil indiga nostri, Nec bene promeritis capitur, nec tangitur ira (103).

For whatsoe'er's divine must live in peace,
In undisturb'd and everlasting ease:
Not care for us, from fears and dangers free,
Sufficient to its own felicity:
Nought here below, nought in our power it needs;
Ne'er smiles at good, ne'er frowns at wicked deeds.

CREECH.

Those who made him subject to death, said at least, that he was happy all his life-time. It was, doubtless, a horrid extravagance not to ascribe immortality as well as happiness to the Divine nature. Plutarch does very well confute this absurdity of the Stoics: I shall set down his words somewhat at large, because they prove a thought, which I have advanced above, and because they confute the Spinozists; for his argument is inconsistent with the hypothesis, according to which God is subject to death, as to his parts or modalities, that he is, as it were, the matter of generations and corruptions, that he destroys his own modalities, that he supports himself with that destruction, &c. Καὶ ἴσως ἐνύχοι τις ἂν ἐθνεσι βαρβάρους καὶ ἀγροίους θεῶν μὴ νοήσει. θεῶν δὲ νοῶν, μὲν νοῶν δὲ ἀθάνατον μηδὲ αἰδίον, ἄνθρωποι εἰδὲ εἰς γίγνοντες. οἱ γὰρ ἀθεοὶ περισσασσομένης ἔτοι, θεοδωρεῖ, καὶ διαγόμεν, καὶ ἵπκωντες, ἐκ ἐτόλμησαν εἰπεῖν το θεῶν ὅτι ἀθάνατον εἶναι ἀλλ' ἐκ ἐπίστασαν ὡς ἐστὶ τι ἀθάνατον τῷ μὲν ἀθάνατον τὴν ὑπάρξιν μὴ ἀπολείποντες, τῷ θεῷ δὲ τὴν πρόληψιν φυλάττοντες. ἀλλὰ χρύσιον καὶ κλεάνθους ἐμπειληκότες (ὡς ἐπὶ εἰπεῖν) τῷ λόγῳ θεῶν τὸν ἑσπέρην, τὴν γῆν, τὸν αἶρα, τὴν θαλάσσαν, εἰδὲνα τὰν τοσούτων ἀθάνατον εἰδὲ αἰδίον ἀπολείπειν, πλὴν μόνον τῷ διδόντι εἰς ὃν πάντας καταλαίσκοντι τὸς ἄλλους. ὥς καὶ τὴν τὸ φθείρειν προσείπει τὸ φθείρειν καὶ μὴ ἐπισκίσειν. ἀσθενεία γὰρ τι καὶ τὸ μεταβάλλον εἰς ἕτερον φθείρεται, καὶ τὸ τοῖς ἄλλοις εἰς ἐαυτὸ φθείρεται τριβόμενον σάββα. Ac fieri sane potest, ut incidat aliquis in homines barbaros & feros, qui Deum esse nullum putent: deum esse qui existimet: sed eundem non securum interitus, non æternum, inventus est ne unus quidem homo. Certè qui athei appellantur quod negarent esse deos, Theodorus, Diagoras, Hippon: non aut sunt dicere deum esse interitui

(103) Lucretius, lib. i. ver. 57. The Epicureans ascribed to the gods whatsoever Homer ascribes to them in these words: so often repeated: Μῆναρ δὲ θεοὶ αἰὲν ἀθάνατοι. Beati Dii semper exstantes. --- The gods always happy.

(100) See the articles MANICHEES, MARCIONITES, PAULICIANS.

(101) The fable of Saturn, who devoured his own children, is infinitely less unreasonable than Spinoza's assertion.

confound things: they would have the difficulties, under which he sunk, wholly removed [O]; but they should be contented to see his hypothesis entirely overthrown, as teritui obnoxium, sed non crediderunt aliquid esse ab interitu immune, ac talem naturam aliquam esse posse negantes, notitiam de deo reliquerunt in medio. Chrysippus verò & Cleanthes, cum implevisent (ut sic dicam) suis dictis cælum, terras, ærem, mare diis: nullum horum ab interitu liberum aut sempiternum statuerunt: solo Jove excepto; in quem reliquos omnes consumi putant; ut jam is perdat, quod nihilo est quam perire melius. Est enim imbecillitas ut pereundo in alium transire, ita interitu aliorum in se transeuntium nutriri atque servari (104). - - - And, indeed, we may happen to meet with barbarous and savage men, who believe that there is no G O D. But there was never found any man, who believing that there was no G O D, did not at the same time believe him incorruptible and eternal. For those who are called Atheists, such as Theodorus, Diagoras, and Hyppo, did not dare to say that G O D was corruptible; they, indeed, believed that there was nothing exempt from corruption, while they denied that no Being was incorruptible, they determined nothing concerning G O D. But Chrysippus and Cleanthes, having filled (as one may say) the Heavens, the Earth, the Air, the Sea, with gods, affirmed that none of these gods was incorruptible or eternal: they excepted Jupiter only, into whom they thought that all the other gods were dissolved, and they made him decay, which is no better than perishing. For as it implies a weakness and defect in one Being to perish and be dissolved into another, so it implies a weakness and defect in that other Being to be nourished and preserved by the former dissolving into it. But tho' this doctrine of the Stoics was never so extravagant, it did not deprive the gods of happiness during their life. Perhaps the Spinozists are the only men, who have made the Deity subject to misery (105).

(104) Plutarch, adversus Stoicos, pag. 1075. A.

(105) Their predecessors, whom I have mentioned in the first remark, have not cleared and divided into the consequences of their principle, as Spinoza does.

But what misery? A misery so great, that he falls into despair, and would annihilate himself if he could; he endeavours to do it; he deprives himself of as many things as he can; he hangs himself, he throws himself headlong down a precipice, being no longer able to bear the terrible melancholy that consumes him. This is not declamation; it is an exact and Philosophical language: for if man is only a modification, he does nothing: it were an impertinent, ridiculous, and burlesque, expression to say, Joy is merry, sadness is sad: it is a phrase no less impertinent in Spinoza's system, to affirm, man thinks, man afflicts himself, man bangs himself, &c. All those propositions ought to be affirmed of the substance, whereof man is only a mode. How could Spinoza think that an independent and self-existent Being, endowed with infinite perfections, is subject to all the miseries incident to mankind? If some other Being forced it to vex itself, and to feel pain, it's striving to make it's self unhappy would be less surprizing; one might say, it must needs obey a stronger power; it is likely it torments itself with the gravel, the cholic, a fever, and madness, to avoid a greater evil. But it is the only Being in the universe, there is nothing that commands, exhorts, or intreats, it. It is it's own nature, will Spinoza say, that moves it under some circumstances, to give itself a great deal of vexation, and a very violent pain. But I will ask him whether he does not find something monstrous and unconceivable in such a fatality.

(106) You will find the sequel of these words of Cicero, in the remark [O], citation (112) of the article PYTHAGORAS.

THE system of Spinoza makes his whole conduct, and all his discourses ridiculous.

The strong reasons alledged against those, who maintained that our souls are a portion of G o d, are still more solid against Spinoza. It is objected against Pythagoras, in a piece of Cicero, that three palpable falsities result from that doctrine: 1, That the Divine Nature would be torn in pieces. 2, That it would be miserable whenever men are so. 3, That man's mind would be ignorant of nothing, since it would be G o d. Nam Pythagoras qui censuit, &c. (106).

VI. Were it not that I remember I do not write a book against that man, but only some short observations by the by, I could find many other absurdities in his system. I shall conclude with this. He engaged in an hypothesis, which makes all his labours ridiculous; and I am sure that every page of his Ethics affords a horrid piece of nonsense. First, I would fain know whom he has in view, when he rejects some doctrines, and proposes others. Does he design to teach some truths? Would he confute some errors? But how can he say that there are any errors among men? Are not the thoughts of the common Philosophers, those of the Jews, those of the Christians, modes of the Infinite Being, as well as those of his Ethics? Are they not realities as necessary to the perfection of the universe, as all his speculations? Do they not arise from the necessary cause? How then can he pretend that they want to be rectified? In the second place, does he not say that the nature, whereof they are modalities, acts necessarily, and always follows it's course; that it can neither turn aside nor stop; and that being the only nature in the universe, no outward cause will ever stop or rectify it. And therefore nothing can be more needless than the instructions of this Philosopher. Does it become him, who is but the modification of a substance, to prescribe to the Infinite Being what it ought to do? Will that Being hear him? And if it should hear him, could it be the better for what he says? Does it not always act according to the whole extent of it's power, without knowing either whither it goes, or what it does? Such a man as Spinoza would set his mind at rest, if he reasoned well. If it be possible, would he say, for such a doctrine to take root, the necessity of nature will establish it without my book: if it be not possible, all my writings will be insignificant.

[O] They would have the difficulties, under which Spinoza sunk, wholly removed. I think it may be supposed that he run into these absurdities, because he could not apprehend either that matter is eternal, and different from G o d, or that it has been produced out of nothing, or that an Infinite Mind, perfectly free, and the Creator of all things, could produce such a work as the world. A matter that necessarily exists, and yet is destitute of activity, and subject to the power of another principle, is a thing that does not suit with reason. We see no affinity between those three qualities; such a combination is repugnant to the idea of order. A matter created out of nothing cannot be conceived, tho' we strive never so much to form an idea of an act of will, which changes into a real substance what was nothing before. This principle of the Antients, ex nihilo, nihil fit, - - - Nothing is made of nothing, offers itself continually to our imagination, and there appears with such evidence, that it stops us short, in case we have begun to frame any conception of creation. Lastly, that a G o d, infinitely good, infinitely holy, infinitely free, who could make creatures always holy, and always happy, should rather chuse to make them criminal, and eternally miserable, is a thing that shocks reason; and so much the more, because it cannot reconcile man's free-will

(107) That is, the liberty of the difference.

(107) with the quality of a Being created out of nothing. But unless those two things be reconciled, it cannot conceive how man deserves any punishment under a free, good, holy, and just Providence. These three inconveniences put Spinoza upon looking for a new system, wherein G o d should not be distinct from matter, and should act necessarily, and according to the whole extent of his power, not out of himself, but in himself. It results from this supposition, that this necessary cause, whose power is not limited, and whose actions are not directed by goodness, justice, and knowledge, but only by the infinite power of it's nature, must needs have modified itself according to all possible realities, so that errors and vices, pain and grief, being modalities as real as truth, virtue, and pleasure, all those things must have been in the universe. Spinoza hoped to resolve by that means the objections of the Manichees, against the one only principle. Those objections have no force but on the supposition that one only principle of all things acts by choice, and can act or forbear acting, and confines it's power according to the rules of goodness and equity, or according to the instinct of malice. This being supposed, the question is, if that one only principle be good, whence comes evil? If it be bad, whence comes good? Deteriora velle, nostri fuerit fortasse defectus: posse vero contra innocentiam, quæ sceleratus quicque conceperit, inspiciente Deo, monstri simile est: unde haud injuria tuorum quidam familiarium quæfivit: Si quidem Deus, inquit, est, unde mala? bona vero unde, si non est (108)? - - - To have a will to do evil, is, perhaps, our defect: but for a villain, in the sight of God, to do against an innocent man whatever he devises, is a thing monstrous. From m. 11.

(108) Boethius, de Consolat. Phil. Joseph. lib. 4. Proje 10, 12.

hence,

as has been done even by his weakest adversaries [P]. It must not be forgot that this impious

hence one of your friends asked, and not without reason, If there is a God, whence comes evil; and if there is no God, whence comes good? Spinoza would answer, my one only principle being able to do good and evil, and doing whatever it can do, good and evil must necessarily be in the world. But if you consider the three inconveniences he intended to avoid, and the extravagant and abominable consequences of his hypothesis, you will find that his choice is neither that of a good man, nor that of a man of parts. He lays aside some things, of which, the worst that can be said is, that the weakness of our reason does not allow us clearly to perceive the possibility of them; and he admits others, which are evidently impossible. There is a great difference between not comprehending the possibility of a thing, and comprehending the impossibility of it. Now see the injustice of the readers. They require from all those, who write against Spinoza, that they should remove the difficulties which perplexed him, and set in a clear light the truths he could not comprehend; and because they find no such thing in the writings of the Anti-Spinozists, they declare they have not succeeded. Is it not sufficient to overthrow the system of that Atheist Reason teaches us that custom ought to be maintained against innovators, unless they bring in better laws; and if their opinions were not better than those that are commonly received, they would deserve to be rejected, tho' they were not worse than the abuses they intend to suppress. It ought to be said to those men, submit to custom, or give us something better (109). Much more ought we to reject the system of the Spinozists, since in freeing us from some difficulties, it involves us in more inextricable perplexities. If the difficulties were equal on both sides, the common system should be preferred to the other, because, besides the privilege of possession it hath also this advantage, that it promises us a great happiness for the time to come, and affords us a thousand comforts in the miseries of this life. How great a satisfaction is it in our adversity to hope that God will hear our prayers, and that, if he does not hear them, he will however reward our patience, and indemnify us in a glorious manner? It is a great comfort to flatter one's self that other men will have some regard to the dictates of their conscience, and to the fear of God. Wherefore the common hypothesis is both truer and more agreeable than the atheistical (110). Therefore since the system of Spinoza is not liable to lesser objections than the Christian hypothesis, it were a sufficient reason to reject it. So that any author, who shews that Spinozism is obscure, and false in its first propositions, and perplexed with impenetrable and contradictory absurdities in its consequences, ought to pass for having very well confuted it, tho' he does not clearly resolve all the objections of Spinoza. The whole matter may be reduced to these few words. The common hypothesis, if compared with that of the Spinozists in those things that are clear, has a greater evidence: and if it be compared with the other in those things that are obscure; it appears less opposite to the light of reason. And besides, it promises us an infinite happiness after this life, and procures us a thousand comforts in this; whereas the other gives us no prospect of a future happiness, and deprives us of confidence in our prayers, and of the advantage we may expect from the remories of our neighbours: and therefore the common hypothesis is to be preferred to the other.

[P] As has been done even by his weakest adversaries. I shall not set up for a master of the ceremonies, to place those gentlemen in their higher or lower ranks, but shall only name those who are come to my knowledge (111). Mr Velthuyse (112) published a book against Spinoza in the year 1680. It is intitled, Traictatus de cultu naturali, & origine moralitatis. Four years after, the Sieur Aubert de Versé put out a book with this title, L'impie convaincu, ou Dissertation contre Spinoza, dans laquelle l'on réfute les fondemens de son Athéisme (113). Mr Poiret inserted in the second edition of his Cogitationes de Deo, Anima & Malo (114), a treatise, intitled, Fundamenta Atheismi eversa, sive Specimen absurditatis Atheismi Spinoziani. In the year 1690, a posthumous book of Mr Wittichius came out, intituled, Anti-Spinoza, sive Examen Ethices Benedicti de Spinoza, & Commentarius de Deo & ejus Attributis. To which I add a Dutch piece, quoted by Mr Saldenus (115).

I add to these; 1. A Dutch book, published by the same Francis Cuper whom I have mentioned at the beginning of the remark [M]. This Dutch book is only a translation of what Henry Morus said in Latin against Spinoza in some passages of his works. It appeared very solid to Cuper, tho' his Arcana Atheismi revelata had been used with the utmost contempt by Henry Morus (116). 2. The book published at Paris in the year 1696, by Dom Francis Lami, a Benedictine. It is intitled, Le nouvel Athéisme renversé, ou Réfutation du Systeme de Spinoza, tirée pour la plupart de la connoissance de la nature de l'homme. You will find an extract of it in the Journal des Savans of the 28th of January 1697 (117). And you may see a just encomium upon it in the 101st page of the second part of the Chevreana, Dutch edition. 3. The work which Mr Jaquelot (118) caused to be printed at the Hague in 1697. It is intitled, Dissertations sur l'Existence de Dieu, où l'on démontre cette vérité par l'Histoire Universelle de la première Antiquité du Monde, par la Réfutation du Systeme d'Epicure & de Spinoza, &c. You will find a good extract of it in the Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans (119). 4. The book published by Mr Jens at Dort, in the year 1698. The title of it runs thus: Examen Philosophicum sextæ divisionis Partis I Eth. Benedicti de Spinoza, sive Prodiromus Animadversionum super unico veterum & recentiorum Atheorum Argumento, nempe una substantia; ubi infirmitas & vanitas argumentorum pro ea evincitur. Accedunt quædam necdum propostia argumenta pro vera existentia Dei. It is a book of sixty-six pages in 4to. The author is a Physician at Dort, and the father of Mr Jens, rector of the college of the same town, and a learned humanist, and a good critic, as appears from his Lectiones Lucianæ, printed at the Hague, in 8vo, in the year 1699. I must not forget the Dutch book, published by Mr Van Til, in the year 1696, an abstract of which may be seen in the Acta Eruditorum Lipsienfium (120). I shall speak below (121) of a Dutch piece, that is just come out.

You will find that the principles of Spinoza are overthrown in all those books; you will there find that from the very beginning of his work, he advances false propositions; and therefore, what he concludes from them afterwards can be of no force. Let him run as much as he pleases: what can he do by running much, if he loses his way from the first step he makes? Note, that his greatest admirers acknowledge, that if he had taught the doctrines laid to his charge, he would be an execrable man; but they pretend he has not been understood. 'Si igitur prædicti philosophi intentio vel opinio fuit naturam cum Deo hoc modo tam sædè confundere, judicio illum ab adversariis justè impetum atque condemnatum, imò & memoriam ejus in omne ævum execrandam esse: attamen quia de alicujus intentione solus potest judicare intus cordium perfricator Deus, nobis nihil aliud restat nisi ut judicemus de opinione quæ continetur in scriptis quæ memoratus vir in lucem emisit; & licet inter illius adversarios habeantur etiam perpicacissimi, puto tamen eos horum scriptorum verum sensum minimè affectos fuisse, quoniam in his nihil reperio nisi id quod abunde satis indicat hunc virum minimè confundere velle Deum & naturam: saltem ego ita judico ex ejus scriptis, quæ si alii melius intelligent, quæ dixi indicia sunt, patrocinium illius hominis in me suscipere nolo, peto duntaxat ut quod aliis licuit, id & mihi liceat, nempe ut exprimam quem puto horum scriptorum genuinum sensum esse (122). . . . If therefore it was the intention of this Philosopher to confound GOD and nature together, in so shameful a manner, or if his opinion comes no less bimself, in to that, I think he was justly attacked and condemned by his adversaries; nay, that his memory ought to be for ever execrable: but because GOD alone, who is the searcher of hearts, can judge of any man's intention, it only belongs to us, to judge of the opinions contained in the writings which this man has published; and though there are some among his adversaries of great penetration, yet I think they have not as all discovered the true

(115) Above citation (78). The author's name was Blyenberg; he was a merchant at Dort, who died in 1696.

(116) Oper Philosoph. Tom. i, pag. 600.

(117) Page 72, of the Dutch edition.

(118) He was minister of the church of Vally in Champagne, and is now minister at the Hague.

(119) For September 1696, Art. iii.

(120) Page 29; & seq. of the year 1696.

(121) In the remark [BB].

(122) Autor anonymus Specimenis Artis ratiocinandi naturalis & artificialis, pag. 113. Note that since the first edition of this Dictionary I have seen that Specimen Artis ratiocinandi, &c. with the author's name and picture. It is Mr Kuffelaar. That book is ascribed to Spinoza bimself, in Micraelius's Historia Ecclesiastica, pag. 2260, Edit. 1699. Micraelius thought that Spinoza was still living in the year 1684, which is not true.

(109) Sin melius quid habes, accersit, aut imperium fer. Horatius, Epistola V, lib. i, ver. 6.

(110) I have already said in the article SOCIETUS, (FAUSTUS), remark [J], that it is the interest of every one, that all authors be conscientious, and fear God.

(111) Note, that I speak only of those who have confuted the Posthumous Works of Spinoza.

(112) Being exhorted to it, and helped by the deceased Mr PAETS (of whom I spoke above, citation (12), of the article SANCTE-SIUS) to whom he dedicated it.

(113) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for October 1684, pag. 862.

(114) At Amsterdam 1685. See the same Annuaire, for April 1685, pag. 450.

V O L. V.

H h h

(1) See his 17th and 18th Letters.

impious man was not sensible of the unavoidable consequences of his system; for he laughed at the apparition of spirits (1), and there is no Philosopher, who has less reason to ‘true sense of his writings, because I find nothing in them, but what abundantly shows that he was far from confounding GOD and nature together. At least I judge so from his writings, which if others understand better than I do, I retract what I now say; I do not take it upon me to protect this man; I only ask that the liberty which is granted others, may likewise be granted me, which is that I may be allowed to explain what I take to be the genuine sense of these writings.’ These words taken from a book of one of his followers, printed at Utrecht in 1684 (123), clearly shew that Spinoza has been so successfully confuted by his adversaries, that the only way of replying to them, is like that of the Janfenists against the Jesuits, viz. That his opinion is not such as it is supposed to be. This is the result of what his apologist says. And therefore in order to shew that his adversaries have attained a complete victory over him, we need only consider that he has in effect taught what is imputed to him, or that he contradicted himself wretchedly, and knew not what he said. He is accused of teaching that all particular beings are modifications of GOD. This is plainly his doctrine, since his fourteenth proposition runs thus: ‘Præter Deum nulla dari neque concipi potest substantia: ----- Besides GOD no substance can exist, nor be conceived: And he affirms in the fifteenth, ‘Quicquid est, in Deo est, & nihil sine Deo esse neque concipi potest: ----- Whatever exists is in GOD, and nothing can exist nor be conceived without GOD:’ which he proves by this reason, that every thing is a mode or a substance, and that modes can neither exist nor be conceived without a substance. When therefore an apologist speaks in this manner: were it true that Spinoza teaches that all particular beings are modes of the divine substance, I would not deny that his adversaries have obtained a complete victory over him; I only deny the fact, I do not believe that the doctrine they have very well confuted, is contained in his book: I say when an apologist speaks in such a manner, he had as good own that his hero has been defeated; for certainly the doctrine in question, is in Spinoza’s Ethics (124).

(123) There is in the title Hamburgi, as in the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus.

(124) The Apologist I have quoted (viz. Mr. Kuffeler) maintains with might and main, in the 14th page, that there can be but one substance in the universe.

SPINOZA knew not that the word idem is sometimes used for simile.

Here I must give an instance of the falsity of his former propositions; it will be of use to shew how easy it was to overthrow his system. His fifth proposition contains these words, ‘In rerum natura non possunt dari duæ aut plures substantiæ ejusdem nature seu attributi. ----- It is impossible that two or more substances of the same nature or attribute should exist.’ This is his Argumentum Achillem, and the most steady foundation he builds upon; but at the same time, it is such a wretched sophism, that no scholar, who has read what is called parva logica, or the five Predicabilia Porphyrii, could be perplexed with it. All those who teach school-Philosophy, begin with telling their scholars what Genus, Species, and Individuum are. This lecture is sufficient to put Spinoza to a stand. The following distinction will do the business: Non possunt dari plures substantiæ ejusdem numero nature seu attributi, concedo; non possunt dari plures substantiæ ejusdem specie nature seu attributi, nego. What could Spinoza say against this distinction? Must he not admit of it with respect to modifications? Is not man, according to his notion, a species of modification, and is not Socrates an individuum of that species? Would he have us maintain that Benedict Spinoza, and the Jew, who attempted to thrust a knife into his body, were not two modifications, but one only? This might be proved invincibly, if his proof for the unity of substance was a good one; but since it proves too much, for it proves that there is but one modification in the world, he ought to be one of the first to reject it. He ought therefore to know that the word idem signifies two things, identity, and similitude. We say, that such a one was born the same day as his father, and died the same day with his mother. With respect to a man born the first of March 1630, and who died the first of March 1610, whose father was born the tenth of February 1655, whose mother died the tenth of February 1655. The proposition would be true in the two senses of the word same. It would signify like in the first part of this proposition, but not in the second. Pythagoras and Aristotle, according to Spinoza’s system (125), were two like modifications: each of them had the whole nature of a modification, and yet the one differed from the other. The same may be said of two substances: each of them has the whole nature, and all the attributes of substance, and yet they are not one only substance, but two. I shall set down what a Spaniard says against those, who, through a sophism like that of Spinoza, thought that the Materia prima did not differ from GOD. ‘Quis non obtruncat fuisse ullo tempore aliquos adeo desipientes, & in clarissima luce cæcipientes, qui Deum esse materiam primam & constantem asseverarent, & pugnaciter defenderent? At qua ratione tantum stultam & impiam opinionem confirmabant? Si materia prima & Deus (inquiunt) non sunt idem, ergo differunt inter se; quæcunque autem differunt, ea necesse est aliquo differre, quare composita esse oportet ex eo in quo conveniunt, & ex eo in quo differunt; cum igitur nec in Deo nec in materia prima ulla sit compositio, nulla quoque differentia inter ea esse poterit; quare necesse est esse unum & idem: Vide quàm levi argumento in tam gravem errorem seu potius amentiam inducitur, non intelligentes discrimen quod est inter differens & diversum, quod etiam traditur ab Aristotele 10. lib. Metaphys. text.

(125) Note, by the by, that by virtue of this principle, Quæ sunt idem uni tertio, sunt idem inter se. Spinoza cannot deny that Pythagoras and Aristotle were but one man. Erant enim idem uni tertio, nempe substantiæ Dei.

12. Differunt enim inter se, quæcunque in aliquo conveniunt & in aliquo distinguuntur; ut homo & leo conveniunt in genere, quia uterque est animal, & distinguuntur per proprias differentias, alter enim est rationis particeps, alter verò expers: Diversa autem sunt quæcunque seipsis distinguuntur, quoniam sunt simplicissima (126). ----- Who is not farprized that ever there were men so stupid and so blind amidst the clearest light, as constantly to affirm, and obstinately maintain, that GOD is the first matter (materia prima). But by what reason did they support so foolish and impious an opinion? If, say they, GOD and the first matter are not the same, therefore they differ from one another. But whatever things differ, must necessarily differ in some properties, and therefore they must be composed of those properties wherein they agree, and of those wherein they differ. But there being no composition either in GOD or the first matter, they cannot differ from one another, therefore they must be one and the same. Observe how slight an argument leads those men into so grievous an error, or rather madness, who do not understand the distinction between different and diverse, which Aristotle has mentioned. Those things are different from one another, which agree in some properties and are distinguished in others; as a man and a lion agree in their genus, both being animals; and are distinguished by their proper differences, one being rational the other not. But those things are diverse, which are distinguished from one another, because they are most simple. There are few notions in our mind clearer than that of identity. I grant that it is confounded, and very ill applied in the common language: Nations, rivers, &c. are accounted the same nations, and the same rivers during several ages; the body of a man is accounted the same body for the space of sixty years or more: but those popular and improper expressions do not deprive us of the certain rule of identity; they do not blot out of our minds this idea: A thing of which one may deny or affirm what cannot be denied, or affirmed of another thing, is distinct from that other thing. When all the attributes of time, place, &c. which belong to a thing, belong also to another thing, they are but one Being. But notwithstanding the clearness of these ideas, it would be difficult to say how many great Philosophers have erred in that point, and reduced all souls and intelligences (127) to unity, though they acknowledged that some were united to bodies, to which others were not united. This opinion was so common in Italy in the XVth century, that Pope Leo X, thought himself obliged to condemn it, and to threaten with severe penalties all those that should teach it (128). Here are the words of the bull, dated the nineteenth of December 1513. ‘Cum diebus nostris Zizaniz seminator nonnullos perniciosissimos errores in agro Domini seminare sit ausus, de natura præsertim animæ rationalis, quod videlicet mortalitas sit aut unica in cunctis hominibus; & nonnulli temere Philosophantes

(126) Benedict Pererius, de communibus Præcipuis lib. 1. cap. xii, p. n. 309.

(127) See the article CESALPINUS, remark [C], and compare what is said of the Scotch in the article A. BELARD. remark [C].

(128) Omnes heretici erroris adfessionibus in hæreticos, veluti damnatissimos hæreticos feminantes per omnia et deinceps beatissimas hereticos & infideles, Catholicam fidem labefactantes, vitandis fore penitentibus fore decrevimus. ----- We have decreed that all those who adhere to the restrictions of this kind of error should be punished and punished as heretics, as every heretic, and infidel, who defiles the Catholic Faith.

secundum

to deny it [2]. Spinoza ought to acknowledge that every part of nature thinks, and that man is not the most knowing and most intelligent modification of the universe; and therefore he must admit the existence of Demons. The dispute of his followers about miracles is a meer quibble [R], and a further proof of the unexactness of his notions

* secundum factum Philosophiam verum esse asserent:

* Contra hoc, sacro approbante concilio, damnamus & reprobamus omnes asserentes, Animam intellectivam mortalem esse aut unicam in cunctis hominibus; aut hoc in dubium vertentes: cum illa immortalis, & pro corporum quibus infunditur multitudinem singulariter multiplicabilis & multiplicata & multiplicanda sit. . . . Whereas in our days a fewer of tares, has dared to sow some most pernicious errors in the field of GOD, especially concerning the nature of a rational soul; namely, that it is mortal, and that there is but one soul in all men, and some rashly philosophizing, have asserted this to be true, at least, according to Philosophy. In opposition to this, with the approbation of the holy council, we condemn and pronounce to be reprobate all those who assert that the intelligent soul is mortal, or that there is but one soul in all men; or those who call this in question: since the soul is immortal, and according to the multitude of bodies into which it is infused, may be particularly multiplied, it and must be multiplied. This was lopping off a considerable branch of Spinozism. I must observe, that some Philosophers do strangely confound the idea of identity; for they maintain (129), that the parts of matter are not distinct before they be actually separated. Nothing can be more absurd.

[2] There is no Philosopher who has left reason to deny the apparition of spirits. I have said it in another place (130); when it is supposed that a most perfect mind has created all things out of nothing, without being determined to it by his nature, but by the free choice of his own good pleasure, the existence of angels may be denied (131). If it be asked, why such a Creator has not produced other spirits besides human souls? The answer will be, That such was his good pleasure, sed pro ratione voluntas: No reasonable reply can be made to this answer, unless the fact be proved, I mean, that there are angels. But when it is supposed, that the Creator did not act freely, and exhausted all his power without any choice or rule, and besides that thinking is one of his attributes, it is a ridiculous thing to assert, that there are no Demons. According to this system, it ought to be believed, that the thinking attribute of the Creator hath been modified, not only in the bodies of men, but also throughout the whole universe; and that besides the animals which we know, there is an infinite number of others which we know not, and which exceed us in knowledge and in malice, as much as we exceed in that respect dogs and oxen: For it were the most unreasonable thing in the world, to fancy that man's mind is the most perfect modification that an infinite Being, acting according to the whole extent of its power, could produce. We can conceive no natural connexion between the understanding and the brain; and therefore we ought to believe, that a creature without brain may as well think, as a creature organized as we are. What is it then that could move Spinoza to deny what is said of spirits (132)? Why did he believe that there is nothing in the world, that can excite in our machines the fight of a spectre, make a noise in a room, and produce all the magical phenomena mentioned in books? Was it because he believed that no Being can produce such effects unless it has as bulky a body as that of man; and that therefore the Demons could not subsist in the air, nor come into our houses, nor steal away from our sight? But such a thought would be ridiculous: the bulk of flesh of which we are made up, is rather an obstacle than a help to wit and power. I mean a mediate power, or the faculty of applying the most proper instruments for the production of great effects. The most surprising actions of men arise from that faculty; as it appears from thousands of examples. An Engineer as little as a dwarf, lean, and pale, performs more things than two thousand savages, stronger than Milo, are able to perform. An animate machine a thousand times smaller than an ant, might produce greater effects than an elephant; it might discover the insensible parts of plants and animals, and place itself upon the seat of the first springs of our brain, and open some valves, by which means we might see phantoms, hear a noise, &c. (133). If Physicians knew the first fibres, and the first combinations of the parts in vegetables, minerals, and animals, they would also know the instruments proper to put them out of order, and might apply those instruments in such a manner as to place those parts in a new order, whereby good meat would be turned into poison, and poison into good meat. Such Physicians would be incomparably more knowing than Hippocrates; and were they little enough to get into the brain and the entrails, they might cure any body, and also produce whenever they pleased the most strange diseases that can be seen. The whole may be brought to this question, Is it possible that an invisible modification should be more knowing and malicious than man? If Spinoza denies it, he knows not the consequences of his hypothesis, and acts rashly and without principles. A man might make a long dissertation upon this subject, wherein he might prevent all Spinoza's subtleties and objections. Compare with this what I have observed in the articles of Lucretius (134), and in that of Hobbes (135.)

[R] The disputes of the Spinozists about miracles is a meer quibble. The common opinion of orthodox Divines is, That God produces miracles immediately, whether he makes use of creatures as agents or not. In either case, it undeniably appears that he is above nature; for if he produces something without employing other causes, he does not want the help of nature; and he never employs them in a miracle, but after he has diverted them from their usual course: And therefore he shews that they depend on his will, that he suspends their power when he pleases, or applies it in a different manner from their ordinary determination. The Cartesians, who make him the immediate cause of all the effects of nature, suppose, that when he works miracles, he does not observe the general laws he has established; he makes an exception, and applies bodies quite otherwise than he would do, if he followed the general laws. Whereupon they say, that if there were any general laws, whereby God had engaged to move bodies according to the desires of angels, and if an angel had desired that the waters of the Red-Sea should be divided, the passage of the Israelites would not be a miracle properly so called. This consequence, which necessarily arises from their principles, makes their definition of a miracle less convenient than it were to be wished, and therefore it were better for them to say, that all the effects, contrary to the general laws we know, are miracles; and by this means the plagues of Egypt, and such other extraordinary actions related in Scripture will be miracles, properly speaking. Now, in order to shew the insincerity, and the illusions of the Spinozists upon this head, we need only say, that when they deny the possibility of miracles, they alledge this reason, that God and nature are the same Being; so that if God did something against the laws of nature, he would act against himself; which is impossible. Speak plainly, and without any ambiguity: Say, that the laws of nature being not made by a free Legislator, who knew what he did, but being the action of a blind and necessary cause, nothing can happen that is contrary to those laws. If so, you alledge your own position against miracles: which is a petitio principii; but however, you speak plainly. Let us bring them off from this general reasoning and ask them what they think of the miracles mentioned in the Scripture. They will absolutely deny all those, which they cannot ascribe to a cunning trick. Not to insist upon their impudence in denying such facts, I shall only argue against them by their own principles. Do not you say that the power of nature is infinite? But would it be infinite, if there was nothing in the whole universe that could restore a dead man to life? Would it be infinite, if there was but one way of forming man, viz. that of ordinary generation? Do not you say that the knowledge of nature is infinite? You deny that divine understanding, in which we believe the knowledge of all possible Beings to be united; but by dispersing the knowledge, you do not deny

(133) Note, by the by, that nothing can be more improper than to inquire whether angels, when they appear, assume a living or dead body. They have no need of it. They need only move the Optic and Acoustic nerves, as they are moved by the light reflected from a human body, and by the air that comes out of the mouth of a man who speaks.

(134) Remark [F].

(135) Remark [N].

(129) Sir Keble Digby does also maintain it, if I am not mistaken.

(130) In the article RUGGERI, remark [D].

(131) I suppose that the authority of the Holy Scripture is laid aside, and that a man declares he only reasons like a Philosopher.

(132) See his letters lvi, lviii, &c.

mr cl

notions. It is said, he died fully persuaded of his Atheism, and that he took some precautions to conceal his inconstancy, if there should be occasion for it [S]. Had he reasoned consequentially, he would not have treated the fear of Hell as a chimerical thing [T]. His friends say that, out of modesty, he desired that no sect should go by his deny its infinity. And therefore you ought to say that nature knows all things, much in the same manner as we say that man understands all languages: one man does not understand them all; but some understand one, and some another. Can you affirm that the universe contains nothing, which knows the construction of our bodies? If you can affirm it, you contradict yourself; you can say no longer that the knowledge of God is infinitely divided; the contrivance of our organs would be unknown to him. You must therefore acknowledge, if you argue consequentially that some modification knows it; you must acknowledge that it is very possible for nature to bring a dead man to life, and that your master confounded his ideas, and knew not the consequences of his principle, when he said (136) that if he could believe the resurrection of Lazarus, he would break his system to pieces, and willingly embrace the Christian Faith.

(136) I have been assured that he said so to his friends.

This is sufficient to show that the Spinozists contradict their own hypothesis, when they deny the possibility of miracles; I mean, (to avoid all ambiguity) the possibility of the facts mentioned in the Holy Scripture.

[S] He took some precautions to conceal his inconstancy, if there should be occasion for it. I mean he took care, that in case the approach of death, or the symptoms of his illness, should make him speak against his system, no suspected person should be witness of it. The case is this; or at least we find the following account of it in a printed book (137). Perhaps it will be said that

(137) Pensées diverses sur les Comètes, num. 181, pag. 565, 566. See the Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans, for March 1689, pag. 82.

(138) The Pensées sur les Comètes were printed in the year 1683.

Voltaire Diderot D'Alembert

Atheists are not greedy of praise? But what can any man do more than what was done by Spinoza, a little before he died? The thing is of a fresh date (138), and I have it from a great man, who had it from good hands. He was the greatest Atheist ever lived, and he grew so fond of certain philosophical principles, that the better to meditate upon them, he confined himself to a close retirement, renouncing all the pleasures and vanities of the world, and minding nothing but those abstruse meditations. Being upon the point of death, he sent for his landlady, and desired her not to suffer that any minister should see him in that condition. His reason for it was, as his friends said, that he had a mind to die without disputing, and was afraid that the weakness of his senses might make him say something inconsistent with his principles. That is, he was afraid it would be said in the world that his conscience, awakening at the sight of death, had damped his courage, and made him renounce his opinions. Can there be a more ridiculous and extravagant vanity, and a more foolish passion for a wrong notion of constancy?

(139) In the remark [H].

A Preface, which I have quoted above (139), and which contains some circumstances of the death of that Atheist, says nothing of this. I find in it that he told his landlady who was going to church, I hope you will return, God willing, and speak with me when the sermon is over (140). But he died quietly before his landlady returned, and no body saw him die but a Physician of Amsterdam (141). For the rest, we are told in that preface, that he was extremely desirous to immortalize his name, and would have willingly sacrificed his life for it, though, in order to obtain it, he had been torn in pieces by the mob. 'Auro plane non inhiabat, aliqui delata sibi Professoris munera aliquoties non respiciisset homo gloriæ avidior & nimis ambitiosus, qui vel cum Wittii amicis suis crudeliter dilacerari sublatius optavit, modo vita brevi gloriæ cursus foret sempiternus (142). - - - Surely he was not covetous, otherwise he would not have so often refused the Professorship which had been offered him, being a man desirous of glory and too ambitious, who would have wished to be cruelly torn to pieces with the De Witts, his friends, provided the shortness of his life was recompensed with immortal glory.'

(141) Id. ibid.

(142) Id. ibid.

[T] Had he reasoned consequentially, he would not have called the fear of Hell a chimerical thing. Those, who believe that the world is not the work of God, and is not directed by a Being simple, spiritual, and distinct from all bodies, must at least confess that there are some things which are endowed with intelligence and will, and which are jealous of their power, which exercise authority over others, which command them to do some things, chastise them, use them harshly, and to revenge themselves severely. Is not the earth full of such things? Does not every man know it by experience? It would be a thing altogether unreasonable to fancy that all Beings of that nature are only upon earth, which is but one point if compared to the world. Must reason, wit, ambition, hatred, and cruelty, be upon earth rather than any where else? Why so? Can any reason good or bad be given for it? I do not think so. Our eyes induce us to believe that those vast spaces we call Heaven, which have such powerful and rapid motions, may as well form men as our earth, and deserve no less than the globe we inhabit to be divided into several dominions. We do not know what passes there; but if we consult only reason, it will appear very probable, or at least possible, that there are thinking Beings in those vast spaces, which extend their empire as well as their light to our globe. Our not seeing them is not a proof that we are unknown or indifferent to them: Perhaps we are part of their dominions: they make laws, which they reveal to us by the dictates of our conscience, and are very angry with those that transgress them. The possibility of it is sufficient to make Atheists uneasy; and nothing but denying the immortality of the soul can make them fearless. For thereby they would escape the vengeance of those spirits, which otherwise might be more dreadful than God himself. I explain myself more dreadfully than God himself. I explain myself more dreadfully than God himself. I explain myself more dreadfully than God himself.

There are some men, who believe a God, a Paradise, and a Hell; but they create illusions to themselves, and imagine that the infinite goodness of the most perfect Being does not permit him to torment his own work for ever. He is the father of all men, say they; and therefore he chastises like a father those who disobey him, and after he has made them sensible of their faults, he restores them to his favour in Heaven. Origen argued in that manner. Others suppose that God will annihilate the rebellious creatures, and will be appeased, and moved to compassion with a quædam finem Rex Magne laborum (143). What end of labour has your will decreed? They carry their illusion so far, as to think that the everlasting torments mentioned in the Scripture, are only comminatory. If such men were ignorant of the Being of a God, and by considering what passes in our world, should believe that there are Beings in other worlds, which concern themselves with mankind, they could not be easy when they come to die, unless they believed that the soul is mortal; for if they believed it to be immortal, they might be afraid of falling under the power of a cruel master, angry with them by reason of their actions; it would be to no purpose to hope to come off after having been tormented for some years. A limited Being may be destitute of all manner of moral perfection; it may be like our Phalaris and Neros, a sort of men who could have left an enemy in a dungeon for ever, had they been able to get an eternal authority. Will they hope that mischievous Beings will not last for ever? But how many Atheists pretend that the Sun had no beginning, and will have no end? This is what I meant, when I said that some Beings might appear more dreadful than God himself? A man may flatter himself, when he considers that God is infinitely good, and infinitely perfect; and he may fear every thing from an imperfect Being: he does not know whether its anger will not last for ever. Every body knows the choice of the prophet David (144).

*Handley
Prestley
Darwin*

Porter

(143) Virg. Æneid. lib. 4. ver. 245.

Wol

To apply what has been said to a Spinozist, let us remember that he is obliged by his principle to acknowledge the Immortality of the Soul; for he looks upon himself as the modification of a Being essentially thinking. Let us remember, that he cannot deny that some modifications are angry with others, put them to the torture, make their torments last as long as ever they can, send them to the galleys for life, and would make that punishment last for ever, if the death of one party or the other did not prevent it.

(144) Being in doubt either to be overcome by his enemies, or to be afflicted with a plague sent from God, he answered the Prophet Gad: I am in a great strait: Let us fall now into the hand of the Lord, (for his mercies are great) and let me not fall into the hand of man. 2 Sam. xiv. 14.

Tiberius,

his name [U]. It is not true that his followers are very numerous. Few people are suspected of adhering to his doctrine; and among those, who are suspected of it, few have studied it; and among the latter, few have understood it, and most of them are discouraged by the difficulties and impenetrable abstractions that attend it (m). But the thing is this: at all adventures those, who have little religion, and do not much scruple to own it, are called Spinozists. Thus in France all those who are thought not to believe the mysteries of the Gospel, are called Socinians, though most of them never read Socinus nor his followers. For the rest, the same thing happened to Spinoza, which inevitably happens to all those who frame impious systems; they secure themselves from some objections, but they lie open to others that are more perplexing. If they cannot be orthodox, if they are so fond of disputing, it were better for them not to dogmatize. But of all Atheistical systems, none is less capable of deceiving than that of Spinoza; for, as I have said before, it is contrary to the most distinct notions of our minds. Objections throng in upon him; and he can make no answers but what are more obscure than the assertions he should maintain (n): and therefore, his poison brings a remedy along with it. He would have been more formidable, had he used all his skill to clear an hypothesis, that is very much in vogue among the Chinese [X], and very different from that which I have mentioned in the second remark of this article. I have been just now informed

(m) This is the reason why some are of opinion that he ought not to be refuted. See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for June 1684, Art. vi, pag. 70, 388, 389.

(n) Consult his Letters: you will see that his answers have seldom any relation to the state of the question.

(145) Spinoza, who made microscopes, should have believed that man is organized and animated in the foot, and that therefore Socrates was Socrates before his mother conceived him.

Tiberius, Caligula, and many others are examples of such modifications. Let us remember that a Spinozist makes himself ridiculous, if he does not acknowledge that the universe is full of ambitious, morose, jealous, and cruel, modifications; for since the earth is full of them, there is no reason to believe that the air and the heavens are not likewise full of them. Lastly, Let us remember, that the essence of human modifications does not consist in being clothed with a bulk of flesh. Socrates was Socrates the day of his conception, or soon after (145); whatever he had at that time may remain entire, when a mortal disease has put an end to the circulation of the blood, and the motion of the heart, in the matter wherewith it was enlarged: and therefore he is after his death the same modification as he was during his life, if we consider only what is essential to his person: death cannot therefore free him from the justice or caprice of his invisible persecutors. They may follow him wherever he goes, and torment him whatever visible form he may assume.

These considerations might be made use of to induce to the practice of virtue, even those who adhere to the impious doctrine of such sects; for it stands to reason that they should be chiefly afraid for having transgressed the laws revealed to their conscience. It is more likely that those invisible Beings would concern themselves with the punishment of such faults.

[U] His friends say, that, out of modesty, he desired that no sect should go by his name. I shall set down the words of the Preface of his Opera Posthuma, without curtailing them. 'Nomen Auctoris in libri fronte, & alibi literis duntaxat initialibus indicatum, non alia de causa, quam quia paulo ante obitum expresse petit, ne Nomen suum Ethicæ, cuius impressionem mandabat, præfigeretur; cur autem prohibuerit, nulla alia, ut quidem videtur, ratio est, quàm quia noluit; ut Disciplina ex ipso haberet vocabulum. Dicit etenim in Appendice quartæ partis Ethicæ capite vigesimo quinto, quod, qui alios consilio, aut rejuvare cupiunt, ut simul summo fruantur bono, minime studebunt, ut Disciplina ex ipso habeat vocabulum; sed insuper in tertiâ Ethicæ parte Affectuum Definit. XLIV. ubi quid sit ambitio explicat, eos, qui tale quid patrant, non obscure, ut Gloriæ cupidos, accusat. . . . The two initial letters only of the author's name were put to the book, because a little before his death he expressly desired, that his name should not be prefixed to his Ethics, which he had ordered to be printed. And why he did so, it seems no other reason can be given, but because he would not have the Doctrine called by his name. For he says in the twenty-fifth chapter of the Appendix to the fourth part of his Ethics, that those who would help others to the attainment of the supreme good, together with themselves, will not desire that their doctrine be called by their name; and where he is explaining what ambition is, he plainly taxes such as do this with being ambitious of glory.'

[X] He would have been more formidable, had he used all his skill to clear an hypothesis, that is very much in vogue among the Chinese. A Father of the Church owned a thing, which perhaps would not be excused at this day in a Philosopher, viz. that those, who deny the Deity or a Providence, alledge probable reasons both for their cause, and against their adversaries. 'Deos nonnulli esse abnegant: profus dubitare se alii an sint uspiam dicunt: alii vero existere, neque humana curare: immo alii perhibent, & rebus interesse mortalium, & terrenas administrare rationes. Cum ergo hæc ita sint, neque aliter fiat, quin sit unum ex omnibus verum, pugnant tamen argumentis omnes, neque singulis deest id, quod probabiliter dicant, five cum suas res asserunt, five cum alienis opinionibus contradicunt (146). . . . Some deny that there are any gods: others say they doubt whether there are any: others that there are gods, but that they take no care of human affairs: and others affirm it, and say that they are concerned in human affairs, and administer them. Since therefore these things are so, and one of all these opinions must necessarily be true, yet each of them contradicts the other with arguments, and does not want something probable to advance in its favour, and in refutation of the contrary opinions.' If he was in the right, perhaps it were chiefly with respect to those, who suppose a great number of souls in the universe distinct one from another, each of which exists by itself, and acts by an inward and essential principle. They are more powerful one than another, &c. Herein consists the Atheism so generally spread among the Chinese. The author of the following passage tells us how he fancies they have by degrees obscured the true notions. (147) God, that most pure and perfect Being, is become at most the material soul of the whole world, or of its finest part, which is Heaven. His providence and his power became limited, tho' of a much greater extent than the power and prudence of men. . . . The Chinese doctrine hath always ascribed spirits to the four parts of the world, to the stars, mountains, rivers, plants, towns, and their ditches, houses, and their hearths, in a word to every thing. They do not say that all spirits are good; they acknowledge wicked ones, which they take to be the immediate cause of the evils and miseries incident to human life. . . . (148) And therefore as the soul of man was, in their opinion, the cause of all the vital actions of man; in like manner they ascribed a soul to the sun, to be the spring of its qualities and motion. And because, according to this principle, the souls, that are diffused every where, produced in all bodies the actions which appeared natural to those bodies, this was sufficient in their opinion to explain the whole economy of nature, and to supply the omnipotence and infinite providence, which they admitted in no spirit, no not in that of Heaven. It is true, that because it seems that man, using natural things for his nourishment and convenience, has some power over natural things; the ancient opinion of the Chinese, which ascribed in proportion a like power to all souls, supposed that the soul of Heaven could act upon nature with a prudence, and a power incomparably greater than the prudence and power of men. But at the same time, they acknowledged in the soul of every thing an inward power, independent by its own nature of the power of Heaven, and

(146) Arnobius adversus Gentes, lib. ii, pag. m. 82.

(147) Le Loubere, Relation de Siam, Tom. i, ch. xxiii, num. 2, pag. 503, 504. See above the citation (55) of the article MALHERBE, and the article SOMMONA-CODOM, remark [A].

(148) Le Loubere, ibid. num. iii, pag. 505, 506.

iii

VOL. V.

(o) See the remark [I].

(p) Vigneul Marville Melanges, Tom. ii, pag. 320, Dutch Edit.

(q) I understand by that word the defects, which do not proceed from Spinoza's asserting things contrary to the maxims which other Philosophers generally acknowledge to be true.

(r) See Wittichius's Anti-Spinoza, or the Extracts of them in the Acta Eruditor. 1690, pag. 346, & seq. and in the 2d volume of the Bibliothèque Universelle, pag. 323, & seq.

informed of a pretty curious particular, viz. That after he had forsaken Judaism, he publicly professed Christianity, and frequented the assemblies of the Mennonites, or those of the Arminians of Amsterdam (o). Nay he approved a confession of faith communicated to him by an intimate friend [Z].

What is said of him in the continuation of the Menagiana is so false [Z], that I wonder Menage's friends did not perceive it. Mr de Vigneul Marville would have advised them to leave it out, had he been concerned in the edition of that work; for he has acquainted the public, that there is reason to doubt of the truth of that fact (p). The reasons he alledges for his doubt are very reasonable: he would not have been too forward, had he positively denied the thing. I shall take notice of a mistake he has committed in the same page [AA]. I must say something concerning the objections I have proposed against the system of Spinoza. I might add a very large supplement to those objections, did I not perceive that they are already too long, considering the nature of my work: this is not a proper place to engage in a formal dispute; it is sufficient for my design to make some general observations in order to undermine the foundations of Spinozism, and to shew that it is a system grounded upon such a strange supposition, that it overthrows most of the common notions, which are the rule of Philosophical discussions. Whoever shews that this system is contrary to the most evident, and the most universal axioms we have had hitherto, does certainly go the right way to confute it, though perhaps it is not so proper to reclaim the old Spinozists, as if it was proved to them that the propositions of Spinoza are contrary to one another. They would be more sensible of their prejudices, were they forced to confess that he does not always agree with himself, that his proofs are wrong, that he does not prove what wants to be proved, that his conclusions are not just, &c. This method of confuting him by shewing the absolute defects (q) of his work, and the relative defects of its parts compared one with another, has been well managed by some of those who wrote against him (r). I have been just now own horn

found

(149) See the anonymous book printed in the year 1690, at Amsterdam, and intitled, Philosophia eulgaris refutata ignorant of certain

acting sometimes against the designs of Heaven. Heaven governed nature as a potent king, whom the other souls were to obey, and they were generally forced to it; but some of them did sometimes exempt themselves from it. I confess, it is an absurd thing to suppose several eternal Beings, independent one of another, and of an unequal power; nevertheless, this supposition appeared true to Democritus, Epicurus, and several other great Philosophers. They admitted an infinite quantity of small bodies of different figure, uncreated, self-moving, &c. This opinion is still very common in the East (149). Those who admit the eternity of matter, are not more reasonable than if they admitted the eternity of an infinite number of atoms; for if there can be two Beings co-eternal and independent as to their existence, there may be a hundred thousand millions, and so in infinitum. Nay, they ought to say that the number of them is actually infinite; for matter, though never so small, contains distinct parts. And it is to be observed that all the Antients were ignorant of the creation of matter; for they never departed from the axiom, ex nihilo nihil fit. And therefore they were not sensible that it is an absurd thing, to acknowledge an infinity of substances co-eternal, and independent one of another as to existence. However absurd that Hypothesis may be, it is not liable to the frightful inconveniencies of Spinozism. It would account for many phenomena, by assigning to every thing an active principle, a more powerful one to some, and a less powerful to others; or if their power was equal, it might be said that those which prevail have a greater combination. I do not know whether any Socinian did ever say or believe, that the souls of men, not being made out of nothing, exist, and act of themselves. Their liberty of indifference would manifestly flow from thence.

[Y] He even approved a confession of faith communicated to him by an intimate friend. One Jarig Jellis, his intimate friend, being suspected of heterodoxy, thought himself obliged to publish a confession of his faith for his vindication. Having composed it, he sent it to Spinoza, and desired him to write to him his opinion of it. Spinoza made answer, that he had read it with pleasure, and found nothing in it that wanted to be altered. Domine ac amice Clarissime: Scripta tua ad me missa cum voluptate perlegi, ac talia inveni ut nihil in illis mutare possim. That confession of faith is in Dutch, and was printed in the year 1684 (150).

[Z] What is said of him in the continuation of the Menagiana is false. The story runs thus: 'I have heard that Spinoza died for fear of being sent to the Bastille. He came into France at the solicitation of two persons of quality, who desired to see him. Mr de Pomponne was informed of it; and being a minister very zealous for religion, he did not think it proper to suffer Spinoza in France, where he might have done a great deal of mischief; and to prevent it, he resolved to send him to the Bastille. Spinoza having notice of it, made his escape in the disguise of a Cordelier; but I do not warrant the truth of this last circumstance. What is certain is, that many persons, who saw him, have told me that he was a little man, of a yellowish complexion, that he had something dismal in his looks, and something ominous in his face (151). The last part of this passage is, I believe, very true; for, be des that Spinoza was originally come from Portugal or Spain, as his name sufficiently shews, I have heard some persons, who had seen him, say the same thing of his complexion, as is related in the Menagiana. But the first part of this story is a wretched falsity: from whence one may judge how many lies are told in such assemblies as Mr Menage's Mercuriales, whereof there are many at Paris and in other cities.

[AA] I shall take notice of a fault Mr de Vigneul Marville has committed. 'The Jew, or rather the Atheist, mentioned by Huetius in the preface of his Demonstratio Evangelica, without naming him, who occasioned his writing that learned book, is the famous Benedict Spinoza, with whom he had some warm conversations about religion at Amsterdam (152). The Jew, with whom Huetius had some conferences at Amsterdam, is Manasses Ben Israel, whom he hath named in the Latin poem of his journey into Sweden.

(151) Sequel of the Menagiana, pag. 15, Edition of Holland.

(152) Vigneul Marville, Melanges, Tom. ii, pag. 320, Dutch Edit.

Altera lux spectare dedis mysteria gentis
Judææ, ductor Judæus & ipse Manasses.
Ast adducta secans dirus præputia culter
Dum tenet attentum, & sublata insania ritus,
Ecce abaci; quo inferre pii cælestia Mosis
Scripta solent, summo extremum limbum pede tango
Inscius; infueto cuncti fremuere tumultu:
Diffugio veritus damnosæ vulnera cultri (153).

Next morn the Jewish mysteries I view,
My guide Manasses Ben Israel the Jew:
The lengthen'd prepure now the dreadful steel Cuts off, and now suspends in air, while all
The Israelites in noisy tumult brawl.
I gazing on, unthinking touch the chest,
Where holy Moses's sacred larv is plac'd:

(153) Petrus Daniel Huetius, Poem. pag. 53, 54, Edit. Utrecht, 1700.

Behold,

now informed that the author of a small Dutch book, printed within these few days [BB], makes use of it with great force and ability. But to speak of the supplement I design to give: it consists in an explanation of the objection I have grounded on the immutability of God [CC], and in the examination of this question, whether it be true, as I am told several

*Behold they start, and stare, and all around Loud shouts and cries from every part resound.
All in a maze, dreading the bloody knife
And furious Jews, I ran away for life.*

That Jew is, I say, the Rabbin Manasses Ben Israel. The character Huetius gives of him in the preface of his Demonstratio Evangelica, does not agree with Benedict Spinoza, who never made a figure among the Jews; for he left them being very young, and after many contentions, which had made him odious. 'Unicum selegi de multis argumentum, says Mr Huetius (154), ex Prophetiarum eventu conflatum, quod propolui hoc opere, & quo olim ad retundendam Judaei cujusdam, viri acuti sane & subtilis, contumaciam usus sum. Cum enim essem Amstelodami, & Judaeorum, quorum magna est in locis frequentia, ritus ac mysteria penitus introspicere vellem, ad eum deductus sum, qui tum inter illos peritissimus, ac totius Judaicae disciplinae consultissimus habebatur. - - - Among many arguments I singled out one, taken from the fulfilling of Prophecies, which I have proposed in this work, and had long ago employed to beat down the contumacy of a certain Jew, a man of wit and subtilty. For when I was at Amsterdam, and was desirous narrowly to observe the rites and ceremonies of the Jews, who are very numerous in those parts, I was carried to him who, at that time, was accounted among them to be the most knowing and skillful in all the Jewish discipline.' You see he speaks of a remote time, and of the most famous Rabbin of Amsterdam: and it is to be observed, that this passage is to be found at the beginning of a large book in folio, which came out in the year 1678 (155), and whose composition and impression took up some years. I think that the time Huetius denotes by the word olim, is the year 1652, in which he travelled into Sweden; but if I was mistaken in this particular, it were still true that he means Manasses Ben Israel, who died in the year 1659, and not our Spinoza, who, as I said before, never kept a considerable rank in the synagogue.

[BB] The author of a small Dutch book, printed within these few days (156). He only calls himself N. N. Philalethes: the title of his book comes to this; A demonstration of the weakness of Spinoza's argument, concerning the only one absolutely infinite substance. He lays down as a fact: 1. That the whole system of Spinoza is grounded on this proposition: That there is but one only substance, and that it is absolutely infinite. 2. That from such a principle Spinoza drew this consequence, That particular beings are only modifications of that absolutely infinite substance. The author maintains that this principle, being contested by every body, should have been proved with all imaginable care, and yet that Spinoza gave no proof of it. I could give some extracts of that piece, for I have seen a French translation of it in manuscript; but because it is but a small book, and in all probability it will be printed in French or Latin, before my Dictionary comes out, it were a needless thing to enlarge upon it.

[CC] An explanation of the objection which I have grounded upon God's immutability. You will find that objection above in the remark [N], numb. II. I must confirm it, since some persons maintain that the weakness of it sufficiently appears, if it be considered that no alteration happens to the god of Spinoza, as being a substance infinite, necessary, &c. &c. Tho' the face of the whole world should change at every moment, tho' the earth should be reduced to dust, the sun darkened, and the sea become a luminous body, there will only be a change of modifications: the one only substance will always remain a substance infinite, extended, thinking, and so will all substantial or essential attributes. When they say this, they say nothing but what I have already confuted beforehand (157): but the better to shew their mistake, I must observe here that they dispute against me, as if I had maintained that, according to Spinoza, the Deity successively annihilates and produces again. This is not what I object, when I say that he makes God subject to change, and divests him of his immutability. I do not confound, as they do, the notion of things, and the signification of words: by changing, I mean the same thing which all reasoning men have ever meant by that word: I do not mean the annihilation and total destruction of a thing, but it's passing through several states, the subject of the accidents it ceases to have, and of those it begins to acquire, remaining the same. The learned, and the illiterate, the Mythologists and the Philosophers, the Poets and the Naturalists, are agreed in this notion, and the signification of this word. The fabulous Metamorphoses, so much sung by Ovid, and the true generations explained by Philosophers, equally supposed the preservation of the substance, and kept it immutably as the successive subject of the old and new form. These notions have been only confounded by the unhappy disputes of Christian Divines: and yet it must be confessed that the most ignorant missionaries come into the right way again, when the question is no longer about the Eucharist. If you ask them, upon any other subject, what is meant by the change, conversion, transubstantiation, and transubstantiation of one thing into another; they will answer you, the meaning of it is, for instance, that wood becomes fire, that bread becomes blood, and blood flesh, and so on. They do not think then of the improper expressions consecrated to the controversy of the Eucharist, that the bread is converted and transubstantiated into the body of our Saviour. This way of speaking does by no means agree with the doctrine designed to be explained by it: it is as if one should say, that the air of a cask is transformed, changed, converted, and transubstantiated into the wine poured into the cask. The air goes somewhere else, and the wine succeeds it in the same place: one of them is not in the least metamorphosed into the other. Neither is the mystery of the Eucharist, as it is explained by the Roman Catholics, any metamorphosis: the bread is annihilated, as to its substance; the body of Christ takes the place of the bread, and is not the subject of inherence of the accidents of that which are preserved without their substance. But I repeat it again, this is the only case wherein the missionaries make a wrong use of the words change, conversion, or transubstantiation, of one Being into another: in all other things, they suppose, with the rest of mankind, 1. That it is essential to a transformation, that the subject of the forms, that are destroyed, should subsist under the new forms. 2. That tho' the subject be preserved, as to what is essential in it, yet it undergoes an internal change, properly so called, and inconsistent with an immutable Being. Let the Spinosophists therefore no longer imagine that they will be allowed to coin a new language, contrary to the ideas of all mankind. If they have any sincerity left, they must confess, that, according to their system, God is subject to all the vicissitudes, and all the revolutions, to which the materia prima of Aristotle is liable, in the system of the Peripatetics. But could any thing be more absurd than to maintain, that supposing Aristotle's doctrine, matter is a substance which never undergoes any change?

But in order to embarrass the Spinosophists, it is but deferring them to give a definition of change. They must define it in such manner, that either it will not differ from the total destruction of a subject, or that it will agree with that one only substance, which they call God. If they define it in the first manner, they will make themselves more ridiculous still than the transubstantiators; and if they define it in the second manner, they will give up the cause.

I add, that the reason they alledge to elude my objections, proves too much; for if it was a good one, they must needs teach that there never was, nor will be, any change in the world, and that all manner of change is impossible, whether great or small. Let us prove this consequence. The reason, say they, why God is immutable, is, because, as a substance, and an extension,

(154) Petrus Daniel Huetius, in Prefat. Demonstrat. Evangelicae, p. m. 3.

(155) The first edition of Huetius's Demonstratio Evangelica was published in 1678, though the year 1679, is in the title page.

(156) At Amsterdam for Bernard Vischer 1701.

(157) See number II, of the remark [N].

several persons pretend that I have not at all understood Spinoza's doctrine [D D]. It were a very strange thing, since I have only undertaken to confute the proposition, which extension, he neither is nor can be subject to any change. He is an extended substance under the form of fire, as well as under the form of wood, which is converted into fire, and so with other things. I will prove to them by this very reason, that the modifications themselves are immutable. Man is, according to their system, a modification of God; they own that man is subject to change, since he is sometimes merry, and sometimes melancholy; sometimes he wills one thing, and sometimes he wills it not. This is no change, will I say; for he is as much a man when merry as when melancholy: the essential attributes of man remain immutably in him, whether he be willing to sell his house, or to keep it. Let us suppose the most inconstant man in the world, and such as might fitly apply to himself these verses of Horace:

Mea pugnat sententia fecum.
Quod petiit, spernit: repetit, quod nuper omisit.
Æstuat, & vitæ disconvenit ordine toto.
Diruit, ædificat, mutat quadrata rotundis (158).

(158) Horat.
Epist. I, lib. I,
ver. 97. See also the passage cited above citation (92).

My mind is with itself at strife,
And disagrees in all the course of life;
And what it hated now, it now desires;
What now it throws away, it now admires;
Unsettled as the sea, or fleeting air,
It razes, builds, and changes round to square.

CREECH.

Or who might, more than any body else, be the true original of these verses of Mr Boileau.

Mais l'homme sans arrêt, dans sa course insensée,
Voltige incessamment de pensée en pensée,
Son cœur toujours flottant entre mille embarras,
Ne sait ni ce qu'il veut, ni ce qu'il ne veut pas
Ce qu'un jour il abhorre, en l'autre il le fouhaite.

Voilà l'Homme en effet. Il va du blanc au noir
Il condamne au matin ses sentimens du soir.
Importun à tout autre, à soi-même incommode,
Il change à tous momens d'esprit comme de mode;
Il tourne au moindre vent, il tombe au moindre choc.
Aujourd'hui dans un casque, & demain dans un froc (159).

(159) Boileau,
Sat. VIII, ver.
35 & 49.

But flier man, in his inconstant course,
Is wilder'd, and oft strays from bad to worse:
Toss'd by a thousand gusts of wavering doubt,
His restless mind still rolls from thought to thought:
In each resolve unsteady and unfix'd,
And what he one day loathes, desires the next.

This is our image just: such is that vain,
That foolish, fickle, mothy creature man:
More changing than a weather cock, his head
Ne'er wakes with the same thoughts he went to bed.
Irksome to all beside, and ill at ease,
He neither others, nor himself can please:
Each minute round his whirling humours run,
Now he's a trooper, and a priest anon,
To day in buff, to morrow in a gown.

OLDHAM.

Let us suppose a man, who has sincerely professed all religions in less than two years: let us suppose that he is gone through all the conditions of human life; that he has been successively a merchant, a soldier, and a monk, and then a married man; that he divorced his wife, and then turned register, financier, and clergyman, &c. If the Spinozists tell him, you have been very inconstant: Why? will he say, you are mistaken, I have never changed, I have been as constantly a man ever since I was born, as a mountain has been a mountain. What could they reply to that argument ad hominem? Is it not most evident that the whole essence of the human species remains in the man, whether he wills the same things, whether he hates to day, what he loved yesterday, and daily changes his inclinations?

But to make use of an example very proper for a country, the inhabitants whereof are used to the sea: let us suppose that a Spinozist, at his return from Batavia, should say that his voyage has been longer than usually, because the winds changed almost every day. He might be answered, You are mistaken, the winds never change. Indeed it may be said, that they blow sometimes from the North, sometimes from the South, &c. but they always retain the essence of wind; and therefore they do not change as they are winds, and remain as immutable as your one only substance of the world: for you say it is immutable, because it never changes its state as to its essential properties. No more does the wind change its state as it is wind, it always retains the whole nature and essence of it; and therefore it is as immutable as your Deity.

I go farther, and I say, that even when a man is burnt alive, no alteration happens to him. He was a modification of the divine nature when alive; and is he not so in the flames, or under the form of ashes? Could he lose the attributes that constitute a modification? Could he go through any change as he is a modification? If he changed in that respect, must it not be said that flame is not a mode of extension? Could Spinoza affirm it without contradicting himself, and destroying his own system? This is sufficient to shew that those are mistaken, who pretend I have not proved that this system makes God subject to change. My argument cannot be denied, without asserting that modifications themselves are immutable, and that no alterations happen in man's thoughts, nor in the disposition of matter; which is a most absurd thing, and contrary to the doctrines which the Spinozists are forced to acknowledge; for they dare not deny that the modifications of the infinite substance are subject to corruption and generation.

Let us desire of them to grant us, for a moment, by a dato non concessio, as the Logicians speak, that Socrates is a substance. They must then acknowledge, that each particular thought of Socrates is a modality of his substance. But is it not true, that Socrates passing from affirming to denying, changes his thought, and that it is a real internal change and properly so called? And yet Socrates remains still a substance, and an individuum of the human species, whether he affirms or denies, whether he wills or rejects a thing. And therefore, tho' he does not change as he is a man, he cannot be said to be immutable; and it may very well be said that he is mutable, and actually changes, because his modifications are not always the same. But let us grant to the Spinozists in our turn, by a dato non concessio, that Socrates is but a modification of the divine substance; let us grant, I say, that his relation to that substance is, as in the common opinion, the relation of Socrates's thoughts to the substance of Socrates. Since therefore the change of those thoughts is a good reason to maintain that Socrates is not an immutable Being, but rather an inconstant and mutable substance which very much varies, it ought to be concluded that the substance of God (160) does actually undergo a change and a variation, properly so called, whenever Socrates, one of its modifications changes his state. It is therefore a most evident truth, that for a Being actually and really to pass from one state into another, it is sufficient that it changes, as to its modifications: and if any thing further is required, to wit, that it should lose its essential attributes, annihilation, or a total destruction, would be grossly confounded with change or alteration. See the Margin (161).

[D D] Whether it be true, as I am told, several persons pretend that I have not at all understood Spinoza's doctrine. I have it from several hands; but no body could tell me the reasons of those who make such a judgment of my dispute. And therefore I can neither

(160) Now, the Aristotle, de Prædicam. cap.
v, reduces among the properties of a substance, to remain the same in number and under contrary qualities.
Máxime verò substantie pro-prium hoc esse videtur, IDEM
NUMQUE NUMERO per-manens contritiorum esse sub-ceptivum.

(161) One may see in the Yezus Castellanensis,
pag. 127, & seq.
several remarks upon what would be sufficient to infer the possibility and necessity of the Divine nature, if the Fathers had taught what is imposed to them.

which is the basis of his system, and which he has very clearly expressed. I have confined my self to the confutation of what he distinctly lays down as his first principle, viz. That God is the only substance that is in the universe, and that all other Beings are precisely confute them, nor examine if I ought to yield to their reasons, for I know them not. All that I can do, is to justify myself in a general manner; and I think I may say, that if I have not understood the proposition I undertook to confute, it is not my fault. I would not be so positive, if I had writ a book against the whole system of Spinoza, examining it paragraph by paragraph. Doubtless I should not have always understood him; and it is not likely he himself understood every part of his doctrine, and could make all the consequences of his hypothesis intelligible. But since I have confined myself to (162) a single proposition, expressed in few words, which appear clear and precise, and are the foundation of the whole structure, I must have understood it, or it contains some ambiguities altogether unbecoming the founder of a system. However I need not be uneasy upon this account, both because the sense I put upon that proposition of Spinoza is the same his other adversaries have put upon it, and because the best answer his followers can make, is, that he has not been understood (163). Notwithstanding this charge, the last author who wrote against him (164), understands the proposition in question as I do; which shews that their accusation is looked upon as very ill grounded.

(162) See the remark [P].

(163) See the same remark.

(164) See the remark [BB].

But to be more particular, what I suppose in my objections amounts to this. I say, that Spinoza taught, 1. That there is but one only substance in the universe. 2. That this substance is God. 3. That all particular Beings, material extension, the sun, the moon, plants, beasts, and men, their motions, ideas, imaginations, and desires, are modifications of God. Now I ask the Spinozists, whether their master taught those things or not? If he taught them, it cannot be said that I have been guilty of the Ignoratio Elenchi, or of mistaking the state of the question; for my objections, suppose that this is his very doctrine, and attack it upon that supposition. I am therefore safe, and whoever says that I have undertaken to confute what I did not apprehend, is mistaken. If it be said that Spinoza does not teach the three things above mentioned, I ask why he expressed himself just as those would do, who should be extremely desirous to make the reader believe that they teach those three things? Is it a fair and laudable thing to use the common style, without annexing to the words the same ideas other men annexed to them, and without informing the reader of the new sense put upon them? But in order to discuss the matter, let us enquire wherein the mistake may lie. I cannot have been mistaken as to the word substance; for I have not confuted Spinoza upon that head; I have admitted what he supposes, that a thing cannot be a substance, unless it be independent of all causes, or have an eternal and necessary self-existence. I do not think I was mistaken in saying, that, according to Spinoza, God only has the nature of a substance; and therefore I believe that if there was any mistake in my objections, it would be only in putting a different sense upon the words modalities, modifications, modes, from that of Spinoza. But I repeat it again, If I was mistaken in it, it would be his fault: I understand those words as they have been always understood, or, at least, as they are understood by all the new Philosophers (165); and I had reason to believe he took them in that sense, because he gave no public notice that he used them in any other signification. It is the general doctrine of Philosophers, that the idea of Being contains two species under it, viz. substance and accident, and that a substance subsists by itself, ens per se subsistens, and that an accident subsists in another Being, ens in alio. They add, that subsisting by one's self, signifies only not depending upon a subject of inhesion; and because, according to their notions, this agrees with matter, angels, and human souls; they admit two sorts of substance, one of which is uncreated, and the other created; and they subdivide the created substance into two species. One of those two species is matter; the other our souls. As for accidents, they all believed before the wretched disputes, which have divided Christianity, that they do so essentially depend upon their subject of inhesion that they cannot subsist without it. This was their specific character, by this they were distinguished

(165) I use this restriction because of the difference there is between the doctrine of the modern peripatetics, and that of the Cartesians, Gassendists, &c. about the nature of accidents. It is a notable difference; but all comes to the same with respect to the objections against Spinoza.

from substance. The doctrine of Transubstantiation destroyed that notion, and forced the Philosophers to say, that an accident may subsist without a subject. They could not avoid saying so, since they believed, on the one hand, that after the consecration, the substance of the bread in the Eucharist subsisted no longer, and they saw, on the other hand, that all the accidents of the bread subsisted as before. Wherefore they admitted a real distinction between a substance and its accidents, and a mutual separability between those two sorts of Beings, by virtue of which, each of them could subsist without the other. But some of them maintained still that there are some accidents, whose distinction from their subject is not real, and which cannot subsist without it. They called those accidents modes (166). Des Cartes, Gassendus, and, in general, all those who have forsaken the scholastic Philosophy, deny that an accident can be separated from its subject, so as to subsist after its separation, and they give to all accidents the nature of those that were called modes, and use the terms of mode, modality, or modification, rather than that of accident. Now since Spinoza was a great Cartesian, it is reasonable to think that he put the same sense upon those words as Des Cartes did. If it be so, he understands by the modification of a substance only a manner of Being, which has the same relation to the substance, as figure, motion, rest, and situation have to matter; and pain, affirmation, love, &c. to the soul of man. For this is what the Cartesians call modes. They acknowledge no other modes; from whence it appears that they have kept the old notion of Aristotle, according to which, an accident is of such a nature, that it makes no part of its subject, and cannot exist without it, and the subject can lose it without losing its existence. Ἐν ὑποκειμένῳ δὲ λείψω δὲ ἐν τινὶ μὴ ὡς μέρος ὑπάρχον, ἀδυνατῶν χωρὶς εἶναι τὸ ἐν ᾧ ἐστίν. Atque id in subiecto esse dico quod in aliquo quidem est: sed non uti pars: ut si autem seorsum ab eo in quo inest, fieri nequit (167). All this agrees with roundness, motion, and rest, with respect to a stone, and likewise with pain, and affirmation with respect to the soul. If Spinoza annexed the same idea to what he calls modification of substance, my objections are certainly just; I have attacked him directly according to the true signification of his words, I have rightly understood his doctrine, and confuted it according to its true sense. In a word, there is no ground for the accusation I examine. But if he had the same notion of matter or extension, and of human souls, as Des Cartes had, and yet would not give the name of substance to extension, or to our souls, because he believed that a substance is a Being that depends upon no cause; I confess I have not rightly attacked him, but have ascribed to him an opinion which was none of his. This was what remains to be examined.

(166) Such as union, action, duration, and ubiquity.

(167) Aristot. de Prædicam. cap. ii.

Having once laid down, that a substance is what exists by itself, as independently upon any efficient cause, as upon any material one, or any subject of inhesion, he ought not to have said that matter and human souls are substances: and because, according to the common doctrine, he divided Being only into two species, viz. into substance, and modification of substance; he should have said that matter and human souls are only modifications of substance. No orthodox man will deny that, according to this definition of substance, there is but one substance in the world, and that this substance is God. Then the only thing that will remain to be known, is, whether he subdivides the modification of substance into two species. If he uses such a subdivision, and if he means by one of those two species, what the Cartesians and other Christian Philosophers call created substance, and by the other species what they call accident or mode, there will only be a dispute about words between him and them, and it will be a very easy thing to make his whole system orthodox, and to put an end to his sect: for a man is a Spinozist only because he believes that Spinoza has utterly destroyed the system of the Christian Philosophers, and the existence of an immaterial God, who governs all things with a perfect liberty. From whence we may conclude, by the by, that the Spinozists and their adversaries do perfectly agree about the sense of the word modification of substance. Both the

K k k

are only modifications of that substance. If we do not understand what he meant by it, it is doubtless, because he put a new sense upon his words, without giving notice of it to the reader. Which is an effectual way to become unintelligible by one's own fault. If there is any term that he took in a new sense, and unknown to Philosophers, it is in one and the other believed that Spinoza meant by it, a Being of the same nature with what the Cartesians call modes, and that he never understood by that word a Being, which had the properties, or the nature of what we call created substance.

Those, who, by all means, would maintain, that I am mistaken, might suppose that Spinoza rejected only the name of substance given to Beings that depend upon another cause, as to their production, preservation, and operation, in fieri, in esse, & in operari, as they speak in the schools. They might say that tho' he retained all the reality of the thing, he avoided the word, because he believed that a Being so dependent upon its cause, could not be called ens per se subsistens, subsistens by itself, which is the definition of substance. I answer, as I have done above, that if it be so, there is only a dispute about words between him and other Philosophers, and that I shall willingly confess my mistake, if it appears that Spinoza was indeed a Cartesian; but only that he has been more nice than Des Cartes in the application of the word substance, and that all the impiety laid to his charge, lies only in a misunderstanding. He only meant (will they add) what is to be found in the books of Divines, viz. That the immensity of God fills up heaven and earth, and all imaginary spaces in infinitum (168), and consequently that his essence penetrates and locally surrounds all other Beings, so that it is in him we have life and motion (169), and that he has produced nothing out of himself; for since he fills up all spaces, he could not place any thing but in himself, there being nothing out of him. Besides, it is well known, that no Being can exist without him; and therefore it is true, that the properties of the Cartesian modes agree with what is called created substances. Those substances are in God, and cannot exist out of him and without him. It is therefore no wonder if Spinoza called them modifications; but on the other hand, he did not deny that there was a real distinction between them, and that each of them constituted a particular principle of actions or passions, in such a manner, that one of them does what the other does not; and that when one denies of one of them what is affirmed of the other, it is according to the rules of Logic, and no body can object to Spinoza, that it follows from his principles, that two contradictory propositions are true of one and the same subject at the same time.

All this signifies nothing; and in order to come directly to the point, a plain answer should be given to this precise question: does the true and proper character of modification agree to matter with respect to God; or does it not agree to it? Before you answer it, let me explain by some examples, what the proper character of modification is. It is to be in a subject in the same manner as motion is in matter, and thought in the soul of a man, and the form of a porrerger in the vessel called a porrerger. A thing cannot be a modification of the Divine substance, only because it subsists in the immensity of God, because it is penetrated by, and surrounded with it on all sides, because it exists by the power of God, and cannot exist without him, nor out of him; it is further requisite, that the Divine Substance should be its subject of inherence, just as, according to the common opinion, the human soul is the subject of inherence of sense and desire; pewter is the subject of inherence of the form of a porrerger, and matter is the subject of inherence of motion, rest, and figure. Answer now: and if you say that, according to Spinoza, the substance of God is not in such a manner the subject of inherence of that extension, of that motion, and of those human thoughts; I will confess that you make an orthodox Philosopher of him, that there was no ground to raise so many objections against him, and that he is only to blame for taking great pains to perplex a doctrine which every body knew, and to forge a new system built only upon the ambiguity of a word. If you say, that he believed that the substance of God is the subject of inherence of matter, and of all the varieties of extension and of thought, in the same sense as Des Cartes says that extension is the subject of inherency of motion, and the soul of man the subject of inherency of sensations and passions, you grant all that I desire: It is in this sense I understood Spinoza, and all my objections are grounded upon it.

The result of what has been said, is a question of fact concerning the true sense of the word modification in the system of Spinoza. Must it be taken for the same thing, that is commonly called created substance, or must it be taken in the sense it has in the system of Des Cartes? I believe the last sense is the right; for in the other sense, Spinoza would have acknowledged some creatures distinct from the Divine Substance, and made either of nothing, or of a matter distinct from God. But it were an easy thing to prove by a great many passages of his books, that he admits neither of those two things. Extension, according to him, is an attribute of God; from whence it follows, that God is essentially, eternally, and necessarily, an extended substance, and that extension belongs to him as much as existence. The result of which is, that the particular varieties of extension, which make the sun, the earth, trees, the bodies of brutes, the bodies of men, &c. are in God, as the School-Philosophers suppose they are in the materia prima, or first matter. But if those Philosophers supposed that the first matter is a simple and one only substance, they would conclude that the sun and the earth are really the same substance. And therefore Spinoza must needs draw the same conclusion. If he does not say that the sun is composed of God's extension, he must acknowledge that the extension of the sun was made out of nothing; but he denies creation; and therefore he must say that the substance of God is the material cause of the sun, is what composes the sun, subjectum ex quo, and consequently that the sun is not distinct from God (170); but God himself, God entirely, since, according to his notion, God is not a Being composed of parts.

Let us suppose for a moment, that a mass of gold has the power to convert itself into plates, dishes, candlesticks, porrergers, &c. it will not be distinct from those plates, and dishes; and if it be further supposed, that this mass is simple and not made up of parts, it must certainly be entire in each plate, and in each candlestick; for if it was not entire in each of them, it would have divided itself into several pieces, and therefore it would be composed of parts, which is contrary to the supposition. These reciprocal and convertible propositions would then be true, the candlestick is the mass of gold, the mass of gold is the candlestick. The candlestick is the whole mass of gold, the whole mass of gold is the candlestick. This is an image of the God of Spinoza: He has the power to convert or to modify himself into an earth, a moon, a sea, a tree, &c. and he is absolutely one, and without any composition of parts; and therefore it may be affirmed that the earth is God, that the moon is God; that the earth is God entire, that the moon is so too; that God is the earth, that God is the moon; that God entire is the earth, that God entire is the moon.

There can be but three ways, according to which, the modifications of Spinoza are in God: but none of those ways is what the other Philosophers say of the created substance. It is in God, say they, as in its efficient and transitive cause; and consequently it is really and wholly distinct from God. But according to Spinoza, the creatures are in God, either as an effect in its material cause, or as an accident in its subject of inherence, or as the form of a candlestick in the pewter it is made of. The sun, the moon, the trees, as they are things that have three dimensions, are in God as in the material cause of which their extension is composed; and therefore there is an identity between God and the sun, &c. The same trees, as they have a form, whereby they are distinguished from a stone, are in God, as the form of a candlestick is in pewter. To be a candlestick is only a manner of being of the pewter. The motion of bodies, and the thoughts of men, are in God, as the accidents of the Peripatetics are in the created substance; they are entities inherent in their subject, which are not composed of it, and which make no part of it. See the margin (171).

extrin
blns ga!

Ident

(170) Matter, as Aristotle says, Physic. lib. i, cap. ix, remains in the effect it produces, αὐτὸ γὰρ αὐτῷ παραμένει. It is not so in the case of the quod rei cuiusque subjectum est primum ex quo inexistente in aliquid.

(171) Observe this difference, that the accidents of the Peripatetics are really distinct from their subject of inherence, and that Spinoza cannot say so of the modifications of the Divine substance; for if they were distinct from it, without being composed of it, they would be made out of nothing. Spinoza would own it: he would not cavil about it, as the Peripatetics do, when they are told that accidents would be created, if they were distinct from the substance. See Journ. de Trév. Juine 1702, pag. 480, edition of Amsterdam.

I am

(a) The remark
[DD].

(b) They have named to me
among others,
Mefieurs
Huygens, Leib-niz, Newton, Bernoulli, & Fatio.

in all appearance the word modification. But whatever signification he takes it in, he cannot avoid being confounded, as may be seen in a remark of this article (a). Those who will carefully examine the objections I have proposed, will easily perceive that I have taken the word modification in the sense it ought to have, and that the consequences I have drawn, and the principles I have laid down to confute those consequences, do perfectly agree with the rules of reasoning. I do not know whether it be necessary to observe, that the side which I attack, and which always appeared to me very weak, is that which the Spinozists take the least care to defend [EE]. I shall conclude with this observation, that several persons have assured me that his doctrine, even considered without a relation to religion, appears very contemptible to the greatest Mathematicians of our days (b). This may be easily believed, if these two things be considered: first, that no man ought to be more fully persuaded of the multiplicity of substances, than those, who apply themselves to the consideration of extension; secondly, that most of those gentlemen admit a vacuum. But there is nothing more contrary to Spinoza's hypothesis, than to assert that all bodies do not touch one another; and there never were two systems more opposite than his and that of the Atomists. He agrees with Epicurus in rejecting Providence, but in all other things their systems are like fire and water.

I have just now been reading a letter (c) where it is said that he lived for some time in the city of Ulm, that the magistrates made him depart from thence, because he there dispersed his pernicious doctrine, and because it was there also that he began to write his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. I very much question all this. The author of the letter adds that his father, whilst he continued a Protestant, was Spinoza's great friend, and that it was chiefly by his means that excellent genius renounced the sect of the Jews.

(c) It is inserted in the Mercur Galant, for the month of September 1702, and was written by an officer in the army of the Elector of Bavaria. That officer says, that he will speedily give in medals, the History of the Ottoman Empire, from its foundation, that it is a work wherein he has laboured two and twenty years, and that he will have it printed at Geneva. He also says that he designs to translate Quintus Curtius, into the Turkish language, which he has been desirous to do by some persons at Adrianople.

(172) Kuffeler, Specim. Artis ratiocinandi, pag. 222. Note, that he is very angry with Bienenburg, who said that Spinoza ascribed a material extension to God. Note also, that pag. 230, & seq. He confutes one Adrian Verwer, who had said something against the system of Spinoza.

I am not ignorant, that an apologist of Spinoza (172) maintains that this Philosopher does not ascribe a material extension to God, but only an intelligible extension, and such as falls not under our imagination. But if the extension of the bodies we see and imagine, is not the extension of God, whence comes it? How has it been made? If it has been produced out of nothing, Spinoza is an orthodox man, his new system signifies nothing. If it has been produced out of the intelligible extension of God, it is still a true creation; for the intelligible extension being but an idea, and not having really the three dimensions, cannot form the matter of the extension, which formally exists out of the understanding. Besides, if we distinguish two sorts of extension, one intelligible belonging to God, the other imaginable belonging to matter, we must also admit two subjects of those extensions distinct one from another; and then the unity of substance will be destroyed, and the whole structure of Spinoza falls to the ground. We may therefore say, that his apologist does not resolve the difficulty, and raises greater ones.

The Spinozists may take advantage of the doctrine of Transubstantiation; for if they consult the writings of the Spanish school-men, they will find many subtleties to answer something to the arguments of those, who say, that one and the same man cannot be a Mahometan in Turkey, and a Christian in France, sick at Rome, and well at Vienna; but perhaps they will at last find themselves obliged to compare their system with the mystery of the Trinity, to clear themselves from the contradictions that are objected to them. If they do not say that the modifications of the divine substance, Plato, Aristotle, that horse, that ape, this tree, this stone, are as many personalities, which tho' identified with the same substance, may be, each of them a particular and determined principle, and distinct from the other modifications; they will never be able to answer the objection grounded upon their overthrowing this principle, Two contradictory terms cannot belong to the same subject at the same time. Perhaps they will say some time or other, that as the three persons of the Trinity, without being distinct from the divine substance, as Divines teach, and without having any absolute attribute that is not the same in number in each of them, have nevertheless each of them some properties that may be denied of the others; so Spinoza may have admitted in the divine substance an infinite number of modalities or personalities, one of which does a thing, which the others do not. This will not be a true contradiction, since Divines acknowledge a virtual distinction, in ordine ad suscipiendam prædicatam contradictoria, with respect to the susceptibility of two terms that contradict one another. But, as the subtle Arriaga judiciously observes, speaking of Metaphysical degrees (173), which some will have to be susceptible of two contradictory oppositions, that would be entirely to destroy Philosophy, to transfer to natural things what Revelation teaches us concerning the nature of God; for it would make way to prove that there is no real distinction between the creatures (174). Dices quarto, dari distinctionem virtutalem inter animalitatem, & rationalitatem, equivalentem reali, quatenus, etiam si à parte rei sint idem, una tamen potest terminare cognitionem, altera vero non, quod est æquivalere duabus rebus distinctis; sicut, licet essentia divina sit idem realiter cum Paternitate, tamen essentie convenit communicari tribus personis, Paternitati vero non convenit ea communicatio. Respondet . . . explicare res creatas per hoc adeo difficile exemplum, est res faciles per difficillimas intelligere, præterquam quod, si ex divinis liceret argumentari ad creatas, etiam posset inferri, animalitatem posse produci, quin produceretur rationalitas. . . . (175) Imò etiam posset inferri res omnes creatas esse idem realiter inter se, & virtualiter, solum prædicatam distinctionem in ordine ad ea duo prædicata contradictoria, non licet ponere in creaturis similem distinctionem, cum neque creaturarum perfectio, neque ulla ratio efficax possit esse ad illam ponendam: imò potius (ut jam dixi) si semel poneretur, non esset ullum fundamentum ad distinguendas inter se realiter creaturas; & consequenter destrueretur tota Philosophia. How much are we beholden to Spinoza! He deprives us as much as in him lies, of the most necessary of all principles; for if it was not certain that one and the same thing cannot be at the same time, such as it is, and not such as it is, all our meditations and reasonings would be insignificant. See what Averroës said (176).

[EE] The side which I attack . . . is that which the Spinozists take the least care to defend. I have attacked Spinoza's supposition, that extension is not a compounded Being, but one numerical substance; and I have pitched upon that part of his system, because I knew the Spinozists say the difficulties do not lie in that. They think they are much more perplexed, when they are asked how thought and extension can be united in one and the same substance. There is something odd in this; for if it be certain, according to our ideas, that thought and extension have no affinity one with another, it is still more evident that extension consists of parts really distinct one from another; and yet they are more sensible of the first difficulty than of the second, and call the latter a trifle if compared.

(173) So they call the attributes ens, substantia, corpus, vivens, animal, rationalis, which constitute the nature of a man. It is agreed that they are not distinct one from another, but that they really are one and the same entity.

(174) Arriaga, Disput. V. Logica, §. ii, num. 29, pag. m. 83.

(175) Id. ibid. Disput. V. Logica, §. ii, num. 29, pag. m. 83.

(176) Quo fit ut merito dicat Averroës hoc loco sine hoc pronuntio non modo possibile non esse philosophari, sed ne disputare quidem aut rationari. Enchiridion in Metaphys. Aristotelis lib. iv. cap. iii, pag. m. 655.

pared with the other. I thought therefore it was necessary to give them occasion to argue thus: if that side of our system can hardly be defended, which we took to be proof against all attacks, how shall we defend the weak sides of it?

SPON (CHARLES) a Physician of Lyons. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (a).

(a) For July 1684, Art. V.

SPON (JACOB) a Physician of Lyons, and an Antiquarian, son of the foregoing. See the same Nouvelles (a).

(a) For February 1686, Art. IX.

SPONDANUS (JOHN DE) son of a counsellor and secretary of Joan of Albret Queen of Navarre, was born at Maulcon de Soule in the country of Biscay in the year 1557 (a). He made so speedy a progress in the Belles Lettres, that he undertook to comment on Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, when he was twenty years of age [A]. He enjoyed considerable posts, that of Lieutenant-General to the Prefidial of Rochelle. He abjured and afterwards that of Master of the Requests to King Henry the IVth. He abjured the Reformed Religion in the year 1593, and immediately after published the declaration of his motives to that change [B]. A great many slanders were spread about against him [C]. He left the court a little after he had forsaken the Protestants, and hid himself among the mountains of Biscay. There he undertook to write a book of controversy, but,

(a) Petrus Frizonius in Vita Henrici Spondani, initio.

[A] He made so speedy a progress: . . . that he undertook to comment on the Iliad and Odyssey, when he was twenty years of age. This is what Frizonius observes; he adds, that Spondanus was the first who published such a commentary in Latin, 'Joannes Spondanus summo à naturâ instructus ingenio vir literatissimus, qui annos natus viginti Iliadem & Odysseam Homeri . . . Latine PRIMUS MORTALIUM commentatus (1). . . . 'John Spondanus, a man of great genius and learning, was the first who ever commented in Latin on the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer, at twenty years of age. If by this he meant, that when Spondanus was twenty years of age, he published that commentary, it would be a mistake, for the first edition was published at Basil in the year 1583, in folio. He dated the Epistle Dedicatory at Basil the twelfth of June in the same year. He had taken care of that edition himself (2), and was then twenty-six years old, but we may believe that he was only twenty when he began that work. He dedicated it to his Mecenas the King of Navarre, who was afterwards King of France. The second edition was also dedicated to that Prince by Sebastian Henric Petri, Bookseller at Basil in the year 1606. Florimond de Remond cannot be so easily excused as Frizonius, since he says that Spondanus published his Commentary on Homer when he was nineteen years of age. Here are his words, In order to finish his work, he retired to the farthest extremity of this kingdom, to the mountains of Biscay, the place of his birth. There, amidst deserts and solitude, moved by the incredible zeal which he had, to bring back to the way of salvation those whom he had left in the paths of perdition, he undertook to answer a book which Theod. Beza had just published (as his masterpiece) concerning the Marks of the Church. For that purpose he employed the most serious hours of three or four months, bestowing the rest, as it were for his amusement, in finishing his translation of Seneca, which will soon be published, and in revising his Hesiod and Homer, whom that rare genius had commented upon and published, when he was nineteen years of age (3). Mr Moreri justly says that Spondanus's Commentaries on Homer are not esteemed (4). The author whom he quotes speaks of them with contempt; Notæ nullius momenti, quasque Casaubonus fuit vocavit (5). Notes of no importance, and such as Casaubon called trifling. Notwithstanding we may admire how so young an author acquired the learning which appears in that commentary.

(1) Petrus Frizonius in Vita Henrici Spondani, initio.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 3, cap. v.

(3) Florimond de Remond (or Remond, as he calls himself before his preface) Préface de la Réponse du Sr. de Sponde au Traicté des Marques de l'Eglise.

(4) Moreri knew not that he was brother to Henry Spondanus, Bishop of Pamiers.

(5) Bibliogr. Historic. Philologica Curiosa, folio D.

(6) See the Epitome of Gesner's Biblioth. pag. 498.

der to place his affairs on a better footing. During that time adds he, I have heard the reports which went concerning me. Some were sorry for me; because I left myself so unreasonably, and withdrew from my advancement near the King's person. Others laughed at me, as if my boasted conversion had only procured me a shameful retreat. . . . They afflicted me most, who published that I was going again to change, and to resume my former errors, that the Sorbonne of Paris had caused my declaration to be burnt, because said they, it contained several Mahometan impieties; and all the mountains resounded with this report. For my part, I know that the most considerable Doctors of that faculty had seen it, and approved it under their hand. However, I was very desirous to find a copy of it, that I might more clearly prove this report to be false (7). At last he recovered one, he revised the work, and gave it to be printed. The Antwerp edition of it by Arnault Coninx 1595 in 8vo, is that which I have used. I have not seen that of the year 1597 (8). Florimond de Remond is not exact, when he affirms that Spondanus, after he had published the reasons of his happy conversion . . . took the resolution to leave the court (9).

(7) Jean de Sponde, préface à sa Déclaration, pag. m. 7, 8.

(8) The author of the Notes on the Confession of Sanci, speaks of it, pag. 18, in the edition of 1699.

(9) Florimond de Remond, Préface, ubi supra.

[C] A great many slanders were spread about against him. You need only see the Epistle Dedicatory of the Confession of Sanci, and the notes added to it in the Amsterdam edition 1699: but as the book I am going to quote is much more scarce than that I have just mentioned, I shall give a long passage of it. 'His death, which was so happy and so peaceable, could not escape the malice of those, who, bearing his conversion impatiently, have dared to publish that he died in a miserable and desperate condition, and that his death, which followed his conversion, was the sentence of his condemnation, and a judgment of God upon him. This is entering very far into the secrets of the council of God. . . . It is truly a judgment of God, not upon Spondanus, but upon us. For it is a great sign of the wrath of God, when he takes off those who are useful and necessary to us, and who may promote the good and profit of the publick. And perhaps it was a particular providence of heaven which called him from among us, before he was encompassed with the torrents of abuse, which gathered on all hands to pour upon him. For let a man be ever so well armed with confidence; calumny will often strike home, and even innocence trembles at the approach of that monster, which Apelles represented in so lively a manner to the shame of the calumniator Antiphrisus. While he lived a Catholic, he looked on all these slanders with contempt: now he is in heaven, he pities and compassionates those who are the authors of them. I remember that one day when some person had shewn him on purpose the defamatory letters which were written against him: truly, said he, smiling, the author of them says not enough, if you consider his custom, but indeed too much, if you consider my innocence. It is his temper to revile with animosity, and it is mine to bear it with patience. Let him attack me, like an Huguenot, with but wanting several helps, he removed to Bourdeaux, where he applied himself, with all his might, to compose that work (b), though the bad state of his health should have induced him to interrupt his labour. He died before he had finished it, on the eighteenth of March 1595. He was buried at Bourdeaux in the Cathedral Church of St Andrew

* with abuse, and I will defend myself, like a Catholic, with modesty (10).

(10) Idem.

REFLECTIONS on the slanders published against those who change their religion.

(11) Compare with this the remark of the article WEIDNERUS.

There is a great mistake in these last words; for they suppose that the spirit of modesty was peculiar to the Roman Catholics, and the spirit of satire to the Protestants. We must own that on both sides there prevailed a cruel custom of loading with infamy those who changed their Religion, and of employing all manner of abuse for that purpose (11). Their whole life was sifted, even back to their infancy; all the sins of their youth were brought together, every part of their behaviour was pried into; loose reports, facts which might be true, and such as could admit of a bad construction were all assembled and blended together, when minds full of suspicion and distrust examined them without mercy: and an infinite number of satires composed after this manner were dealt about in the world. We need not ask cui bono, to what purpose. For it is manifest enough that both sides proposed two or three considerable advantages by this proceeding. They hoped that the conduct of deserters would give no scandal, provided they represented these deserters as persons who had sold themselves to iniquity, and were void both of honour and conscience. By this they would prevent its being believed, that the uncertainty of the doctrines which they maintained, and the reasons alleged by the other side had prevailed with those deserters to abjure their religion. They would lessen the triumph of their adversaries, by maintaining that they had only gained profelytes who were ruined and infamous in their character. In short, by exposing to infamy those who had revolted, they proposed to raise a greater horror against revolting; and to frighten any who should think of apostatizing: it being probable that those who were afraid of satire, would not dare to lay themselves open to it by changing their Religion, when so many formidable examples might teach them that their party would fully execute this threatening.

Quid me commoritur (melius non tangere clamo)
Flebit & insignis tota cantabitur urbe (12).

(12) Horace, Sat. I, lib. ii, ver. 45.

For if he does, he shall repent the wrong:
The warning's fair, his vices shall be shown,
And life expos'd to all the cens'ring town.

CREECH.

But if the advantage was visible in those respects, the loss was not less visible on other accounts; and thus it is surprising that the foresight of the bad consequences of this repentment, did not temper it. Nothing could harden the adverse party in their errors more than the lash of these personal satires. Each side imagines that the followers of the other are slaves to a blind prejudice, and a passionate obstinacy. And does not each confirm the other in such an opinion, when they blacken the character of the man who has left them, and employ against him, not a modest, a civil, and charitable answer to the motives which he publishes, but a violent answer, and personal defaming invectives. That side which has won a profelyte gives no credit to the stories published by the side which he has left; but looks upon them as base calumnies, and thus they persuade themselves more and more, that nothing prevails on the other side but passion and obstinacy, without the least mixture of an evangelical temper. Surely to persecute a convert with libels, is the way to alienate him wholly. Perhaps he would have returned into the pale of the Church, had he been calmly and civilly admonished of his fault: his return would have been a triumph which might have been advantageously opposed to the victory which their enemies boasted of. But that advantage is lost, if they irritate this weak brother. He cannot but be very sensible of his innocence with regard to some points in the satires which defame him (13). From thence forward he conceives a bad opinion of his ancient brethren, and of the motive by which they act. If the truths which they divulge make him uneasy, the lies serve not a little to make him more so: he contracts a hatred against their persons, which disposes him to hate their opinions; so that he who was at first only an outward convert, now becomes one inwardly. Anger produces this effect. It is probable that Spondanus, possessed with this passion, by reason of the terrible calumnies which were spread about against him, banished every idea which might recommend to him his former religion. He grew a stanch Catholic out of a repentment against the Protestants (14). Du Perron's discourses could not so much confirm him in the Romish Religion as his own repentment.

(13) They contain hearsays, conjectures, and the additions of Tale-tellers, &c.

It will be in vain to object to me in the words of the Psalmist, Imple faciem eorum ignominia, quærent nomen tuum Domine, --- Lord cover their face with reproach, and they will seek thy name (15): I will answer, that when we make this prayer, we ought to leave the issue of it to Providence, and not assign it to the pens of satirical writers. They are very unfit persons to bring back into the way of truth, those whom they defame for having turned aside from it. They have not well understood that an evangelical spirit is a fire which ought to enlighten and warm, but not to burn, calcinate, and stigmatize. We must say the same thing of this fire, that a Spanish author said of the fire of virtuous love, Arde y no quema; alumbra y no daña; quema y no consume, resplende y no lastima, purifica y no abrasa; y aun calienta y no congoxa (16). --- It glows, but scorches not; it enlightens, but burns not; it burns, but consumes not; it glitters, but dazzles not; it refines, without destroying; and though it be hot, yet it is not painful.

As to the profit which may arise from the art of being formidable by satire, it is a disputable point. I would not deny that when people observe that their failings are supported, while they appear zealous for their religion, but that, if they leave it, these failings will furnish matter for defamatory libels, they may be restrained from abjuring, by the fear of slander. A Satirist may strike with terror those who are not conscious of their innocence.

Ense velut stricto, quoties Lucilius ardens
Infremuit, rubet auditor cui frigida mens est
Criminibus, tacita sudant præcordia culpa (17).

(17) Joven. Sat. I, ver. 165.

But when Lucilius brandishes his pen,
And flutes in the face of guilty men,
A cold sweat stands in drops on every part.
And pain and anguish seize the vitious heart.

He may even alarm the mind of a good man, who is desirous of an honest fame. We know too well the power of calumny. The testimony of a good conscience does not secure us against the credulity of mankind. But after all, is it not a considerable advantage to keep weak members within the pale of the Church; and should we not imagine that the fear of slander will be but a weak barrier to those whom other passions animate to revolt, and who may depend upon being cordially received by the opposite party, and on being reputed by them as virtuous persons, and undeservedly caluminated (18). The change of Religion is a marvellous wash in the eye of converters. They may be said to claim the right of promising what God promises in the Bible: Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool (19). Note, that in order to weaken the strength of satires, the adverse party made them pass for an artifice, and at last pretended that this mine having taken air, had no effect. Let us quote a modern author.

* This declamation is not more serviceable to this author's (20) design, which is to blacken the reputation of all those who are converted, to the end, that the fear of being ranked among defamed persons might hinder others from turning Catholics. I own that when the Protestant party bethought themselves of this stratagem, some people at first were simple enough to be deceived by it, and to be kept in their errors for fear of losing their reputation. But that artifice is become entirely useless, because

(14) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, September 1686, p. 1096.

(15) See the same Nouvelles, February 1685, Art. II, p. 151, of the second edition.

(16) Guevarra. See the preface of Scuderi, before the Poem of Alatic.

(18) See remark [M], of the article CAYET, at the end, and the words of Mr Dailé to Father Adam: As soon as that man (Mr Cottier) whom you have for some years continually blackened with the basest crimes, presented himself to you, he was cordially received. In a moment he is become whiter than the snow. Dailé, Réplique au Père Adam, Part. iii.

(19) Isaiah l. 28.

(20) That is Mr Jurieu.

(c) Jean de Spondan, Declaration des Motifs, &c. pag. m. 25.

(d) Id. ibid. pag. 28.

St Andrew and his book of Controversy was published imperfect [D]. There was subjoined to it a small book, intitled Tumulus Joannis Spondani, from whence I have taken some of the particulars which I have just mentioned. That author declares (c) that Spondanus passed his days, with great fatigue and misery, both in his studies, and in all his other public and private occupations; and (d) that his imprisonment at Orleans was the fourth which GOD had sent him during the Civil Wars. He was elder brother to HENRY SPONDANUS, who has continued the annals of Baronius.

* because all the world knows at this time that reasonable people, whether they be Catholics or Protestants, give no longer any credit to calumnies of this nature, since they have become general, and spare no body. Every body knows that he who returns to the Catholic religion thereby loses with the Protestants the character of a good man, and is as much despised by them as he was formerly valued (21). So that they who declaim on this head have the misfortune of being minded by no body, and of having lost their time in whetting satirical weapons which wound no body, and return upon themselves (22).

(21) You will see in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, August 1689, pag. 879, that he has changed something in that reflection. See also Cottib's Reply, pag. 309, 310, and what Mr. Daillé answers him in chap. xxii, of Part. ii.

(22) Brueys, Réfutation des Réponses faites à son Examen, pag. 299, 300, Dutch edition 1686.

(23) Daillé, Réponse à Adam & Cottib, Part. iii, ch. ix, vii, viii.

(24) Idem. pag. 144, 145.

(25) Brueys Réfutation, &c. pag. 312.

(26) See Father Veron, in the book intitled L'Apôtre vicieux.

The late Capuchin, Father Basile, who having turned Protestant, was defamed by the Catholics (26), defended himself among other means, by the esteem which had been always paid him in his order. See his Mémoire confusé, printed at Sedan in the year 1639.

[D] His book of Controversy was published imperfect. It is intitled, Réponse au Traité des Marques de l'Eglise fait par Th. de Bens. It contains 317 pages in 8vo, and was printed at Bourdeaux by Simon Mil-langes in the year 1595, by the care of Florimond de Remond, who prefixed a preface to it, out of which I have already given some passages. Here are a few more; hardly had the author arrived at the middle of his work, when he found that he wanted several good books which were necessary to him. To have these books, and to converse with the learned, for he had there no conversation but with himself, he came to this town of Bourdeaux. As he laboured day and night with a marvellous ardor, and more than his health allowed. (For he had a weak and crazy body, but a strong and vigorous mind) the length of his watching, his assiduous bent upon books amidst the rigour and unusual severities of last winter, impaired his health; yet for all that he did not give over his undertaking. And when his friends told him the prejudice he did himself, by thus constantly poring upon books, and in a cold and rugged study, without giving any respite either to his body, or his mind; I must make haste, said he, for I foresee that the evening approaches, and that I must soon depart from my station. If I die, it will be honourably, with sword in hand, as a brave Christian champion ought to die. In short, his indisposition and his disease increasing with his labour, he was seized with a pleurisy, which soon conquered his weak and emaciated body. . . . His disease. . . . lasted only nine days. Towards the end of the preface we find the following words. 'Now reader, here thou hast his book: a book imperfect indeed, but which, however, shews the perfection of its writer. It is a great pity that it was not completed: and that what we have of it is not fully corrected, since it is only the plan of his first conceptions, which promised that the work would be divided into three books, and contain a series of arguments stronger and in a better order: to say nothing of the style, which is the last thing that is polished in a book. God knows whether Spondanus was ill furnished with style, for the embellishing what he had undertaken, he who seemed accomplished with all the ornaments of a perfect eloquence, as his writings testify, and who had a marvellous facility in giving a lively picture of his conceptions, so that hardly were there three words dashed out in three leaves of this work. I believe that in this respect he was inimitable. His capacity would have fully discovered itself in the book intitled L'Idée des Religions, which he designed to write; but death interrupted that, and several others of his projects for the defence of the Church (27).

(27) Florimond de Remond, Préface de la Réponse de Spondan au Traité des Marques de l'Eglise.

(a) Lætus, Compend. Hist. Univers. pag. m. 389.

(b) His name was Samuel Maciejowski.

(c) Id. ibid.

(d) Stanislaus Lubieniec, Hist. Reform. Polonica, lib. i, cap. v, pag. 31.

STANCARUS (FRANCIS) a native of Mantua, lived in the XVIth century. He was one of those, whose endeavours to establish the Reformed Religion in Poland proved most successful. He had been called to Cracow [A], to teach the Hebrew tongue (a); but when it was observed that he insinuated the doctrines of the Protestants in his lectures, he was complained of to the Bishop of Cracow (b), who had procured him that place; the Bishop being informed that he was a Heretic, had him imprisoned (c). He was released by the address or interest of some lords, and found a good place of refuge in the house of Nicolas Olefnicki (d), a gentleman, whose quality, merit, and courage, conspired to make him considerable (e). He proposed to him to put an end to the Romish worship, and to throw down the images; but Olefnicki having consulted

(1) Jo. Lætus Compend. Hist. Univers. pag. m. 389.

(2) Stanislaus Orichovius, in Chimeria, fol. 4, & 23.

[A] He had been called to Cracow. John Lætus affirms that the Bishop of Cracow himself called him thither to be professor of the Hebrew tongue. A Maciejowski Episcopo Cracoviensi: evocatus erat ut linguam S. Cracovica doceret (1). But others (2) say, that having been expelled from Italy as an Heretic, and not being able to settle in Germany, he went into Poland, where he was permitted to teach Hebrew in the college of Cracow, because they knew not what he was; they only knew that he understood that language. Those, who say this, being both his enemies, and the Bishop of Cracow's friends, may have omitted some circumstances. However, I believe that bishop did not send for him out of Italy, and that he knew nothing of his being qualified to teach Hebrew, till he saw him in Poland. See the remark [N].

[B] Olefnicki

consulted his friends, did not think it proper to be so hasty [B], and was contented to have the Sacrament administered in his castle with such ceremonies as Stancarus should think fit to appoint. Some time after, the first design of that Reformer was put in execution; the Monks, who officiated in the church of that place, were expelled, and the images were broke, and burnt to ashes (f). Olefnicki founded a Reformed Church at Pinczovia in the year 1550, whither he called several persons illustrious for their piety and learning (g). Stancarus set up there a noble school (h), and drew up fifty rules of Reformation for the Churches of Poland [C]. He was sent into Prussia some time after, and was Hebrew professor for a year at Königsberg (i). There arose violent quarrels between him and Osiander, the consequences whereof proved fatal for orthodoxy. Osiander taught that man is justified by the essential righteousness of God, and that JESUS CHRIST is our righteousness according to his divine nature. Stancarus being too eager to contradict, and departing from that error with too great a vehemence, run into the opposite extreme; for he maintained that JESUS CHRIST is our Mediator only according to his humane nature (k). It is said that he learned this doctrine from Peter Lombard, an author whom he much admired [D]. He attempted to establish it in Poland, but he met with some obstacles which he could not overcome.

(f) De hinc Monachos cenobio & imaginibus templo eiecit, quin & has frangi & comburi fecit (Olefnickus.) Id. ibid. pag. 31.

(g) Id. ibid. pag. 33.

(h) Lætus, ubi supra.

(i) Micælius, Syntagm. Hist. Eccles. pag. m. 866, 870.

(k) Id. ibid. pag. 866.

It

[B] Olefnicki . . . did not think it proper to be so hasty. A Roman Catholic gives the following account of it. 'Capit. errorem (Stancarus) instaurare Zwinglii, in idque operam dare, ut abduceret Olefnickum

a religione paterna & persuaderet illi religionem externam. Cujus ad præscriptum imagines è fano tolli, cenam pro usitata peregrinam institui, Sacra quæ Monachi in ejus oppidi fano religionibus vetustis administrabant, explodi jubet. Erat hoc fanum cum adjuncta Monachorum domo, munificentia Sbignei Olefnicki operose extructum ac liberaliter ditatum, quod profanare Stancarus properabat, cujus consilium cum Olefnicko videretur periculosum esse, ne quid inconsiderate faceret, vocat amicos ac in consilium adhibet, in quo, variatis sententiis, illa postremo vicit, ut imagines cum reliqua suppellectili falvæ in fano manerent: Monachi etiam veteri instituto sacra facerent: quod nihil earum rerum mutari tunc posset impune: adeffe Regem in proximo, Episcopum etiam Cracoviâ nondum discessisse, fore hæc rebus mutandis aliud tempus magis idoneum. In præsentia placere cenam institui, idque fieri in Arce privatim non in fano publicè, quod in oppido subiectum est arci. Secundum hanc sententiam permittunt Stancaro novæ cenæ modum prescribere, ac illius usum docere (3). - - - He began to renew the error of Zwinglius, and to labour to withdraw Olefnicki from the religion of his ancestors, and persuade him to embrace an extraneous religion. Accordingly he ordered the images to be taken out of the church, a foreign communion to be administered instead of the usual, and the religious worship, which the Monks performed in the church of that town after the ancient manner, to be abrogated. That church, with the neighbouring house of the Monks, which Stancarus bestowed to profane, was built with much labour, and liberally endowed by the munificence of Sbigneus Olefnicki. Olefnicki having thought his advice dangerous, that he might do nothing rashly, consulted his friends, who being of different opinions, it was resolved, at last, that the images, and other ornaments, should remain in the church untouched; that the Monks likewise should perform their religious worship after the ancient manner, because it was not safe at that time to change any of those things. That the king was at hand, and the bishop still in Cracow, and they hoped there would be a more convenient time to make a change in those things. For the present it was agreed that the communion should be administered privately in the castle, and not publicly in the church. According to this resolution, they allowed Stancarus to appoint the ceremonies which should be used in the new communion, and to teach the use of them.' Stancarus's temper may be known from these words. If he had not the gift of perseverance, it ought not to be ascribed to any lukewarmness: he was a very fiery man; his patron, who was a sword-man, threw water upon that great fire by the advice of some lay persons, who examined that affair. Take notice of a negligence of the Socinian writer, whom I have quoted. He relates the whole Latin passage to prove by the testimony of a Polish Annalist, that Stancarus caused the Monks to be turned out, and images to be thrown down; and yet it appears from the words of that Annalist, that no such thing was done: Lubienietzki betrays therefore his want of judgment. He might have found in Spondanus what he should have quoted. (4) 'Adversus Stancarum prodiit Orichovii Roxolani elegans libellus titulo Chimæra . . . ubi ait . . . (5) 'eum Pinczoviam Cracoviensis municipii oppidum se contulisse, ibique punice incitatum furore in templum irruisse, imagines sanctorum sustulisse, memorias Martyrum delevisse, altaria evertisse, sacra profanasse, gazam ecclesiasticam diripuisse, denique facientes ex oppido exterminasse. - - - There appeared against Stancarus, a little book of Orichovius Roxolanus, intitled Chimæra . . . where says . . . that he went to Pinczovia, a town in the district of Cracow, where, being incited with a furious rage, he rushed into the churches, threw down the images, defaced the monuments of the martyrs, overthrew the altars, profaned the holy things, laid violent hands on the ecclesiastical treasury, and, in short, banished the priests out of the town.' See the remark [O].

[C] He drew up fifty rules of Reformation for the Churches of Poland. We should wrong him should we suppose that he was a sedentary Reformer, who keeping in his school at Pinczovia, sent his orders and his counsels every where. It is certain that he travelled into several parts to perform the work of the Reformation. Stancarus Ecclesias à papatu reformavit. L. Canones instaurandarum Ecclesiarum conscripsit (6). This proof being too weak, do not mind it, but hold by this. 'Stancarus . . . ad reformandas Ecclesias ab Anno 1553, magno studio incubuerat: in quam rem hortatu Jacobi Comitissæ Ostrorogii libros conscripserat. Cum enim ei, tunc Felici Crucigero & aliis piis viris, mota in ditione Cracoviensi persecutione . . . aliz sedes quietæ querendæ essent, in majorem Poloniam concesserat & Ostrorogii protectu tutus permanerat. A quo Anno 1553, dimissus in minorem Poloniam cum eodem illo Crucigero reverterat, & reformandis ab idololatria ecclesiis pro tempore operam dederat, favore Stanislaus Stadnicki, Hieronymi Philipovii, Nicolai Olefnicki & aliorum Patronorum Virorum Nobilissimorum & Generosissimorum fretus (7). - - - Stancarus laboured with great pains to reform the church, in the year 1553: and for this purpose he wrote some books at the persuasion of James Count Ostrorogski. For a persecution having arisen in the district of Cracow, and he, with Felix Cruciger, and other pious men, being obliged to settle in some safer place, came into the Greater Poland, and continued safe under the protection of Ostrorogski. In the same year having been sent into the Lesser Poland, he came back with Cruciger, and endeavoured to reform the church from idolatry, being supported by the favour of Stanislaus Stadnicki, Jeron Philipowski, Nicolaus Olefnicki, and other most noble, and most generous patrons.'

[D] It is said that he learned this doctrine from Peter Lombard, an author, whom he much admired. I have read the following passage long ago in Micælius. 'Hic homo tanti fecit Magistrum sententiarum ex cuius lacunis hauserat errorem, ut dicere non sit verius, unum Petrum Lombardum plus valere, quam C. Lutheros, CC. Melancthonos, CCC. Bullingeros, CCCC. Martyres & I. Calvinos: ex quibus omnibus, si in mortario contunderentur, non exprimeretur una uncia veræ theologiæ (8). - - - This man so much esteemed Peter Lombard, from whom he had im-

(4) Spondanus, ad ann. 1551, num. 22, pag. 538.

(5) Orichovius, in Chimæra, fol. m. 24, verso.

(6) Lætus, Compend. Hist. Univ. pag. m. 389.

(7) Stanislaus Lubienietzki, ubi supra, lib. ii, cap. vi, p. 116, 117.

(8) Micælius, Syntagm. Hist. Eccles. pag. 890.

(3) Orichovius, Annal. III, apud Stanislaus Lubienietzki, Hist. Reformat. Polonica, lib. i, cap. v, pag. 31, 32.

(22) Id. ibid.

bibed his error, that he was not afraid to say that Peter Lombard alone was worth more than one hundred Luthers, two hundred Melancthons, three hundred Bullingers, four hundred Martys, and five hundred Calvinus. Out of all whom, if they were pounded together in a mortar, there would not be extracted one ounce of true Divinity. Florimond de Remond (9), who mentions part of those things, and some others, quotes Stancarus's apology against the Divines of Zurich. I have consulted it, and in it found (10) Micraelius's words. Note, The author boasts that he took his doctrine from the holy Fathers, and not from Peter Lombard, who has only collected, says he, the authorities of the Fathers, and the doctrines of the Church.

(10) Folio k 5,
Edit. Cracoviensis
1562, in 8vo.

(12) Acrites
discussa fuit.
Stanisl. Lubien
cius, ubi supra,
pag. 117.

(13) Id. ibid.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) Id. ibid.
118.

(16) It is attested by Calvin's Trinitarianism, pag. m. 682

(17) It is 252d letter

(18) Respo

controverfia fcripti quæ

summissio

do causal.
hominem

non volui dare. M.

lib. iv,

in the y

among Zanaki

Apparatus:

nas, p

by C. C.

1

subject, that might afford many reflexions [H]. Stancarus lost all the glory of his first actions

(23) Stanisl. Lubiecius, ubi supra, pag. 118.

incidit (23). - - - Soon after, this opinion, as like wife that of Servetus, concerning the superiority of the Father, did not a little induce pious and learned men to examine this argument. Wherefore Andreas Lubiecius, senior, in his manuscript, de Synodis, had just reason to say, that the synod of Pinczovia, held in the year 1558, made way for the destruction of the doctrine of the Trinity. . . . And, indeed, it will evidently appear to every body, that by what followed in this synod of Pinczovia, a door was opened for the examining of opinions which had been commonly received. For in that same year Blandrata, being driven out of Geneva by the influence of Calvin, came to Pinczovia; where having had much discourse with Lismaninus upon this subject, and perceiving that the enemies of Stancarus had not been able to answer him, he so wrought upon him, that he also began to call the doctrine of the Trinity in question. For this reason Lismaninus came to be suspected of Arianism by the ministers, who stiffly maintained their inveterate errors. Calvin had been all along afraid that Stancarus's adversaries would run into another extreme, and saw, to his great grief, that his fear was not groundless. Here follows what he writes to the brethren of that country. 'Tabulam nuper in Polonia editam, quæ Christum & Spiritum sanctum alios à Patre deos facit, non sine acerbissimo merore inspexi. Pridem me hæc cura, non abs re anxium tenuit, ne fratres minus in Scriptura exercitatos abiret Stancari importunitas, ut vitandæ unius absurditatis causa, in aliam fœdiorum laberentur. Accidit ergo quod timui, ac tristi exemplo patefactum est quam noxia sit pestis contentio, ubi magis propositum est, adversarium vincere, quam bonam causam simpliciter tueri. Cæsium Stancari delirium meritò à fratribus Polonicis repudiatum est. Sed dum fidi ab una diaboli astutia cavent, obrepit alter impostor Blandrata Stancaro deterior: & hac occasione abusus est ad errorem non minus detestabilem spargendum

(24) Calvin. in Admonitione ad Fratres Polonos ne triplicem in Deo Essentiam pro tribus Personis imaginando tres sibi Deos fabricent. init. pag. 683; Tractatum Theolog.

(24). - - - It gave me great grief to find that there had been a treatise published in Poland, which makes 'Jesus Christ and the Holy Ghost two distinct Gods from the Father. I was along ago in pain, and, not without reason, apprehensive, lest the troublesome spirit of Stancarus should pervert such brethren as were not well enough versed in the Scripture, and so far work upon them, that in order to avoid a less absurdity they should fall into a greater. What I feared is come to pass, and we have a melancholy proof how pernicious the plague of contention is, where people study more how to get the better of an adversary, than simply to defend a good cause. The gross conceit of Stancarus was justly rejected by the brethren in Poland. But while they were guarding themselves against one trick of the Devil, Blandrata, another impostor, worse than Stancarus, surprised them, and took hold of this opportunity to propagate an error no less detestable.' I shall set down a very fine passage of another letter he wrote to them in 1563, which shews the pernicious effects of disputes, and that God sends a curse upon the work of those, who dispute rather to triumph over their enemies, than for the sake of truth.

(25) Idem. pag. 686.

(25) Porro te terrimus hic error, qui apud vos grassatur, favorem obtinuit ex immodico contentiosis fervore. Nam cum Stancarus infusus Sophista, & rabula improbiſſimus commenta sua ingereret, Christum Mediatorem duntaxat esse, quatenus homo est, ideoque apud totam Trinitatem intercedere, optimum compendium quidam esse duxerunt, si responderent solum Patrem verè & propriè esse Deum. Ita effugium illud nimis cupidè multi arripuerunt, quòd ita putarent nullo negotio refutari Stancari ineptias. Sic ut veteri proverbio dicitur, nimium altercando veritas amissa fuit. Equidem non dubito quosdam inscitia vel inconsiderata facilitate lapsos esse: verum conjicere simul licet, nonnullos (26) astutè captasse occasionem, ut execrabile delirium, quod plausibile fore sperabant, simplicibus impudè obtruderent. That is, 'Furthermore, this pernicious error, that is spread among you, proceeds from too great a contention. For when Stancarus, that silly Sophist, and wicked babler, maintained that CHRIST is our Mediator only as he is man, and that therefore he intercedes with the whole Trinity; some were of opinion that the best way was to say, that the Father only is truly and properly God. Many were too fond of this subterfuge, because they fancied the absurd notions of Stancarus would be easily confuted by that means. Thus, as the proverb has it, Truth has been lost by too much contending. I do not doubt that some have been misled through ignorance and inconsiderateness; but it is very likely others have cunningly waited for an occasion to set forth such an execrable doctrine without any danger, hoping it would be acceptable to the ignorant.' Beza does also acknowledge, that Trithemism and Arianism, which then revived in Poland, were occasioned by Stancarus's disputes (27).

(26) He means Blandrata, Gentilis, John Paul Akiatus, whom he names soon after.

[H] It is a subject that might afford many reflexions. I shall only make a few, and will begin with the complaints some make against learning. Were it not better to suppress the universities than to maintain so many professors in all faculties? They are the men, who give birth to Heresies, or bring up those, who spread and multiply erroneous doctrines. The people, that is, all those who are not called to explain matters of religion, preserve the faith, imparted to them, found and undefiled. Teach them that they must believe the Trinity, the Unity of the Divine Nature, the Incarnation, CHRIST's Mediation, &c. they will believe all those mysteries, without altering the purity of them, and raising any disturbance about them. But the Doctors take a contrary course: some are willing to distinguish themselves by subtle interpretations, and others will not suffer it. Which occasions disputes, that trouble the spring, and divide it into several muddy streams. The first division is quickly followed by a second, and so on: that fecundity, or rather contagion, is very surprising. In a little time you will hear of many sectaries, Apollinarists, Arians, Eutychians, Macedonians, Monothelites, Nestorians, Sabellians, &c. (28). If any one drew the genealogy of Heresies, it would appear that their descent is chiefly grounded upon these two causes. 1. The disputants are willing to keep at too great a distance from their adversaries; and therefore they run into another extreme. 2. The desire of getting the victory, makes them carry their objections so far, that they may be retorted against them, or favour a third party. What do they do to remedy that inconveniency? They yield the ground they are not able to defend, and have recourse to some new invention. This produces a quite different system, which another doctor will reform a-new, not finding it so exact as it should be, and so on. Another, who fancies that both parties have the advantage, and are worsted by turns, as they act offensively, or stand upon the defensive, thinks himself obliged to pitch upon another hypothesis. All these disorders appeared in the case of Stancarus. He fell out with his colleague Olander in the university of Konigsberg; and the better to oppose him, he ascribed to CHRIST's humanity what the other ascribed to the Divine Nature. When he removed from Konigsberg to Francfort upon the Oder (29), he found there an antagonist (30), who run into a new extreme, that he might the better contradict him; for it is said (31), that he taught that JESUS CHRIST, our justification and our mediator as he is God and man, died according to his divine nature. Stancarus returning into Poland maintained his opinion so warmly, and accused his adversaries so violently of favouring Arianism, that he gave many persons occasion to revive the sect of the Arians, and then that of the Samosatrenians. I believe they went upon this: 1. That the objections of the other ministers proved, that the sole humanity of CHRIST was not our mediation. 2. That his objections proved that a co-essential Son of God could not be a Mediator. They therefore took a medium between those extremes: they said that JESUS CHRIST, the Son of God, not co-essential, and clothed with our nature, was our Mediator as to his human nature, and as to the spiritual nature he had before he was born. These are the unhappy effects of Theological disputes, and Professors chairs.

There is another thing to be considered. If a professor advances a new opinion, and gives ground to believe that he does it to get some reputation, an antagonist immediately starts up, who maintains that it is an ill opinion. They grow hot by degrees, and at last hate one another in earnest. To colour their proceedings, which are so like human passions, the aggressor

(27) Beza, in Apologia altera ad Claudium de Xaintes, pag. 345, Tom. ii, Operum. See also what he says in Calvin's Life, ad ann. 1560, pag. 381, Tom. iii, Operum.

EXAMINATION of the complaints against the multitude of universities and professors.

(28) I follow an alphabetical order and not a chronological one.

(29) Melch. Adam. in Vit. Theol. German. pag. 234.

(30) Called Andreas Musculus.

(31) Staphylus, apud Prætorium, Voc. Stancarini, pag. m. 458.

(n) See the remark [I].

actions by the troubles he raised afterwards, indulging too much his vanity and subtilty (N). He published several pieces [I]. Some are strangely mistaken about the nature of his opinions, as I shall make it appear, when I observe Moreri's faults [K]. The books for must say that the question is about a thing of great moment to the Church. He that is attacked must say the same, and shew that the opinion he has altered gives a great advantage to the enemies. When things are come to this pass, there is no going back; the superiors must intervene. But what is the usual effect of their decisions? an actual and virtual schism. No such thing would happen, if men were not over-fond of their own thoughts. For example, had Stancarus confessed, as he should have done, that his opinion was of little importance for the good of the Church, he would not have thought himself obliged in honour to maintain it; he would have been silent, as soon as he perceived that his assertion occasioned troubles. How many disorders might have been avoided in the world, if men had been contented to dispute about things necessary to salvation? At this rate Osiander and Stancarus had never writ two pages one against another. Is there any body among the people that follows either of those doctrines, when they put their trust in the death of CHRIST? Nay, do not those very Divines, who have most disputed about those questions, worship him without thinking of these distinctions between the human and Divine Nature?

Here is another consideration. In all countries where many persons are paid to explain a body of Divinity, some will doubtless be so rash as to start questions, which it were better to let alone (32), as land-marks that divide inheritances. The example of such men is much to be feared; for every body thinks he may do what is done by others, that have not more authority than himself: hence it is, that new disputes never arise more easily, than when they have been lately preceded by many others. This is what some say against the great number of universities.

I shall answer all those complaints in a few words. It is a most certain maxim that good things ought not to be suppressed, because some make an ill use them: and therefore since the improving of one's mind is very worthy of man, and the appointing of masters for that end is a good thing, it ought not to be abolished under pretence, that some learned men make an ill use of their knowledge to raise Theological disputes. To which I add, that the ill consequences of ignorance are still more to be feared. Ignorance would not prevent divisions: some men less ignorant than others, tho' they had never been in an university, would be so presumptuous and so vain as to fow new doctrines, and might establish them the more easily, because their hearers would be silly and ignorant.

I shall conclude with deploring the miserable condition of mankind. They cannot avoid one evil but by running into another: if you cure them of their ignorance, you expose them to scandalous disputes, and such as frequently shake and even overthrow the government.

[I] He published several pieces.] An Hebrew Grammar at Basil, 1546. An Exposition of St James's Epistle, with the conciliation of some passages of the Scripture, at Basil, 1547. This conciliation was taken almost word for word from Bullinger's commentaries (33); and therefore Stancarus may be placed in the catalogue of Plagiaries. De decem captivitatibus Judæorum: De sanguine Zachariæ, and several other tracts, the titles whereof may be seen in the epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca. I shall only transcribe what follows: De Trinitate, & Mediatore Domino nostro Jesu Christo, adversus Henricum Bullingerum, Petrum Martyrem, & Joannem Calvinum, & reliquos Tigurinos ac Genevensis Ecclesiæ Ministros, Ecclesiæ Dei perturbatores. De Trinitate, & Unitate Dei, deque Incarnatione & Mediatione Domini nostri Jesu Christi adversus Tritheistas, Arianos, Eutybianos, Macharianos, Cerinthianos, Ebionitas, & Photinianos. Opus novum de reformatione tum Doctrinæ Christianæ, tum veræ intelligentiæ Sacramentorum, cum matura consideratione & fundamento Scripturæ sanctæ & consilio SS. Patrum, at Basil, 1547, in 8vo (34). It is observed in the epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca, that Stancarus's book against the ministers of Zurich and Geneva is full of injurious words, and that it was confuted by Josias Simler. Here is an apostrophe of Stancarus: 'Conclusum est, ô Calvine, doctrinam tuam de filio Dei esse plane Arrianam, à qua resiliis quam primum te oro atque obsecro, & has hæreses quam citius fieri potest retractas, & liberes Ecclesiæ Dei ab istis blasphemis quibus eam contaminasti (35). - - It is agreed, O Calvin, that your doctrine concerning the Son of GOD is plainly Arian, which I therefore beseech you to renounce as soon as possible. Make haste to abjure such heresies, and free the Church of GOD from those blasphemies with which you have defiled it.' He says, in another place, which he has demonstrated, that the Churches, called Reformed, were Arian and Eutybian. Omnes Ecclesiæ quas vos appellatis reformatas per Evangelium filii Dei, Ariane & Eutybianæ sunt, nec hoc negari potest, ut supra demonstrativè probavi (36). Andrew Jurgiewski, canon of Vilna, alleged those two passages in his Bellum quinti Evangelii (37). From whence it appears that Calvin and Stancarus gave one another the same hard words; each of them accused the other of being a blasphemer, and a disturber of the Church; and if Calvin blamed Stancarus's vanity, I make no doubt that the latter charged him with the same fault. 'Eft illud non absurdum modò, sed exitiale commentum, quo vir ille fastu turgidus & novitatis nimium cupidus orthodoxæ fidei principia labefactare conatus est. Dolendum sanè est, quòd hominem qui professe alioqui poterat, mater hæreseon ambitio ad nocendum impulit. Adeò enim frivola sunt quas obtendit rationes, ut satis appareat, nihil aliud quam acuti ingenii famam ab aliis dissentiendo captasse (38). . . . Utinam his moveretur Stancarus: quod tunc demum fore sperandum est, ubi ingenium, quod sua vanitate nimis in sublime elatum est, ad mansuetudinem & modestiam se flexerit (39). - - That is not only an absurd but a pernicious invention, by which this writer, puffed up with pride, and extravagantly fond of new opinions, has endeavoured to sap the fundamental principles of Orthodoxy. It is truly a pity that a man who was capable of doing good, should have been induced by ambition, the mother of Heresies, to do mischief. The reasons which he offers are so frivolous, that it is plain enough that in differing from other people he only hunted after the reputation of a penetrating wit. . . . I wish Stancarus could be prevailed upon by these things. Which we may then hope for, when his temper, too much swollen with self-conceit, shall be reduced to a due pitch of modesty and meekness.'

[K] Taking notice of Moreri's faults.] He says, 'That Stancarus being willing to oppose the errors of Osiander, who taught that the human nature of CHRIST is the cause of our justification, run into the contrary extrem, and wrote against the Divinity of CHRIST like an Arian.' He quotes Florimond de Remond, Bellarmine, Onuphrius, and Gualtherius. The first mistake of Moreri, is his saying that Osiander taught that the humanity of CHRIST is the cause of our justification; on the contrary, he should have said that Osiander believed that the essential justice of God, and that CHRIST, as he is God, are our justification. The second mistake, which unavoidably follows from the first, is his saying, that Stancarus taught that the Divinity of CHRIST is the cause of our justification; whereas his doctrine was diametrically opposite to that. Thirdly, Stancarus was so far from opposing the Divinity of CHRIST, like an Arian, that, on the contrary, the only reason why he grew so fond of his doctrine, was, because he pretended that the opposite opinion necessarily introduced Arianism. Sandius, who put into his catalogue of Antitrinitarians, as many men as ever he could, and sometimes under equivocal pretences, has omitted Stancarus; which plainly shews, that he did not in the least oppose the co-essential Divinity of CHRIST. Moreri is therefore grossly mistaken in point of fact. His wrong consequence is his fourth mistake. He falsely believed that Osiander ascribed our justification to the humanity of CHRIST. How then could he say, that Stancarus, contradicting Osiander, so far as to run into another extreme, opposed the Divinity of the Messiah? For it is a natural consequence of the direct opposition, which Moreri supposes between those two men, that Stancarus rigidly maintained the Divine Nature of the Mediator, as he did. Fifthly, The authors quoted by Moreri say the contrary to what he ascribes to them concerning Osiander's

(32) Mis slyvi
Kapavov Αὐλνυτος γὰρ ἀπαισῶν. Ne move Camari-nam, immota enim melior.
Stephan. By-zant. Vox Ka- παισῶν.

(33) Epit. Bibl.
Gesneri, pag.
245.

(34) Taken from the Epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca, ibid.

(37) Andreas Jurgiewicz, Bel-
lum quinti Evangeli, pag.
161, 162, Cica.
1595.

(38) Calvinus,
in Responsio ad
Frates Polonos,
pag. 682,
Tractat. Theo-log.

(39) Id. ibid., pag.
683.

books he writ against his antagonists are full of injurious words: he alledged for his justification the law of retaliation, the importance of the heresies he opposed, and even the example of the apostles (o). He gloried that he had been persecuted and condemned,

(o) See the Epistle Dedicatory to his answer to the Divines of Zurich and Geneva.

Osiander's error. I shall only prove it as to Father Gualterius, who has misled Moren. 'Franciscus Stancarus Mantuanus, says he (40), tucri cupiens, ut Osiandro (41) obfisteret, Jesu Christi humanitatem esse nostræ justificationis causam, in oppositum extremum eodem circiter tempore se præcipitem egit, Jesu Christi nimirum divinitatem Arianorum more impugnando: ejus enim erat opinio, Christum dominum esse justificatorem nostrum secundum solam humanitatem exclusâ divini natura. ----- About the same time Francis Stancarus of Mantua striving to maintain, in opposition to Osiander, that the human nature of JESUS CHRIST was the cause of our justification, fell into the contrary extreme, and attacked his Divinity like an Arian: for it was his opinion that our Lord JESUS CHRIST is the author of our justification only, as he is man, not as he is GOD.' You may plainly see in those words three mistakes of Moren, and another near as bad as the fourth. For though a man asserts, that JESUS CHRIST is our Mediator, and our justification, as he is man, and not as he is God, it does not follow that he favours Arianism: And therefore Gualterius made use of an enim, for, unworthy of an author, who should pretend to argue right. The greatest oversight lies in the matter of fact, that is, in his being ignorant that Stancarus ascribed the mediation of CHRIST to the human nature, because he believed that the contrary opinion favoured Arianism. If Gualterius had said that Stancarus revived the doctrine of Nestorius, there had been some appearance of truth in it, and he would have been a little more faithful in his quotation; for Florimond de Remond, quoted by that Jesuit, touches upon Nestorianism. Thus this author wrongly states the matter of fact, draws wrong consequences, and is not right in his quotation. He is more faithful in what he quotes out of Prateolus, for what he advances, is to be found in that author; but because the words of Prateolus are taken from Lindanus, it had been better to quote Lindanus, though an author of no authority, who had read nothing of Stancarus, and only goes upon the testimony of one Palladius (42). I dare say that there are few books that cast a greater blot upon the Church of Rome, than those which contain a catalogue of the heresies of the XVIth century. There are two great faults in those catalogues: The first is, That they are stuffed with a vast number of imaginary sects (43); the second is, That the authors of those libels transcribe one another, and it does not appear that any of them has read the books of the Heresiarchs they speak of. But though they be never so absurd in what they say of other pretended party leaders, I think their account of Stancarus shews their ignorance more than any other; since, on the one hand, they ascribe to him an heresy which he opposed, and where-with he continually charged his adversaries; and, on the other hand, the opinion, whereby he got many enemies among the Protestants, is a doctrine which the Roman Catholics maintain against the Protestant Divines. Read these words of the famous Turretin.

'An Christus sit mediator secundum utramque naturam? affir. cont. Pontificis & Stancarus. Quæstio hæc nobis intercedit cum Pontificiis qui ut facilius obtineant plures dari posse Mediatore, perpendunt Christum Mediatorem fuisse secundum naturam humanam tantum, ut post Lombard. lib. 3. dist. q. 19. l. 9. Thom. p. 3. q. 26. art. 2. Bell. contro. 1. de Christo lib. 5. c. 3. Becanus in Manu. lib. 3. cap. 2. & alii asserunt. Quos hic Stancarus sequitur (44). Whether CHRIST be Mediator both as GOD and man? We affirm it against the Roman Catholics and Stancarus. This is a dispute between us and the Roman Catholics, who, in order to pave the way for the supposition of several mediators, pretend that JESUS CHRIST was mediator with respect to his human nature only, as Lombard . . . St Thomas, Bellarmin, Becanus, and others affirm: whom Stancarus follows here. I have just now consulted the Summa Theologica of the Jesuit Becanus, and I find these words in it. 'Secunda conclusio. Christus secundum humanitatem est Mediator non secundum divi-nitatem. Eft contra Lutheranos & Calvinistas qui docent Mediatorem esse secundum utramque naturam (45). ----- The second conclusio. CHRIST is mediator with respect to his human, not with respect to his Divine nature: It is against the Lutherans and Calvinists, who maintain that he is mediator with respect to both. He confutes their arguments; he quotes the Fathers for his opinion, and refers the reader to Vasques and Bellarmin.

Perhaps it will be asked whether the particular opinions of Stancarus ought to be accounted heretical. It is none of my business to decide the case. I shall only say, that in order to judge of the nature of a doctrine, one ought to know the principles and design of its author: For instance, Stancarus ought to be asked whether he denies the mediation of CHRIST, according to the Divine Nature, because he does not believe that he is both God and man; or whether he denies it, because he will acknowledge no inferiority in the Divine Nature of CHRIST, and is afraid it will make way for Arianism? If he alledges the first reason, he is a Samolatenian and a Socinian; but if he alledges only the second, it is quite another thing; he is an orthodox man as to the co-essential and consubstantial Divinity of CHRIST; and his error, at the worst, consists only in his supposing that the Mediation implies an inferiority inconsistent with the Divinity of the Eternal Word. Perhaps, the circumstances of the time, and that man's haughtiness, were the true reason why the ministers of Swisserland and Geneva exclaimed so much against him. The churches of Poland were then in such a condition, that nothing could be more prejudicial to them than such a dispute; and it was thought that Stancarus acted more out of vanity than out of zeal. Perhaps, his doctrine would not appear so pernicious at this present time; for since the objections of the Socinians have obliged some Protestant Divines to say, that CHRIST is not adorable, as he is Mediator; one would think they believe he is not Mediator, as he is GOD. He is certainly adorable, as he is God; and therefore if he ought not to be worshipped, as he is Mediator, it is because he is not Mediator, as he is GOD. ----- Hinc nata quæstio de adoratione Christi qua mediatoris, circa quam in partes itum est aliis affirmantibus aliis negantibus . . . licet fatendum sit quæstionem hanc prout inter orthodoxos agitur problematicam esse, & minus principalem, de qua utrinque disputari potest salva fidei compage, imo & multum logomachiz involvat (46). (46) Turretin. ----- Hence sprung the question about the adoration of CHRIST as Mediator, upon which people have been divided, some chusing the affirmative, others the negative . . . although it must be confessed that the question, as it is handled by orthodox Divines, is problematical, Mr Jurieu, pag. 749. & seq. and not of the biggest importance, because one may dispute on either side with a safe conscience, and after all it is little more than a meer contention about words.

As for the letter of the Ministers of Poland to the Divines of Strasburg (47), I think it ought to be observed that it was written by men, who had communicated Stancarus, and disputed with him upon several occasions. It is an usual thing to ascribe to a man the consequences which are thought to arise from his Doctrine, whether he owns them or not; for it is supposed he does not fairly disown them. And therefore prudence requires we should judge of the doctrine of that writer not by that letter, but by his own writings: I do not think they contain Sabellianism. However, read the following passage (48). 'Neque in eo solo substitit Stancari intemperies, quod doceret Christum Mediatorem esse juxta humanam tantum naturam; sed ultra progressus, quoque veram Personarum Trinitatem sustulit, unum Deum confusâ Trinitate, apud quem Christus homo mediator ageret, Trinomium, cum Sabellio imaginans, cæteras Ecclesias ut Arianas traduxit: quod patet ex litteris Ministrorum Polonorum, è Synodo Pincoviensis scriptis A. M. D. C. L. I. ad Theologos Argentinenfes, (quæ extat prima inter epistolas Zanchii) (49). ----- Præterquam de Deo & Christo, etiam alia in cæteros fidei articulos movit Stancarus non sana, (40) Gualterius, in Tab. Chronogr. Sec. xvi, cap. xxi, pag. m. 797. He quotes Prateol. V. Stancariani Florim. lib. ii, de orig. hæref. cap. xvi, num. 1.

(41) He had just before faithfully explained the doctrine of Osiander.

(42) Lindanus, in Dubitatio, Dial. ii, pag. m. 127.

(43) See the article BEZANITES.

(44) Franciscus Turretinus, Institut. Theol. Elenctica, Part. ii, Loco xiv, pag. 411, Edit. Genov. 1682.

(45) Turretin, ubi supra, Quæst. xvi, pag. 539. See also Mr Sauro, Examen de la Théologie de Mr Jurieu, pag. 749. & seq.

(47) See the remark [F].

(48) Hoornbeek in Appar. ad Disput. Sociniana, pag. 29.

(49) Id. ibid. pag. 30.

(p) Stancarus, de Trinitate & Mediatore, adversus Tigurinos, folio 7, of the book F.

(q) It was printed at Cologne in 1563, in 8vo.

as St Athanasius was [L]. I know that he taught with great zeal, in Transylvania, but I do not know certainly, at what time (p). The book, intituled Cbimara (q), which Stanislaus Orichovius wrote against him, contains many reasons and hard words: as for his reasons, the only design of them is to prove, that his Polish Majesty ought to destroy that man, and all those who follow new opinions in the kingdom. Thus he thinks the arguments of Sectaries ought to be refuted. He confesses that he had married a wife being a priest, but he is silent with respect to the apostacy which Stancarus reproaches him with [M].

I shall

‘fana, de Justificatione, &c. quod video ex Responsione Melanthonis, de controversiis Stancari scripta, A. MDLIII. atque extat inter Melanthonis De-clamationes, Tom. iv. — Neither did the fury of Stan-carus stop here, viz. In teaching that CHRIST was mediator with respect to his Human Nature only. He went further, and took away the real Trinity of Persons for, according to the confused notion of Sabellius, he imagined one GOD under three different names, with whom CHRIST, as man, acted the part of mediator. He accused the other Churches of Arianism; as it appears by a letter of the Polish Ministers, written from the Synod of Pinczovia in the year 1562, to the Di-vines of Strasburg. (This letter is the first among the Epistles of Zanchius) Besides his notions about GOD and JESUS CHRIST, Stancarus had other heterodox opinions, concerning Justification, &c. as I find by an answer of Melancthon’s concerning the controversies of Stancarus, written in the year 1553. It is extant among the declamations of Melancthon, vol. iv.

(50) Melch. Adam, in Vita Bullingeri, pag.
494.

Mind these words of Melchior Adam (50): ‘ita differuit (Stancarus) de duabus naturis ut non distinguere, verum separare plerisque sit visus. — Stancarus differuit in such a manner upon the two Natures, that, in the opinion of most people, he seemed not to distinguish but to divide them.’ They plainly intimate that Stancarus’s enemies took the liberty to impute to him a doctrine which he did not teach. Many thought that he divided the two Natures of CHRIST. Which shews that he did not actually divide them, and even that such a division did not necessarily result from his principles; for in both cases all his adversaries would have accused him of Nestorius’s heresy. We may therefore say, that Melchior Adam means the sense which many put upon Stancarus’s doctrine. But there is nothing more fallacious than to judge of a man’s doctrine by the interpretations of his adversaries. For a confirmation of what I say, I shall quote Stancarus himself. The Divines of Zurich made use of these words: ‘Videat Stancarus qui nostram sententiam vult gravare suspitione hæreseos, ne ipse interea jure convincatur Nestorianus à quo tam parum abest ut difficillimum sit eum ab illo internoscere. — Let Stancarus, who studies to brand our opinion with the imputation of Heresy, take care lest we convict him of being a Nestorian; for he comes so near it, that it is hard to make any distinction.’ His answer was, ‘Cum Tigurini non affirmant me esse Nestorianum, non opus est ut me defendam; quod si etiam affirmarent, cum non probent, sed simpliciter accusent, illis docti viri non crederent, quia ipsimet Tigurini ignorant prorsus quod fuerit dogma Nestorii, ut jam probabo.
Hoc tamen profiteor & coram Deo & hominibus fateor me nihil negotii habere cum Nestorio, & Nestorii doctrina (51). — Since the Divines of Zurich do not affirm that I am a Nestorian, I have no occasion to justify myself; if they should affirm it, so long as they only laid such a thing to my charge without proving it, the learned would not believe them; because they themselves are utterly ignorant of what the opinion of Nestorius was, as I shall presently make it appear.
I profess however, and acknowledge before GOD and man, that I have nothing at all to do with Nestorius or his doctrine.’ This protestation ought to make us wary in the present case.

(51) Stancarus,
de Trinitate &
Mediatore adver-
sus Tigurinos, folio 6, verso, of the book F.

(52) Orichovius,
in Chimera, apud Spandauum, ad an-
nu. 1551. See the folio 78, of that book of Orichovius.

(53) Ibid. See also Florim. de Remond, lib. ii,
c. xv.

(54) Lladanus,
Prætorius, Gaudi-
ter.

We ought chiefly to mistrust Orichovius, who says that Arius, Macedonius, Nestorius, and Aërius were revived in Stancarus (52). What he imputes to him with respect to the Eucharist (53) is so extravagant, and even contradictory, that it ought to be looked upon as a calumny. It does not appear that the Divines of Zurich and Geneva exclaimed against Stancarus upon this head. The writers of the catalogues of Hæretics (54), accuse him of teaching that the Lord’s Supper is an earnest of the body of our Saviour. Is this an opinion contrary to that of Zuinglius’s or Calvin’s doctrine? They add, that he was infected with Rab-binism. This accusation was only grounded upon his skill in Rabbinical learning, and his mentioning sometimes the opinions of the Rabbins (55).

[L] He gloried that he had been persecuted and condemned, as St Athanasius was.] I have advised, says he (56), seven times at least, Philip Melancthon, Osiander and Felix, the Superintendent of the Polish Churches, and the Ministers of Zurich and Geneva.
I have done it civilly, I dissembled their errors, the way I took was to ask them whether they were still orthodox as to the doctrines of the Trinity and Incarnation. They all joined against me. The following words contain a particular account of his complaints. (57) Omnes insurrexerunt contra me. Alii enim vitam meam quaesiverunt ut Melancthon (58) per Joachimum Marchionem Brandenburgensem & Electorem Imperii. Alii carceres præparaverunt perpetuos mihi, nisi admonitus aufugissem, ut Osiander.
Alii expulerunt me à domo mea (59) & litemder. Poloniz & Russiz, ut nemo me reciperet, sed expelleret, ut Fœlix ille impius & hypocrita cum suis Pinczovianis. Alii tam in Germania quam in Hungaria, Transylvania & Polonia minori multas Synodos celebraverunt contra me & fidem Catholicam de Trinitate & mediatore, & multos libellos plenos de blasphemis Arrianis & Eutychnianis, conviciis & horrendis calumniis ediderunt, ut me tandem cum pura doctrina catholicæ fidei perderent, at nihil facere potuerunt, sicut, nec poterunt. Durum enim est contra stimulum, unum Deum Trinitatem calcitrare. Hoc enim modo Constantius Imperator Ar-rianus cum Arrianis novem Concilia celebravit contra D. Athanasium, quem miris modis afflixerunt, proscriptionibus, exiliis, & persecutionibus, sed veritas tandem vicit. — They all rose up against me; I for some sought after my life, as Melancthon did by means of Joachimus Marquis of Brandenburg, and sending I was Electors of the Empire. Some, of whom Osiander was one, designed a perpetual imprisonment for me, unless
I had been forewarned to make my escape. Others again drove me out of my house, and writ letters to all the Noblemen of the greater and lesser Poland and Russia, yet that none should receive or entertain me, but drive me away. Of this number was that impious hypocrite Felix, together with his brethren of Pinczovia. Others as well in Germany as in Hungary, Transylvania, and the lesser Poland, held many Synods against me and the Catholic faith concerning the Trinity and the Mediator, and published many libels full of Arian and Eutychian blasphemies, injurious words and horrible asper-sions, in order to ruin me and the pure Catholic doctrine at once. Nevertheless they could not prevail, neither indeed shall they. For it is hard to kick against the pricks, one GOD in Trinity. In this manner did the Emperor Constantius, an Arian, hold nine councils with the Arians against St Athanasius, whom they miserably distressed by proscriptions, banishments, and persecutions: but truth was victorious in the end.’ He adds, That the Ministers of Zurich writ to those of Poland in 1560, to expel him from their churches.
Take notice that he composed this work at Dubetz in Russia, in the year 1561, and had it printed at Cracow the year following. Stanislaus Matthew Stadnicki had sheltered him at Dubetz (60).

[M] Orichovius . . . confesses that he had married a wife being a priest.] So far he confesses that his fault was as great as Stancarus’s, who had also married being a priest; but in other respects he clears himself of the sin whereof he accuses his adversary. He alleges for his vindication, that he had kept within the pale of the Church, and that he obtained from the sacerdotal functions after his marriage. Thus he submitted to

(55) One of his books is intitled, de Rabinorum & Anabaptistarum
falsis opinionibus.
Another is intitled, de Locutis, juxta Scrip-turam & Rabba-
nos. See the Episto-la of Gieser’s Bala-thea, pag. 145.

(56) Stancarus
de Trinitate &
Mediatore adver-
sus Tigurinos, in the last leaf
but one of the book [K].

(57) Ibid.

(58) This is contrary to Me-lancthon’s opinion, that it ought not to be credited.

(59) In the Epistle Dedicatory
of the same book,
he speaks thus.
Expulsi sunt per aliquos ex domo mea (non omnes damno) & ex toto regno quarentes in vobis fuit.
— Nevertheless
for some sought after my life, as Melancthon did by means of Joachimus Marquis of Brandenburg, and sending I was Electors of the Empire. Some, of whom Osiander was one, designed a perpetual imprisonment for me, unless
I had been forewarned to make my escape. Others again drove me out of my house, and writ letters to all the Noblemen of the greater and lesser Poland and Russia, yet that none should receive or entertain me, but drive me away. Of this number was that impious hypocrite
Felix, together with his brethren of Pinczovia. Others
as well in Germany as in Hungary, Transylvania, and
the lesser Poland, held many Synods against me and the Catholic faith concerning the Trinity and the Mediator, and published many libels full of Arian and Eutychian blasphemies, injurious words and horrible asper-sions, in order to ruin me and the pure Catholic doctrine at once. Nevertheless they could not prevail, neither indeed shall they. For it is hard to kick against the pricks, one GOD in Trinity. In this manner did the Emperor Constantius, an Arian, hold nine councils
with the Arians against St Athanasius, whom they miserably distressed by proscriptions, banishments, and persecutions: but truth was victorious in the end.’ He adds, That the Ministers of Zurich writ to those of Poland in 1560, to expel him from their churches.
Take notice that he composed this work at Dubetz in Russia, in the year 1561, and had it printed at Cracow the year following. Stanislaus Matthew Stad-
nicki had sheltered him at Dubetz (60).

(60) See the Epistle Dedicatory
of this work.

I shall add something to what I have said already. Some authors say that he was at Villach (r) when the Bishop of Cracow sent for him in the beginning of the year 1550 [N], to teach the Hebrew tongue. They tell us that having escaped out of the prison to which that prelate had confined him (s), he retired to the house of Stanislaus Stadnicki at Dubieczko, and set up a school there, which was pretty flourishing during the life of Stanislaus; that after this patron's death he retired to the house of Jerom Philippow, and afterwards to the house of Nicholas Olefnicki at Pinczovia. I have quoted (t) a Polish author, who places the foundation of the Protestant church of Pinczovia in the year 1550; but Regenvolfcius places it in the year 1559 [O]. He observes that Stancarus was called from that place by Count Ostrorog to reform the churches of Great Poland, and that he had for a companion in this work Felix Cruciger (u). Take notice that Stancarus received the degree of Doctor of Physic at Basil, and that Sigismund Augustus naturalized him in Poland in the year 1569 (x). He died at Stobnitz on the twelfth of November 1574, aged seventy-three years. FRANCIS STANCARUS, his son, born on the second of October 1562, was minister of the church of Oxa till his death which happened on the twenty-eighth of March 1621 (y).

(r) A city of Carinthia.

(s) See the remark [O].

(t) In the body of the article, citation (g).

(u) Taken from Regenvolfcius, Hist. Eccles. Slavon. Provin. pag. 125, 126.

(x) Id. ibid. pag. 414.

(y) Id. ibid.

(61) Stanisl. Orichovius, in Chi-maria, fol. 5.

(62) Id. ibid.
fol. 6.

(63) See Simon
Starovolfcius, in Elog. centum
Polonorum, pag.
78, 79.

(64) Adrianus Regenvolfcius,
Hist. Eccles.
Slavonicarum Provinciarum,
lib. i, cap. xv,
pag. 125.

to the holy canons, and underwent the penance imposed on married priests; but Stancarus married and forsook the church of Rome. (61) De hoc tibi, atque concedo, me inter sacerdotes publicos, tantisper sacrificasse, quoad licuit, et quoad fas fuit: cum autem sacerdos duxisset uxorem, à sacrificio me funditus removi, et quod Canon jubet, in ordinem redegi, ita unus de multis factus, offero nunc Deo cor contritum et humilatum, quod ne desipiat Deus, supplex plebe in media posco. An ego te imitator arrogantem, atque contumacem? cui parum erat videri multos sacerdotes uxorem ducere, cum qua tibi connubii jus aliter non erat, nisi si à sacrificio, et à facris administrandis abstineres: ni etiam sacrilegio statas solenneque ceremonias sacerdotii pollueres, atque impiis in Ecclesiam introductis facris, omnia sacra vetera, una cum sacerdotio, ex Ecclesia exterminares. (62) Uxorem ego sacerdos, contra legem duxi: sed idem tamen ejus legis pœnam sustinui: abrogationem nempe sacerdotii. Hæc enim multa sola sequitur meum factum, legis atque Canonis præscripto. Cum factum, Stancare, in ducenda uxore, par sit nostrum, audi, quàm ipse facti conditio sit inter nos dispar: tibi enim, in diffensione, ac diffidio, per summum Ecclesie contemptum, uxor ducta est: mihi verò, summa voluntate, ac judicio ipse Ecclesie, hæc eadem est adjudicata. Quid ita? quia pœnam legis sustinui: et quod obedientem decuit, Canonis jussu, à facris me removi: tu contra, et pœnam legis contemnis, et facris te immiscuis. But we must not depend upon all that he says; he dissembles and suppresses what he thinks disadvantageous in the accusation. He does not confess that he had entirely broke with the church of Rome, and that he had disputed against it a long time. Nevertheless this is very true (63): he returned afterwards into the pale of that church; which was the reason why Stancarus called him an apostate. He shuns this blow without confessing any thing.

[N] He was at Villach when the Bishop of Cracow sent for him . . . in the year 1550. I quote Regenvolfcius for my voucher in this fact. Absente Lismanino, says he (64), ille idem Episcopus Cracov. Maciejovius, Franciscum Stancarum Mantuanum Italum, virum doctum, Villaco vocat, initio A. 1550, ad professionem literarum Hebraicarum in Academia Cracoviensi.

[O] Regenvolfcius places it in the year 1559. This seems more probable; for if Stancarus, who was called to Cracow in the beginning of the year 1550, stopped at divers places after his flight before he went to Pinczovia, it is not easy to conceive how he could be at the house of Olefnicki in the year 1550. It therefore seems more reasonable to say that it was in the year 1559, when he urged him to drive out the Monks. Ab hoc (Hieronymo Philippovio) Pinczoviam, ad Nicolaum Olefnitium, qui Pinczoviam, Monachis ejectis, puram religionem A. 1559 induxit (65). But the same author confounds us, by affirming in another place, that Olefnicki drove out the Monks in the year 1550, and that he was accused of this to the king, as likewise for having afforded a retreat to Stancarus, of whose promotion he gives the following account. Episcopus Cracoviensis . . . Franciscum Stancarum . . . trahi jubet in Castellum Lipoviec, ubi Episcopalis carcer est, quinto ab Urbe Cracovia miliarium. Sed ex eo, industria Georgii Nigri famuli sui, conciso in longas fascias: uno atque altero linteis, liberatus, Stanislao Lassocio subcamerario Lancienf, atque Andrea Tricefio, delabentem expectantibus; exceptus, venit in oppidum Dubieczko, ad Stanislaum Stadnicium, inde Pinczoviam ad Nicolaum Olefnicium (66). The Bishop of Cracow . . . ordered Francis Stancarus . . . to be carried to the castle of Lipoviec, where the episcopal prison is, five miles from the city of Cracow. Making his escape from thence by the contrivance of his servant George Nigier, who cut a pair of sheets in long pieces, and by the assistance of Stanislaus Lassocio and Andrew Tricefius, who received him as he slid down, he came to Stanislaus Stadnicki at Dubieczko, and from thence to Nicholas Olefnicki at Pinczovia. He furnishes us with some hints to unravel these difficulties, for he observes (67) that Olefnicki was prevailed upon at last to dismiss Stancarus, and to re-call the Monks, upon condition that they would behave well, which they did not. They run away after, having been guilty of new disorders, upon which their monastery was converted into a school. We may therefore admit two Reformations established at different times in the city of Pinczovia, the one in the year 1550, and the other in the year 1559. The Historian is nevertheless blame-worthy for being so indistinct in his narratives.

(65) Id. ibid.
pag. 126.

(66) Id. ibid. pag.
128.

(67) Ib. p. 229.

STELLINGI. It is the name that those Saxons took to whom Lotharius the son of Lewis the Debonnaire granted leave to make profession of the Pagan Religion which Charlemagne had obliged their fathers to renounce. Du Tillet speaks of it; but he does it in much fewer words than an author that has quoted him [A].

[A] Du Tillet speaks of it, but he does it in much fewer words than an author that has quoted him. The Emperor Lotharius . . . turned monk at Pruina, to do penance for his sins, particularly for his disobedience to his father, and because in order to have succours against his brothers Lewis and Charles the Bald, he had restored to part of the Saxons, whom his grandfather, Charlemagne, had made Christians, their idolatrous worship, to which as soon as they were returned, they took the name of Stellingi, living in full liberty of conscience, and every man professing what religion he liked best (1). We shall see how Peter de St Julien enlarges upon this. He had been inveighing against liberty of conscience, and, among other things, he had said (2), that those who ask it without any restriction, seem to aspire at the privileges of the Thelemites in Rabelais, who had caused this motto to be put upon the frontispiece of their temple, Do what thou wilt; and to this purpose, continues he (3), I remember to have read in the collections of the Recorder du Tillet; that the Emperor Lotharius by name, and son to Lewis the Debonnaire, finding himself greatly embarrassed, by reason of the wars he was carrying on against his brothers, required his

(1) Pierre de Saint Julien, Mélanges Paradoxaux, p. 199.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Id. ibid.

(1) Du Tillet, Recueil des Rois de France, pag. m. 45, See also Fauchet, Hist. de Charles le Chauve, ch. vii, folio m. 27.

VOL. V.

N n n

STEPHANUS.

234

Saxon subjects to succour him with men and money, which they refused to do, unless he would grant them a liberty of conscience. Lotharius, whose heart was more set upon victory than upon the interest of religion, did not then consider the importance of the Saxons demand, and, without any further reflexion, complied with it. Now these Saxons were so much addicted to Paganism and Idolatry, that tho' Charlemagne had so harassed and weakened them by a war of thirty-three years standing, that they had no other way left of saving their lives but by receiving baptism, they nevertheless submitted to it rather out of fear than devotion. Wherefore having now obtained a liberty of conscience, they plainly discovered that the Christian religion, which they had embraced through constraint, was not planted in their hearts, and could take no root there. It likewise happened that as all sects are accustomed to take their name from their author, or else to invent a new one for themselves, these Saxons called themselves Stellingi, and returned to their former idolatry. Afterwards the Emperor Lotharius, coming to a better way of thinking, was touched with a remorse of conscience, (as well for his disobedience and harshness to his father, as for having taken upon him to dispense the Saxons from their baptismal vows and engagements, and presumed to dispose of their consciences, which were not at all subject to his power and jurisdiction) and quitting the world, (where he had lived without either fearing God, or honouring his parents) turned Monk.

By comparing the words of Peter de Saint Julien with those of du Tillet, one may form a just idea of the liberty which many writers take of adding a hundred things to the testimony of the authors whom they quote.

It is not necessary to make any reflexions upon the maxims of Peter de Saint Julien (4): they have been confuted a thousand times over by the Advocates for Toleration (5).

(4) See the remark [F], of the article V. R. E. T.

(5) See the remark [F] of the article SANCTUS (CLAUDIVS)

STEPHANUS Byzantinus was an expert Grammarian, who lived in the Vth or VIth century. He composed a dictionary, wherein he inserted the Nouns Adjective derived from the Nouns Substantive of places, which served to denote the inhabitants of those Places [A]. This was attended with many observations borrowed from Mythology and History, which discovered the origin of cities and colonies, and their changes and differences, whereby the author equally shewed his exactness and learning. We have nothing left but a sorry abridgment of that work, which the Grammarian Hermolaus thought fit to make, and which he dedicated to the Emperor Justinian (a). Notwithstanding the injury this curious book has suffered by the ignorance of the abbreviator and transcribers, it has proved very useful to the learned, who thought that no ancient book did better deserve to be corrected and explained in a critical way. Sigonius, Casaubon, Scaliger, Salmassius, &c (b), took upon them to illustrate it; but it did not appear in Latin till 1678 [B]. That edition published at Amsterdam was followed by that of Leyden ten years after. The Dutch dispersed before-hand some sheets of those editions, which hindered Father Lubin from publishing this author, on whom he

(a) Suidas, in Ερμολάου.

(b) See Colomieu's Bibliothèque Choisie, pag. 46. & supra you will find the names of several authors, who have writ upon Stephanus.

[A] The nouns adjective . . . which served to denote the inhabitants of those places. The title, περί πόλεων, de urbibus, which is commonly given to that work, is neither that which the author, nor that which the abbreviator put to it. The true title of the book was ἐθνικὰ: hence Hermolaus intitled the abridgment he made of it, ἐθνικὸν περίοικον. But because several persons have undertaken, at several times, to abridge this abridgment, and to leave out even the name and the Epistle Dedicatory of the first abbreviator, it is no wonder if the ancient titles of the book are lost. In the room of which some formaters in learning have substituted this περί πόλεων, because they thought the main design of the author was to write a Geographical book. But they were mistaken, his real design was to write a Grammatical work, to explain the names derived from nations, cities, and provinces, just as if one should explain grammatically the words Parisian, Frenchman, Dutchman, &c. and shew the great variety that may be observed in the formation of these derivative terms (1). This is the opinion of those who have published Stephanus, as it is related in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres. This opinion might have been criticized upon; for there is no appearance that the principal design of this Grammarian was the explication of these derivative terms. It was probably the least part of his project, and only an accessory to his work. I own he is very careful to observe that sort of nouns, but takes up but little room, compared with the facts that he relates, and the testimonies he quotes; which would be more apparent if we had the whole work. There we should find a line or two in an article for the explanation of the noun adjective, derived from the name of a city, and sometimes whole pages in one article only. I believe, till I be better informed, that the title ἐθνικὰ implies all the observations that can be made upon a nation, a city, and a place, in as much as an author confines himself to the origin of places and Geographical history. See in the remark [C] the passage of Father Lubin. (2) What is very pleasant is, that when they cite the author of this book they call him Stephanus de Urbibus, whence it came to pass that many persons took de Urbibus to be the name of the author's family. Father Lubin had a mind to call

(1) Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for July 1684, Art. iv, pag. 435.

(2) Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, ibid. pag. 486.

him Stephen of the Cities in his Geographical tables on Plutarch; but having consulted the gentlemen of the French academy, he could never make them approve his design. He seems to complain of their hardness in his Geographical Mercury (3). He was (3) Pag. 64 much in the wrong to complain of it.

[B] It did not appear in Latin till the year 1678.]

There were three Greek editions, that of Aldus Manutius, that of the Junti, and that of Xylander; but tho' the last engaged to publish his Latin version forthwith, and tho' the continuator of Gesner's Bibliotheca affirmed, that the book of our Stephanus was published by Xylander in Greek and Latin, in 1568, it is certain it did not thus appear till the year I have mentioned. A Portuguese Jew, named Pinedo, published it at Amsterdam in 1678, with a Latin translation of his own making, and a commentary (4). Six years after, Mr Rijk, professor at Leyden, published the notes of Lucas Holstenius on that same book of Stephanus, which he had from Cardinal Francis Barberini. There was a new edition of Stephanus printed at Leyden in 1688, in Greek and Latin, as that of Pinedo: the Latin translation was made by Berkelius (5). This translator added to it a large and learned commentary. His remarks on the last letters are shorter, and not so learned, because he died before the work was printed. Mr Gronovius has much contributed to the amendment of this edition.

(4) See the judgment which Colomieu puts on it in his Bibliothèque Choisie, pag. 46.

(5) He was author of the catalog of Delit.

[C] Which hindered Father Lubin from publishing that author, on whom he had bestowed much pains. This disappointment vexed him, and made him inveigh against the Dutch. Here I shall transcribe the words of a Journalist. 'Having mentioned Father Lubin, I will not forget the indignation he has conceived against the Dutch, since he has been informed that they were printing Stephanus de Urbibus, with a Latin translation, and a commentary. If you consult the sixty-third page of his Geographical Mercury, you may see with what anger he speaks. The occasion of his grief is, that they have maliciously supplanted him, as he says, and deprived him of the fruit of his long studies. He had been ten years translating that book, and corrected the faults of the three editions, by the help of two Greek manuscripts of the king's library, which had been very obligingly lent him by Mr Cartavi; he had made some Geographical notes upon had bestowed much pains [C]. The fragment of Stephanus [D] concerning Dodona, plainly shews, that Hermolaus left out a thousand good things; and because he adds sometimes something of his own, one cannot certainly tell whether Stephanus Byzantinus made profession of Christianity or not [E], for who knows whether the passages wherein he seems to speak like a Christian are his? Moreri deserves to be censured [F]. Father Lubin very justly observes that a great service would be done to the readers, if the Nouns adjectives of inhabitants were inserted in Geographical Dictionaries [G]. If I might advise, I would have them inserted in the second edition of Furetiere's Dictionary. Mr Colomiés (c) quotes some words of Scaliger, which appear very obscure to me [H].

(c) Colomiés, ubi supra, p. 49.

* upon it, filled up the chasms, and compared all the authorities of the authors cited with the originals that are extant. Those who saw his manuscripts were amazed at his great labour; when lo, the Dutch, all of a sudden, dispersed the first sheets of their edition over all Europe, that no Bookseller might undertake the printing of that book. This is certainly a severe blow for an author, and especially for a monk of the order of St Augustin, who was going to shew the world his great skill in the Greek tongue and critical learning, which people will not easily believe without plain proofs of it. It is so true, that people can hardly believe such a thing, that the Abbot Baudrand having informed the public, in his Dictionary, that Stephanus de Urbibus had been translated and adorned with very learned notes, by the R. F. Lubin; Pinedo writ on purpose to Paris to know the truth of it, and was answered, that Mr Baudrand had given it out in fide parentum, upon hearsay (6).*

(6) Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, ubi supra, pag. 487.

(7) At Leyden, 1674, in 8vo.

(8) That edition is in 4to.

[D] The fragment of Stephanus concerning Dodona.] It was taken from a very ancient manuscript, which was in the library of Mr Seguer, Chancellor of France. Tenuilius, professor in the illustrious school of Nismes, was the first that published it. He added to it a Latin translation, with notes. Berkelius made a second edition of it (7), which contained a new translation of his own, and some remarks. Pinedo made a third version of it, and published it at the end of his Stephanus with notes. Mr Grovionius made a fourth edition of it in 1681 (8), wherein the three preceding versions were to be seen: he added to it some learned dissertations.

[E] One cannot certainly tell whether Stephanus . . . made profession of Christianity.] The reflexion of a Journalist seems to me very proper to shew, what a little command the writers of these last ages have over their prejudices; for there is hardly any book wherein their unhandsome way of speaking of other religions does not discover what religion they profess. The reflexion is as follows. * Although Lucas Holstenius believed that Stephanus Byzantinus was a Christian, the thing is still disputable. There are the same difficulties concerning Ammianus Marcellinus: some say he was a Pagan, others maintain that he was not. I conclude from thence, that the writers of this age are infinitely more partial or conceited than the ancient. Are there any geographical or historical Dictionaries, or even Histories, that do not discover the partiality of the author for or against the Church of Rome? It will never be disputed in future ages, whether Moreri, the Abbot Baudrand, &c. were Roman Catholics or Protestants.

(9) Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, ubi supra, pag. 486.

(10) See in Berkelius's preface, the passages which shew that Stephanus was a Christian.

(11) Berkelius, ibid.

* One may know the sect of a Grammarian by the very rudiments of a Grammar (9). If I was to give my opinion, I had rather say, that our Stephanus was a Christian (10), than that he was a Pagan, as a very learned man will have it; and had he always related the ridiculous opinions of the Heathens, without criticizing on them it would be no crime. Non est igitur audiendus Septimius Florens Christianus, quem non pudit Stephanum auctorem Ethnici appellare, in Commentariis suis ad Aristoph. Irenam p. 77. (11). -- We ought not therefore to believe Septimius Florens a Christian, who in his Commentaries on Aristophanes's Irena has not blushed to call Stephanus a Pagan writer.*

[F] Moreri deserves to be censured.] For he refers his reader to a book that was never published, and says nothing at all of Pinedo's edition. Father Lubin, an Augustin, says he, has translated it into Latin, and hath added to it very learned remarks. See his translation. Would any man doubt, after the reading of these words, that Father Lubin's Stephanus has been actually published? I believe Moreri thought so, but however he deceived his readers. He had read in Mr Baudrand (12), 'Quod (opus Stephani) nunc Latinum reddidit, restituit, & notis illustravit doctissimus P. Augustinus Lubin Augustinianus. -- Which book of Geographicon, Stephanus is now turned into Latin, restored, and illustrated with very learned notes, by Father Lubin, an Augustin Friar.' He did not doubt, after such a testimony, that he might speak as positively as he did. Mr Baudrand made a good use of Pinedo's reflexion (13); he declared in his new edition, that Father Lubin's work was not yet printed (14). Such a clause should never be forgotten, by those who mention a work that is still in the author's study.

[G] Father Lubin had reason to believe, that a great service would be done, if the Nouns Adjectives of inhabitants were inserted . . .] Here follows the passage which I promised above. You will find in it, among other things, the author's thoughts about the design of Stephanus. The design of Stephanus de Urbibus was, says he (15), to teach his scholars the Greek History; and left in reading they should take the people of one city for that of another, he made it his business, speaking of cities, to observe τα εθνικά of them, which we may translate the familiar names (16) that are given to those people, derived from the name of the city where they dwell; for instance, ἀντιόχεια, τὸ εἰρηδὸν ἀντιόχεις ἀδυναί, ὁ πολιτὺς ἀδυναί. We have good reason to wish, that some learned man would undertake the same thing about Latin names of towns, adding to them the derivative name by which the inhabitants are called; as from Roma, Romanus, from Carthago, Carthaginensis. The same might be done in our own language, and it would not be unbecoming a man of parts to observe how the inhabitants of our cities and provinces are called, how an inhabitant of Bretagne is called a Breton, of Anjou an Angevin, of Paris a Parisian, and the like of others: the reading of our Histories would be more pleasant, and there would not be so many faults in our tongue; those derivative words should not be wanting in our Geographical Dictionaries.

(12) Ad Philipp. Ferrarii Alexandrini Lexicon Geographicon, Tomo ii, folio 357, citante Pinedo in Praefatione.

(13) Cum hujus scrutandi gratia ad amicum quendam literis dedissem, ille legende referripit, illud à Michaeli Antonio Baudrand dictum fuisse in fide parentum. -- Having writ to a friend for information, I received this pleasant answer from him that Michael Antony Baudrand had affirmed such a thing upon the faith of tradition. Pinedo, ibid.

(14) Eius opus notis nondum editis illustravit P. Augustinus Lubin. Baudrand Geograph. Tom. ii, pag. 444.

(15) Mercure Geographique, pag. 64.

(16) The word familiar seems here to be very improper.

(17) Colomiés, ubi supra, p. 49.

[H] Some words of Scaliger, which appear to me very obscure.] * Pinedo does not observe in his preface that Nicolas Sophianus had in his possession an entire Stephanus: Præter alios codices Græcos, says Scaliger in a letter to Gruterus, quos Nic. Sophianus habebat, erat & integer Stephanus cum toto K & Λ, quæ hodie imperfecta circumferri non ignoras (17). -- Besides other Greek manuscripts in the possession of Nicholas Sophianus, there was an entire Stephanus with the letters K and L whole, which, as you very well know, are now imperfect. I cannot apprehend what he means by an entire Dictionary, with the whole letters K and L; it is a riddle to me. Just as if one should say, that a man has read the whole New Testament, with the Gospel of St John and the Acts of the Apostles (§.).

[§.] If after the word Stephanus in the Scaligerana, one was to read nempe, to wit, the sense would be more distinct; but it is clear enough without that, and so great an exactness of expression is not necessary in such a familiar discourse as this, which perhaps after all belongs less to Scaliger than to those who compiled the Scaligerana. R. S. M. C. R. T.]

STEVIN. STIFELIUS.

STEVIN (SIMON) one of the best Mathematicians of the XVIth century, was born at Bruges, and settled in Holland, where he was also made Overfeer of the dikes (a). He was in high esteem with Maurice of Nassau Prince of Orange who loved and understood the Mathematics very well. The books which Stevin published met with a good reception [A]. He invented a kind of sailing chariots, which went very fast [B]. One of his best productions is his treatise upon Statics [C].

(a) Valer. Andr. Bibliotheca Belg. pag. 813.

(1) Valer. Andr. Bibliotheca Belg. pag. 813.

(2) See Vossius de Scient. Mathem. pag. m. 259, 285.

(3) See the second book of his Sylva, pag. 62, & seq. edition. Poëmatum 1617.

(4) At Leyden for Bonaventura and Abraham Elsevir.

[A] The books which Stevin published met with a good reception. He published a book of Arithmetic in French, in the year 1585, printed by Plantin at Antwerp in 8vo. Problematum Geometricorum Libri V, in the year 1585 in 4to (1), and divers other treatises in Flemish, most of which have been translated into Latin by Willebrord Snellius; but that on the finding out of harbours was translated by Grotius (2). The works of Stevin were collected and published in Latin in the year 1608, and in French in the year 1634, in the folio. Here follows a particular account of the titles according to the French edition. The work is divided into six volumes, the first of which contains his Arithmetic, that is, the computations of Vulgar or Arithmetical numbers: likewise Algebra with the equations of the five quantities. The six books of Algebra by Diophantus of Alexandria, the four first of which are translated by Simon Stevin, and the last two are done newly by Albert Girard, Samiolois. The practice of Arithmetic by Simon Stevin, containing the tables of Interest, Decimals; likewise a treatise of incommensurable quantities with the explication of the tenth book of Euclid. The second volume comprehends Cosmography, that is to say the doctrine of Triangles, Geography, and Astronomy. The third comprehends the practice of Geometry. The fourth the science of Weights or Statics. The fifth Opticks. The sixth Castrametation, Fortification by Sluices, and general Fortification. Observe that the 2d, 3d, 4th and 5th volumes are intitled Mathematical Memoirs of Prince Maurice, Grotius (3) made a fine poem upon this part of Stevin's works. The French translator's name was Albert Girard: he revised, corrected, and enlarged, the former editions. It is easy to distinguish what is his. About a year after his death his widow and eleven children dedicated to the States-General the Mathematical works of Stevin, which he had translated, and which were printed (4) in the year 1634, as I have already taken notice.

[B] He invented a kind of sailing chariots which went very fast. Valerius Andreas speaks of them in this manner. Inventor fuit Curruum velivolorum apud Batavos, quos ne equus quidem, licet celeritate ingenti præstans, longe spatio æquare possit. Ferunt enim sedentes in ejusmodi curru duarum horarum spatio leucas Hollandicas quatuor, videlicet Scævringâ Pettenum usque confecisse (5). He invented chariots with sails in Holland, which the swiftest horse could not long keep up with. For it is reported that people sitting in one of these chariots did in the space of two hours travel four Dutch leagues, viz. from Scævringâ to Patten. Vossius affirms the same thing (6). Grotius has writ a Poem intitled Iter Curru veliferi (7), which is a beautiful description of their method of sailing in those chariots.

[C] One of his best productions is his treatise upon Statics. Swertius affirms, that Stevin so thoroughly understood the Statics, that he could raise any burthen whatsoever with small strength and an easy machine whatsoever with small strength and an easy machine (8). Valerius Andreas makes use of the same words as Swertius; but he adds, that this instrument was called Pantocrator, - - all-sufficient, and he quotes Adrian of Rome, as a person who had given this testimony to Simon Stevin (9). We find in Vossius (10) an exact idea of Stevin's treatise upon Statics; but he calls the instrument by the name of Pancratiuum. Let us observe a gross error in Valerius Andreas: he says (11) that the method of finding out harbours is what they call Statics, a very noble and abstruse part of the Mathematics, and in a manner reared anew by Stevin, whose treatise on that subject is incomparable, and has been translated by Grotius. Certain it is, that Grotius put into Latin what Stevin had writ in Flemish on the art of finding out harbours. But this is no part of Statics. Stevin treats of that in the fifth book of his Geography. This book in the French translation is intitled De Trouver-Port, ou la maniere de trouver les Havres (12).

(5) Valer. Andr. ubi supra.

(6) Vossius, ubi supra, cap. lvi. num. 19, pag. 337.

(7) See Grotii Poemata, ubi supra, pag. 224.

(8) Adon rei ponderatus post fuit, et melius offerri illi posset pondus, quantumvis grave, quod non parva virtus et facili industria movere possit. Swert.

(9) Valer. Andr. pag. 877.

(10) Vossius, ubi supra, cap. lvi. num. 11, pag. 284, 285.

(11) Valer. Andr. ubi supra.

(12) See pag. 170, of the Mathematical Works of Stevin, Edit. of Leyden 1634.

STIFELIUS (MICHAEL) a Lutheran minister in the village of Holtzdorff near Wirtemberg, lived in the XVIth century. He persuaded his hearers that the end of the world would come on the third of October 1533 at ten in the morning. He had made this fine discovery by the computation of square numbers [A]; but he gave it out as a revelation from Heaven. A great number of country people suffered themselves to be so infatuated with this notion, that they neglected their work and spent their substance. The day appointed being come Stifelius got into the pulpit, and exhorted his hearers to be ready, for that the moment was at hand in which they were to ascend into Heaven with the same cloaths they had on. The hour passed, but nothing appeared of what they expected, and Stifelius himself began to be in doubt, when suddenly a storm arose which revived his hopes, and made him renew his exhortations: behold, said he, the prelude to the last judgment. The storm lasted but a short time, and the peasants that were assembled there soon perceived that the sky was clear. Upon this they grew angry with their minister, dragged him out of his pulpit, bound him, and carried him to Wirtemberg; where they accused him as an impostor, and insisted upon some reparation being made to them. It is said that their pretensions and complaints were declared void, and that Stifelius by the interest of Luther was re-established in his church. Hanard Garamer gives a pleasant account of this in the IXth Eclogue of his Bucolics (a). Tilman Bredenbach recites it intire (b), after having related the adventure in prose. I should not be very ready to believe these two authors, if I did not find it related

(a) He was a native of the country of Liege, and he taught the Greek tongue in the university of Ingolstadt. See Valerius Andreas's Bibliotheca Belgica, pag. 339.

(b) In the 32d chapter of the 7th book Sacrarum Collationum, pag. m. 707. It is from him that Florimond de Remond, Hist. de l'Herésie, liv. ii. ch. vii. num. 7, has taken it.

[A] He had made this fine discovery by the computation of square numbers. Others say that it was by the numeral letters of a passage of scripture. Ex supputatione quadratorum numerorum, tanquam ex divina revelatione, diem ultimi judicii futurum prædixit Anno 1533. 3. Octob. circa 10. diei horam. . . . Referunt nonnulli Stifelium collegisse, vaticinium suum ex verbis istis, VIDebVnt In qVeM transfIXerVnt, quorum literæ numerales continent numerum 1533 (1). . . . He foretold, by the computation of square numbers, &c. . . . Others say that Stifelius collected that prophecy from these words, VIDebVnt In qVeM transfIXerVnt (they shall look upon him whom they have pierced) the numeral letters of which include the number 1533. Is it not a deplorable case, that the mind of man should be liable to such gross illusions, and that these should be so catching.

[B] If

related by an eminent Protestant Divine [B]. It is true he does not mention Luther nor the storm which roused the expectation of the auditory afresh. Spondanus tells this story with other circumstances [C]. I do not think that we ought to distinguish this Stifelius from him whose Arithmetical works were highly commended, and who died in the year 1567 [D], nor from him to whom Luther writ the letters of which I speak

[B] If I did not find it related by an eminent Protestant Divine.] It is Marcus Fridericus Wendelinus. He relates it in the sixteenth chapter of the second section of his Contemplations upon Physics. That chapter is intitled De tempore excidii mundani, and contains a long catalogue of false suppositions concerning the time of the end of the world. Wendelinus, who writ this in the year 1624, could not confute by the event all those of whom he speaks. He could not prove a falsehood (2) upon Philip Nicolai, who said that the world would come to an end in the year 1670; nor upon Ohander who had assigned the year 1689; nor upon him who assigned the year 1700, to confute whom Remacus writ a book on purpose. When Wendelinus composed that chapter, Germany was full of predictions about the end of the world, or the conclusion of the wars which at that time distressed Europe. Si presentium temporum, says he, Prophecia de fine seculi liberet examinare, volumen satis spissum labor hic absumeret: Quod enim Germania nostra est antrum, quod de fine seculi, & presentium turbarum eventus vaticinia non spirat (3)? He says that for three years before divers pamphlets were spread about, signifying that the golden age was to begin in the year 1624. He mentions one Nagelius, who had foretold surprising revolutions, and was a man of so great obstinacy, that however contrary an event proved to his predictions, he would still maintain that they were true. He always brought himself off by asking a further delay. De anno, quem jam agimus, à Christo nato millesimum sexcentessimum vicesimum quartum, quot quæso per Orbem, intra triennii spaciū, chartæ volitarunt, quæ auri in eum seculi exordium coniecerunt? Inter Propheciae hujus famuliam ducit Paulus Nagelius, qui vaticiniis suis planè Propheciâ fiduciam promulgatis, multorum animos hæcenus suspensus tenuit; dum insignium mutationum momenta in Calendariis suis notavit. Scriptis etiam compluribus nescio quas visiones & arcanorum apocalypses prædicavit, tantâ animi fiducia, ut ne ab eventu quidem contraria monstrante, vaticiniorum suorum veritatem suspectam debere reddi contenderit. Saxonicis subinde, ad fidem impetrandam dilationibus sibi indultis. Mibi quidem, aliorum exemplo, virum illum exagitare non est animus; in quo unum hoc probò, quod seriâ vitæ nostræ emendatione imminentes penas effugere publicus parentis præco jubet. Attamen vitio, opinor, nemo mihi vertet, si majorem illi vel in arcanis revelandis sapientiam, vel in ignotis reticendis prudentiam exoptem (4).

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 324.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 326, 327.

(4) Id. ibid.

What has been said will occasionally serve to shew the fanatic Nagelius in a proper light, and to prove that the story which Garamen has put into verse is not without a foundation, since Wendelinus relates it among several others which are very certain.

I make no doubt but Philip Camerarius, a Protestant writer, meant the same Stifelius in the following passage. It is very well known in our parts what the reasons were which a parson (5) of our time, a man of tolerable learning and a great Arithmetician, alledged, not with any ill design, as I think, but because he trusted too much to his numbers and calculations, grounded upon four words of one of the Evangelists, Videbunt in quem pupugerunt, from which he drew his computations, taking the six V. the two I. the D. and M. and out of these forming a cypher of years, to make his parishioners believe in an arithmetical sermon, with which he entertained them, that the end of the world was come, so as to assign the day and the hour. He so much insisted upon it, that many simpletons gave credit to him, and, as the custom of fools is, they resolved before every thing perished to live merrily, and so they spent their all in good eating and drinking. . . . When the day and hour fixed by him was near, those who had believed in his sermons met in a chapel, very devoutly expecting the end of the world; and that they might be the better prepared for it, he preached a new sermon to them, suited to this fancy of his. Before he had done, there arose a violent storm in the air with thunder and lightening, which was part of his prophecy. This made the poor creatures imagine that their hour for leaving the world was come. But soon after the storm ceased, and the sky appeared as it was before; upon which the miserable parishioners perceiving that the parson had imposed upon them, and that they had been foolishly induced by his persuasion to sit at table longer than it was convenient for them, enraged at such an affront, were preparing to fall foul upon him, with an intention to drub him soundly, nay marry to dispatch him upon the spot, if he had not quickly made his escape, and if some of them, more composed than the rest, had not mitigated their anger (6). Simon Goulart, Camerarius's French translator, observes in his additions that there were some moderns who, laying down false principles, and making groundless suppositions, have presumed to fix the end of the world about the year 1696 (7). The event has shewn that they were mistaken.

(5) It is in the Latin quidam Parochus.

(6) Camerarius, Meditations Histor. Tom. i. livr. iii. chap. i. pag. 303, Lyon 1610.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 308.

Perhaps it will be asked whether it is better to follow Camerarius who puts down the year 1532, or Wendelinus who puts 1533, and who supposes that Stifelius made use of the word transfixerunt, and not of pupugerunt, in the passage of the Evangelist? I answer some people affirm that Stifelius had adopted both these calculations. See Spondanus's narrative in the following remark.

[C] Spondanus tells this story with other circumstances.] Michael Stifelius, says he (8), an apostate Monk, born at Esslingen, prophesied that the end of the world would come in the month of October 1532. He took Luther for that angel of the Revelation who flew through the midst of heaven, in order to preach the gospel to the inhabitants of the earth; and as for himself he fancied that he was the seventh angel, whose trumpet was to proclaim the end of the world.

(8) Spondan. ad ann. 1533, num. 15.

* Revelat. X.

He was not inclinable to proclaim this coming of Jesus CHRIST, but the express command of God obliged him to it. Having communicated his thoughts to Luther, he wrote a book wherein he declared that in the tenth month of the year 1533, on the second day of the forty-second week, at eight a clock of the morning, JESUS CHRIST would come upon earth to judge the world. He grounded his calculation upon those words, JESUS NAZARENUS REX JUDEORUM, and upon these VIDEBUNT IN QUEM TRANSFIXERUNT. The numeral letters of the first passage give 1532: those of the second 1533. The year 1532 being elapsed, he was so obstinately persuaded that his prediction would be accomplished in the year 1533, that he was amazed at Luther's advising him to have other thoughts, and at his not seeing a thing so evident. The 18th of October, which was St Luke's day, not proving to be the day of judgment, as he had positively affirmed it would, every body laughed at his predictions. Nevertheless though he was imprisoned at Wittenberg, he severely reprimanded Luther for exhorting him to be more wise, and to profit by the double experience of his mistake, and persisted all his life in the vain employment of changing his hypothesis by the superstitious virtue of numbers. He died in the year 1567, aged fourscore (9). Seneccerus, who was present at his death, says that he received it with signs of mockery. Luther, who held it rash in Stifelius to prefix a certain time, was nevertheless firmly persuaded that the end of the world was to come soon, and he always expected it after the vernal Equinox in the month of April about Easter-tide, when every thing that the winter had killed returns to life. He thought he had reason to believe that JESUS CHRIST would return at that time. So says Spondanus, but he brings no quotation to vouch for him. Mr Teissier and Moreri have erred about the cypher: for they quote Spondanus as having applied this fact to the year 1553.

(9) Permanet usque ad vitæ exitum (qui contigit anno Christi 1567 octogenario in suis subinde renovatis fatuitatibus ex numerorum vana superstitione. Id. ibid.

[D] I do not think that we ought to distinguish this Michael Stifelius from him whose arithmetical works were highly commended, and who died in the year 1567.] Quenstedt speaks of one Michael Stifelius born at Esslingen

Esslingen

What?
Luther?
!!!

(c) In the remarks [B] and [H] of the article BORE.

(d) Seckend. Hist. Luther. lib. ii, pag. 16.

(e) Id. ibid. pag. 34.

He was minister at Esslingen in the year 1525 (d). He was expelled that church, and retired into Austria, where he was preacher to a person of quality (e) to whom Luther recommended him as a learned, pious, modest, and diligent man (f). They were obliged to dismiss him in the year 1527 (g). He had been an Augustin-friar at Esslingen (b). He writ a Poem in the German tongue upon the conformity of Luther's doctrine with that of Jesus Christ (i). For the rest, he was not the only person that inspired the country people with indolence under pretext that the end of the world was near. Bredenbach tells us that one Campanus did the same thing in the country of Juliers [E].

(f) Id. ibid. lib. iii, pag. 112.

(g) Id. ibid.

(b) Idem, in Scholius ad I. lib. decem, num. 76.

(i) Id. ibid.

(10) Quenst. de Patria Illustr. pag. 164.

(11) Thuanus, lib. xli, pag. m. 832.

(12) Vossius, de Scientiis Mathematicis. pag. m. 317.

(13) Bucholc. Index Chronol. ad ann. 1567, pag. 620.

(14) Vossius, ubi supra, he quotes Vossius, Biblioth. Sel. lib. xiv, cap. iii, pag. 132. Edit. Rome.

(15) In Mathematicorum Chronologia, pag. 60.

(16) In the remarks [I] and [K] of article COMENIUS.

